Infinite Dendrogram

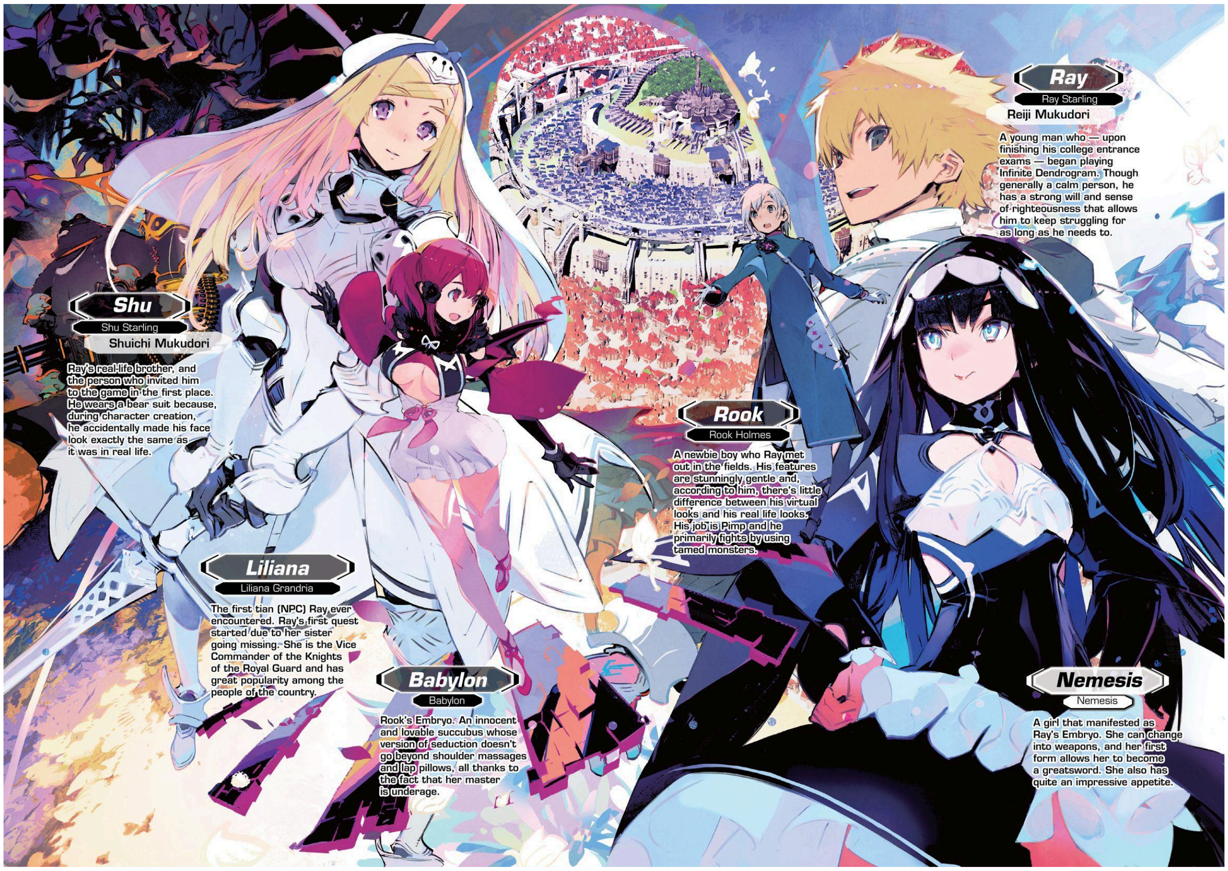
1. The Beginning of Possibility

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
1. The Beginning of Possibility

Infinite Dendrogram
1. The Beginning of Possibility
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki



Shu

Shu Starling

Shuichi Mukudori

Ray's real-life brother, and the person who invited him to the game in the first place. He wears a bear suit because, during character creation, he accidentally made his face look exactly the same as it was in real life.

Liliana

Liliana Grandria

The first tian (NPC) Ray ever encountered. Ray's first quest started due to her sister going missing. She is the Vice Commander of the Knights of the Royal Guard and has great popularity among the people of the country.

Babylon

Babylon

Rook's Embryo. An innocent and lovable succubus whose version of seduction doesn't go beyond shoulder massages and lap pillows, all thanks to the fact that her master is underage.

Rook

Rook Holmes

A newbie boy who Ray met out in the fields. His features are stunningly gentle and, according to him, there's little difference between his virtual looks and his real life looks. His job is Pimp and he primarily fights by using tamed monsters.

Ray

Ray Starling

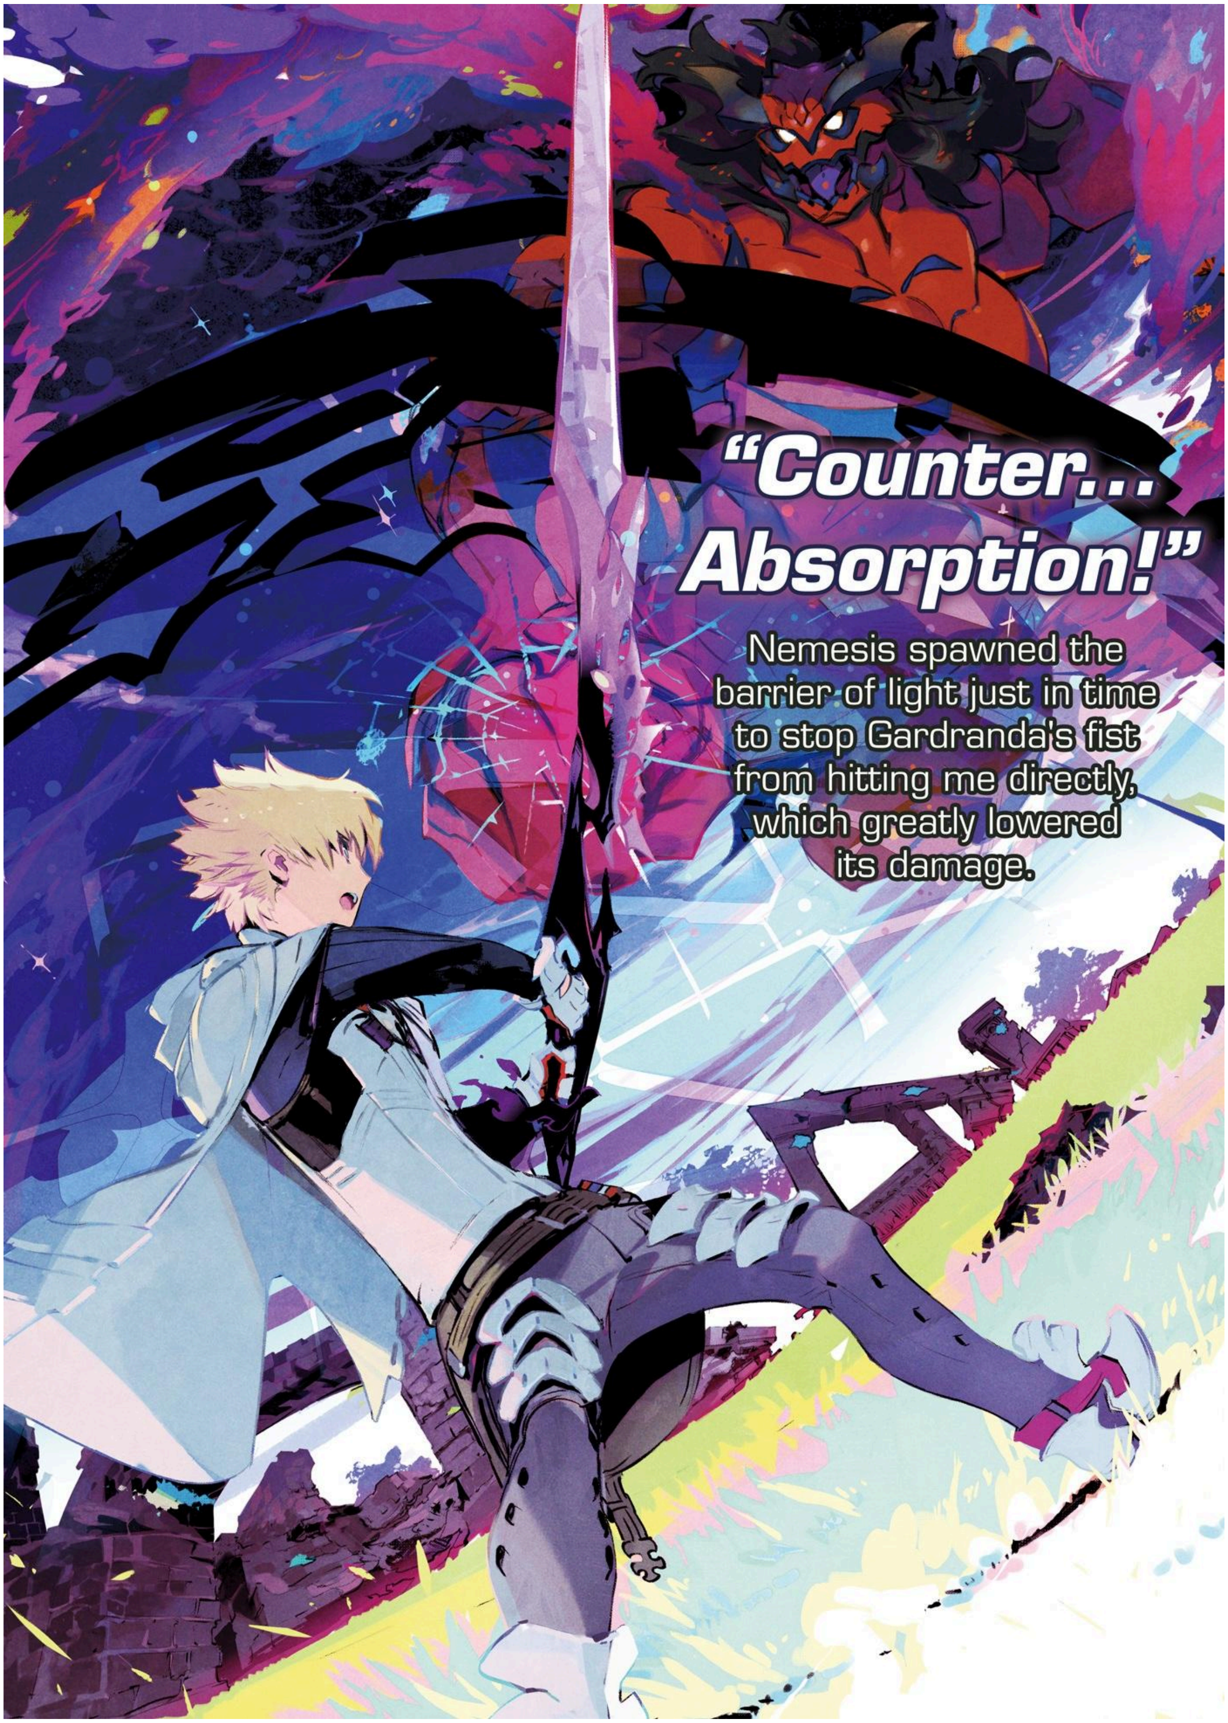
Reiji Mukudori

A young man who — upon finishing his college entrance exams — began playing Infinite Dendrogram. Though generally a calm person, he has a strong will and sense of righteousness that allows him to keep struggling for as long as he needs to.

Nemesis

Nemesis

A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. She can change into weapons, and her first form allows her to become a greatsword. She also has quite an impressive appetite.



“Counter… Absorption!”

Nemesis spawned the barrier of light just in time to stop Gardranda's fist from hitting me directly, which greatly lowered its damage.

Contents

Chapter Zero: Infinite Dendrogram
Chapter One: Nemesis
Chapter Two: Dinner and Intentions
Chapter Three: Start Point
Chapter Four: Tomb Labyrinth
Chapter Five: Superior
Chapter Six: Cat's Tea Party
Chapter Seven: Ordeal of Rookies
Epilogue
Afterword

Chapter Zero: Infinite Dendrogram

July 15, 2043. On this date, the VRMMO Infinite Dendrogram was released around the world. It had been nearly half a century since man had first dreamt of a VRMMO (virtual reality massively multiplayer online) game.

In the 2000s, a variety of media, such as manga, anime, and video games, began to incorporate VRMMOs into their stories as the ultimate "dream game." From among a sea of creative entertainment, people eagerly looked forward to the release of a VRMMO, and in the 2010s, quasi-VR headsets were released, offering enhanced quality of sight and sound immersion.

Although at first a mere product of fantasy, VRMMOs were anticipated, developed, and then finally given form. In the 2030s, a small number of full-dive VRMMO games were released, allowing players to enter game worlds using all five of their senses.

The reason so few were released was due to the difficulty and enormous cost of development. This meant that only companies with leading technology and sufficient resources could even make an attempt. Or perhaps more were attempted, but never completed.

However, the few completed games that did make it out into the world were quickly met with disappointment. Unlike the VRMMOs depicted in fiction, these ones lacked in realism, they assailed the senses with discomfort, and their graphics were hardly any different from existing game systems. Also, despite guarantees of a safe design, players one after another fell ill and were taken to the hospital.

The development companies behind the initial dive VRMMOs all went bankrupt due to poor sales, bad reputations, and numerous lawsuits from afflicted players.

A reviewer from the time had the following to say about these games: "They managed to create the 'dream game,' but they weren't able to create the 'dream.'"

Dive VRMMO games continued to be developed, but none were made that could be considered a success.

That is... until Infinite Dendrogram was released.

◇

The lack of information about Infinite Dendrogram before its release was abnormal.

It was kept secret the whole time, and on the day of release, the developers only made one announcement simultaneously across the global media networks. In it, they presented four key selling points for the game.

First: the five senses would be perfectly simulated.

Second: even if there were 100 million players, all of them would play in the same game world on a single server.

Third: players could choose how they'd view the game world, with options including realistic, 3D CG, and 2D anime.

Fourth: time within the game would flow three times faster than in the real world.

In response to the announcement, voices from around the world could be heard saying: "Is this really even possible?" "Just how much money and tech did they use to make this?" "Even for a case of misleading advertisement, isn't this going a bit far?"

Although the announcement had an impact, people found its content simply absurd. Out of everyone that saw the announcement, and this included non-gamers, 99.9998% didn't believe it and didn't buy the game.

The remaining 0.0002% of people, however, said things like, "It seems like a lie, but what if it's true..." "I'll try it," "I believe it," and they headed into stores to buy the game.

The necessary hardware cost around 10,000 yen, and was an extraordinary, some would even say reckless, pricing scheme. This helped lure in customers, with some saying, "Well, even if it's a lie, it's only 10,000 yen." So they bought it and started playing.

And once they logged into the game... they all knew it was the real thing.

Overcome with amazement at the game's realism, they would log out and look at their clocks, only to be astonished even more. The dreams they saw were all real — the “dream game” was now a reality.

The day after release, amid the clamor set off around the world by posts and comments from those who played the game, the developers released another announcement. This time, the contents of the game were detailed. A man named Lewis Carroll, the lead developer for Infinite Dendrogram, presented the broadcast announcement and said the following:

“The game system in Infinite Dendrogram has a special feature. Rather than relying on thousands of possible combinations of jobs and skills, this feature provides absolute and distinct uniqueness. This feature is the Embryo. It will offer players truly infinite possibilities and unique customization.

“Embryos will respond to personal circumstances and evolve from among an infinity of patterns. These patterns will not merely be different colors and parts, but will even include unique skills, allowing them to be truly limitless in scope. This is what Infinite Dendrogram is all about.

“Yes, Infinite Dendrogram will provide you with a new world and your very own unique possibility.”

These words served as the last trigger needed to turn the game into a giant movement.

◇◇◇

March 16, 2045 — Reiji Mukudori

I, Reiji Mukudori, was sitting on my heels with the game in front of me and a nervous expression on my face.

It probably sounded like an exaggeration, but after waiting a year and a half, I was finally going to be able to play Infinite Dendrogram. So, of course, I was nervous.

“It’s been a long road,” I said.

The game had been announced and released during the summer of my junior year in high school — at the same time I had been motivating myself to do my best on my college entrance exams.

I’m sure there had been other game-loving high schoolers in their junior or senior years who had been left in despair like I had been, thinking, why of all times did such an interesting-looking game have to come out during my entrance exam years?

However, I had now successfully made it into a college in the city, and had taken the opportunity to start living on my own. I had finished moving yesterday, and my parents, who'd helped me, had already returned home.

I can play games as much as I want now!

I had headed to the game store this morning as soon as it opened and purchased a copy of Infinite Dendrogram. For about half a year after its release, it had apparently been difficult to get a hold of a copy, but a whole year and a half later, I was able to buy it without any trouble.

My older brother, by the way, was one of the ones who had bought the game on release day. This whole time, he had been calling me saying, "Hurry up and let's play Dendro together." I hadn't been sure if this made me feel bitter or simply jealous.

But all those feelings end today!

"...Let's do this!" I braced myself and opened the box. Inside, were a helmet-type game system and a manual.

According to the manual, in order to enter the game world, all you needed to do was put on the helmet and turn on the switch. There were other explanations regarding visuals and time as well, but "amazing" would be the only way I could describe them.

Really, just how in the world did they make this game? I wondered. It seems to be ten, maybe twenty years ahead of current technology...

However, now wasn't the time to be scared. Following the instructions and recommendations in the manual, I put on the helmet and lay on my bed facing the ceiling. I then turned on the game.

Instantly, my vision went black.

◇

"Hello and welcommme."

Before I knew it, I was no longer in my room, but in a space that appeared to be the study of a Western-style, wooden building. The voice had come from a cat I had never seen before, which sat in front of me on a seemingly well-made, wooden rocking chair.

...A cat?

"I'm sorry for the intrusion," I said. I was confused, but decided to respond with a greeting first.

"Yes, that's niiice," said the cat. "I like people with proper mannerrrs." The cat spoke in fluent Japanese, but with a slow drawl at the end of his sentences.

"Is this like the game's tutorial or something?" I asked.

"That's riiight. You'll be sent into the game after you finish configuring various settings herrre. Oh, I'm Cheshire, control AI No. 13 for Infinite Dendrograaam. Nice to meet youuu."

Control AI... I see. No wonder it's able to use fuzzy logic in its responses.

Control AIs are man-made cyber intelligences with entire modern supercomputers serving as their brains. Their primary uses, as the name suggests, are in control and management. It's said that just one of them can perfectly, and at high speeds, manage the databases and networks of a small country.

If this one is No. 13, does that mean there are twelve other control AIs of equal ability involved in managing this game?

"Nice to meet you, too," I said.

"All riiight," said the cat. "First up is selecting the graphiiics. Samples of these will alternate, so choose which one you like the best, okaaay?"

After the cat... Cheshire... said this, the surrounding scenery completely changed.

The study I turned into a spacious area — a somewhat Middle Ages European townscape. There were many people walking about, and after a fixed period of time, their appearance would change. Actually, it wasn't their appearance, but rather, the way I saw them was changing. It went from a realistic appearance to CG, from CG to anime, and then back to realistic.

"...Wait, how are you doing this?" I asked.

"Imagery perceived by sight is processed by the brain, after all, so there's a waaay," replied Cheshire. "And so, the way you see can be changed like this, but which one will you go wiiith? You can change it later by using an itemmm."

"I'll leave it as-is," I said.

I thought it would be better to see normally until I got used to the game, so that's what I did. Although I was interested in how it would feel to touch something that looked like it was from an anime.

"Okaaay," said Cheshire, and the scenery reverted back to the study. "Next is your player naaame. What do you want your name to be in the gaaame?"

"I'll go with Ray Starling." This was a name I had often used in games before. It was simply a distorted version of my first name and the English translation of my last name, Mukudori.

"Okay, then I'll set it to thaaat," said the cat. "Next, the settings for your appearaaance."

After Cheshire said this, a featureless mannequin and a bunch of window screens appeared before me. These screens contained words such as "height," "weight," "bust," their corresponding sliders, as well as facial features.

"These are..." I said slowly.

"Use those parts and sliders to make your own avatar for the gaaame," said Cheshire. "Oh, you can also make it into an animal like me, or even change your genderrr."

No, I'm not so sure about changing my gender in a game this realistic...

"It's okay to take your time and think it overrr," said Cheshire. "We have three times the amount of time here than in the real wooorld. ...Oh yeah, there was that one time when someone repeatedly logged in and out and spent one month in Earth time making their avatarrr."

That's a tremendous amount of effort and concentration, so I don't think I'll be able to go that far.

It wasn't just because of the sheer number of sliders and parts, but the values you could set for each of them were way too exact. It was almost like they were telling me to make a real human face.

For a beginner, that's way too difficult, I thought. In that case...

"Can I just use my real appearance as the default and make some changes to that?" I asked.

"You can do thaaat," Cheshire said and waved his tail.

The mannequin turned into me.

"Now you just need to make some changes using this as your baaase," said the cat.

"Thanks," I said.

It was fairly simple after this. I left most of the settings the same, but changed my hair color to blond, and changed my ethnicity as well, which altered my face. While I worked on this, I wondered about what my face would look like if I set it to anime or CG. I'd be able to see it if I played without changing any of the settings, but... no, it's better that I don't play online with my actual face.

And like that, I finished creating my avatar after about thirty minutes or so.

"And... finished," I said.

"Okaaay. Then I'll hand over your starting itemmms." Cheshire waved a padded paw in the air and a bag fell from empty space. "This is your storage bag, also known as your inventoryyy. The storage space inside it is from a different dimensionnn. You can store items in here if they're yours, but on the flip side, you can't put any items in here that arrren't."

"I see," I said.

It's a useful bag, but I guess that means it can't be used to commit crimes.

"Well," Cheshire continued, "if it's an item that dropped from someone you PKed, or one that you stole with the Steal skill, then it'll go innn."

I fell silent. I don't know what to say to that.

"By the way, if a player's Steal skill is high enough in level, they can steal an item from even inside this 4D pocket-like item baaag," the cat said. "So be carefulll."

Now just how exactly am I supposed to be careful against a thief that's capable of stealing from the fourth dimension?

"This bag is for beginners, but there are also other types, such as ones that are tough to steal from, small ones, and ones with a lot of capacityyy," the cat said.

"What is the capacity of this one, by the way?" I asked.

"The size is about equal to one classroom, and the weight is maybe around one ton in Earth measuremeeents."

"It can fit quite a lot," I said. "That's plenty."

"It's apparently not enough if you're a merchant, thooough," said the cat. "They're likely to buy new onnnes. Oh, item bags will scatter their contents around if they get destroyed, so pay attention to their durabilityyy."

"I'll be careful," I said.

"Next is a set of beginner equipmeeent. Ray, what will you piiick?" Cheshire pulled a catalog from a bookshelf and showed it to me.

In it were full sets of various types of armor. There was the typical Eastern and Western style armor, but in addition to these, there were traditional outfits from China, India, the Middle East, and South America. On the opposite end, there were even outfits that seemed to be from Sci-Fi movies.

"I'll go with this, then," I said, choosing a combination that consisted of innerwear, a jacket, jeans, and a bandana. The look vaguely resembled the male protagonist from a masterpiece game of the last century.

I played retro games as well as modern games thanks to my brother, so although the look was a bit behind the times, it matched my tastes.

"Okaaay. What will you pick for your first weaponnn?" the cat asked.

I turned to a different page in the catalog. All kinds of weapons were listed, including a wooden sword, a practice sword with a dull blade, a knife, a bow, a sling, and a staff.

I should choose something that matches my outfit.

"I'll go with the knife," I said.

"Okaaay. So for your weapon and equipment... Wazaaaam." It was hard to tell if Cheshire's voice was energetic or not, but as he said that, my appearance changed. My outfit switched to the one I had just chosen, and a knife now hung from a belt at my waist. Most impressive of all, my appearance had changed to mirror the avatar I'd made earlier.

"Wow, this is something else," I said as I looked at myself in the full-length mirror Cheshire had provided. It looks pretty good.

"Oh yeah, that's right, here's your starting moneyyy." Cheshire handed me five coins that appeared to be made out of silver. "Five silver coins is worth 5,000 lirrr. One rice ball costs about 10 lir, by the waaay."

Then 1 lir would be about 10 yen, I thought. In that case, 5,000 lir is a lot of money.

"Is it okay to get this much in the beginning?" I asked.

"Yep. Be sure to learn how to make money before it runs out, thoooough," he said.

In other words, I probably won't get any more after this, so I should use it wisely.

"Well then, it's finally time to transfer your Embryooo," he said.

"Oh, the thing in all the rumors!" I said.

Embryos.

I'd heard they were the greatest feature in Infinite Dendrogram. They offered true uniqueness and evolved in infinite ways based on the player.

They were partners that exceeded the likes of items and equipment.

My brother, who was already playing the game, said, “If this hadn’t been a well-made dive VRMMO, but just a regular MMO instead, I’m sure it still would’ve been a hit as long as it had the Embryo system.”

“Do you need an explanation on Embryooos?” asked the cat.

“Since you’re offering, I guess I should listen to it,” I said. It’s probably best to hear the tutorials for unique systems, after all.

“Okaaay,” said the cat. “All players receive an Embryo at the starrrt. The only time they’ll look the same is while they are in this zeroth fooorm. With the first form and beyond, they’ll change in completely different ways based on their ownerrr.”

“Ohhh,” I said. As a gamer, I can’t help but be fascinated by features that allow for something to be totally unique.

“Although the possibilities are infinite, there are some rough categorieees,” added the cat.

“Oh, I didn’t know that,” I said. This was because I’d done my best to block out any information before I started playing. I’d been worried that I might abandon my entrance exams if I’d found out something about the game, as it would have made it harder to resist playing it.

The only information I’d heard from my brother was that “it’s fun.” It might have been the case that he’d also been worried about my exams, and so he hadn’t told me anything specific.

“The broad categories arrre: Type Arms — a device type that players can equip as a weapon or armorrr. Type Guardian — a monster type that protects the playerrr. Type Chariot — a vehicle type that players can riiide. Type Castle — a building type that players can reside innn. Type Territory — a barrier type that players can deployyy. That’s about ittt.”

“Ohhh,” I said. I was starting to get excited to see how my Embryo would turn out.

“Also, besides these ones, there are rare and advanced categories that an Embryo can evolve into, tooo. There are even categories that are unique to one Embryooo. It’d be nice if you could get onnne.”

“Wow!” I exclaimed. “But if that’s the case, there are bound to be players who keep resetting their character until they get a rare category.”

“Ahh, you can’t remake your character in this gaaame,” said the cat.

“Huh?”

"Even if someone bought different hardware and played the game, that person would log in as the same character as the first tiiime," Cheshire explained. "Their Embryo would also be the saaame. This is because we keep records on our side of users' brain wave dataaa."

"......" I was silent.

They record our brain wave data... I thought. Yeah, that sounds kind of scary.

"Even if they were able to reset, it's all based on that person anywaaay, so I think their Embryo would end up exactly the saaame," said the cat.

Is that how it works?

"Annnd... while we were talking, your Embryo finished transferrinnng," the cat added.

"Huh? ...Ah." I realized that on the back of my left hand was now embedded a faintly glowing oval gem.

"That's your Embryooo," Cheshire said. "It'll be stuck to your left hand during its zeroth form, but it'll come off after it hatches and reaches its first forrrm."

In other words, I guess it's sort of like I'm incubating an egg.

"By the way, is there any chance it can break while it's an egg?" I asked.

"That won't happennn," said the cat. "Any damage an Embryo receives while in its zeroth form will be passed on to the playerrr."

Ahh, I see. So that means the Embryo will be safe even if the player dies.

"But after they hatch, Embryos can be damaged and break like anything elllse," the cat said. "They'll self-repair over time, thooough."

It's kind of like a living creature.

"By the way, after your Embryo turns into its first form, a tattoo of a crest will appear where the egg waaas," said the cat. "It serves as a sort of identification for players in this worrrld. Without it, you wouldn't be able to tell players apart from NPCees."

"Is that so?" I asked.

But no, there's no way you would mistake an NPC for a human... right?

"Also, the crest has the ability to store your Embryooo," said the cat. "When you don't need it, you can keep your Embryo in your left hannnd. You'll be together with it as long as you play this game, so please take care of ittt."

"Got it," I said.

I'm still not sure how my Embryo will evolve, but that's fine. It all comes down to oneself anyway, so I guess it'll work out on its own.

"It's nice to meet you, partner," I said.

Needless to say, there was no response from my Embryo, but I got the feeling that it shined slightly.

"Lastly, please choose which nation to joiiin." Cheshire laid out a map on the study's desk. It was an old scroll map. After it was unfurled, however, pillars of light rose up from seven locations on the map, and from within them, I could see various towns. "The nations with pillars of light are the ones you can join in the beginninnng. What you see in the pillars is the capital of each nationnn."

Floating in letters of light around each of the pillars was the name and explanation of each nation.

Surrounded by castle walls is a Western fantasy town, with a white limestone castle at its center.

Kingdom of Altar: the land of knights.

Sakura petals dance through the air in this city made of wood. A Japanese-style castle looms high above it.

Tenchi: the land of blades.

Subtle elegance hangs in the air of these mountains. A large river flows for all eternity through its valleys.

Huang He Empire: the land of the hermits.

Black smoke rises from countless factories and forms a cloud that blocks out the sky. On the ground is a modern day city made of steel.

Dryfe Imperium: the land of machines.

Bazaars nestle up to a giant oasis, surrounded by desert as far as the eye can see.

Caldina: the commercial city-state union.

Made from connecting countless large ships together, this man-made landmass floats in the middle of the open sea.

Granvaloa: the maritime nation.

At the base of Yggdrasil deep in the forest, elves, fairies, and demi-humans live in this secluded garden of flowers.

Legendaria: the homeland of fairies.

"Ohhh..." I said.

Seeing this makes me want to visit every one of them, I thought. Tenchi has a similar feel to the Azuchi-Momoyama Period, while Huang He gives off a sense of Chinese fantasy. Dryfe seems like they'd have robots, and just walking through the bazaars of Caldina would feel like I was sightseeing. The seas of Granvaloa call out to me to seek adventure, and as for Legendaria, there's no need to even think of a reason.

However...

"I'll go with the Kingdom of Altar," I said.

"Okaaay," said the cat. "By the way, as a quick survey, what would your reason for choosing that beee?"

"My brother is waiting for me."

"Oh, is that so..."

I had called my brother from the store right after I'd bought the game, and he'd said, "Then I'll be waiting for you in the Kingdom of Altar's capital."

...Since he's waiting, I have no choice, I thought. But why did he choose the Kingdom of Altar, anyway? I'm pretty sure he likes robots and warships, so why didn't he go with the Dryfe Imperium or Granvaloa? Well, I guess I'll just have to ask him in person.

"There are events that allow you to change the nation you belong to, so don't feel so down about ittt," said the cat.

"Yeah, thanks..." I said.

I need to change gears, I thought. The Kingdom of Altar seems kind of plain and normal, but it just might be a nice place.

"Okay then, I'm going to send you to the Kingdom of Altar's royal capital, Alteaaa," said the cat.

"Ah, just a second. What are the goals in this game?"

In all the games I'd played since I was a kid, even online ones, they'd had established goals such as defeating the evil god or demon king. I thought this game would be the same, but when I asked this to Cheshire...

"Anythinnng," was the response I got.

"Anything?" I asked.

"That's what I meannnt. Anythinnng. You can become a hero or the demon king, a king or a slave, a good person or an evil person. You can do something, or you can do nothing. You can stay in Infinite Dendrogram, or leave it. It's all up to you. If it's possible, then you can do anything you want." Cheshire's way of speaking had changed. "Just like the Embryo in your left hand, what's about to begin is infinite in possibility."

His speech had morphed from the slow drawl. It was almost as if he were narrating something.

"Welcome to Infinite Dendrogram. We warmly welcome you," a voice said.

As soon as these words were spoken, the study disappeared from my surroundings. The desk, the bookshelf, and even Cheshire, vanished, and I was left floating in the air.

"Huh?"

Below me was a familiar-looking world. I was looking down on the same continent I'd seen on the map just moments earlier. Before long, almost as if my body was being sucked down toward one point on the continent — the Kingdom of Altar — I started to fall at a great speed.

And just like that, I set foot in the world of Infinite Dendrogram.

◇◇◇

In front of the South Gate, Royal Capital Altea, Kingdom of Altar — Ray Starling.

"I thought I was going to die..." My heart was pounding after being suddenly dropped from the sky, and I forced in breaths to help calm myself down.

The feeling of the fall still remained with me:

The sight of scenery changing vividly before me at high speed.

The sound of my body scraping against the air as I fell.

The chill in the air whipping around me.

The smell of wind I had never smelt before.

The taste of dirt from the ground — I had fallen over in a daze, confused at how abnormally safe my landing had been. There hadn't been any pain — it was apparently turned off by default — but all five of my other senses had perceived this world just as they would the real one.

"This... is too real," I said quietly.

A true dive VRMMO... I finally had a sense that the dream game had become a reality.

I did think the theatrics had been a bit over the top, but I had now made my way into the world of Infinite Dendrogram.

I looked about my surroundings and saw a large gate behind me. It was encompassed by white castle walls that stretched up as far as I could see. There were also soldiers clad in Western-style armor serving as its gatekeepers.

This gate is one of the places I saw in Cheshire's room, so it's probably safe to say this is Altea, the Kingdom of Altar's royal capital.

The gate was open leading into the town, and for a while now, carriages and people had been coming and going.

It seems I can pass through just fine.

As it was my first time, I timidly — or, more accurately, suspiciously — passed through the gate and was able to enter the town without any trouble.

"All right," I said with relief. It looks like they don't do inspections for people entering or leaving Altea.

Since I'd safely made it into town, all that remained was to head to where I was supposed to meet my brother.

"If I remember correctly, he said a large water fountain on the capital's central street," I said. "He did say I could reach it by heading straight from the entrance, but... hmm... I'll take a look just in case."

I recited the words "main menu" in my mind, and just like it was described in the manual, a game window appeared in front of me. The window was split into two; on the right side was my name and a simplified view of my stats, while on the left side was a list of various menu commands.

I glanced over at my stats and saw that my current level was 0. Jobs in Infinite Dendrogram supposedly each had their own level, and since I was currently jobless, my level was stuck at 0.

"Map... Here it is." I found what I was looking for in the menu and opened it up. A new window appeared displaying a map of the Royal Capital Altea.

Normally, a map had to be filled in by traveling around or by buying maps. However, the manual explained that a player's starting area, the capital of the nation they joined and its surroundings, got input into the map from the start.

This is useful.

"I see. I see," I murmured.

The city of Altea was circular in shape and surrounded by castle walls. These walls had a gate at each of the four cardinal points, and stretching out from each of them was a large, stone-paved road leading to the center of the city.

The roads would have intersected into a cross if they had continued; however, this was not the case. At the center of the royal capital was another ring of castle walls, and inside it was the area for nobility. Special permission was required to enter this area, and at its center was the royal castle.

Well, I probably won't have any need to go there for a while, I thought.

The central street we were supposed to meet at was the one running from the South Gate to the nobility area. The gate I had just passed through, by the way, was the South Gate.

So if I simply head straight, I should be able to reach the water fountain.

I was walking while looking at my map and thinking this, when...

"Ah?!"

"Huh?" Somehow, I had locked eyes with a woman I didn't know. She had run out from a side alley, and since I'd been engrossed in my map, I hadn't noticed until she was right upon me. I reacted late and wasn't able to avoid her, causing us to collide. As a result, I was flung more than fifteen meters away.

"Gah..." I muttered. That felt like it caused some serious damage.

As a matter of fact, the window screen I still had open showed that I'd lost 80% of my HP. In addition to this, I appeared to have broken some bones. The status effects "broken left arm" and "broken right leg" were now being displayed.

Just one collision with a lady, and I receive such near-fatal wounds as these... come on, just how shockingly frail am I?

"A-Are you all right?!" The woman that ran into me rushed over to my side with a pale look on her face. She had soft hair and kind facial features... and was wearing white, metal armor that looked absurdly heavy.

I wouldn't be surprised if that thing weighs a hundred kilos.

"I-I'm..." I tried to tell her, "I'm okay. It was no big deal." However, my body was still numb from the damage and I couldn't properly move my tongue.

"I'm so sorry! Force Heal!" Her hand instantly glowed white and particles of light fell from it onto my body. My HP was completely healed, and the status effects for my broken bones were also gone.

"Oh... ohhh..."

That must've been healing magic. It was a common occurrence in video games to nearly die and then get completely healed, but this was what it was like to actually experience it. ...It's kind of scary.

"I'm terribly sorry! This is all because I wasn't paying attention to what's in front of me while running..." she said.

"N-No, I was also looking away... By the way, are you okay?" I asked. We'd collided with enough force to give me near-fatal wounds, so I was worried that she might have been injured as well, but... she was completely unharmed.

She appeared to be a really high-level player, and the equipment she was wearing looked to be of a high-grade as well. Her stats, then, would most likely be high, too.

So that's why our collision ended up the way it did.

"I'm fine," she replied. "But I caused you to get such a terrible injury..."

"Oh no, y-you were kind enough to heal me, so I'll be just fine." I couldn't help but speak politely. On top of that, I was fairly sure my voice was shaking. The damage from when we'd collided had caused me to lose my nerve.

"B-By the way, it looked like you were in quite the hurry. Is there something wrong?" When I asked her this, the woman suddenly appeared to have remembered something.

"Well actually, my little sister left the house and I was in the middle of searching for her."

"Your sister?" I asked.

"Yes. This is her in this picture. Have you seen her anywhere?" Asking this, she took out a picture and showed it to me. Although this world has a fantasy setting, it would appear that pictures are readily available. In the picture was a cute little girl. She looked like a younger version of the woman in front of me, but with straight hair instead of wavy.

Her sister, huh? I thought. Like me and my brother, she must be playing this game together with her sister.

I could only stay silent as she looked at me in desperation. I felt bad for her, but I hadn't seen her sister. "I'm sorry. I just started recently, and I just entered this town through that gate a moment ago..."

"Is that so... Then she might already be inside... Um, this is my contact information," the woman added. "If you happen to see my sister anywhere, please contact me! Also, I'm really sorry for running into you!" She took out a piece of paper, wrote something on it, and then handed it to me.

"There's no need to apologize, so please go and search for your sister," I said.

"Thank you... Well then, goodbye!" she said and darted off, leaving me with a memo in my hand. The following was written on it: "Liliana Grandria, Knights of the Royal Guard Vice Commander, Kingdom of Altar."

"Huh?"

Characters I had never seen before were being translated into Japanese in my head. More shocking than that, however, was the rest of the memo...

"The quest 'Search for Milianne Grandria, Difficulty Level 5' has started. Please see the quest screen for further details."

I was at a loss for words.

Umm... yeah.

Although she looked like a real human to me, this meant that she wasn't actually a player, but instead...

"She was an NPC?!"

And just like that, I realized again just how unbelievably realistic Infinite Dendrogram was.

◇

Shortly after I met Liliana and received my first quest, I arrived at the large water fountain on the central street where I was to meet my brother. On the way there, I had a look at the help information, and apparently difficulty level 5 quests were supposed to be undertaken by a party of advanced players. So without a doubt, it wasn't something I could partake in.

Why would a quest like this be given to a beginner, anyway? I wondered. I should just ask Bro about it for now.

Thinking about this, I had hurried my way to the water fountain, and...

The scene that greeted me left me speechless.

There was a nearly two-meter-tall bear costume with a sign reading "Welcome little brother" parked in front of the water fountain.

"...What in the world is that?" I managed.

There's no way... But... No, no way... But then again...

This is where we're supposed to meet.

There likely aren't that many people out there waiting for their younger brother.

He wouldn't know my character name, and it's not like he can use my real one, so it makes sense to write "little brother" on the sign. I get that part.

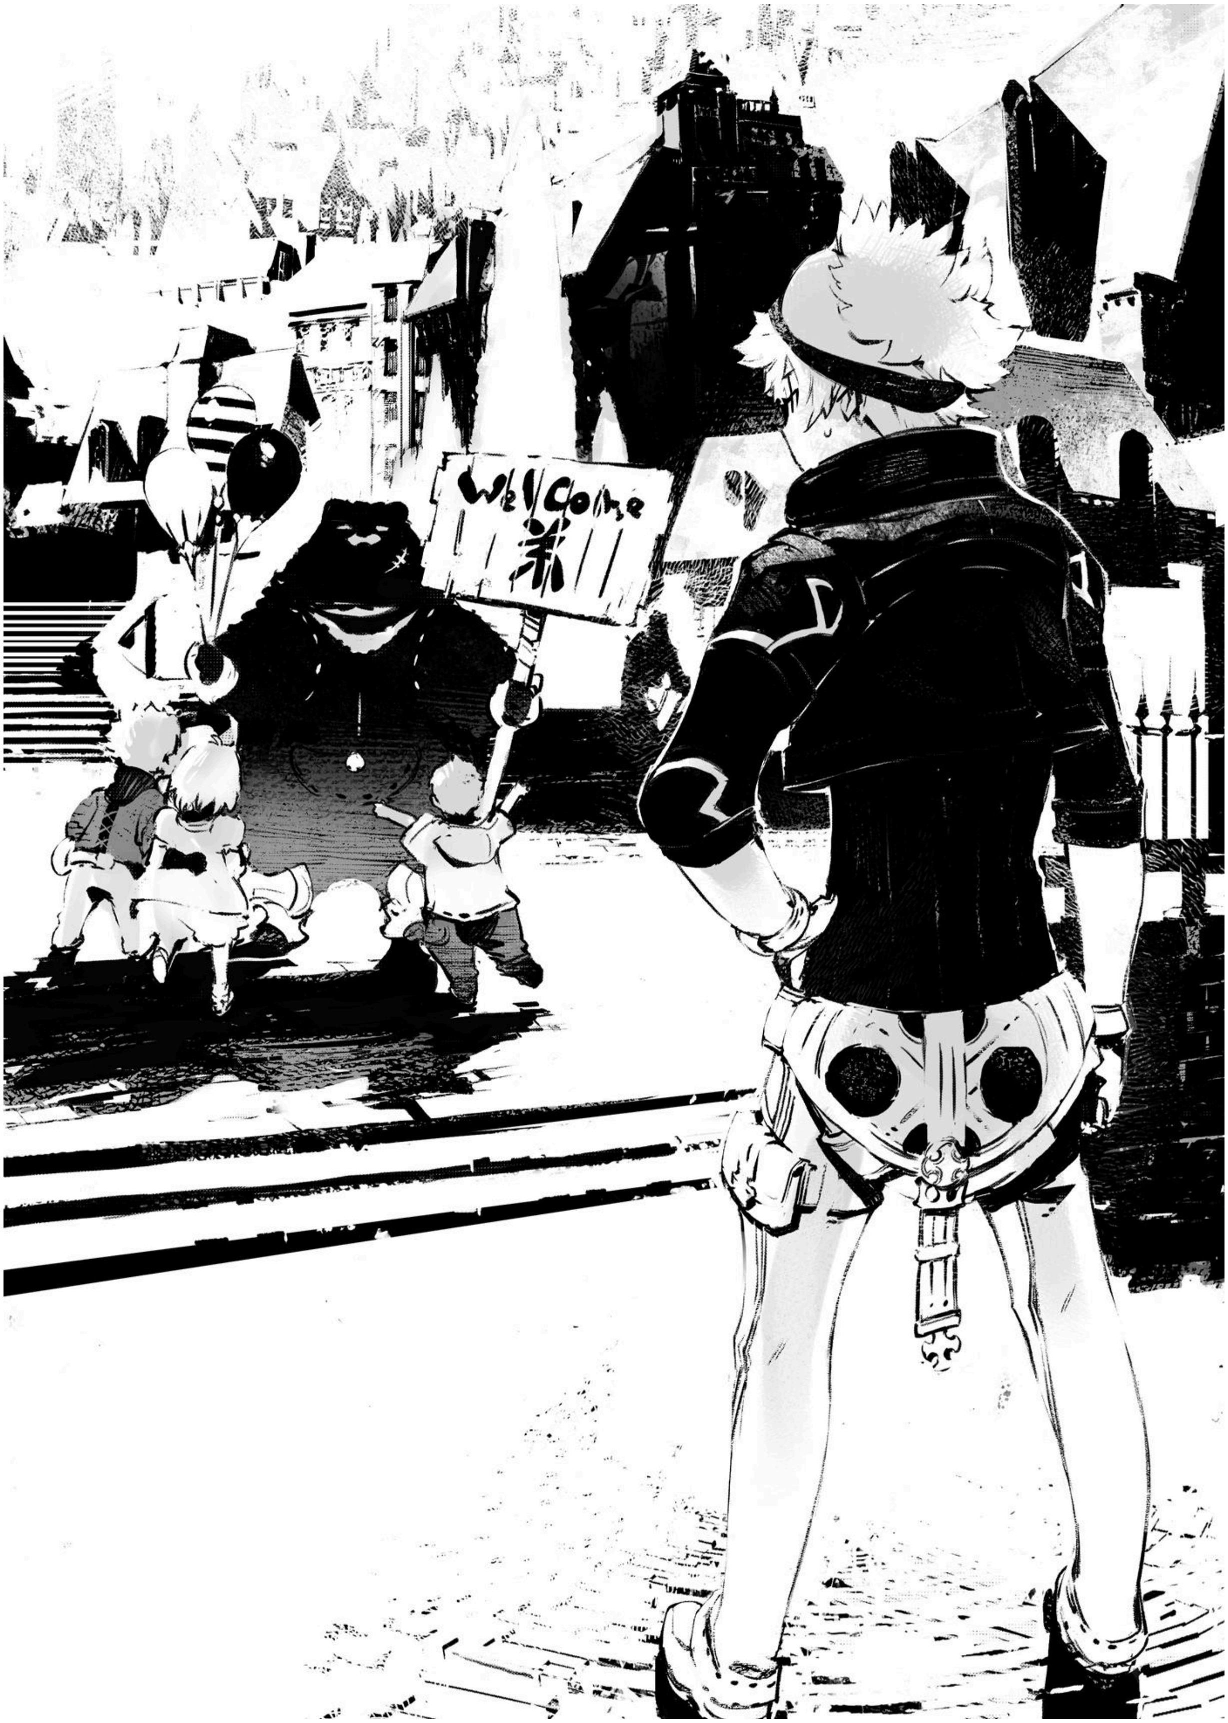
But...

"Why the costume?" I asked aloud.

It's going to take some guts to talk to that thing.

For a little while now, children had been gathering around the bear. I couldn't tell if they were NPCs or players, but they seemed to be very attached to the bear. They were climbing onto its head and lap, as well as hanging from its arms.

I wasn't getting anywhere at this rate, so I steeled my nerves, and decided to talk to it. "Excuse me. I would like to ask you something..."



Welcome
米

"Yes, yes, just bear with me for a moment."

Was that a pun...? I thought. I get that it you're a bear, but still...

"Are you Shuichi Mukudori... Forget it, is that you, Bro?" I asked.

"Indeed it is," he said. "Hey, Reiji."

...I so wanted to be wrong.

"I'm glad we were able to meet up." The bear — I mean, my brother, Shuichi Mukudori — stood up and said, "Shall we go, then?"

He then pulled out some candy from his storage bag — or rather, a pocket attached to his stomach — and passed them out to the children gathered around him.

Is he pretending to be that famous character? I thought. In that case, he should be a cat, or at least a raccoon.

"Yay!"

"Thanks, Mr. Bear!"

The children received their candy and then headed off in cheerful spirits. Before long, only my brother and I were left remaining.

"I guess first up should be introductions," my brother said. "My name here is Shu Starling."

"I'm Ray Starling," I said. "So like I thought, we did end up with the same name."

Since it was so easy to use the English translation of our last name, Mukudori, whenever someone in my family made a character, eight out of ten times we'd end up with the name Starling.

"So, what should we do?" my brother asked. "It looks like your Embryo hasn't hatched yet, so should I show you around the town? While we're at it, if you want to pick up some equipment, I can lend you some money at no interest."

"Oh, well, actually..." I explained to him about the quest I had just received.

"Really... A quest from Liliana," he said. "I've never received one before."

"Really, though, why would I get a quest like this when I'm at level 0?" I asked.

"That's because this world is realistic, and a lot of quests are triggered by coincidence," he said. "Incidents don't occur in order to create a quest, but quests arise when there happens to be an incident. There are many quests you won't be able to trigger intentionally, and there'll be a lot of cases where you end up going on one you didn't intend to. Well, consider it a good baptism... you were able to get a sense for how realistic the people of this world are, right?"

"Yeah," I said. "It was so realistic, in fact, I'm a bit suspicious as to whether I'm talking to the real you, or just an NPC pretending to be you."

"Of course it's me," he said. "You better bear-lieve it."

"Stop it with the bear stuff!" It made me feel weird because I knew the person inside and could picture him.

"Ha ha ha. By the way, Liliana is a contender for the first or second most popular person in this kingdom. She even has a fan club made up of both players and tians."

"There's a fan club... Oh, and what's a 'tian'?" I asked.

"A person that isn't a player," he said. "Well, you can just think of it as the general term for NPCs."

"Interesting... so that means even NPCs participate in fan clubs," I said.

"According to the developers, 'their personalities and ability to think are on the same level as humans.' So that kind of thing is the bear minimum of their capabilities."

Really, this game is so sophisticated, it's almost alarming.

"By the way, did it say anywhere in the quest information about where to search?" my brother asked.

"No, nothing," I said. "They're telling me to search for someone without any hints. That's why I don't know where or how I should start."

Although to be accurate, this memo would count as a hint, I figured.

"Hmm," he said. "Can you hand me that memo for a sec?"

"Here you go."

My brother took the memo, but instead of reading its contents, he flipped it over and showed its back to me.

Dear Sister,

The shops were all out of remberries, so I'm going to go get some. I'm bringing bug-repellent incense, so I'll be okay. Please look forward to it and wait for me.

From Milia.

"Isn't this..." I said slowly.

"She must have been in a real hurry," said my brother. "She wrote her contact information on the back of the memo her sister left and gave it to you."

I didn't notice it either. Since the memo had been written on parchment paper, I hadn't been able to see through it.

"What are these remberries?" I asked.

"Remberries are one of the high-grade specialties from around here," he said. "Just think of them as really delicious fruit."

"'Go get' must mean that she went to go search for them," I said. Milianne seems to be quite the proactive kid.

"There are two places around here where you can get remberries," said my brother. "The first is an orchard within the capital. You can harvest there if you pay the fee of 5,000 lir per basket."

Isn't that the entire amount you get at the beginning of the game? I thought. That's expensive!

"The other one is just outside the South Gate. It's called Old Reve Orchard."

"Old Reve Orchard?" I asked.

"Some things happened, and insect-type monsters have taken up living there. So it's an abandoned orchard," he said. "Even now, there are a lot of fruit trees growing wild there, but at the same time, it's become a nest for monsters."

"So the stuff about bug-repellent incense must mean..." I said slowly.

"Probably so."

That's way too proactive!

"Go to the safer orchard!" I shouted.

"5,000 lir is asking a bit much from a child," said my brother. "Even the market value of 50 lir for one would be tough."

"But still, that doesn't mean..."

"Old Reve Orchard, by the way, is a place players usually mistake for being beginner-friendly due to how close it is to the starting point," he said. "However, it's a dungeon where beginners enter and then get killed right off the bat. It's also known as the 'newbie killer.'"

This couldn't be any worse.

I'd just realized this now, but when I'd met Liliana, she had probably been headed toward the old orchard. When Liliana had said, “Then she might already be inside,” she must have been convinced that Milianne had already entered the orchard because I hadn’t seen her after passing through the South Gate.

“Well,” my brother continued, “in any case, it’d be best to clear this one quickly. It’s probably the type where you’ll fail if time elapses.”

“What?” I asked.

“I told you, right?” he said. “In this world, incidents are realistic and occur spontaneously. That’s why there are no guarantees that things will be fine until the player clears the quest, unlike in older games.”

“Yeah, but...”

“Let me tell you this from my experience as one of the starting players,” he said. “There have been examples in the past of people dying. A sage revered as a hero, the commander of the knights, and even the king of this nation — they all died.”

“......” I didn’t know what to say.

“Despite that, the world of Infinite Dendrogram carries on without a hitch,” he said. “That’s because it’s real.”

I began to imagine...

What if the girl in the picture gets attacked by monsters and tragically dies? Imagining it gave me an unpleasant feeling. Thinking about Liliana caused those feelings to sink even further. I know that they’re NPCs, but...

“That’d leave a bad taste in my mouth,” I said.

“Wouldn’t it?” my brother agreed. “So let’s clear it and shoot for a happy ending.”

I couldn’t see my brother’s face because of the bear costume, but I had the feeling that he was smiling on the inside.

Thus, my brother and my newbie self formed a party, and we set off to tackle my first quest.

The quest to clear was “Search for Milianne Grandria.”

The difficulty level, 5.

The location was the trap dungeon “newbie killer,” Old Reve Orchard.

The goal... was a happy ending.

Start quest.

Chapter One: Nemesis

"By the way, have you pawsed to look at your starting stats yet?" my brother asked me as we headed toward Old Reve Orchard.

Come to think of it, not yet, I realized.

"Status information... Here it is." I clicked on the option and a new window appeared displaying my stats.

My level was of course 0, and I currently had no job equipped. It seemed multiple jobs could be equipped at once, and so in addition to the level for each job, there was also a total level. My level for both was still 0.

The other stats displayed were HP, MP, SP, STR, END, DEX, AGI, and LUC. Each of them was fairly low; other than having 98 HP and 23 SP, the rest were all below 20. I didn't have anything to compare them with, but those stats were probably weak.

...But then again, I guess there's no way a newbie at level 0 would be strong, I reminded myself.

"So I'll be going into this dungeon called the 'newbie killer' at level 0, won't I?" I asked.

"You'll bearly make it past zero if you don't equip a job," said my brother. "Do you want to get one before we go?"

"...No, it doesn't look like we have the time. I'll go like this," I said.

It'd be unbearable if the girl in the picture were to die while we were doing that, I thought. The most important thing right now is speed.

My brother and I talked as we ran.

"Can I ask you a few things?" I asked.

"I guess I can bear that."

"I didn't see a stat for INT, so what factors into magic strength?" I asked. "There is magic in this game, right?" Liliana did use healing magic, after all.

"It's based on your max MP and the level of the magic skill," said my brother. "Also, the total amount of MP you pour into it. And there is no INT stat in this game, by the way. Your intelligence is the bear basics, yourself, after all."

That makes sense, I thought. I wouldn't really get what it meant if you told me my intelligence went up.

"Oh, and as for skills that use SP, their strength isn't based on your SP, but on various other related stats," my brother went on. "Well, those various stats will receive adjustments from your Embryo, so their variation will be infinite."

"That sounds complicated," I said.

"If you bear with it, I'm sure it'll go fine! How things turn out will be a pawsitive reflection of your individuality."

...He's really getting into those bear puns, isn't he?

"Oh, yeah. Let me give you some accessories I have." Bro Bear handed me some items from his bag.

When I looked at them, these included: ten Healing Potions that could easily heal me to max health, one Lifesaving Brooch, and four Dragonscale Ward accessories.

"The Lifesaving Brooch bears the brunt of your fatal damage, but it has a 10% chance of breaking," my brother explained. "How many times this is checked is determined by the amount of damage divided by your HP. The Dragonscale Ward will reduce incoming damage by 90%, but it'll break after one use."

I see, they appear to be throwaway accessories, but they'll definitely help.

"This game has level and stat restrictions for equipment," said my brother. "So I'll beef you up with these accessories instead since they don't have any level restrictions."

There are five slots for equipping accessories, so they'll all fit perfectly.

"Thanks, Bro... Hey that reminds me, what's the death penalty in this game?"

A death penalty: it was a feature found in many online games. To put it simply, it was some sort of demerit for a character that died. They could lose levels, for example, or have their stats lowered for a period of time.

Since he's trying to help me avoid dying, this game must have some kind of a death penalty, I thought. This was why I wanted to ask him what that penalty was, but...

"A 24 hour login ban."

The answer I received was unexpected.

"...A what?" I asked.

"If you die in this game, you won't be able to log in for 24 hours in real time, or 72 hours in the game world," he said.

...Are they out of their minds? I thought incredulously. I can't believe there's a game that won't let you play it as a death penalty.

"The frightening thing about this penalty isn't that you can't play the game; it's that three days will pass by in Infinite Dendrogram without you," he said. "So for example, if you're in the middle of a quest like we are, you'll have to abandon the quest for three days. When you're in a world as realistic as this one... that's what's so scary."

What would happen if Bro Bear and I were to leave this quest alone for three days?

...The answer to that was obvious.

"I'll tag along and try not to die," I said. "I'm not sure how useful I'll be at level 0, though."

Or more like, I won't be of any use at all.

"By the way, like I mentioned earlier, Old Reve Orchard is a trap dungeon known as the 'newbie killer,'" said my brother. "Innocent newbs starting Dendro without any prior knowledge enter the dungeon saying, 'Yaay, I'm gonna go on an adventure nearby,' and then it's game over, they get their bear butts exposed and smacked to the extreme. They get insta-killed and can't log in for a whole day."

It's like a trauma-generating machine.

"However, it's strange. Why is the difficulty level 5? Based on the levels of the monsters in the dungeon... it's too high."

As I listened to my brother mutter this, we passed through the South Gate of the Royal Capital Altea.

◇

The orchard was located about ten minutes' running distance from the South Gate. It was surrounded by a metal fence, and a worn-out sign at the entrance read, "Welcome to Reve Orchard." The place, however, seemed long-abandoned. Plants grew wild, and the color on the sign had faded.

"Well then, it's time to storm in, but..." My brother stopped in front of the entrance to Old Reve Orchard, which was now a den of insect monsters. Right after that, a new window appeared before me.

“Party request from Shu Starling.
Will you join this party? Yes / No”

“It’ll be easier to cover for you if I can constantly track your status,” he said.

“Okay, got it.” I clicked “Yes” on the window, and as soon as I did, a screen opened up showing the status of our party. My brother’s name had been added to it as well.

There’s space on the party screen for four more players, so this game must have a maximum party limit of six.

Displayed along with my brother’s name were also his stats. However...

“What’s going on with this?” I asked.

On my brother’s status screen, everything other than his name was blacked out, including even his level and HP.

“Ah. That’s the concealing ability of this suit,” he said. “If there’s a difference in level between me and an enemy or ally, then they can’t bear witness to my stats.”

What kind of ability is that? I thought. That makes it harder to help with support magic... Not that I have any... Oh, that reminds me.

“Hey Bro, I didn’t get the chance to ask this because of the quest, but why are you wearing a bear costume?” I asked.

My brother rubbed the eyes of his costume with his bear fingers. “It’s a story that’ll leave us both in tears.”

“We’re kind of busy, so hurry up and answer my question,” I said.

“My little brother is looking at me so coldly...” he grumbled to himself, before gradually starting to speak. “So, you know how there’s a part where you create your character, right?”

“Yeah.”

“It was a pain to make it from scratch, so I tried to do it using myself as the base.”

“So did I.”

“Well, I made a bit of a mistake...”

“A mistake...” I began. “What did you do?”

“I accidentally confirmed it without making any changes.”

“...Oh boy.”

So in other words, inside the suit was my brother’s actual face and appearance. Playing an online game with your actual face was a risky thing to do. This was especially true in my brother’s case.

Yeah, with that you’d have no choice but to wear something like a suit.

“By the way, the reason I chose this kingdom is because I saw a store in the capital selling costumes,” he said.

“Oh, so that’s why you didn’t go somewhere that was more along your tastes, like Dryfe or Granvaloa,” I said.

“Drastic times called for drastic measures... Oh, and by the way, costume number one cost 4,980 lir.”

“That’s almost the entire starting amount!” I cried. Just how exactly did he get by in the beginning?!

“On top of that, it was a gag item with no defense,” he said. “I was one of the first players, so there was no information available. Really, from that hopeless start, it’s been a path full of hardship until I got a hold of this costume.”

“So what abilities does this one have?” I asked.

“Take a look.”

“Ultimate Suit Series: Hind Bear

Ancient Legendary Armor

DEF +903 (beary high)

Skills:

Disguise: completely hides your stats from anyone with a total level of 100 less than yours.

Built-In AC: a built-in AC designed for any environment. The perfect temperature any time, any place.

Power Assist: supports movement with muscle motors. STR +903.

Bullet-Proof Made: able to withstand even crossfire. Reduces damage from physical ranged attacks by 903.

Knife-Proof Made: feel safe on even the days with a lot of assassins. Reduces damage from physical close-ranged attacks by 903.

Utility Bear Hands: mysteriously, these hands can properly grab things, and they can be used quite skillfully. Increased damage to fish and insect monsters.

????: ■”

What’s with this overly high-spec gag item?

“What’s ‘+903 (beary high)’ supposed to mean?” I asked. “Is it actually as high as that implies, though? Wait, what level are you anyway, Bro Bear?”

I can’t see his stats at all right now, so at the very least, his total level should be over 100, but...

“That’s a bearied se-cr-et,” he said.

Man, that’s irritating.

“All right then, that’s enough of our comedy skit for now. Let’s go save the girl.”

“...About 90% of the material came from you, Bro Bear, but I agree,” I said. “Let’s go.”

We made our way into Old Reve Orchard. Once inside, we followed a path of weeds and broken signs. On one of the signs was written, “500 metels to remberry field.”

“I take it that means 500 meters?” I asked.

“Pretty easy to understand, isn’t it?” my brother agreed. “Also... have you noticed?”

“...The sound, right?” I asked. “I’ve been hearing it for a while now.”

From the direction the sign pointed in, I could hear clashing sounds and the cries of something inhuman. I couldn’t see anything due to all the plants in the way; however, Liliana, who’d entered the dungeon ahead of us, was without a doubt fighting something.

That was when I realized that the sound of battle could only be heard from the remberry field, while everywhere else was quiet.

“Are there no other players here?” I asked.

“Ahh, there are a lot of people with trauma from this dungeon,” said my brother. “On top of that, the drop items and materials you can gather at these levels aren’t all that great, either. Also, the insects attack in swarms, and a lot of them can cause Poison or Paralyze, so a counter for status effects is a must.”

I guess it’s what you’d call an unpopular hunting ground.

“Well, thanks to that, it does make it easier for me to fight...” my brother muttered. “Baldr, activate in second form.”

“Ready.” An electronic voice I hadn’t heard before answered him.

The back of my brother’s left hand began to glow through his costume, and then something suddenly flew out from it. The bear’s silhouette now had the following strange additions to it: a ring of gun barrels, a motorized mechanism for quick reloading, an ammunition belt, and a giant drum-like magazine.

Right there before me was a heavy firearm known as the Gatling gun.

“...Isn’t this game supposed to be primarily fantasy-based?” I asked. As I looked at my brother’s Embryo, which was likely a Type Arms, I couldn’t help but ask this question.

I envisioned Type Arms to be more, you know, like a demon sword or a demon spear. Is something like a Gatling gun allowed? I wondered.

“The machine Imperium Dryfe also exists in this world, so my Embryo is just fine.” Bro Bear laughed as he hoisted the drum magazine on his back and lifted the barrel of the Gatling gun under his right arm.

As I stared, somewhat shocked at the surreal sight of him...

“KIKIKI...”

“CHIKI... CHIKI...”

Bee and ant-type insect monsters had begun to swarm around us.

“All right then, let’s bear-eak our way through to the remberry field,” Bro Bear said, as he readied his Gatling gun... and fired away.

“YEAAAAAAAAAAAAAHHHHHHHHH!”

In the next instant, the sound of explosions roared about us. The insect monsters were smashed to pieces, and their bodily fluids were scattered all around.

The gun barrel spun, and each bullet it spit out added to the number of corpses. As soon as the monsters fell to the ground, they turned into specks of light and disappeared.

It was a one-sided killing spree. Bro Bear mowed down the monsters faster than they could appear. In under a minute, a few thousand empty cartridges had been ejected from the Gatling gun.

Normally, there would be no way he could hold and fire something that heavy-looking. However, based on what he had showed me earlier, his costume was essentially a power suit.

His STR is at least ninety times higher than mine, so that might be why it's possible, I thought. Even so, it's bizarre for him to be shooting while walking.

The reason he didn't run out of ammo while firing at that pace was probably because his Gatling gun was an Embryo. It was likely using some sort of mysterious power.

Seeing him carry a Gatling gun and rapidly fire like that... It's almost like that one scene from that old, famous movie, I thought. I think it was the second film in a series about cyborgs, and the most well-known title of an actor who later became a state governor.

Well, given that it's a bear costume doing it and not a muscle-bulging, macho man actor, it'd probably turn into a C-class movie.

"In any case, it really doesn't look like I'll be of any use..." I said. If I were to carelessly get out in front, I would probably end up like Swiss cheese in an instant.

"Oh, you can ignore the drop items. I want you to stick right behind me," said my brother. He was referring to the drop items that had remained behind after the monsters disappeared.

Parts like this are really game-like.

"Gotcha," I said. "Hm? Isn't this situation kind of like..."

It was a situation found in a lot in games. The low-level player character would get help in the beginning from a high-level character and proceed through the game. This character would be really powerful and helpful, but would usually end up dying. The death would sometimes be used to close out the opening act.

"'Uuuuuurgh,' I think it is," I said. "That brings back memories."

"...Wait, I'd be the one that dies in that scenario." My brother's voice sounded unsettled.

It was hard to tell if we were in battle, working, or doing a comedy skit, but we traversed the 500 meters and arrived at the remberry field.

◇

"Who's there?! Y-You're..." As expected, Liliana was engaged in battle at the remberry field with a swarm of insect monsters. She was taking on a countless number of them while protecting her younger sister behind her.

"Yes, we made it!" I said, relieved.

“The bear cavalry (no horses) has arrived!” my brother agreed.

He fired his Gatling gun again in grand style. The insects that had been encircling Liliana started to fall at an incredible rate.

I was worried he might hit the two of them, but he handled his Gatling gun skillfully, and there wasn’t even a ricochet. He easily wiped out the encirclement of insects, and we made it safely over to the two sisters.

“Are you all right?” I asked, repeating back the same words Liliana had said to me earlier.

“You’re the one from before... Why are you here?” She looked at me in surprise.

Hm? She’s reacting as if she just realized who I was, I thought. So then when she said “Y-You’re” a moment ago, was that directed at... my brother?

“And you, as well...” Liliana said. “Really, why?”

“We came to help,” said my brother. “My little brother was saying, ‘I can’t leave them alone! I’m going to go rescue her, no matter what!’ so I figured I’d bear with him.”

I didn’t say that! I thought. I don’t recall saying anything that embarrassing!

“Your little brother... so that’s why,” Liliana whispered to herself as if she had understood something.

The mood here... I think Liliana and my brother just might know each other.

Liliana turned to me and bowed deeply. “Thank you very much. If you two hadn’t come, I wouldn’t have been able to protect my sister, Milia.”

“O-Oh, no,” I said. “All I did was watch from behind...”

“Still, please let me thank you,” she said. “Even though I caused you trouble, you brought reinforcements to come save me... I won’t forget this kind deed.”

Her words went beyond making me feel embarrassed; they made me feel a sense of guilt. The quest had been automatically accepted for me, and all I had done was stick safely behind my brother like a parasite.

That guilt caused me to avert my gaze from Liliana, and when I did, it landed on her sister, Milianne.

She’s as cute as she was in the picture. No, even more so.

“Loli?” my brother asked. “Lolicon?”

No I'm not! I fumed.

"Sniffle, sniffle..." Milianne was crying.

Well, yeah, she would be, I thought. She was surrounded by a bunch of insect monsters, and her life was even in danger.

However, given that there were still about five fruits — most likely the remberries — inside the basket she was holding, she really had her stuff together.

"A-Anyway, let's get out of here," I suggested. "It'll be dangerous if more monsters come."

"Very well," replied Liliana, and a change occurred on my menu screen.

"NPCs have joined your party.
Liliana Grandria has joined.
Milianne Grandria has joined."

Ahh, NPCs can join parties, too. And their stats are...

Milianne's stats were lower than mine were at level 0. Liliana's stats, however, were very high. Her Paladin level was 60, and her total level was 210. She even had over 5,000 HP.

Well, then again, she is the Vice Commander of the Knights of the Royal Guard, which means she's ranked second out of all the knights in this kingdom, I thought. So it shouldn't be a surprise she's this strong.

I then noticed that Bro Bear was silent and his expression was serious. I couldn't actually see it directly, but given how long I had known him, I could tell from the mood.

"Ray, the quest still hasn't been completed, has it?" he asked.

"Um, yeah," I said. "It hasn't changed at all."

"I see." Bro Bear readied his Gatling gun and looked about our surroundings. He appeared far more serious than when he had been mowing down insects earlier.

"Bro...?"

"Ray, the difficulty levels of quests are calculated individually by the control AIs in charge of them. The control AI takes into account information about the surrounding environment and people related to the quest."

"What?" I asked.

So the difficulties are calculated with information on the environment and related people? Control AIs really are impressive to be able to do that for every quest... but what does that have to do with anything?

"So, I was thinking the difficulty for this quest was high due to a time limit." My brother started to put his thoughts into words bit by bit. "I thought we cleared it easily because I'm suited for fighting against large numbers, but..."

His gaze fell to one spot on the ground.

"...we met up with Liliana and eliminated the swarm of insects. And yet, the quest still isn't complete. In other words, this quest has a difficultly of 5 even after taking into account that Liliana's total level is 210."

Right after he said this, the ground where he was looking exploded. Something huge and long flew out from it.

"GYULUUUUUUUUAAAAAAA!" It was a giant centipede almost thirty meters long. "Clink!"

The giant centipede had large, stag beetle-like jaws growing on its face in all four directions. Its skin was also covered in reptile-like scales. The bullet my brother had swiftly fired at it had been easily repelled.

It was completely different from the bugs my brother had been trampling over earlier. Even a beginner like me could tell.

This thing is strong.

I could hear Liliana's shocked voice beside me. "A Demi-Dragon Worm!"

"GIIIEEEEAAAAAAAA!" The ground exploded again, and another Demi-Dragon Worm appeared.

"A Demi-Dragon class monster, huh..." my brother said. "I get it now. If we need to protect this girl while facing off against several of these, then I can see why it has this difficulty rating even with some help. But even so!"

His voice sounded cheerful, almost as if his worries had disappeared. I, on the other hand, was intimidated by the two monsters and was at a loss for words.

"If you're up against me, that amount just isn't going to cut it!" My brother then lifted up both his arms and said, "It'd be fine to just smash them to pieces, but this is a good opportunity! Baldr! Activate your fourth fo—"

"GIIIEEEAAALEAAAAAA!"

“GYULUUUUUUUUAAAAAAA!”

“GYUIIILUUUUAAAAAAAAAA!”

“GYULUUUUUUUULOOAAAAAAA!”

Just then, four more Demi-Dragon Worms appeared from the ground in each direction, trapping my brother.

“Hey, wait, I can bearly move right now!” he protested. “Really though, there are still—” The newly appeared Demi-Dragon Worms locked their jaws onto my brother and then disappeared into the ground.

“.........Huh?” I couldn’t process what I had just seen.

“Ah!” gasped Liliana, as she bit her lip at the unexpected turn of events.

I checked the party status, but my brother’s stats were still blacked out. I couldn’t tell if he was alive or dead.

“Um, Bro, I’m sorry for triggering a flag, but... isn’t this a bit sudden?” I hesitated.

With my brother missing, the remaining two Demi-Dragon Worms drew toward us.

I was terrified. In an instant, I had been cast from the safe zone behind my brother into danger.

The biggest animal I had ever seen in my life was an elephant. Now, monsters far larger than that were bearing down toward me with cold hostility. Even if I knew this was a game, my legs shook.

“...There’s something I wish to ask of you,” Liliana said to me.

“Wh-What is it?”

“I’ll hold back one of them. Both, if possible. During that time, could you please take my sister to safety?”

“But...” I paused.

There are two of them, I thought. Even for Liliana, by herself that’d be...

No, I’m thinking wrong, I reminded myself. At level 0, I won’t be of any help to her. In fact, I’d just get in her way if I stayed behind. That would put not only me, but Milianne in danger as well.

“...All right.” I pulled Milianne’s hand and started running. Behind us, the battle between Liliana and the Demi-Dragon Worms commenced.

◇

The path where my brother had just recently mowed down enemies with his Gatling gun was clear of monsters.

We can make it to the exit in one go like this, I thought. I have to say, though... I only realized this after running desperately, but this game also incorporates the concept of fatigue.

On top of that, my legs were shaking, and the game was kind enough to display that I had the status effect Fear. Infinite Dendrogram's absolute realism even went so far as to convey the terror of a giant creature.

Even so, I ran, making sure that I never let go of Milianne's hand.

"Heh... Heh..." Following behind me, Milianne also ran in earnest. Her face was full of dread.

Both scared, we continued to run.

"By the way..." I said to Milianne. It was an attempt to help ease our worries, if even for a bit. I wasn't sure myself just exactly whose mind I was trying to put at ease though. "Milianne... Milia, so why did you come all the way here to get remberries?"

I asked her this half out of curiosity; the other half was for distraction.

"T-Today is Sister's birthday... She loves remberry cake, so I thought I would make it for her..." she stuttered.

"I see," I said.

"But there weren't any for sale at the shops, so I didn't know what to do," she said. "And then, a guy with glasses told me, 'If you have this incense, you can go get some from the orchard outside.'"

...So this is that four eyes' fault, I thought. I don't know what he was thinking telling her that, but I'd like to punch that idiot for sending a kid to a place this dangerous.

"Sister came to get me, but the effect of the incense wore off..." she said.

We had covered half the distance while we were talking.

Just the other half left, I thought. At this rate, we'll make it the rest of the way.

"...uluuuu!" Just then, I heard a roar and felt the ground tremble behind me.

I made the decision on the spur of the moment. I picked up Milianne and jumped to the side.

In the next instant, a Demi-Dragon Worm burst from the ground and chomped its jaws as it passed through the area where we had just been running.

"She couldn't have...!" An unpleasant thought compelled me to turn around, but I could still hear the sounds of battle.

Liliana was still fighting.

Could this be one of the two she was fighting, and it left to chase after us? I wondered. Or maybe it's one of the ones that dragged my brother underground? The real issue is that, no matter which one it is, I don't have a way of fighting back.

My stats were still at their default levels, and the Embryo on my left hand still hadn't hatched. Even if it did hatch now, I can't imagine a newly-hatched Embryo would be able to stand up against an enemy that my brother's Gatling gun didn't work against.

My heart pounded in terror and unease, while a cold sweat broke out on my forehead and down my back. I thought I might die just from how realistic it felt.

"GYULUUUUUUUUUEAAAAA!" The Demi-Dragon Worm exposed its long body from the ground and roared, not in an attempt to intimidate us, but rather in triumphant laughter.

"...The end of the road, huh?" I muttered.

The "newbie killer," Old Reve Orchard, I thought. It looks like I'll also experience my first death here.

But...

"W-Waaah..." Milianne was crying in my arms.

She's an NPC... a tian. Unlike me, if she dies, she won't come back. The thought left me unsettled. Bro said that even the king died. I'm sure there aren't any special circumstances just for her. In this world, she'll die just like anybody else.

"...Like I said, that'd leave a bad taste in my mouth!" I took off the Lifesaving Brooch and equipped it to Milianne. "Milia, can you run to the entrance from here by yourself?"

"...What?" She looked up at me with unease.

"I have to go and beat up this damn centipede for a bit," I said.

Right after I said this, the Demi-Dragon Worm charged at us. I pushed Milianne away, and like getting hit by a truck, I flew into the air.

"Gah... hah..."

It was a powerful impact, even worse than when I had collided with Liliana back in the town.

However, the damage had been 93. My remaining HP was 5... I'm still alive.

One of the four Dragonscale Wards I had equipped had broken and disappeared. I'd survived thanks to its ability to reduce the damage of the attack by 90%.

I forced my numb body to move and drank a Healing Potion from the item menu. My HP was fully restored.

I can still move.

As I turned around, I saw that Milianne was still standing there.

"Go! I'll take care of this guy!" I shouted.

It was a big lie; there was nothing I could do. However, I could at least buy some time. If she could run away during that time, that was all that mattered.

Milianne stood up and ran for the exit.

If she can get to the exit and return to the field, there should be other players and tians there. This is for the best, I thought, and was then immediately flung into the air again.

It was my second cycle of near-death, the Dragonscale breaking, healing with a potion, and then recovery.

"Hah! If you include the death penalty, I can take another three of your hits, you damn centipede!" I shouted.

The third attack came, but this time I avoided it. Even at default stats, if I move, I can dodge it.

However...

"What?!" I was caught by its tail and knocked aside.

The damage was nearly the same. My HP was dangerously low again, and another Dragonscale broke.

"Damn... it."

Only one more left.

Milianne still hadn't made it to the exit.

At the very least, I have to bide my time until then, I told myself. As I thought this, the Demi-Dragon Worm changed its focus of attack.

"GYUUUUEAAAA!" It twisted its large body around and laid its sights on Milianne.

"Hey, you bastard! What are you looking at?" I shouted.

It ignored me and charged after her.

“Waaaiiiitttt!”

I chased after it, but I couldn’t catch up with it at my speed. The large Demi-Dragon Worm struck Milianne, sending her small body floating upward into the air like a leaf. The basket she had been holding so dearly was forced from her hands, and tumbled to the ground.

“Aaaaahhh!” I dived headfirst and caught her falling body. There was a large impact as I caught her, and the last Dragonscale shattered.

That’s not the real issue right now.

I was frightened to do it, but I looked at Milianne’s face. A pain different from physical pain was stinging at my heart.

She was unconscious... but unhurt. In exchange, the Lifesaving Brooch I had placed on her had shattered.

It apparently works even when equipped to Milianne, I thought, relieved. However, now that the brooch is broken, there won’t be a next time.

My last Dragonscale was also gone. We no longer had any means to withstand the Demi-Dragon Worm’s attack.

Liliana’s still fighting, I thought. Bro still hasn’t come back since disappearing into the ground... I’m all out of options.

“GYUUUUAAAAAAAA!” The monster in front of me had become irritated at its tough prey, but it now appeared to be shaking in joy at finally being able to finish things.

In a last-ditch effort, I tried drawing the knife I had received with my starting equipment. However, after removing the knife from its sheath, I discovered that its blade was broken. Before I could even use it, it seemed the repeated collisions had caused the knife to break.

The chances for us to survive were now at zero.

I looked at the unconscious girl in my arms.

Her weight, her warmth, her breathing, and the emotions she had showed me — they were no different from real life. She was alive, so realistically alive.

And like death in the real world, that life was about to be lost.

“...Damn it.” I couldn’t give up.

For me, this world was a game. It wasn’t a problem if I died.

But even if I know this world is a game, it’d leave a bad taste in my mouth if this girl were to disappear from it forever. I clenched my fist in frustration.

On the back of that hand... was my Embryo in its egg-like zeroth form.

“Hey...”

I...

“If they say an Embryo is supposed to offer a player... If you’re supposed to offer me infinite possibility...” I pleaded, “...then give me that possibility.”

The monster in front of me raised its head to deliver the final blow.

“Give me the possibility for a happy ending, the possibility to save this girl!” I cried.

To my left hand I pleaded. To the incarnation of this world of possibilities known as Infinite Dendrogram, I pleaded from the bottom of my heart.

“Wake up already and give me even 1% of a possibility!” I cried.

The Demi-Dragon Worm launched its last attack.

“You’re an unexpectedly overbearing Master, aren’t you?” said a voice. “However, I am one that is born from you. I don’t dislike that part about you.”

In an instant, the fatal charge was blocked by someone.

“...Huh?”

Just like when my brother had disappeared into the ground, I couldn’t process what was happening before my eyes.

I couldn’t understand why in front of me was not the tragedy that should have taken place, but instead, a miracle that shouldn’t have occurred.

The Demi-Dragon Worm that was supposed to kill us had been repelled by a wall of light and was bent over backwards.

My Embryo had vanished from the back of my left hand, and in its place was a glowing, blue crest.

Between the Demi-Dragon Worm and us now stood a girl I didn’t know. Her jet black hair waved in the wind, and her skin glistened like white porcelain. She swung her gothic skirt made of black fabric and white frills as she turned to look at me. Her eyes were made of the black of night and a white that reminded me of the stars.

“Morning,” was the first thing she said.

I couldn't say anything.

"Hm, you seem out of it," she said. "Good grief, aren't you something? I forced myself to wake up because you told me to, and yet..."

The way she spoke almost made the mystique she had disappear, but her words made me think of something.

"Are you my..." I began. ...Embryo?

"Of course," she said. "Well then, Master, that damn centipede is still in good health. To cheer things up in celebration of my birthday, what do you say we finish it off in style?"

"How?" I burst out.

Before I could even finish asking this, the girl had disappeared. She lost her human form and turned into a swarm of black, shining lights that enveloped my right arm, and then transformed into a black greatsword. It was organic and sinister looking, but in some way, still beautiful.

"I'll leave the timing to you," she said, her voice coming from the sword. "Swing down when the damn centipede comes charging at us. We're all going to die if you screw up, got it?"

It felt like she was telling me, "I gave you your chance, now the rest is up to you."

"...Got it." I was aware there were things that needed to be done before asking any questions.

The Demi-Dragon Worm seemed to be furious as it charged at us faster than it ever had before. It was a straight shot at a speed I was able to see, but not avoid.

However, I still had time to swing my sword.

"The three times Master almost died, and the one attack I absorbed... The four attacks you made with everything you had..."

Right before the jaws of the Demi-Dragon Worm could reach me...

"I'll double them and pay you back," said the girl as I swung down the black greatsword.

"Vengeance is Mine!" she shouted.

There was an impact the moment the greatsword made contact.

Then a moment of stillness.

Right after, the Demi-Dragon Worm, almost as if it had been crushed by a monster several times its size, shattered into pieces starting with its head.

Just exactly how many times today am I going to see something I struggle to understand? I wondered.

While I was thinking this, I looked at what was in front of me. The Demi-Dragon Worm's large body was gradually breaking into pieces that turned into light and vanished.

Behind me was Milianne, still unconscious, and beside me was the girl. She had changed back from the black sword.

"Success, success," she said happily. "Isn't that great, Master? You grabbed hold of the possibility you'd hoped for."

"You really are my Embryo, aren't you?" I asked.

The girl lightly lifted her frilled skirt and bowed with contrived respect. "I'm Nemesis, a Type Maiden with Arms Embryo. I was born from your heart, body, and soul." The girl — Nemesis — introduced herself like that and grinned broadly. "It's nice to meet you, Master."

Chapter Two: Dinner and Intentions

Outside Old Reve Orchard — Ray Starling

After I defeated the Demi-Dragon Worm, I picked up its drop item, a Demi-Dragon Worm Treasure Coffer, and escaped from Old Reve Orchard while carrying Milianne.

I didn't think about going to aid Liliana.

On the window screen displaying our party members' status, I could see that she was doing fine. Moreover, there was no way that a miracle like what had just happened would occur a second or third time. I had the feeling that if I were to get full of myself now, then it would definitely ruin things.

"Withdrawing is the right choice." Nemesis, who was apparently my Embryo, explained the battle situation like so. "That tian girl won't die. She's the stronger of the two, so even if it takes some time, she'll win for sure against that damn centipede."

"Even though you were just born, you seem to be more informed about this world than I am," I said.

It appears she even knows about Liliana, so maybe she has memories from before she hatched.

"That's because even if I take the form of a human, I'm not one," she said. "Mysterious things like that exist. More importantly, Master, if you possess a thing called curiosity, then isn't it about time you had something to ask me?"

Nothing sprang to mind. I didn't respond.

I'm starting to get a handle on it, but Nemesis seems to be the type that likes to speak in a roundabout way, I thought. Well, I guess I'm not one to talk, since I'm able to understand her.

In other words, she was saying, "Hurry up and check out my abilities on the status screen."

I looked at the status screen and saw that a category for Embryo had been added. I clicked on it right away and a window appeared displaying

Nemesis and her parameters. Displayed on the window was the name "Maiden of Vengeance Nemesis," and "Type Maiden with Arms."

Additionally, there were ATK and DEF stats listed, as well as modifiers for each stat. The ATK and DEF stats applied when equipping Nemesis as a weapon.

So this is the same as normal weapons and armor.

The stat modifiers, however, appeared to always be in effect just by having Nemesis around, and they apparently weren't just a set value boost to my stats. When leveling up, increases in my stats would also take these modifiers into account.

As an overall evaluation, her stats weren't that strong. The modifier for HP was a bit high, but the rest were low. The ATK stat for equipping Nemesis was only about 50.

It's strange to compare this with Bro Bear's costume, but even after taking that into account, my stats themselves don't seem like they've gone up that much, I thought. Well, I guess that goes without saying since Nemesis was only just born as an Embryo. But in that case, how was I able to defeat the Demi-Dragon Worm?

As I pondered this, I found the section for skills. Listed there were the two skills "Counter Absorption" and "Vengeance is Mine."

The Counter Absorption skill was the wall of light that Nemesis had used. It had a max stock of two uses, and with each use, a wall of light could be created to nullify attacks. It replenished one of its stock every 24 hours.

And then there was the skill that had defeated the Demi-Dragon Worm, Vengeance is Mine.

This skill took the total damage received from an enemy within 24 hours, doubled it, and then unleashed that damage as an attack that ignored all defense. Even damage that had been reduced by other skills and items, or nullified by Counter Absorption, was added to the total.

But once the skill is used, it looks like the damage counter is reset for that enemy, I noticed.

"Okay, I get it now," I said. "So that's how I was able to defeat that Demi-Dragon Worm."

Although the damage was reduced by the Dragonscale Wards, I did take three of its hits, I thought. On top of that, Nemesis nullified one attack with her other skill, Counter Absorption. So that's four in total, and the damage would come out to roughly 3,600. Plus, the ability for Vengeance is Mine then doubled this to around 7,200.

I don't know how much life that Demi-Dragon Worm had, but this must mean that it wasn't more than 7,200 HP. Or maybe its head was a weak spot, and landing a direct hit on it had some effect.

"...Even if I know how the trick worked, it's still a miracle," I thought aloud.

The one-hit killer move had only worked because I had been weak, and my opponent had been strong. What had also played a big role was that I had overcome several near deaths thanks to the items my brother had given me. But more than anything, Nemesis's skills had been a perfect match for the situation.

"The end result sure seems convenient," I said to myself.

Embryos are supposed to be unique and based on things like one's personality, biorhythm, and attributes, right? I thought. Looking at the results this time, it almost seems like it was set up. Also, a skill that gets stronger the more damage I take... I feel as if I'm getting treated like a huge masochist.

"A masochist, huh... I'll have you know, this is the result of my having observed you, Master. There were no mistakes," said Nemesis, seemingly offended.

Wait, can she hear my thoughts?

"But anyway, you said 'observed'?" I asked.

"The zeroth form is a time period for Embryos to observe their Masters," she said. "After observing their psychology and behavior, an Embryo's first form is then born based on this."

I see, I thought. So in other words, my experiences since starting have more or less been factored in.

...Now that I think about it, I collided with Liliana right after I started, and then I also fought a Demi-Dragon Worm. I feel like I've been taking a lot of near-fatal damage. So I guess these skills are the end result of all of that, huh?

"Well," continued Nemesis, "even if the experiences and behaviors are the same, there will be differences in an Embryo's form and skills based on each Master. Also... I think Counter Absorption was derived from your personality."

"Hm?" I asked. I wonder what she means by that.

"Oh, and another thing," she went on. "I'll go ahead and say this myself, but a Type Maiden Embryo is quite rare, you know? You should be grateful to me and reflect upon how blessed you are."

Oh yeah, that's right, I realized. Maiden wasn't one of the normal categories Cheshire mentioned. She seems to be a rare type, and it's a big help that she's explaining various things to me, but it's still somewhat of an iffy feeling having a girl come out of an Embryo that's based on me.

"Iffy? Did you say 'iffy?'" she asked huffily.

Ah, that's right. She can hear my thoughts.

"I can hear them!" she shouted. "Iffy? What do you mean by 'iffy?' You hit the jackpot with me! This beauty! This rarity! What could there be to complain about?"

"No I didn't mean that you were iffy, Nemesis, but the fact that you emerged from me, you see..."

As we went back and forth, Liliana appeared from the exit of Old Reve Orchard. The armor she was clad in was dirty with mud and dust, but Liliana herself seemed to be unharmed.

"Milia!" Finding us, Liliana quickly ran to our side, and after looking at her sister's sleeping face, she let out a sigh of relief.

"Thank you very much... for protecting my sister... Truly, thank you!" Liliana burst out as tears fell from her eyes.

"Um, yeah..." I said. This is troubling. I don't know how to respond.

"That's right," said Nemesis. "You should be grateful to my Master, and even more so to me."

And that's Nemesis for you...

"Is she your...?" asked Liliana.

"Yeah, umm... my Embryo."

Liliana looked at Nemesis, slightly surprised. "I see. So, after all, as his brother, you're also a Master chosen by an Embryo. But a Maiden, it's almost like that..."

Just as she was about to say something...

"All right! I've escaped from the bearied underground world!" Bro Bear jumped out from the ground together with a loud sound effect.

"...Ummm," I said. You were still alive, Bro? Well, his stats were displayed the whole time, just blackened out so I couldn't tell, but still...

For some reason, Bro Bear wasn't carrying his Gatling gun, but instead had a shovel in his right hand.

That can't be how he moved through the ground, can it? I wondered.

"The underground tunnel is now open!" he proclaimed.

Right after he said this, the ground shook slightly, and the sound of something caving in could be heard. The hole Bro Bear had come out of then closed.

"And it caved in right away!"

Oh, shut up.

"You were all right, Bro?" I asked.

"Oh yeah! Me and Baldr's fourth form tore them to shreds!"

"Fourth? Not the Gatling gun from earlier?" I asked.

"That's the second form."

I guess that means there are various forms.

"For some Embryos, you can use their previous forms at will," Nemesis chimed in. "Brother Bear's Embryo must've been one of those types."

...Is "Brother Bear" referring to my brother? I wondered.

"Ray, is that blali your Embryo?" he asked me.

He meant "black loli," shortened to "blali"... Neither of those terms are all that great.

"It's a pleasure to meet you," she said. "I'm Nemesis, Ray Starling's Maiden with Arms Embryo. I hope we get along, Brother Bear."

It appears Nemesis is determined to push through with calling him "Brother Bear."

"Setting that aside... Bro, if you were alive, I wish you'd come out sooner," I said. "I was this close to dying."

A total of about four times, actually.

"That would've been difficult," he said. "Because the whole time, I was locked in battle underground with all the Demi-Drags."

All the Demi-Drags?

"There were swarms of Demi-Drags bearied in an underground cave," he continued. "I don't hate bugs, but that really sent shivers down my spine."

I stayed silent.

That thing?! Swarms of them...

Good thing I didn't stick around for long.

"An outbreak of those centipedes... the 'newbie killer' is way too scary," I said. I guess that's just what you'd expect from a trauma-generating machine.

"Normally there shouldn't have been even one Demi-Drag living there..." said my brother.

"Huh?" I asked.

"Oh, well. I took care of every one that I found, so they shouldn't multiply anymore," he said. "More importantly, let's head home."

"You're right," I agreed. "Let's head back."

And so like that, Nemesis, Bro Bear, Liliana, Milianne, and I all started on our way back.

Due to our close proximity to the royal capital, we arrived in no time. After we passed through the gate, we then parted ways with Liliana and Milianne.

Before leaving, Liliana said, "I'll be sure to repay this debt of gratitude."

Milianne, who had woken up, gave each of us a remberry from the basket she had held onto so dearly, and said, "Thank you."

As I watched the two sisters walk home hand-in-hand...

The message, "Quest 'Search for Milianne Grandria' has been completed," was displayed, and I finally felt like the quest had ended.

"It's over..." I said, exhausted. I feel like I've gone through some crazy danger and chaos right off the bat.

“The reward is one remberry, huh?” asked Nemesis. “A tad shabby considering what we went through, I’d say.”

If I recall, it’s a fruit worth about 500 yen.

However, I felt that it had more value than that.

I wiped the remberry on my clothes and took a bite. It had the taste of a strawberry and the texture of an apple, but that one bite was more delicious than either one.

It was the taste of accomplishment.

“All righty then, it’s time to party,” said my brother. “It’s dinnertime. Since today is Ray’s first day playing, I prepared a feast.”

“You did?” I asked.

“I have heaps of meats and vegetables ready. Not that bear-bones stuff, either! Top-grade stuff.”

“Ohh, that sounds fascinating,” chimed in Nemesis.

That does sound tasty, I thought. Nemesis seems to agree, as well... Wait, Embryos eat food too?

“And for dessert I’ve got remberries.”

“Ohhh...” I said. “Wait, what?”

“For dinner, I bought up all the remberries available at the market this morning. It’s all-you-can-eat.”

“.........You.”

If I remember correctly, the reason Milianne went to Old Reve Orchard was because all the remberries were sold out, right? I thought. Which means...

“Damn it, Bro Bear, you were the start of this whole mess!” I couldn’t stop myself from shouting, and it echoed about the royal capital as the sun began to set.

◇◇◇

After chewing my brother out for a while, we made our way to the restaurant he had made reservations at. It was run by a player, and not only did they serve their own food, they also allowed customers to bring their own ingredients that chefs from the restaurant would then cook. My brother had apparently already handed over a mountain of ingredients.

“All right, in celebration of Ray’s first day and completing his first quest, cheers! Thank you beary much!”

“Cheers!” said Nemesis and I, as we all clinked our drinks together. My brother had a rem liqueur (made from remberry), while Nemesis and I had a drink that was similar to orange juice.

Infinite Dendrogram checked age restrictions based on each player’s citizenship, so I apparently wouldn’t be able to drink alcohol until I turned twenty. If I were to go into further detail, sexual material was R 18, while alcohol and tobacco was R 20.

Since these things exist in the game, I’m not sure if I should call this wholesome or indecent.

“Hmph. Thanks to my kiddy Master, I can’t drink any alcohol, either,” Nemesis griped. “Six years in our time... that’s long.”

“Based on appearances, when it comes to who shouldn’t be drinking, you’re number two,” I pointed out.

Number one would be my brother... for various reasons, I thought. ...Don’t drink alcohol from a glass while in a bear costume.

“Chomp, chomp,” grunted my brother. “Go on now, eat up. Meat. Eat some meat. Chomp, chomp, chomp, chomp.” My brother ate the food laid out on the table and encouraged us to do the same.

Really, you can eat and drink while wearing that costume? I thought. It’s high-spec, even in weird ways.

“Okay, okay... What is this? It’s delicious!” I cried. I was surprised at the taste after trying the unknown food I had been recommended. It had been made using ingredients and cooking methods I didn’t know, and yet it had all come together in a tastiness I could comprehend. On top of everything, it was incredibly delicious.

“The owner of this place is a Star Chef,” said my brother. “It’s the top class fur the Cook Job. His cooking skills would be about a three star in our world.”

“That’s amazing,” I said. “But after eating a feast like this, it’ll be tough to deal with the difference between this and what I eat in the real world.”

It should be about dinnertime for me back home, and I should be getting hungry.

“By the way, my body back in the real world should still be lying down, right?” I asked.

“Yes. But you’ll get a notice if something happens in the real world.

Like fur bathroom breaks or hunger, for example."

Right after he said this, a window appeared at the edge of my sight.

"Notice: urge to urinate.

Notice: hunger."

Oh, I see. "Okay, then I'm going to log off for a bit," I said.

"All right. Try to come back as soon as you can."

"Do return quickly, Master," said my Embryo. "I can't help myself to the food until you come back."

"Yeah, yeah," I said, and then selected the Logout option from the Main Menu.

"Logging out. Should your next log in point be your save point or current location?"

"Current location," I replied.

"Understood. We await your return."

And like that, my avatar disappeared from the world, and as if waking from a dream, my consciousness receded from Infinite Dendrogram.

◇

"...Ohh." The first thing I did after logging out of Infinite Dendrogram was check the clock. The time was about three hours later than when I had started the game. I was impressed to see that time really had only advanced by a third of what I had spent in the game world.

I then went to the bathroom. After that, I ate a balanced nutrition bar and drank some mineral water to replenish my body's nutrients. Although I had eaten inside the game, my actual stomach hadn't been filled.

I checked my cellphone in case I had any missed calls or messages, but there were none. I also looked at the news on my computer, but there wasn't anything that stood out.

After about ten or so minutes, I logged back in.

◇

"Welcome back."

“...You,” I said.

Upon arriving back, I saw that the food on the table was all different. It appeared that he’d eaten everything that had been there initially.

...For him to eat all that food by himself... is my brother really a bear? I wondered.

“Waahh?! The a la carte I was looking forward to is gone!” As I logged in, Nemesis materialized and let out a scream.

“Don’t worry,” said my brother. “There’s still plenty of food left. What you’ve seen so far is only about 10% of it.”

“That’s too much! Just how many people is this for?” I exclaimed.

If Nemesis hadn’t been born, then it would’ve been just the two of us. Why did he prepare so much?!

“...Oh well,” I said finally. “By the way, Bro, I still have a few things I want to ask you.”

“How I got this costume?”

“No... well, I am a bit interested, but no.”

There were two system-related things and one thing about Liliana that I was curious about. I guess I’ll start with the easier questions.

“Embryos change form as they evolve, don’t they?” I asked.

“That’s right. My Baldr increased its weapon-y-ness. It also got beary much bigger.”

I thought that Gatling gun was quite large, but... that was only its second form, right? Anything bigger than that and I don’t think you’d be able to carry it.

“By the way, I wasn’t able to show it to you, but the fourth form I used today is a tank,” he said.

“A tank?!” Is that even allowed? “So Nemesis will also eventually turn into something different from her current human form... like maybe even a tank.”

Nemesis, who was eating beside me, became scared and said, “Th-That’s so ominous.”

“How they evolve depends on their Master, but in your case, Nemesis will probably always be a Maiden,” said my brother. “Although the ‘with Arms’ part might change to a different type.”

“Speaking of that, Nemesis turned into a sword. What would she be regarded as?” I asked.

“Like I was saying, she’s a Maiden Embryo that turns into an Arms. Maidens are generally hybrids... A mix of various types.”

“Really?” I asked. That seems like kind of a bargain.

After I thought this though, Nemesis complained, “What do you mean, I’m a cheap girl?!”

“There’s one person I know that has a Maiden Embryo,” my brother explained. “She stayed as a Maiden while the ‘with’ part changed into various things. It’s even become a Superior Embryo now.”

A Superior Embryo?

“The first to third forms of an Embryo are called low-rank, while the fourth to sixth forms are called high-rank,” explained my brother. “And then the current highest level that can be reached, the seventh form, is called a Superior Embryo. It’s called this because it surpasses the limits of the high-rank forms.”

“The final form... Superior Embryo,” I murmured. I wonder if Nemesis will reach that one day. She’s still in her first form, though, so I don’t know how long it’ll take to reach that.

“By the way, out of all the players, there are fewer than a hundred that have reached this form,” my brother added.

The game has over 100,000 active players, and yet there are less than a hundred?! I thought. Just how difficult of a path is it?

“Those people are way too hardcore,” I said.

“It’s not like they all achieved it solely through their play time,” my brother said. “There are a lot of players who started on release day and still haven’t reached it, while there are those who were able to do it in half a year.”

Does that mean it requires some special conditions?

“Oh yeah, Bro, you started playing on release day,” I said. “So how far has your Embryo evolved? What form is it up to?”

“That’s a bearied se-cr-et.”

That’s annoying.

Also, Bro Bear mostly spoke normally when he was explaining things, but used bear puns when he was teasing me. It was irritating, now that I had caught on to this.

While Bro Bear and I had been talking, Nemesis had cleaned off all the food on her plate before I had even realized it.

...We were talking about you, you know.

"Okay, on to my next question," I said. "It's about our standing in this world."

"And by that you mean?"

I was thinking over how Liliana had spoken and acted. "Liliana called me something like 'a Master chosen by an Embryo,' and not a player. I don't really get what the circumstances are regarding that... or what the status for us as players is within the setting."

Somehow, I didn't get the feeling she was thinking of me as a player in a game.

"Hmm," said my brother. "You can find out about that by reading the background setting on the official site, but... you'll lose several hours of time if you do, so I'll give you the short explanation." My brother then began his lecture on the world's setting.

"In this world there are Masters and tians. All of us players are called Masters here. The meaning is something like, 'One chosen by an Embryo.' So a Master is someone who raises and uses an Embryo that possesses infinite possibilities. Due to this, a Master's power is enormous, but in exchange, they are burdened with one condition."

"Condition?" I asked.

"Their bodies are frequently spirited away to a different world."

...Hm?

"A Master may vanish from this world for as little as a few minutes, or for as long as several months," said my brother. "Also, there are times when they return to the place where they vanished, as well as times when they are flung to a special location called a save point."

Wait, isn't that...

"At the moment before death, a Master can also use the power of an Embryo to send their body to another world and survive," said my brother. "However, if this happens, they will not return for at least three days."

"So what that means is that logging out and the death penalty for players have been incorporated into the foundation of this world?" I asked.

"That's right," he said.

"...Wow."

As far as I can tell from interacting with Liliana and Milianne, the way tians think is at the same level as real humans, I thought. So in order to allow those tians to go about without realizing this world is a game, they've defined how players return to the real world and their immortality as truths of this world.

I see. There's a lot more to it than I thought.

"By the way," my brother continued, "sometimes there are players that go around saying, 'this world is a game,' but the tians view them as 'pitiable Masters that have gone mad from being sent to different worlds.'"

"...Ahh," I said.

"Also, since Masters disappear so irregularly, for the most part they don't take on important positions in the kingdom," he added. "Even if you join the knights in order to get the job Knight, you won't be given regular work. Instead you'll get tasks specific to Masters."

In other words, you're given jobs where it'd be fine even if you disappeared during it.

"Well," said my brother, "in terms of strength, we're stronger because of our Embryos, so the jobs that get sent our way usually pay higher rewards than the ones for tians."

I wonder if I'll be asked to go slay a monster by myself, I thought. Well, okay then, that resolved the bigger questions I had regarding the game's system. Which just leaves...

"Bro, did something happen between you and Liliana?" I asked.

"I don't know what you're talking about."

"Don't try to dodge the question. Liliana clearly knew who you were." And if I were to add to that, it didn't feel like it was a good impression she had, either. "What did you do?"

Surely he didn't make a move on her, right? For example, saying something like, "Yaay! It's a real female knight! I just can't get enough!" and then hugging her?

"I didn't do anything." Contrary to my expectations, my brother answered in a serious tone. "It's because I didn't do anything... that she probably resents me."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"It'll be another long story," he said. "And unlike before, it's not going to be a fun one."

"I don't mind."

After I said this, my brother let out a sigh and then began to talk. "Two months ago in real time, half a year ago in Dendro time, there was a war. The machine Imperium Dryfe invaded the Kingdom of Altar."

The machine Imperium Dryfe: it was one of the nations a player could choose when first starting. It was at odds with this fantasy world as it had an advanced mechanical civilization.

...Although I don't have the right to talk about being at odds, given that I have a tank-riding bear in my family.

"The reason given by their nation was to obtain the Kingdom of Altar's fertile land," my brother said. "As for the game's side... it was a war event."

The manual had mentioned war events. They were large-scale battles between nations, and big quests with the fate of each nation on the line.

"It was a large battle involving Masters and tians," said my brother. "Well, it was a type of event that doesn't happen very often and one of the game's bigger features, but..." he sighed. "The result was a crushing defeat for the Kingdom of Altar. A third of our territory was lost, and among tians, the court magician Arch Wiseman, half of the knights, and the king died. Put simply, many of the key people running this kingdom perished in battle."

"...Why did they lose so badly? Is Dryfe that powerful?" I asked.

No, that's hard to believe, I thought. It'd be different in real life, but since this is a game, I'm sure they've taken measures to balance this.

"The strength of both countries was essentially even," he answered. "This includes the nations' power, the soldiers' levels, and the fighting ability of important tians. However, the strength of Masters on top of that is a different story."

"So you're saying they lost to Dryfe because of the difference in the number of players?" I asked.

Dryfe certainly seems like a nation where those who like it would really like it, so maybe a bunch of players joined it, I thought. ...No, that can't be it. If that were the case, this kingdom would also...

"The reason they lost is because out of all the Masters that were eligible to join the war, most didn't participate," he said.

"What?" It was an answer I didn't expect.

The fate of the kingdom was at stake, and it was a big-time event, yet they didn't participate?

"The king of Altar was, how to put it, an old-fashioned person," my brother said. “He said, ‘This is a crisis for our kingdom. Warriors of this nation, now is the time to rise up!’ It was great that he gave this speech and joined the front-lines, but that was it.”

“That was it?” I asked.

“There were no rewards. Essentially, he felt that if you belong to this nation, then it’s a given that you should rise up during its crisis.”

...I get that the fate of the kingdom was at stake, but I still feel that’s being a bit cheap, I thought. Is that how it’s normally done?

“Of course, for Masters... for players, they’re enjoying this world but they aren’t staking their lives on this game,” my brother said. “If they die, they just can’t log back in for 24 hours. That’s why even if the kingdom was in a crisis, there were many who thought that if there wasn’t anything to gain, then there wasn’t any meaning in participating.”

I would be just the opposite, I thought. If the login restriction was the only negative that came from dying, then I would consider joining the war, but I guess everyone thinks differently. There is the cost of the healing items you use during battle, and it’d be a huge minus if you fought some strong enemy and your equipment got destroyed.

“Regarding this issue, the fact that Dryfe on the other side clearly stated their rewards was a big factor,” he explained, and went on to describe them.

Apparently they had been quite exceptional.

They had offered 5,000 lir for every Kingdom of Altar soldier defeated. For each Embryo holder — in other words, each Master — the reward had been 50,000 lir. In addition to this, they had offered various rewards for defeating key people, such as rare items and a privileged status within the nation.

As a result, the morale of Dryfe’s players had risen, while the motivation of players in the Kingdom of Altar had dropped considerably.

“There were even some players saying things like, ‘I want to fight on Dryfe’s side,’ and ‘There might be a rare event if this kingdom gets destroyed,’” my brother said.

I wasn’t sure what to say. As a gamer, I can’t say I don’t understand how they feel. I can understand them, but...

“And the real decisive blow for the crushing loss was that the Kingdom of Altar’s Big Three — the top players for the kill rankings, duel rankings, and clan rankings — all passed on participating.”

"Rankings?" I asked. "They have those?"

"That over there," he said and pointed outside the window.

This restaurant faced the square with the water fountain where I had met up with my brother. He pointed at a splendid-looking notice board in front of the water fountain.

"That's the Kingdom of Altar's ranking board. It's updated every three months in game time. There are the kill rankings where you compete with your accomplishments defeating monsters. Then there are the duel rankings for PvP achievements, and the clan rankings that compare the size of clans. The top thirty ranking players for each of these is listed there."

"Hmm," I said.

"And this part is important: the only players that can participate in wars are the ones in those rankings. As for the clan rankings, if you're a member of a clan within the top thirty, then you can participate. So you could temporarily join a clan as a mercenary and fight in a war."

So in any case, that means a player can't fight in wars unless they make it into those rankings.

And at the time of the last war, the top-ranking players for each category, known as the Big Three, had supposedly said the following when the kingdom sought their participation:

The top of the kill rankings, King of Destruction (name unknown), had said, "I don't want to participate in a big event and carelessly expose my face."

The top of the duel rankings, Over Gladiator Figaro, had said, "I'm not interested in sloppy fights."

The leader of the top clan on the clan rankings, High Priestess Tsukuyo Fuso of The Lunar Society, had said, "We were unable to reach an agreement with the Kingdom of Altar."

As a result, the other ranking players' already low motivation had been brought down even further.

I'm sure they could see it'd be a losing battle, I thought. And like that, the war had started without many of the ranking players.

The ones that had participated had included some of the ranking clans, players that had temporarily joined them, such as members of fan clubs for popular tians like Liliana, as well as naive players.

The result had been a terrible sight.

The scene on the battlefield could only have been described as a massacre. The overall number of players had been disparate, and most devastating of all was that the top-ranking players on Dryfe's side had all participated.

Top of the Dryfe Imperium's kill rankings, King of Beasts.

Top of the Dryfe Imperium's duel rankings, Hell General Logan Goddhart.

Top of the Dryfe Imperium's clan rankings, Giga Professor Mr. Franklin, leader of the clan, Triangle of Wisdom.

Two out of the three had Superior Embryos, and their fighting power had been enormous. The Knights of the Royal Guard Commander and the Arch Wiseman had died at the hands of these three. Even the king had been killed.

"If things had kept going as they were, without a doubt, this kingdom would've been on a straight shot to ruin," said my brother. "But after being forced to give up a third of our territory, the nation of Caldina began their invasion into Dryfe. Except for some troops they left behind in the territory they took, the rest of Dryfe's forces retreated back to their homeland, and so the Kingdom of Altar managed to survive by a hair."

However, my brother continued to explain, since Caldina had already pulled out of Dryfe, Dryfe would likely attack again in a few months.

...He was right, I thought. This wasn't a fun story.

"So what's this about you saying that Liliana resents you?" I asked.

"That's because I was one of the ranking players listed there that didn't participate," he said. "Moreover, the former commander of the knights that died in battle was Liliana and Milia's father."

"...Man," I said. This really isn't a fun story.

"And so, having heard this not-so-fun story, what do you plan to do, Master?" Nemesis, who had been engrossed in her food this whole time and hadn't joined our conversation, asked.

"There's nothing I can do, right?" I asked.

What will I do when Dryfe attacks again... well, for now, I've already made my decision.

"Even if there's no reward, I'm not too keen on refusing to participate," I said. "Even if there's a cost, I would think there's some value in taking part." Even if you were to just view it as a game event.

"Yeah, well, you're right about that, but the players' mood at the time was more of a boycott against the cheap nation," said my brother. "I even get the feeling that Dryfe might've prepared their crazy rewards as a way to create this mood."

If that's the case, then the Kingdom of Altar probably lost to Dryfe strategically before the battle even began.

"Why didn't you join, Bro?" I asked. "Was it because of the lack of reward for you, too?"

"...In my case, it was because having my equipment break would equal exposing my real face."

"...Ahh, yeah."

Well yeah, that would be a huge problem, but still...

"Well, I've changed my equipment since then, so I'll be joining next time," he said.

That costume's DEF stat and physical damage reduction are certainly impressive, I thought. Although it's still a gag item, no matter how you look at it.

"The next time we do fight, though," he continued, "the strength of their nation will have increased, while ours will have weakened. So it'll be tough."

"Weakened?" I asked.

"Since losing the war, there have been a lot of players switching to different nations. There are even tians leaving the kingdom. People on online chat boards have been saying things like, 'The Kingdom of Altar is past its prime,' and 'It's game over.'"

I remained silent.

Defections, refugees, and rampant resignation... That's the path of a country headed towards collapse in the real world.

"With the latest update to the rankings, about 70% have been replaced," he said.

"Hmm..." I said. Put another way, now might be the chance to get on the ranking boards.

"In that case, I guess I'll start from there," I said.

Listening to all this has helped me solidify my plans... no, my plans are still the same, but my goals have increased.

"Have you decided on a new objective?" asked Nemesis.

I nodded. “As things stand, there aren’t a lot of things I can do, and I can’t take part in the war.”

Which is why...

“First I’ll raise my level,” I said, “and then I guess I’ll aim to get onto the rankings.”

◆◆◆

Earth — Undisclosed Chat Room

Members: Professor

General has joined.

Beast King has joined.

Members: Professor, General, Beast King

Professor: Good evening.

General: good evening

Beast King: eve

Professor: Gentlemen...

Professor: Did you both watch the video I sent you through Infinite Dendrogram?

Beast King: saw it

General: thats why we’re here, obviously

Professor: That’s true.

Professor: Now then, regarding our plan to eliminate an important tian. To put it simply...

Professor: It failed.

General: ya, fail

Professor: Those things I released in the dungeon...

Professor: The horde of Demi-Dragon Worms got wiped out, didn’t they?

General: werent there holes in this plan from the start?

General: giving the targets sister bug repellant incense and directing her to the orchard

General: and then springing a trap on the target there

Professor: Originally, I had a different set of steps planned.

Professor: But for some reason all the remberries had disappeared from the market.

Professor: Even the portion I intended to use for my plan was gone. lol.

Professor: Tis a real shame.

Professor: The plan was to give a poisoned remberry to the little sister...

Professor: and use that to kill the older sister.

Professor: Lil Sis, "Big Sis, congratulations."

Professor: Big Sis, "Thanks. Guhah!"

Professor: Lil Sis, "Big Siiisss!"

Professor: This was how it was supposed to go, so what a shame, riiiiiiight?! boo hoo, lol.

General: what u think is a shame isnt important

General: the issue is that the new plan got thwarted

Professor: Wasn't that bear scary? To go up against almost 100 Demi-Dragon Worms by himself...

Professor: and even more, to win unscathed.

Professor: Just one of those things should be a match for a player with a high-rank job. lol.

General: thats not that big a deal

General: its possible if ur leveled up and strong...i could do that too

General: but...defeating a demi dragon worm at lvl 0 with no job

General: i dont remember anyone being able to do something that absurd

Professor: My, my. So does that mean his Excellency the General is more concerned by that newbie than the bear?

General: pfft...i look forward to crushing him

Professor: As usual, way to play the stereotypical evil top brass character.

Professor: Me too though! lol.

General: whatever. this is how i am

Professor: lol.

General: but i cant deny it if u call me evil

General: the destruction of a nation...its this games first big event

General: i look forward to the chance when dryfe, no, when WE get to accomplish that

Professor: Well, last time ended with us just taking out some key people and gaining a portion of their territory, so that was a bit hard to stomach.

General: i had fun fighting with the knight commander

Professor: The king was boring.

Professor: It would’ve been better to fight a bunch of soldiers instead.

General: the arch wiseman...was it beast king that took him out?

Professor: That was pretty awesome. Just what I’d expect from our strongest player.

General: hey

Professor: Oh, okay, okay. His Excellency the General and Beast King are both the strongest. lol.

General: ya whatever. i’ll prove it to u in the next war

General: this time i’ll put an end to the kingdom of Altar

Professor: Yes, please do let me see that. lol.

General: btw, beast kings been silent the whole time, but dont u have something u want to say?

Beast King: the bear, was really, cute

General: ....

Professor: .... lol.

General: ...i dont understand ur taste, beast king

Chapter Three: Starting Point

Heaven's Three Star Restaurant, Royal Capital Altea — Ray Starling

Last night, after I had talked about various things with my brother, the dinner had turned into a normal banquet.

My brother and Nemesis, who had eaten more than double what I had, had given up partway and had left more than half the food untouched. So we'd passed out the remaining food and drinks to the other customers in the restaurant, and the entire scene had morphed into a party.

If an observer were to look about the restaurant, they wouldn't be able to tell who among those partying was a player (Master), and who was an NPC (tian).

The one saying to my brother "Hey big spender" is probably a player, I thought. That was a joke from a retro game. The one with a glass of wine in one hand and an exaggerated way of speaking is probably a tian.

Other than the distinction of who had an Embryo crest, these were the only sorts of vague differences... They all look human to me.

The whole scene made me appreciate again just how amazing Infinite Dendrogram was, and along with this, I felt there was something I needed to think about.

I felt this, however...

"My head hurts..." I groaned. The headache made it impossible in my current state to think about anything philosophical.

"Is this a hangover?" groaned Nemesis from beside me, holding her head like I was. I looked about the restaurant and saw that every person at the party who had consumed that drink was in the same state as us.

A hangover... I thought. Yeah, this must be a hangover.

Normally, underage players couldn't drink any alcohol. However, among those who had joined the party yesterday, there had been a Master with a skill that could change water into "an alcohol-like drink." To which I'd just like to ask, "Why would there be a skill like that?"

"This isn't alcohol, okaaay?" the person who'd offered me the drink had said. "It's just juice, okaaay? Drink it and you'll just feel as light as air, okaaay?"

It had tasted great, so I had drunk several cups. And so when the sun had risen, I found myself in this state.

"Ugh... Why does it have to show up here, too?" I muttered.

"Hangover" was also displayed on my status, and even though the pain setting should had been turned off, my head was throbbing.

"That drink, it was similar to alcohol but it was probably actually poison," said Nemesis.

"Ahh, a poison disguised as alcohol that gives you status effects, huh?" I responded.

In that case, it made sense that a skill like that existed, as well as why I had been able to drink it while ignoring the underage restrictions.

There was a folk tale about something like that in Japan, so there might've been an Embryo based on that.

The person who made the drinks was just fine after drinking it, though.

"Why would you drug someone like this...?" I wondered aloud.

"It's Lei-Lei's beary special way of welcoming you." Bro Bear, who had been passing out water to those suffering with a hangover, said this with a strained laugh.

"Welcoming?" I asked.

"She makes sure to get every newbie to drink that Divine Oni Poison Sake (light)."

"Why would anyone do such a thing...?"

"She's teaching you the lesson, 'Surprise attacks like this exist, so you need to be careful, okaaay,' by letting you experience it."

Oh, I see, I thought. No wonder I thought the people who didn't drink her alcohol seemed like they were grinning or looking on with nostalgia. I'm sure they received the same welcome earlier.

"...I learned a good lesson, then," I said.

"By the way, she's one of the Masters I mentioned yesterday who bears a Superior Embryo," said my brother. "She's also known as the Prodigal of Feasts Lei-Lei."

"Prodigal of Feasts..." I murmured.

She seems like an extraordinary person, but I wonder how she got a second name like that?

"Oh, also by the way, she wasn't able to participate in the previous war due to a schedule conflict in real life, it seems," said my brother.

I guess it goes without saying, but there are people who're too busy to participate in the game's events.

◇

In the end, I wasn't able to move during the morning until my hangover had passed.

...The item someone from the restaurant gave me to cure the Hangover effect didn't work, I thought unhappily. That's some pretty nasty poison for you not to be able to cure its status effect...

Putting that aside, we were back to normal, so we had decided to go shopping in town.

"Hey, Bro, I want to sell the drop item I got from the Demi-Drag and buy some beginner equipment, Dragonscales, and brooches. Do you know where they sell those?" I asked.

"What? You're going to stock up on those?" Bro Bear's expression looked troubled.

Nemesis's skill requires that I take damage, so I was thinking that the Lifesaving Brooch and Dragonscale Ward were a must, but...

"Is there some sort of problem?" I asked.

"Those accessories are beary expensive," he said. "The Dragonscale Ward is the top ward-type accessory and costs about 300,000 lir for one. The Lifesaving Brooch goes for about 5,000,000 lir."

"Say what?" I burst out.

That's 3,000,000 and 50,000,000 in yen. Those items were that expensive? I was taken aback. However, thinking about it, I guess that's reasonable. It is on the level of determining life or death for you. I would've died several times if it hadn't been for them.

"...I'll hold off for now," I said. Also, sorry for breaking them all yesterday...

"That'd be for the beary best," my brother said. "As for beginner equipment, I know a player-run shop that's fair. By the way, did you already open the Demi-Drag's drop item?"

"Open it?" I asked.

"For boss monsters like the Demi-Drag, the items they drop are usually crates. Inside should be one item derived from the boss you defeated, and then one to five random items based on the boss's level."

"Oh, really?" I asked.

Come to think of it, the item it dropped was a Demi-Dragon Worm Treasure Coffer, I remembered. I'm pretty sure "coffer" is another word for "chest."

I selected it from the item list and the message "Will you open this item?" was displayed.

"Would it be better to open this?" I asked.

"Hmm... There's a chance it'll be a miss, so you could just sell it as-is," said my brother. "But if it's from a Demi-Drag, then it might have something quite good in it. So I think it's okay to open it."

"Okay, then 'yes' it is."

Acquired Natural Demi-Dragon Worm Full-body Armor.
Acquired Ementerium.

"It says I got natural full-body armor and Ementerium," I said.

"Full-body armor is beary nice," he said. "It should have a skill that reduces physical damage by 150."

Wow, that's really good... I think, but I'm not sure anymore after having seen Bro Bear's costume.

"What does 'natural' mean?" I asked.

"Oh, it means that it's a naturally-made full-body armor."

...What does "a naturally-made full-body armor" mean?

"All right, then I'll equip it right away..." I said. "Huh? I can't."

I looked closer and saw that the following messages were displayed: "You do not meet the level requirement," and "You must have a total level of 150 and a job level of 51 in order to equip this item."

"...I guess I can't use this for a while," I said in disappointment.

"It looks like it'll be some time before you can equip it, so I think it'd be fine if you sold it," said my brother. "It'll fetch you at least 400,000 lir. Also, Ementerium is an item you sell. It's worth about 20,000 lir."

Ohh, those are pretty good prices, I thought. Although they don't even come close to reaching the brooch.

"Ementerium though... For the Demi-Drag's drop item that you're supposed to sell, it only goes for 20,000?" I said to myself.

If, for example, the full-body armor that he said was a winner hadn't been in the crate, and instead it had been an item based on the Demi-Drag with the same value as Ementerium, then that'd be a total of 40,000, I thought. I'm finally starting to understand how extraordinary Dryfe's rewards were that I heard about yesterday. I'm sure it'd be much easier to defeat eight soldiers than one Demi-Drag. I bet it was a profitable battlefield for those that took part.

...In any case, I've acquired some war funds, so I guess I'll go buy some equipment.

At the shop my brother had recommended, I had them choose a few items for me that I could equip even at level 0.

The equipment was supposedly part of something called the Riot series, and they were widely used by lower level players. It was a set consisting of light armor, bracers, pants, and boots.

The equipment I had bought happened to be the quality product of an armor craftsmen. Due to this, the Riot light armor had received the following bonus effects: Increased HP, HP +200; and Reduced Damage, which reduced physical damage by 10.

This will probably be a big help while my level is still low.

"Nemesis will do fine for my weapon, so I should be good to go grind levels now," I said.

"Not 'Nemesis will do fine!' You should be saying, 'Nemesis is the greatest!'" my Embryo shouted.

"Ne-me-sis is the grea-test," I intoned.

"Don't say it so monotone!"

I had also sold the drop items to this shop for the market value of 420,000 lir. Buying the set of equipment and some healing items, by the way, had cost me only about 20,000 lir. I still had the complete amount I had received for selling the full-body armor, but as there was no need to use it, I decided to just keep it.

At any rate, I was now prepared to go grind levels.

"Ah, hold on a sec," said my brother. "Before you go grind levels, you should equip a job. You'll be at level 0 forever if you don't."

"...Ohh," I said. I forgot. I'm still jobless.

"Should I explain a bit about jobs?" asked my brother.

"Please do," I replied.

My brother explained the following things to me.

Jobs in Infinite Dendrogram were divided into three large categories: low-rank jobs, high-rank jobs, and Superior jobs.

Low-rank jobs were ones that jobless players acquired first. They were easy to get, and had a level cap of 50. High-rank jobs had set conditions for acquiring them, and they were capped at 100. Six low-rank and two high-rank jobs could be equipped at once, giving a player a total level cap of 500.

So then what about Superior jobs?

Superior jobs were extremely difficult to acquire, and on top of that, only the first player that acquired the job would be allowed to equip it. Also, the greatest feature of Superior jobs was that they had no level cap.

That's right. With Superior jobs, your level, that was normally maxed out at 500, could be increased as much as you liked.

There was no balance whatsoever to this. But of course, as your level rose, so did the amount of experience needed for each new level. That was why even without a cap, there apparently weren't many people with ridiculously high levels.

...Which is to say, there are a few players with ridiculously high levels, I thought. Given how there were also those Superior Embryos that came up last night, I feel like the development team is deliberately setting up different levels of strength.

Also, it appeared that there were even cases where tians had Superior jobs.

This is somewhat of a digression, but the terms "low-rank job" and "high-rank job" used their translated versions in each player's language. The term "Superior job," however, was unified across all countries and cultural regions.

Given how this overlaps with Superior Embryos, I wonder if the development team is trying to give some deeper meaning to the term "Superior," I thought.

By the way, when using just the word "Superior," this apparently referred to a Superior Embryo and its Master.

...Like I thought, it's confusing.

"What'll happen if I choose a job that doesn't mesh well with my Embryo?" I asked.

"If you're at a save point, you can reset your job whenever you like," replied my brother. "And even if you reset your job, your Embryo's growth won't change."

So that was why there were apparently some players that would repeatedly reset their jobs in order to try various ones. You could repeat this process until you found a job that suited you. After finding it, your Embryo would have developed due to the time spent up until then, so you'd then be able to level up even easier than before.

"Speaking of jobs... what are the jobs of the ranking players you talked about yesterday?" I asked.

"If they came up in yesterday's conversation, then they all have Superior jobs," said my brother.

"I thought as much," I said. Titles like "King" and "High Priest" certainly seemed like ones only one person could acquire. "Do you know what kind of requirements they had?"

"Oh... The requirements for King of Destruction were: surpassing 100 million total damage dealt, defeating a certain number of high-rank boss monsters solo, and also completing a special quest," said my brother. "The rest probably had something similar."

100 million damage... I could use the same skill I used against the Demi-Drag, Vengeance is Mine, 10,000 times and it still wouldn't be enough, I thought. The jobs for ranking players are as impressive as I'd expect.

"By the way, the stat modifiers stack for all the jobs you have equipped, but you won't be able to use some skills if the grouping of your main job changes," said my brother. "So that means you won't be able to use Gunner skills while you're a Cook."

"Oh, really?" I asked. "Being something like a Cook and Soldier seems like it'd work out, though." Like in that one movie.

"Well, you can also change your main job at save points, and you can still use skills if they're within the same grouping," said my brother.

It's probably best to keep that in mind when choosing which jobs to equip.

"Okay, then what jobs can I equip now?" I asked.

"Ta-daa! The Suitable Job Diagnostics Catalog," he said in a voice as if he were going to take out some sort of secret tool. What he did pull out, though, was a thick book. “If you read this catalog, you can find the job that best fits you out of all the ones you can equip right now.”

“That’s useful,” I said.

“Since the format is a questionnaire, I don’t know if it’ll really be the best fit, but this’ll work just fine when you’re not sure what to do,” he said. “Because at any rate, there are over a hundred low-rank jobs that you can equip in this town from the beginning.”

“That’s way too many!” I cried.

“Well, you’ll probably be using this going forward, so I’ll give this to you.” He handed me the book.

“Thanks,” I said. At any rate, let’s give it a try.

And so, after five or so minutes the results came in...

“A Paladin?” I thought aloud. It’s certainly a staple in games, but I’m not so sure it fits me.

“Ahh,” said my brother, “Paladins get a boost to their HP, STR, and END. Also, they can learn damage-reducing skills and healing magic.”

I see, I thought. In that case, it’s perfect. As long as I’m using Nemesis, then it’ll probably be a great match.

“That’s strange, though,” he continued. “Paladin isn’t a job you can get from the start. I mean, it’s a high-rank job.”

“A high-rank job?” I asked.

“Yeah,” he said. “You can’t get it unless you meet certain conditions.”

“What kind of conditions?” I asked.

“First, you need to defeat a boss of a certain strength... a Demi-Dragon class monster, while also doing more than half the damage to it.”

“I did that,” I said. I cleared that in the battle with the Demi-Drag.

“Next, you need to donate 200,000 lir to the church.”

“I can do that,” I said. Right now I have around 400,000 lir.

“And last, you need the recommendation of a key person related to the knights,” he finished.

“A recommendation... that I don’t have,” I said. I just started playing Dendro, so I don’t think I’ll be able to get a recommendation.

“Wait, wait. Didn’t something along those lines happen just yesterday?” Nemesis, who had been quietly listening the whole time, suddenly cut in.

“I see,” said my brother. “So that was the real reward from yesterday’s quest. Well, of course they wouldn't display such a tactless message as, 'Your relationship with so-and-so has deepened.'"

"Huh?" I asked. Somehow, the two of them seem to have gotten something I didn't.

"Master... have you forgotten just who it was you helped yesterday?" asked Nemesis.

"...Ah."

We then made our way over to Liliana's house. Liliana was the Vice Commander of the Knights of the Royal Guard, and likely because of what had happened yesterday, she was at home with Milianne.

We received a warm welcome and thanks for the day before. After we chatted with the two, I mentioned to Liliana that I wanted to become a Paladin. She readily agreed and wrote a recommendation letter for me right away.

I took care of the donation at the church as well, and within the day, I had become a Paladin.

And with this, I was finally prepared to go grind levels.

◇

"All right, then this is where I'll take my leave," Bro Bear struck up his hand and said.

"What? You're not going to help us grind levels, Brother Bear?" asked Nemesis.

"I had planned from the start to go separate ways after the welcome party was over," he said.

"Why's that?" I asked.

"If you do power leveling, then a gap will develop between your status and actual playing skill," he said. "A player's skills and ingenuity are beary important in Dendro, so you need to set out on your own to develop these as well."

"I'm here too, though, so it'll be the two of us," said Nemesis.

Power leveling was a method of easily grinding levels by getting help from a stronger player. An example of this would be letting the stronger player take all the hits from a strong monster, during which you would chip away at its health, defeat it, and then instantly gain levels.

Yeah, I guess if I did that, my level would go up, but my skills wouldn't improve.

"Also, Dendro has the Embryo system," said my brother. "If you constantly ask fur others to help you, your Embryo won't develop in a good way."

"Is that how it works?" I asked.

"It's possible," answered Nemesis.

Since Nemesis was born this way as a result of my play style since starting, I guess it is possible.

"And so, I'll say adios to you here-," said my brother. "But if you get into any serious trouble, contact me."

"Yeah, if I get into serious trouble," I agreed.

"That's all right, but for starters, try to do your best on your own," he added.

"Got it," I said. "And, um, thanks for all your help since yesterday."

"Don't worry about it. I bearlieve it's only fair to help you out a bit. Oh, and also..." Bro Bear brought the head of his costume closer to me. "If anything happens with a ranking player, make sure you contact me right away." His voice had taken on a more serious tone again.

"Bro?" I asked.

"Well, that thing from yesterday might've been just an anomaly. But crazy things shouldn't happen that often, so just relax and enjoy Dendro." Bro Bear said this and left, leaving just me and Nemesis behind.

At the same time, a message was displayed saying, "The party has been disbanded." My brother's status, which had been showing the whole time, also disappeared.

"Well then, Master," said Nemesis. "It's finally time for you — no, for us — to stand on our own feet, but have you decided on where to go?"

"Bro told me about some low-level hunting grounds, so I think I'll go check those out," I said.

"I'm looking forward to grinding levels," said Nemesis. "Heh heh heh! Tonight I starve for blood."

"It's still noon, you know?" I said.

◇

The first hunting ground we headed to was Easter Plains, right outside of Altea's East Gate. It had a very clear view, and I could see monsters leaping about here and there, as well as the players fighting them.

That reminds me, this is the first time I've seen other players fight.

"All right, then let's get started too, shall we?" I asked.

"Yeah," said Nemesis, and she then changed into the same black greatsword as yesterday.

I swung the greatsword up and down as I held it in my right hand — or rather, it was wrapped around my whole arm.

"This really isn't as heavy as it looks," I commented.

Even at my STR level, I can swing it with no trouble, I thought. It's about the same weight as that fake sword I bought as a souvenir a long time ago on my school field trip. Or maybe about the same as a metal pipe.

"Isn't it rude to mention a lady's weight?" asked Nemesis.

"But this is clearly lighter than when you're in your human form," I said. What happened to the law of conservation of mass?

"...You're concerned about the law of conservation of mass in a world with magic and where time flows differently?" she asked.

Well, yeah, that's true, but...

"And besides, it shouldn't feel light to anybody else," she said. "It'll only feel light for you."

"Is that how it is?" I asked.

"That's how it is."

Okay, then I guess I'll leave it at that, I thought. My level isn't going to get any higher if I spend all my time asking questions.

"All right then, time to start grinding levels," I said.

"I'm itching to get started."

Two hours later.

My level had gone up by 3, and I hadn't taken any damage yet.

"...How come I'm not taking any damage even though I've been getting pummeled?" I wondered.

Since I had arrived here, I had been fighting monsters like Little Goblins and Pashi Rabbits. They were the type you could take one glance at and say, "Ah, these are the small fry monsters you find in the beginning." However, no matter how many times they had attacked me, I hadn't taken any damage.

"You shouldn't be surprised," replied Nemesis. "You have fairly good equipment for your level. Also, wasn't there a Reduced Damage skill? Isn't all the damage below 10 becoming 0 because of that?"

So that means the monsters here can't do more than 10 damage to me.

My initial HP had been a little under 100. Taking into account that this was a hunting ground for beginners, it was possible they had only placed monsters here with low enough strength that they wouldn't kill a player with that amount of HP.

Incidentally, my HP was now over 700 at level 4. Liliana's HP had been in the 5,000s with a Paladin level of 60 and a total level of 210, but at this rate, by the time I reached Paladin level 60, my HP would probably be well over 6,000.

"This may get crazy down the road," I said.

"It might be because it's a high-rank job, but its stat boosts are nice," said Nemesis. "Also, HP is the highest out of all my stat modifiers."

So the large growth in my HP was apparently the result of the total modifiers from the Paladin Job and my Embryo. The modifier for Embryos is pretty big, I realized.

Although it wasn't as much as my HP, my other stats had of course gone up, as well. In addition, I also learned the healing magic skill First Heal.

With this, I can heal myself to some degree now.

"Hmm... I guess I'll change spots, then," I said. As things stand, I should be okay somewhere with enemies that are a little stronger.

"Yeah, I agree," said Nemesis. "I also felt things were a bit underwhelming."

Well, yeah, that's because it only takes us one hit to slice the goblins and rabbits in half, I thought. Even though I was the one doing it, it was still kind of scary. The monsters' corpses don't remain behind, but if they did, it'd be one extremely gory sight.

"Let's see," I said, "the next suitable hunting ground would be Noz Forest, just past the North Gate."

"Then shall we first return to the royal capital?" asked Nemesis. "It's almost time for sweets, after all."

Time for sweets...

"I'm okay with paying for some drinks," I said, "but..."

What will I do if she eats as much as dinner last night? I wondered. I would like to keep the remaining money I got from selling those items to get my next set of equipment.

At any rate, we headed back toward the royal capital. On the way, I watched the other players as they fought. There were a lot of players with outfits that were in the catalog from the tutorial, so they were probably beginners like me. However, even if they had the beginner outfits, they all had at least one thing other players didn't.

One player had a sickle and chain. The player would hurl it in the air and the chain would extend on its own to attack the monster — or so I had thought, but for some reason, it was the sickle that would travel underground and then attack the monster instead.

Another player had a baby carriage. Inside the carriage was an egg-like object, and for some reason, the player was pushing the carriage with their left hand, while desperately swinging a sword in their right hand to fight off monsters.

Another player had a stone hut. There was an opening at one section in the wall, and the player was attacking monsters from there with a slingshot. Monsters that bit onto the hut stopped moving as if they were stunned.

Another player had a red barrier. Monsters that entered the barrier would blow up as if they had stepped on a mine.

Ah, the player got blown away as well, I noticed. I wonder if all of those are Embryos like Nemesis.

"...There are a lot of different types," I said, amazed.

"The sickle and chain is an Arms, the hut is a Castle, and the mine field is a Territory," explained Nemesis. "The baby carriage is... what exactly? A tool that's an Arms? Or maybe a Chariot?"

So those are the non-Maiden base category Embryos... they look really interesting.

"Are you cheating on me?! Are you thinking about cheating while you're embracing me with your right hand?!" cried Nemesis.

...Does this count as embracing?

"I'm not thinking about cheating or anything, I just thought it was interesting how they all have their own abilities and personalities," I said. "It's really fantasy-like."

Bro Bear's Embryo was such a heavy firearm, the issue went way beyond whether or not it was fantasy-like, I added silently.

"Well, having something solely unique to each Master is the fundamental principle of Embryos, after all," said Nemesis.

"Also, compared to the others, your first form is fairly rugged, Nemesis."

"Rugged?!" she exclaimed.

Yeah, your greatsword mode, that is.

As we continued to walk like that, we came across another player engaged in battle with monsters. Unlike before, however, I could see the silhouettes of two people.

One of them wore a coat that appeared to be starting equipment. He was a player of about middle or high school age. He was dirty with mud and blood from battle, but even still, he was an attractive young boy that you could get away with calling either cool or cute.

As for appearances, the other person was quite unique, as well. She had a demon tail and bat wings, and was a beautiful, imp-like young girl.

"Haaa!"

"Take that!"

The two of them were fighting with all they had, but they were surrounded by four Little Goblins, and the odds were slightly stacked against them.

Now, I'd like to help, but it wouldn't be good to just cut into their battle.

"First Heal," I said, and healed both of their HP. I did it partly as a way to test the new healing magic I had just learned but hadn't yet used. It was what you might describe as a drive-by heal. I couldn't see their HP since we weren't in the same party, but their wounds noticeably disappeared.

"Ah! That helps a lot!" one of them cried.

"Thank youuu!"

The two regrouped and resumed fighting.

◇

After about five minutes, the two managed to wipe out the Little Goblins.

“Good work out there,” I said. “First Heal.” I cast the healing magic one more time on the two after they had finished fighting.

“Thank you very much for healing us! That really helps,” one of them said.

“Thanks,” the other added gratefully.

“I just wanted to try out my healing magic, so no need to worry about it,” I said. If anything, it feels awkward to be thanked.

“Well, you have been getting thanked non-stop since yesterday...” said Nemesis. Her weight then unexpectedly disappeared from my right hand, and she was standing next to me in her human form.

“Huh? What?!” one of them gasped.

“Oh? Are you...” asked the other.

The two of them appeared to be surprised, but Nemesis paid no mind to that and just stared at the imp girl.

“I see, I see,” said Nemesis. “A fellow Maiden... no, a Guardian, huh? However, it’s rare for a Guardian to look this close to a human.”

“Hey, stop staring at her, Nemesis,” I said. “That’s rude.”

“My apologies,” she said. “I was just curious about something.”

Just what that something was... well, I was curious about it, too.

“I’m sorry, my Embryo was being rude,” I said.

“Please don’t worry about it,” said the other player. “That’s amazing, though. There are even Embryos that transform!”

“That’s right. I’m Nemesis, a Type Maiden with Arms Embryo!” Nemesis introduced herself with such vigor it seemed like a sound effect should’ve accompanied her.

...This is embarrassing.

“Oh, sorry for the late introduction, but I’m Ray Starling,” I said. “I started playing Infinite Dendrogram yesterday.”

“Ah, I’m Rook,” said the other player. “I also just started playing yesterday.”

“I’m Babylon! A Type Guardian Embryo! Call me Babi, okay?” the girl announced.

“Rook and Babi,” I repeated back their names. “I have to say, though, weren’t Guardians supposed to be a type of monster?”

Other than her tail and wings, Babi looks exactly like a human. You could even say that there’s no difference, since I’m pretty sure tails and wings can be added when creating a character. If I had to say which she looked more like, between a monster and a human, I would say a human.

"That's because I'm a succubus!" she declared. "I'm sexy and cute and everyone falls head over heels for me!"

Succubus......... a succubus?

"Babi, I told you not to be so open about that in front of people...!" Rook wailed.

"Whaaat? But I'm an Embryo that takes pride in being a succubus, so it's not embarrassing at all."

"It's embarrassing for me!" he cried.

"...Rook, you're embarrassed by me?" Babi looked at him with puppy dog eyes.

Even as someone on the sidelines, I thought that looking up at him with teary eyes was just unfair.

Rook became flustered in an instant. "You see, umm, I'm not embarrassed by you, Babi. It's just that it'd be embarrassing if people were to start prying into my inner thoughts since you were born from me, you see..."

What is this sense of deja vu? I thought. Also, I feel like I could get along with Rook.

"Now, now, you shouldn't cause too much trouble for your Master, Babi," Nemesis scolded.

"You're one to talk," I muttered.

◇

Rook and Babi were done with their hunting, so we decided to band up and make our way back to the capital as one group. And, since we had no reason not to, Nemesis and I invited them to our little sweets party.

They gladly accepted, but...

"Peaches sure are delicious this time of year." Despite it being her first time eating peach tarts, Nemesis spoke as though she knew everything about it and hastily sank her teeth into her seventeenth serving.

"No sweet thing is complete without this." Babi poured chili sauce all over her strawberry parfait.

"...No, chili sauce shouldn't even be an option," I said.

“I think so, too...” Rook agreed. “But the speed at which Nemesis eats is also quite...”

“Yeah, I know exactly what you mean...” I said.

The scene before us was strange in many ways. For example, despite not being older than a day, Nemesis and Babi were familiar with the concept of seasonal fruit, they had their own tastes, and they expressed awareness of flavoring.

Yesterday Nemesis had told me that, despite being humanoid in form, she wasn’t really like us. But that didn’t stop the sight before me from seriously throwing me off.

“When born, we Embryos make use of our Master’s memories,” she had explained after reading my mind. “Our knowledge of this world came from the world’s system, but our knowledge of worldly affairs came from our Masters.”

Oh, so that’s how she knows about peach seasons and the like.

“Basically, we Embryos know everything about our Masters,” she added.

“What kind of girls do I prefer, then?” I asked.

“Ones like me, of course!”

“Wrong.”

“Why?!” she howled.

So, to sum it up, they didn’t know everything, but merely came equipped with common sense.

“Still, what kind of common sense would make Babi eat something so... blasphemous?” I couldn’t help but ask.

“Perhaps she does it because it’s blasphemous, no?” Nemesis answered. “After all, her name is Babylon, right?”

The Whore of Babylon was a figure from the Book of Revelation, often portrayed riding a seven-headed beast as she spread depravity, adultery, and defilement, making her a sworn enemy of the martyr. I had no idea if any of that applied to Babi, but Nemesis had the name of the Greek goddess of vengeance or divine punishment, and befittingly, her ability was a counterattack. There was reason to believe that Embryo names were related to their powers.

“That aside, Babi, being a succubus, you must know many ways to express your sexuality and make men go crazy about you,” Nemesis commented.

What the hell are you saying, you damn goth loli?

“Of course I do,” said Babi.

D-Does she really?

Babi’s words actually made Rook choke on his food a bit.

“Ho ho...” Nemesis said gleefully. “Care to share?”

“Umm, there’s the shoulder massage, the massage where you lightly step on the lower back, and the best one — the lap-pillow and ear-cleaning combo! Sexy, right?!” Babi exclaimed.

“...Hm?” Nemesis asked.

Sexy? I thought. None of that goes beyond normal massage. I wouldn’t even call it “lewd.”

“That’s not what I wanted to hear. Don’t you have anything befitting the name ‘Whore of Babylon?’” Nemesis asked.

“Like?” Babi looked puzzled.

“W-Well, I-I’m not one to know...”

Don’t give her a question that flusters yourself, you damn goth loli.

“Umm... I’m underage, so I think that Babi is just acting accordingly...” Rook stopped choking on his food and gave us a highly agreeable reason.

“Ahh, age restrictions, huh.” I expressed my understanding. Just like they affected alcohol and tobacco, age restrictions reduced the sexiness of succubi to the point of making it equivalent to girls giving massages to their dads.

Man is it hard to tell if Infinite Dendrogram is wholesome or indecent.

◇

Before parting ways, Rook and I — both being newbies — made a little promise to party up and go adventuring sometime.

Also, Rook didn’t have a job yet. In fact, he’d started playing without having read anything about the game, so he didn’t even know how to get one.

I let him take a look at the Suitable Job Diagnostics Catalog my brother had given me, and he quickly found a job he was interested in. To make it into a little surprise for the next time we partied up, I chose not to ask what it was.

Anyway, after Rook and I went our own ways, I walked to the northern Noz Forest.

“Shall we?” I asked Nemesis.

“Yes, let’s raise your level.”

With Nemesis already in her greatsword form, I entered the second easiest hunting ground in the capital’s surroundings.

Unlike Easter Plains, this place had a number of trees that took a toll on visibility. The forest was so dense that it was hard to see twenty meters ahead. However, I could hear the sounds of battle coming from the distance, so it clearly wasn’t completely inaccessible to us players. The sounds were probably being made by beginners like myself, who were no longer satisfied by the Easter Plains.

About two minutes after we began searching for monsters, we found some wolf-like beasts. Right when they entered my vision, the name “Teal Wolf” was displayed above them. There were three in total.

“Man, this is sudden,” I said. As in most RPGs, fighting multiple enemies right after entering a higher level hunting ground wasn’t the best idea, but I had no choice.

Quick and nimble as they were, the wolves made the first move as the one closest to us jumped and bit into me. The hit dealt 22 points of damage, and it was the first time I’d felt pain that day.

Since I would be able to take about thirty such attacks, I decided to go on the offensive.

As the Teal Wolves surrounded me, I targeted only the one straight ahead. They all began attacking, slightly out of sync with each other. I ignored the two coming from behind and intercepted the one right ahead.

The hit from my black greatsword made the wolf whine in pain. Unlike Little Goblins and Pashi Rabbits, it didn’t get split in half, but the damage I gave was great enough to make its movements more dull.

“Yeah, this isn’t anything I can’t handle,” I said.

I continued the grind.

◇

Several minutes later, with my health at 50% and a level higher than I’d had before, I stood surrounded by drops from three monsters.

“All right, so we can take on three of these at once,” I said.

“Indeed we can,” Nemesis agreed.

In preparation for the next battle, I restored my health with First Heal. Possessing both high HP and an ability to self-heal, Paladins were simply ideal for leveling.

“All right, I’m healed.” I said.

“So, now you’re just level 5 and already have over 800 HP,” Nemesis commented. “Your defense has increased, too, so you might even be able to bear a Demi-Drag’s attack without any accessories. Don’t you think so?”

“...Even if I can, I’d like to avoid boss battles for now,” I replied. Endlessly repeating events that intense would simply drain my life away. “I’ll hunt standard monsters until I reach level 20.”

“That’s a good idea.” said Nemesis. “I might’ve evolved into my second form by that point.”

“What will happen when you evolve, anyway?” I asked. “My brother said that Embryos don’t change too much.”

“I imagine it won’t go beyond new skills and changes to the weapon,” she answered. “Though, I do not know if the same can be said for the evolution between the third and fourth form.”

“High-rank evolution, was it?” I asked.

“Yes,” Nemesis confirmed. “First to third forms are low-rank, while fourth and above are high-rank. As far as I understand it, high-rank forms display a whole different level of uniqueness. There are even cases where the focus on certain skills leads to Embryos entering their own, unique categories.”

The fourth form of my brother’s Baldr was a tank, which was categorized as a “Chariot.” However, it had originally been an Arms-type gun, meaning that it had evolved into a different category.

“If high-rank forms display a lot of uniqueness, what about the seventh — Superior — form?” I asked.

“There are no details on that in the knowledge I was granted with my birth,” she replied. “We’re simply not given this kind of information, it seems.”

“I think I see how it is,” I said. It was top secret knowledge not meant to be seen by the average person. Not surprising that there were fewer than a hundred people who got there.

“However, I do know that Embryos of fourth or higher forms get called ‘high-rank’ not just for classification, but for power, as well,” Nemesis said, giving more details. “That’s why you must hurry and uplift me into the fourth form... and beyond, if you can.”

“Well, that’s the plan, anyway.”

The rankings were probably full of people with high-rank Embryos, so if I wanted to get there, I had no choice but to get on their level.

“For now, I have no choice but to do some honest leveling,” I said. “I’m gonna reach level 13 and move on to another hunting ground while it’s still today.”

The orange patches of sky I saw between the trees clearly showed that it was getting late, but I had no intention of ending the hunt just yet.

Hell, more monsters spawn at night, so it actually makes me excited.

“That’s the spirit,” said Nemesis.

“All right, then, let’s g—”

Suddenly, my vision slanted.

No — it wasn’t just my vision, but myself.

The numbness — the remnant of an impact — on my forehead was a sign that something had just hit my temporal region. My status display showed me that it had taken away a whole 80% of my HP.

“...The hell?” I’d been struck by sudden critical damage with no rhyme or reason behind it. Since it’d hit my head, I was left dizzy and unable to properly move my limbs.

“Master!” Nemesis raised her voice.

I thought she was simply worried about me, but I was wrong. It was a warning.

“Hh! Counter Absorption!” she cried. Twenty-four hours had passed since she’d used it yesterday, so Nemesis could use Counter Absorption again. Right as she did that, the newly-created wall of light was hit by something.

“Gyaghg, ghgee!”

It was a small monster that combined the aerodynamic shape of a bullet with the dreadful visage of a preta. It writhed — to no avail — as it tried to break through the wall of light. More likely than not, the damage I’d taken a second ago had been dealt by this thing.

“Is this a monster?” I asked.

...No way, I thought in disbelief. This monster's offensive ability is way too great compared to the Teal Wolves I've been fighting. However, it didn't seem like it was a boss monster like the Demi-Dragon Worm, either. I mean, it doesn't even have the name pop-up that appears over every monster in sight. Could it be...

"Kh!" Counter Absorption's wall of light vanished, and so did the monster that had hit it.

"A suicidal-type monster that dies right after its first attack," Nemesis explained. "It's both a monster and not at the same time... Master! This is a...!"

"...Guardian!" I completed her sentence.

Type Guardian... A monster-type Embryo. Unlike Babi, who was of the same type, this one was a real monster.

"Master, retreat! Someone is targeting you!" Nemesis exclaimed.

"Don't have to tell me twice!" I cried.

With my dizziness gone, I dashed towards the North Gate while healing myself.

Soon enough, I became fully aware of the situation. Screams of players were echoing all over Noz Forest. It wasn't just one or two people, either, but dozens of them. Since that monster was an Embryo, the one responsible was another player.

PK — Player Killing. Just as the name implied, it was the act of killing other players — a concept that had existed since the dawn of MMOs. The person who had attacked me was attacking other players, too, increasing his number of victims with every passing second.

With Nemesis's buff and stat increase due to the high-rank job, my HP was significantly larger than that of most people close to my level, and yet a single attack had been enough to bring me to the verge of death. No player without similar circumstances could survive it.

It was no longer a "newbies' hunting ground"... but a "newbie-hunting ground." We had become the hunted.

"That Guardian died right then and there, so why are the victims increasing?!" I cried.

"They're probably part of a high-rank Guardian categorization. Type Legion," Nemesis answered. "It's an Embryo that's basically a colony. As far as I know, the quantity comes at a great cost to quality!"

“You’re saying that the attack that almost killed me was ‘low quality?’ Nice joke,” I said.

Wait, if the Embryo is a high-rank, the Master must be high-rank, too, I realized.

“We’re at a disadvantage!” cried Nemesis.

We have to hurry back to the capital, I agreed. This player-killing asshole shouldn’t follow us there.

However, before I could act out my thoughts...

“Gyaghghghghghghgh!” I heard it behind me — a monster flying towards me like a meteor.

“Mast—!”

It’s going to kill m—

“Like hell!” Turning around, I swung my black greatsword at the bullet monster.

“Ghh...ghghghgh.” The impact made the bullet monster blast away into the trees, ending its life and role.

“...I did it!”

“Well done, Master!” Nemesis cried. “Now, you just have to—”

—run to the city. Nemesis didn’t get to finish her sentence. In her greatsword form, Nemesis didn’t have a face. However, I could easily tell what she was looking at.

Someone was standing there beyond the trees, lightly veiled by a dark haze. I couldn’t tell whether it was a man or a woman, young or old, or even if it was actually human or not. Though light, the haze distorted the silhouette to the point of making me unable to see such basic things. All I could tell was that the figure held a gun-like object in its right hand...

...and that an Embryo crest was shining on its left.

At that point, it couldn’t have been more obvious.

It was this person. This person was the one trying to kill me.

“Run away! Master!” Nemesis exclaimed.

Before I could even respond, I began dashing with all I had. The distance was twenty meters. It was much smaller than the distance I had to run when escaping the orchard, and the city was right beyond it.

I kept on running.

However, I suddenly heard a gunshot. At the same moment, I felt a dreadful, daunting sensation.

I had to keep running.

But the terrible chills running down my spine made me turn around. The sight that awaited my eyes was beyond anything I could expect.

Nemesis and I had been able to fend off a mere two of those bullet monsters, and still only barely. And, upon turning around, I was greeted by a hellish swarm of the very same creatures, numbering so many that they blocked out the view behind them.

A moment later, before I could even blink, the monsters charged at me and pulverized my body.

[Fatal Damage]

[Party Eliminated]

[Resurrection Period Expired]

[Death Penalty: 24 Hour Login Ban]

◇◇◇

Reiji Mukudori.

"...Ghh!"

Right after they destroyed me, my consciousness was ejected to reality as if I had been only dreaming. Unlike how people felt when waking up after a good night's sleep, my mind was completely clear. However, I wasn't sure if I could properly process and accept what had just happened.

Sure, I'd heard the final message loud and clear. And I was fully aware that the penalty for dying was now in effect. But I still couldn't wrap my head around what had actually happened back there.

"Let's just test it and..." Sure enough, I wasn't able to log in to Infinite Dendrogram.

As I made my attempt, I noticed the message on the display fixed to the side of the device. It said "Penalty Active. 23h:55m:16s remaining."

"...Well, damn," I said.

I looked outside and realized that dawn had yet to break. The clock said that it wasn't even five in the morning. There wasn't much I could do at this time of day.

"...Guess I'll sleep for now." I spread myself out on the bed and tried to pass out. However, when I closed my eyes, I couldn't help but picture the moment I'd been killed. That led to me trying to imagine what I could've done to survive.

It was a case of Tetris Syndrome. Just like people would imagine what block placement would get them to a higher score, I ran my head through various survival strategies.

As such thoughts dominated my head, I realized just how shoddy my movements had been. With the regrets and considerations of what I could've, should've, and would've done spinning in my mind, I eventually fell asleep.

◇

I woke up at about eight in the morning and had my breakfast while watching the morning news. They were discussing something about the entertainment industry and the world tour of that famous singer — Rachel Raymuse. It wasn't anything I could bring myself to care for.

"...Man, this is dull." I was referring to the taste of the food I was eating.

Since I had all the time in the world right now, I'd decided to make something myself, but the result had been far below the fancy meals I'd had in the game. I had a feeling that continuing to live like this would quickly drain away my excitement for real food.

After I finished eating and took care of the dishes, I went to an online message board and looked for info. It didn't take long for me to find something on the incident I'd been involved in.

The tragedy at Noz Forest was actually big news in the message board dedicated to Infinite Dendrogram.

Normally, simple player killing would never get this much attention, but this was a special case. That was because players were still being hunted in all the beginners' hunting grounds. However, this was only happening in the Kingdom of Altar.

Simultaneously and continuously, the kingdom's newbies were being killed off. It was clear that it was an operation executed by multiple members of an organized force. The only question left was: Who was behind it?

Most people on the message board suspected the Dryfe Imperium, which was rumored to be planning to attack Altar soon. The reasoning behind the suspicion was the idea that Dryfe was trying to keep Altar's war potential low for when they decided to make their move. Since it was only happening in the kingdom, the possibility of that being true was high.

As one would expect, the kingdom's players were responding to this. Some volunteered to act as vigilantes and hunt down the player killers. A number of bigger battles had happened between the two sides. However, the vigilantes had failed to get even a single victory. That made it quite obvious that the player killers were made up of highly proficient players. Just like the others, the one who had killed me at Noz Forest remained undefeated, but there was a slight difference. The vigilantes weren't even able to find the player killer.

The beginner hunt showed no sign of stopping, but no one could even find the person responsible, let alone defeat them.

"...It had to be that person, right?" I said. Back then, I'd seen both the bullet monster Embryo and its Master. Due to the strange mist surrounding them, I hadn't been able to tell if they were male or female, young or old. That might've had something to do with the vigilantes' inability to find them.

I ran my eyes through the comments, which were many and varied. Some said, "Welp, the Kingdom is screwed," others went "Dryfe players are such scumbags," and some saw this as an opportunity and said, "If you're thinking of deserting, I recommend Caldina. Noobs welcome."

Among them, I saw complaints from unrelated people.

One said, "Man, I got killed while I was just passing by. My Embryo was this close to evolving and the death penalty messed it all up."

Another replied with "Same here, and I was about to start living the high-rank dream..."

Were there more death penalties than the login ban? It got me curious, so I typed up and posted a message saying "Noob here. Just started and died for the first time. What's this about death penalties?"

Replies came quickly.

One simply went "Get lost, noob."

Another was fooling around and said, "Let me teach you my ways. Step one: You get naked..." but there were those who properly explained it to me.

Apparently, there were rumors that a high number of death penalties decreased the speed at which Embryos evolved. Most players believed this information and treated it as truth.

It was hard to gauge, considering that Embryos were unique to each player, but rough comparisons showed that Embryos belonging to players with many death penalties evolved slower than those with less. This demerit might've been one of the reasons why the kingdom's players weren't enthusiastic about participating in the war.

After giving my thanks for the info, I switched to another board.

I thought I'd be seeing grim posts about war and player killing everywhere I went, but Tenchi and Huang He were full of people talking about the tame events going on there.

Cherries were blooming in Tenchi, so people were talking about the cherry blossom viewing sponsored by the tian "Conquest General."

In Huang He, panda-like monsters were breeding so much that a whole mountain had become black and white. It was possible to use a camera item to take photos or films and send the output to external media. Someone had posted a screenshot of the panda event, and the heartwarming sight made me smile.

The only battle-related event I found was in Legendaria. There was a great battle royale to compete for tickets to the concert where "everyone's idol" — Fairy Queen Titania — was the main event. Though it was clearly PVP, everyone seemed to be having tons of fun.

"...Why is the Kingdom of Altar the only place that's getting terrorized and reaching the verge of death?" I began to understand why some players would want to defect.

Reading it all was a real buzzkill, so I just turned the PC off.

All right, what now? I thought. My death penalty ends before dawn tomorrow. I guess it's a good time to take care of some stuff.

I had to stock up on household supplies and food, not to mention that I'd yet to unpack all the things I had brought here upon moving. Plus I had to start getting ready for college, which would begin in just a month.

There were lots of things I had to do in reality.

◇

By the time I was done shopping, unpacking my stuff, and finishing up dinner, it was already past ten o'clock. I checked the message boards, and sure enough, the player killers weren't taken care of even after two days of in-game time. If the rumors were true and Dryfe Imperium players were really the ones responsible, they would likely try to keep the situation like this until right before the war started. That put me in a bit of a pickle, since I wouldn't be able to use any of the standard places for leveling. All the hunting grounds close to the four gates of the capital were occupied by player killers. That meant that I couldn't even leave the capital.

Even if I somehow broke through their blockade and got to another town, the only hunting grounds that fit my level were around the capital.

If there's one place I can go to...

"Guess I have no other choice," I said aloud.

...it's that special beginner's hunting ground that my brother told me about.

All of the hunting grounds he'd told me about were beyond the four gates of the capital, but there was one exception. I'd been told it was a place that the player killers couldn't reach, and since I hadn't seen anyone posting that it was affected, it was probably true. However, that hunting ground had problems of its own.

My brother had told me what those problems were, and I'd become averse to the idea of going there. However, since I couldn't use the standard hunting grounds, that place was my only real option.

I went to sleep early, woke up at dawn, confirmed that the penalty was gone, and hastily logged in.

◇

Three days had passed in the game. The time of day was evening — just like when I'd died.

The place I'd spawned at wasn't Noz Forest, but the large fountain where my brother had waited for me on the first day. While we had been walking around the town and shopping, he had told me that it was one of the capital's save points, so I'd set it as the place where I'd revive.

All is as it should be, I thought. The death penalty ends and you automatically revive at your save point.

"...I see you're back, Master." Before I realized it, Nemesis was standing next to me in her human form. She'd left the crest without me noticing it.

"Yeah. I'm back," I said.

She said nothing.

"...Hmm."

Man, this is awkward. The fact that I had gotten the death penalty made our reunion really unpleasant. I'd gotten killed because of my own ineptitude, so I had to apologize to her...

"Sor—"

"No need." She stopped me before I could finish.

Oh, yeah, she knows exactly what I'm thinking.

"Stop thinking such ludicrous things," she said. "I'm the one who feels awkward and needs to apologize."

"Eh?"

Why?

"...Before the incident, I went on and on about how I was the greatest and nothing could ever match me, but the very first time we fought against an enemy Embryo, I could do nothing to protect you from dying. I am infuriated by my own lack of worth and power." Nemesis expressed her frustration by biting into her lip so hard that I could see a small trail of blood go down her chin. That was just how guilty she felt.

But...

"But you're wrong." I said. "If you hadn't protected me against the second attack, we would've been defeated way earlier. Seriously, it's my fault for being bad at the game. It makes me look pretty pathetic when you consider that I want to join the rankings."

"No! It's my fault because my skill wasn't strong enough to protect you from the final attack!" Nemesis exclaimed.

"Don't be stupid! It's my fault because I couldn't operate in a manner appropriate for our ability!"

Nemesis hit me in the chest. The punch was very weak. And the words that left her mouth...

"It was my lack of power. If you hadn't been a Master — a player — I... you and me both... would now be gone forever... and that scares me beyond belief..."

The words that left her mouth displayed a fragility far greater than the fist on my chest. The same girl that hadn't stopped talking about the extent of her greatness was now showing her weak side.

"Nemesis..." I said.

She only sniffled in response. Nemesis was crying. Her permeable tears were a sure sign of fragility and transience. When she cried, Nemesis didn't seem like a mere game character.

"...you might be right."

My words made her shoulders shiver. As if to calm them down, I placed my hands on them.

"However, Nemesis, I really don't think that this failure is only your fault," I continued. She was one or two heads shorter than me, so I bent down a little bit and looked her straight in the eyes. "And... just as you said, it wasn't only my own powerlessness, either."

"Master...?" Nemesis asked.

Nemesis wasn't the only one who was inept. Nor was my powerlessness the only thing to blame for this.

"This failure... is our fault," I concluded. That was the only correct answer. "My level was low. You haven't matured as an Embryo. And most important of all — we both lacked experience. That's why we were killed by him."

That defeat was in the past, and the past wasn't something you could change.

This death penalty might leave a stain on our record.

"Even so, both of us are alive," I said.

I had gotten killed, but since I was a player — a Master — my life continued as normal. And, if you ignored the possibility of her evolution slowing, Nemesis was okay, too.

"Which means it's all fine, isn't it?" I said. "We can still go on and become stronger than before."

We Masters and Embryos can get back on our feet countless times, I thought. Who cares about a stain on our record, anyway? I don't want the path I travel to be a bed of roses. Even if we're slightly hurt, we're still standing on our own two feet, aren't we?

"Let's become strong and have our revenge on that scumbag," I said.

In fact, we have a new goal now, I thought. We'll level up, evolve, become better at the game, and eventually grind him into paste, fair and square.

"...You are an unexpectedly demanding man." My words made Nemesis adopt a wry smile. "However, you couldn't be more right," she went on.

"Indeed, not letting go of the past when it hinders your march to the future is the height of folly. We still have a road in front of us."

She wiped away her tears. All that was left on her face was a familiar, indomitable grin.

"I don't know his name, but that Master will get what's coming to him." Nemesis raised her right hand. "Let's go, Master! Let's become strong — no, the strongest! No one will be able to harm us then!"

"Hell yeah!" I cried. "Let's do this, Nemesis!"

And so, we linked our arms together. I didn't get any inelegant messages saying something along the lines of "Your bond with Nemesis has deepened," but I could feel it having happened. Nemesis and I were closer than ever before.

That moment was our true starting point.

◇

By the way, I didn't care about it while talking to Nemesis, but since the fountain was a save point, we were surrounded by many other players. They could see and hear our exchange with no problem, and when Nemesis and I joined hands, we were greeted by a round of applause.

With our faces red from embarrassment, we chose to leave the place, giving our conversation an unsatisfying ending.

Chapter Four: Tomb Labyrinth

Royal Capital Altea — Paladin Ray Starling.

After running away from the fountain plaza, we went out on a large road surrounded by shops on both sides.

“All right, so we both want to become strong,” I said. “Our best option would have been to level in the hunting grounds surrounding the capital, but the current situation doesn’t allow that.”

“The player killers are still active, after all,” Nemesis agreed.

If we wanted to have our revenge on the player killers, we’d have to level in Noz Forest, but with them still being there, we’d end up getting PK’d the moment we left the capital.

“That’s why we’ll go to the last available hunting ground that my brother told us about,” I said.

“The Tomb Labyrinth, correct?” she asked.

“Yeah,” I said.

Tomb Labyrinth. Out of all the hunting grounds surrounding the capital, it was the only one that was inside it. It was a great, maze-like dungeon that extended below the capital’s graveyard.

While my death penalty had been active, I’d taken a look at the walkthrough wiki and found out some important things about it.

First, it was an underground dungeon with a theme and set of monsters that changed every five floors down.

Second, the deeper you went, the stronger the monsters became.

Third, the lower floors were swarming with monsters so powerful that they put Demi-Dragon Worms to shame.

Fourth, the monsters in the upper floors were weak — about as strong as those appearing around the capital.

Fifth, the walkthrough wiki’s volunteers had confirmed 415 floors so far.

The most important point was the fourth one. In the upper floors, we newbies could level without worrying about getting killed by players.

“Normally, the other beginners would completely flood it, but that won’t happen here, right?” Nemesis spoke.

“Yeah, most of the other beginners should be unable to get in,” I replied.

“...Tough world, isn’t it?” she asked.

“Seriously.”

Once we remembered the reason why the other beginners couldn’t enter, Nemesis and I heaved a long sigh.

After dinner, we arrived at the graveyard where we could find the Tomb Labyrinth.

As obvious as it might’ve been, the graves here were Western-style, not Japanese. We were surrounded by countless tombstones, displaying the names of the deceased and the years they had been born in and died. It was a large graveyard, so there was a map at the entrance. It showed that the Tomb Labyrinth was quite a distance inside. There was even a guardroom for the soldiers stationed there.

Making our way to our destination, we walked through the graveyard.

I’ve gotta say... this unfamiliar sight of a Western graveyard at night is pretty creepy, I thought. Though I guess thoughts like that will only get Nemesis to make fun of me and... hm?

“Nemesis?” I asked.

She didn’t respond. There was no expression on her face. In fact, she was making an active effort to not display any emotions.

It’s gonna be our first battle since coming back from the death penalty, so she might be a bit on-edge, I thought.

“Nemesis,” I said.

“What... is... it...?” Nemesis spoke so clumsily that I could almost hear her voice creak like the mouth of some rusty old doll.

“...It’s nothing.”

“I... see...”

I wondered, Is she on-edge or just tense? I can’t tell. Well, I don’t mind if she’s on-edge. We just recently revived, after all. But man, this graveyard is really grim.

Well, nighttime graveyards weren’t lit up by anything, so it was only natural for them to be grim. It was the perfect place for one of those generic horror movie scenes in which zombies crawled out of their graves, banded up into an army, and closed in while losing parts of their bodies.

“...Hm?” I asked.

Right after I pictured a horror scenario, Nemesis took hold of my hand. I could feel it shaking, and when I looked at her face, I saw nothing but anxiety.

...Oh, I see how it is.

"Are you... afraid of ghosts and stuff?" I asked.

She didn't respond. Instead, she simply looked away.

I guess she is and doesn't want to say it, I thought.

Nemesis always spoke in a proud manner, ate a lot, and was slightly arrogant. Yet, she was afraid of ghosts. Despite us becoming closer, I still didn't have a good grasp of her character.

"If you're afraid, why not just change your form right now?" I suggested.

"...Okay." Still holding on to my hand, Nemesis transformed into a greatsword. For some reason, I could feel her becoming more composed.

I guess her form has an effect on her mental strength, I thought. Keeping her psyche safe comes at the cost of making me look like a weirdo who hangs around graveyards with an unsheathed greatsword in hand, but whatever. I'll just go to the entrance before anyone notices.

◇

I finally arrived at the entrance to the Tomb Labyrinth. It took me about ten minutes, which spoke volumes about just how large the graveyard was.

Well, there's a large labyrinth underground, so it's only to be expected, I thought. And since I was near the entrance to a dungeon now, no one would tell me off for holding a weapon.

The gate to the Tomb Labyrinth was made of stone and looked really sturdy. There was a soldier stationed right next to it. He quickly noticed us.

"Master, are you wishing to explore the Tomb Labyrinth? You need to have a 'Tomb Labyrinth Exploration Permit' to do that," he said.

A Tomb Labyrinth Exploration Permit. This item was the very reason why no beginners were exploring the Tomb Labyrinth.

It was a possible reward for quests of difficulty level three or a random drop from boss monsters. They were being sold on the player market, too, but one went for an average of 100,000 lir. It wasn't an amount an average beginner could easily procure. Basically, this was a harsh beginner's hunting ground that required the players to pay a kind of toll.

Luckily for me, I'd had the leftover money I'd gotten from selling the Demi-Dragon Worm's drops. So, before going to this graveyard, I had bought my permit. I'd even finished filling it in and actually making it effective, so I was good to go.

When I reached for my items and dug for the Permit with my left hand...

"Oh? You're a Paladin, aren't you?" the soldier asked. "Then there's no need for that. Please go inside."

He moved away from the gate without me having to show my permit.

...Excuse me? I thought.

"...What about the Tomb Labyrinth Exploration Permit?" I asked.

"Paladins don't need one," he answered.

...Are you for real?

"Oh dear, what a waste of 100,000 lir," Nemesis chimed in.

"Oohhh..." Groaning, I fell to my knees.

Not even the death penalty could do it, but this loss of money had made me collapse in an instant.

The shock was huge. If I had to gauge it, it was about three times worse than playing one of those retro RPGs, spending tons of time getting enough money to buy an iron sword, only to get it from the next treasure chest you found.

Goddammit, that money is the equivalent of 1,000,000 yen... I thought. I filled it in, too, so it's exclusive to me and I can't even resell it now...

Why didn't my brother tell me about this...? Well, I guess he wouldn't know, not being a Paladin and all.

As I kneeled on the ground due to the shock, the soldier called out to me in a worried tone. "A-Are you okay, sir?"

Nemesis chimed in, "I know you're shocked, but nothing will come out of moping about it."

"...Y-Yeah, you're right," I said.

Time to get a grip, I told myself. I simply have to raid this dungeon with the intention of making up for the lost money.

"So, can I go inside?" I asked.

"Y-Yes. Be careful, sir." The soldier spoke a spell that opened the gate. Beyond it, I saw a gloomy darkness and a staircase leading down.

"Let's go, then," I said.

"Onward," Nemesis agreed.

We made our first step into the Tomb Labyrinth.

My brother told me about the Tomb Labyrinth during a little break we had while we were buying my gear.

"Here's something to bear in mind: the largest dungeon in this country is inside the capital," he'd said.

He had just finished telling me about the beginner's hunting grounds surrounding the city, so this info was like a little bonus.

"Inside the capital? What do you mean?" I'd asked.

"Bear-ly a few dozen meters below us, there's a dungeon called the 'Tomb Labyrinth,' and it's the largest one in the Kingdom of Altar — no, this whole continent," he'd explained.

Nemesis and I had stared darkly at the ground we were standing on.

"It doesn't seem like Dryfe even needs to do anything for this country to be destroyed," said Nemesis.

"Just bear with me here. The Tomb Labyrinth is a created dungeon," my brother had continued. "The monsters inside will never crawl out — you can be paw-sitive about that."

"'Created dungeon?'" I repeated the unfamiliar term, and my brother instantly began explaining it.

"Dendro has two bear-ly similar types of dungeons," he began.

You really like giving explanations, don't you, bro? I thought.

"The first type is a 'natural dungeon,'" he continued. "It's used fur places that weren't dungeons before, but that got the function due to various circumstances. The Old Orchard is the bear-fect example."

He went on to add that natural dungeons also included dens created by intelligent creatures and fortresses felled by monsters.

"The other type is a 'created dungeon,'" he went on. "Just as the name implies, these are places that were created fur the sole purpose of being dungeons. Bear with me if I sound a bit meta here, but they're basically dungeons made by the devs."

"Oh?" I asked, expressing my desire to know more.

"There are three main differences between natural and created dungeons that you must always bear in mind," he answered. "First of all, monsters in created dungeons never go outside."

That makes sense, I thought. Living in the capital would be too dangerous otherwise.

"The second difference is that monsters automatically respawn regardless of any ecosystems and reasonable causes," he continued.

The people of this world had realistic personalities and lives, and monsters normally weren't different in that regard, since they adhered to proper ecosystems. They wouldn't simply appear with no rhyme or reason. Just as dead tians wouldn't come back to life, entire species of monsters could be made extinct.

However, that didn't apply to created dungeons, where monsters respawned without limit. It was perfectly natural for there to be undead-type monsters despite the lack of corpses.

"The third difference is that every few floors you run into a boss monster that — along with its standard drops — gives you additional rewards," he added.

Unlimited monsters meant unlimited treasure. The grade of the drops increased the lower you went, and — in the deeper levels — items that could be sold for 1,000,000 lir weren't uncommon.

This dungeon was a real cornucopia.

"There are other created dungeons, but the one with the most bear-able entry requirements is the Tomb Labyrinth," my brother added. "When you look at Dendro as a game, this is obviously the best reason to choose the Kingdom of Altar. After all, to get in, you only need to have a permit and be aligned with the kingdom."

He paused for a moment, then continued.

"Just like the fertile land around these parts, it's one of the reasons why Dryfe wants to conquer this country. They can't enter the Tomb Labyrinth until they do that, you know?"

So, to Dryfe, the Kingdom of Altar is like a treasury with an endless supply of commodities, eh? I thought.

"Did you stay with the kingdom so you could raid the Tomb Labyrinth?" I asked. "Is this the reason why you didn't switch to the country you like once you got your suit?"

"I've bear-ly been there," he answered.

Not the reply I'd been expecting.

"Why?" I asked.

"...Baldr's fifth and higher forms are too large to use in the dungeon," he admitted.

I had no words. The saying “less is more” crossed my mind. I didn’t know if it fit his case, but it was a clear example that there were pros and cons to everything.

And holy crap, what kind of Embryo is larger than a tank? I thought.

◇◇◇

And now, Nemesis and I were exploring the very same Tomb Labyrinth my brother and I had talked about. Since it was underground, I expected it to be pitch black inside, but it was actually relatively well-lit. This was because the walls and ceiling were covered in luminescent minerals.

The labyrinth’s hallways were quite wide — enough to let about ten people walk side by side. The ceiling, however, wasn’t too high. Just as my brother had said — it would get in the way of anything particularly big.

I thought that simply breaking the ceiling would solve that problem, but my attacks couldn’t even put a scratch on it. This dungeon was clearly indestructible.

“Despite having the eerie word ‘tomb’ in its name, it’s quite a clean dungeon,” Nemesis commented.

“It’s probably being cleaned automatically,” I said. I could only assume that, instead of realism, the main force at work in this dungeon was the will of the developers.

“I wasn’t sure if I could handle a tomb, but if all of it is like this, then there’s nothing to worry about,” Nemesis said. She was getting increasingly motivated. “I’ll split apart all the monsters this dungeon sends our way!”

“Hate to rain on your parade, but the only monster type that spawns in this floor is undead,” I said.

“...Eh?” She let out an expression of shock and confusion.

I pointed further into the hallway. Speak of the devil.

Clad in tattered clothing, there was a person — or, rather, a monster that looked like a person’s bones. The fact that it was a monster was proven by the name above it — Civilian Skeleton.

Just as the name said, it was clearly the skeleton of a civilian, rather than that of a soldier or knight. It had no weapon, so it merely extended its empty hands and closed in on me while making a rattling sound.

Due to Infinite Dendrogram having such realistic graphics, the skeleton was quite a scary sight. The hints of red and yellow on the bones — likely left behind by dried bodily fluids — made the sight a bit too vivid and slightly unpleasant.

Things like this make me wish I had chosen anime or CG as my visual setting, I thought.

Despite the gross presence, Nemesis wasn't saying a word.

"Nemesis?" I called out to her.

More silence. She didn't respond at all.

I guess she's trying not to think about anything, I thought. After all, I was about to use her to attack it.

"Let's do this," I said and brandished my greatsword. I had my reservations about attacking a person's bones, but since I had to, I charged at the monster.

My attack made the skeleton's arm and shoulder shatter into many pieces. I then swung towards its head with the flat of the greatsword.

The skeleton's skull got easily pulverized, turning the monster into shining dust that vanished.

"Can't you do it without making me touch it so much?" Nemesis complained.

"Are you saying we have some means of fighting besides slashing and smashing?" I asked. I had no offensive magic, and Nemesis's only skills were the defensive Counter Absorption and the counterattack Vengeance is Mine. Though I'd bought some consumable magic items, they were limited.

Physical melee attacks are my only option with these enemies, I thought.

"That is true, but... it's hard on my mental health," Nemesis complained.

"Well, at least we're fighting skeletons here, not anywhere else," I said.

By "here," I was referring to the fact that we were in a created dungeon. The Civilian Skeletons here weren't actual remains of people, but monsters made just for the sake of being monsters. Even though they were eerie, they weren't haunted or anything.

When you think about it, these monsters are strangely sanitary, I thought. They even come out dry and fresh.

"Hmm... that makes it a bit easier to bear," Nemesis agreed.

"Good to know," I said. "Ah, there's another monst—"

I cut my sentence short and could hear Nemesis gasp. The creature that had come from the corner of the hallway made us both lose our words.

Just like the skeleton, it was an undead-type monster. However, unlike the bare, bony frame from before, this one was... fatter. That was because its bones were covered in rotten, maggot-infested flesh.

However, the covering wasn't complete, and you could see yellow and dark red liquids dripping out of the places where its flesh was missing. Since my five senses in the game were about as strong as they were in reality, I could even smell the indescribably bad stench it was emitting.

Above its head, I could see its name — Wounded Zombie.

And so, the sight of the otherworldly, revolting creature made the explorer cast a D6 for a sanity check and...

"...Whoa! This thing is so grotesque it made my mind drift away into another game!" I exclaimed.

This is a bit much, honestly, I thought. Though I guess it's natural for an undead lair to have zombies right next to its skeletons.

Unlike the skeleton from before — which had been silent except for the rattling — this zombie was closing in on us while groaning and splashing its fluids on the ground.

"Looks like we have another fight on our hands," I said.

"Huh?! W-Wait! Are you seriously going to use me to cut that?!" Nemesis yelped.

"...Like I said, that's not a dead person," I said. "It's just a monster made for this dungeon."

"No no no no! I don't care how it was born, I simply do not want to cut that!" she insisted.

"Nemesis..." I began. It looks like she really doesn't want to do this, so... "I'll polish you when we get back, so just bite the bullet for now."

"Nooooooo!"

I raised Nemesis as high as the pitch of her scream and charged towards the zombie.

◇

Silent sniffling resounded through the hallways. Its source was none other than Nemesis. Still in my hand, she was weeping like some cursed weapon as I continued walking through the Tomb Labyrinth.

Since we'd entered, we had defeated twelve zombies, thirty skeletons, and five monsters known as "Haunted Spirits." That had gotten me two level-ups, making me level 7. My total HP was now above 1,000.

"Th-The rotten flesh... the maggots..." Nemesis continued weeping. The battles with the zombies had taken a toll on her sanity.

If there was a silver lining to this cloud of hers, it was the fact that the monster corpses completely disappeared, leaving nothing but the drops. Otherwise, both Nemesis and I would look terrible due to all the flesh and fluids covering us.

"Ohh... I never expected you to be such a sadist..." Nemesis moaned.

"Hey, I didn't do it because I wanted to," I responded. "It was necessary."

"...I feel like you performed a strangely high number of full swings, though," she snapped suspiciously.

"It's just your imagination," I said. Though doing them had made me look like the villain from some splatter flick, full swings with my greatsword had been extremely effective at shattering the fragile undead around here. It had made me feel like I was in a Western action game.

Also, although unrelated, the groans of the zombies had all been drowned out by Nemesis's screaming whenever she had their scattered flesh on her. I eventually got used to it, making it much like background music.

"Damn, the last battle cost me half of my Gems," I said. A Gem was an item type I had prepared for battles against spirits.

As the name implied, spirits were ghost-like monsters that had the annoying property of being immune to physical attacks. Not only that, they also drained MP or SP instead of HP and had attacks that applied debuffs to their targets.

I had no offensive magic, so I couldn't do much against them. And though Vengeance is Mine could harm spirits, it could only counter based on the HP I'd lost — not MP or SP. I was woefully underequipped to battle them.

However, I'd read the wiki info on the Tomb Labyrinth, and I'd known I'd run into spirits here. So I'd been aware that I'd need a countermeasure against them, and bought the Gems for this very purpose.

When used, a White Lance Gem would release a shining spear of holy magic, making it really effective against spirits.

However, they could only be used once, and each cost a whole 1,000 lir. I'd bought a total of ten, but the encounters so far had already cost me half of them.

But there's a little problem... I thought.

"I wonder how much we will get for the drops we've gathered so far," Nemesis said.

She'd finished the thought in my stead. For one, it was clear as day that I'd yet to gather even 10% of the money I'd spent on the Gems. To be able to continuously hunt in this dungeon, I wanted to make up for the lir I'd lost, but the returns here were far too small.

Zombies and skeletons dropped items such as Tattered Clothing or Bone Pieces, and I wasn't even sure if they could be exchanged for money. Spirits were even worse, since they didn't drop anything at all.

If, at the very least, the monsters here had been animal-type, I could have made some nice money selling their pelts or fangs. But as things actually were, my wallet was in serious trouble.

"Let's try going a bit further," I said. "We didn't even find the stairs to the next floor, after all."

Maybe we'll find a treasure chest if we keep it up, I thought. Despite being in a dungeon, we'd yet to see a single one of those.

"Understood," Nemesis agreed. "...By the way, Master?"

"What?" I asked.

"Once we're back, I will hold you to your word, and you will polish me," she said.

"Well yeah, sure," I replied.

I guess the fact that the fluids and pieces of flesh disappeared didn't do much to better her mood.

◇

A few minutes later, we came across a set of stairs of the same design as the ones we had used at the entrance.

"Well, this seems like the end of this floor," I said.

"No boss to be seen here," Nemesis added. "I was told that you encounter them every five floors."

The floors in the Tomb Labyrinth came in sets of five. The first five floors were the haunt of undead monsters, and the fifth had an undead boss.

Defeating it would open the entrance to the sixth floor, which was infested by an entirely different monster type until floor ten, and from there, the pattern repeated seemingly endlessly.

The walkthrough site described floors until 415, which was in the domain of dragons. The boss on that floor was too strong for anyone to defeat, so anything beyond was simply called uncharted territory.

That term wasn't appropriate, though, since it actually referred to the fact that no one among those managing the walkthrough site or contributing to the wiki had ever made it past that floor. It was entirely possible that someone knew what was beyond floor 415, but kept it secret to have a little advantage.

Man, I have absolutely no business pondering places I can't even get to, I thought. I'll just leave for now. But man, what should I do about this dungeon's high cost and low returns...?

As I got lost in thought, Nemesis called out to me. "Master!"

Her quiet voice was a signal for me to be cautious.

"What's wrong?" I asked.

"Someone is coming up the stairs," she answered.

I instantly shifted my attention to the staircase.

I strained my ears and could faintly hear the echoes of someone's footsteps as they went up the stairs.

Monsters couldn't go between floors, so it was clearly a player. Done with their business here, someone was taking their leave by using the stairs.

Strangely enough, however, there was only one set of footsteps. If someone had come here to explore the dungeon instead of — like myself — grinding levels in the low-level floors, they would surely come with a party.

As I considered that, the footsteps suddenly stopped.

A moment later, from the darkness below, something extended towards me. It was almost too fast for me to perceive.

There was some distance between me and its source, so I could sense it coming. However, right when I came to realize what it was, it was already right in front of me.

The thing coming straight towards my face was an attack against me.

"Counter Absorption!" Nemesis and I shouted, and something slammed against the newly-created barrier of light.

That something... was a chain.

Its end had the shape of a pyramid. Though blocked by the Counter Absorption barrier, it continued applying an immeasurable amount of pressure to it, making me fully aware that it could have pulverized my head in a single hit.

"Th-This power...!" Nemesis's voice made it obvious that it was hard to bear. She hadn't reacted like that when defending against the Demi-Dragon Worm's attacks, or the bullet monster's.

That means that this attack is far greater than those two! I thought in disbelief.

"I... I can't take it...!" Nemesis groaned. The barrier of light that had defended me against such powerful attacks began to crack, and...

A sudden turn of events. Right before the barrier shattered, the chain returned to its source.

We got a moment of reprieve.

However, such an action from this opponent could only mean one thing.

"They're going to attack again! Prepare yourself!" Nemesis shouted.

Just as she'd said, they were preparing for a second attack.

I hastily jumped back, creating some distance between us.

"...What do we do now?" I asked both Nemesis and myself.

We had one more Counter Absorption use, but that was the extent of it. We couldn't handle anything beyond the next attack.

I got into a battle-ready posture and waited for the chain to come at us again.

Some time passed, and I grew confused. The next attack showed no sign of happening.

I couldn't sense the chain coming, but I could hear the footsteps as the attacker resumed going up the stairs.

"Master... which do you choose?"

I instantly understood what Nemesis had in mind.

There were only two options for me: to turn back and run away, or to face whoever was coming up.

If the first attack was anything to go by, the power difference between us was so great that I couldn't ever hope to win. I had a feeling that this person was stronger than the player killer we'd sworn to get revenge on.

If it was possible, I didn't want to fight them, but the possibility of having that chain attack me from behind crossed my mind, rendering me unable to move from my battle-ready posture.

If I can't move, running isn't even an option, I thought.

Hesitant as I was, I couldn't expect either choice to bring me much success, so I could only go with a certain gamble.

When he comes up, I'll nullify his next attack, multiply all the damage he was supposed to give me, and launch a counterattack, I laid out the plan in my head. I have no idea if I'll land the hit or if it'll be enough to kill him, but it's my only chance.

Knowing my thoughts, Nemesis readied herself and aligned her attitude with mine.

The footsteps became louder, and — sooner than later — the person was in sight.

It was a young man who looked several years older than me. Though he had a nice face, he looked as though he was glaring at something. I would have even gone as far as to call him slit-eyed.

His apparel was simply bizarre. Though the metal armor on his upper body was from the Riot set — the same as mine — for some reason or another, his lower body was covered in a hakama. Then there were his metal greaves, six familiar chains — three in each hand — rings on all of his fingers, and a feathered hat on his head.

But the most extreme article of clothing he wore was the blue long coat hanging on his shoulders.

None of his clothes were strange by design, but the coordination between them resulted in something truly bizarre.

It seemed like a generic case of “I equipped only the highest quality items and ended up looking weird” that every gamer was familiar with.

The reason I assumed the gear was high quality was simply because it all looked masterfully made, even to my inexperienced eye.

The man in strange clothing threw me a glance...

“...So it was a person.”

...and spoke up with a sigh.

A moment later...

“I attacked you because I thought you were a monster! I’m so sorry! My bad!” He bowed before me and apologized.

“...Huh?” I said.

◇

Still in the room with the staircase, the strangely-dressed man and I began having a little chat.

Nemesis had returned to her human form.

The room we were in was protected by a barrier item — placed by the man — that kept monsters at bay, so we were safe.

The first thing I found out upon speaking to him was that he wasn’t a PKer. Also, his mannerisms and the way he spoke gave me the impression that he was a... reasonably good person.

As for why such a man would attack me...

“So, you confused me with a monster, huh?” I repeated his excuse.

“Yep... I’m really sorry,” he said.

As he’d been making his way up here, he had felt someone examining the hints of his presence. The light shining behind me had made my silhouette look inhuman, so, just to be on the safe side, he had attacked me.

...I couldn’t really blame him. After all, in her black greatsword form, Nemesis would reach right up to my shoulder. My silhouette could easily look monstrous.

“Monstr—?!” Nemesis yelled.

My observation seemed to have been quite a shock to Nemesis, but I chose to ignore it.

“So tell me, why are you going solo in such a shallow floor?” The strange man asked.

“Oh, I’m just leveling,” I replied.

“Leveling? Why here, of all places?” He seemed puzzled. “Your total level is... 7, huh? Shouldn’t someone your level be leveling outside? It’s both easier and more profitable. I know you’re a Paladin and didn’t have to buy a permit, but still.”

...I did buy one, though, I thought and lamented the wasted money once more. I also couldn’t help but notice that he’d been able to see my level.

“Didn’t you know? No one can use the beginner’s hunting grounds due to the terrorism there,” I explained.

“Terrorism?” he asked.

“Yes, player killers are terrorizing the beginner’s hunting grounds around the capital. It’s been going on for three in-game days now.”

“...I’ve been in this dungeon for five, so I had no idea.” He added that he didn’t even check the Internet for game-related news.

I couldn’t hold back my surprise. “You’ve been in the Tomb Labyrinth for five whole days?! What where you doing here?!”

“Just a little marathon,” he said. “I wanted to see how far down I could go while playing solo, and then I simply came back up.”

A bit of a tryhard, isn’t he? I thought. His gear and the power behind his attack were proof that his level was really high.

“How deep did you get this time?” I asked, just out of curiosity.

“I got to floor 418,” he said. “That’s one more than my previous record.”

The young man had spoken a number that was nigh impossible to believe.

“...What.” That was about the only way I could react. Even while in a party, the tough guys from the walkthrough site could only reach floor 415.

It was quite hard to accept that he had been able to go beyond where they’d gone and reach the uncharted ground while going solo.

“You are...?” Nemesis asked for his name.

“Oh, my name is Figaro,” he replied. “Nice to meet you.”

“I’m Ray Starling,” I said. “This is my Embryo — Nemesis — and... ah!”

As I introduced myself, I finally realized where I’d heard his name before.

Figaro — Over Gladiator Figaro.

That was the name of the one sitting at the top of the Kingdom of Altar’s duel rankings.

“Are you that Figaro? From the rankings?” I asked.

“Yep, that’s me,” he answered. “I go through lots of matches in the arena.”

“Arena? Matches?” His words slightly confused me.

“Yep. The arena,” he said. “In the kingdom, it’s in Gideon, city of duels. When dueling in the arena, you don’t die, even when you’re killed, and you can even win money depending on the audience you pull. It’s fun.”

“‘Don’t die, even if you’re killed?’” I raised an eyebrow.

“There’s a magical field that makes it work that way,” he explained. “It’s like a recreational activity with some betting on the side. There are some other tourist attractions, and the town is always lively, so I recommend you visit it someday.”

I guess people’s tendency to cling to their desires is fully functional even when their country is on the verge of ruin, I thought.

“Gideon is not too far after you pass the mountain in the south, and... oh, right.” He suddenly stopped. “If the terrorists are preventing the use of beginners’ hunting spots, then the Sauda Mountain Pass is blocked, as well. The idea of there being less traffic there is... troubling.”

Figaro fell silent, pondering something...

“All right, then. I’ll do something about it.”

...and said that.

“I also have to make up for the attack I did, after all,” he added. “I’ll take care of the player killers in Sauda Mountain Pass.”

“Take care? How?” asked Nemesis. “...Negotiation?”

The question mark behind that word was almost audible.

“You should be able to use the pass by tomorrow, so you just get some levels and come over to Gideon,” said Figaro. “Most of the time, you can find me there or in this dungeon.”

“Ah, okay,” I nodded.

“All right, I’ll be going, then,” he said, getting ready to leave. “Oh, have this.”

Figaro reached into his bag and took out a small stone. It was a Gem — just like the ones I’d used — but this one was of a different color and carried a different kind of magic.

“It’s imbued with ‘Escape Gate’ — a spell that lets you leave created dungeons," Figaro explained. "Get all the levels you can and use it to leave this place."

"Are you sure I can have this?" I asked.

"Sure am," he said. "It's another thing I'm doing to make up for the attack I did. After all, it would've been really bad if I'd given a death penalty to a newbie like yourself."

"Thank you so much," I said. I was sincerely grateful. With this item, I could continue the hunt without having to think about the dangers I'd face on the way back.

Figaro really is a good guy.

"But man, you two are pretty good," he added.

I raised an eyebrow.

"You were able to withstand my attack, weren't you?" he asked.

"Well, yeah, but that's what our skill is," I said.

"I wasn't talking about the damage," he said. "You didn't break when I came up the stairs."

Didn't break? I thought. What does he mean by that?

"I'm fond of people who don't break," he continued. "I like you. Hope we get to fight in the arena someday."

"That'd be nice," I said. If — as Figaro had said — there was no death penalty there, I could act on my curiosity and fight him just to find out how strong the top of the rankings really was.

"Yep. I'm looking forward to it," said Figaro. "I'll dedicate this cleaning to the pleasures of the future."

"Cleaning?" I asked.

Figaro stood up.

"See ya later, then," he said, instead of elaborating on the strange term.

"See you, too. Thank you for the Gem," I said, choosing not to push it.

With a bright smile on his face, Figaro waved us goodbye and left the room.

◇

"Over Gladiator Figaro, huh?" Nemesis spoke. "Not the kind of person I expected him to be."

"Same here," I agreed. "Based on what my brother said, I expected him to be more rebellious."

He'd told me that the reason Figaro hadn't joined the war was because he "wasn't interested in sloppy fights." That had made him sound really obstinate and rebellious, but upon meeting the guy, I could only assume that he'd had his reasons.

"All right, let's get started, then," I said. "We've got a Gem that lets us leave this place with no problem, so let's go all out."

"Yeah, let's do it," Nemesis agreed. "No undead can be as scary as that attack from before."

Apparently, that event had made her sense of fear go numb.

Perfect, I thought. We'll be able to progress at a faster pace. Up until that point, a part of me had been holding back — for Nemesis' sake. Now I can turn this little adventure into a real splatter flick.

"Let's resume the hunt!" I roared.

"Bring it on!" she joined me.

A few hours later, I was polishing Nemesis — still in her sword form — as she silently wept.

This continued until the break of dawn.

◇

It was ten in the morning, the day after we'd explored the Tomb Labyrinth.

It was time to check out, so I walked out of the inn while drowsily rubbing my eyes.

The reason for my drowsiness was the fact that I had stayed up until dawn polishing Nemesis, who had still been asleep.

Instead of being in her human or sword form, she was currently inside the crest on my left hand. Nemesis was outside of it most of the time, but for most people, Embryos were something to keep in their crests.

That was obvious, of course. Otherwise, my brother would have to walk around with a Gatling gun in his hands or ride around in a tank.

And that's something that'd have him taken away by the police for questioning, I thought.

Nemesis's personality kept her outside most of the time, but now, she was focused on sleeping inside the crest.

Seems like the R-18 zombie fest took quite a toll on her mind, I thought.

However, thanks to that, I'd gotten to level 12 and gained two new skills. They were "Paladin's Aegis" and "Instant Equip."

Paladin's Aegis was an always-active defensive skill. It was pretty good, too, since it reduced all incoming damage — magic or physical — by a whole 10%. A Paladin simply wasn't complete without it. Since it cost absolutely no MP, it was possible to just activate it and treat it as a passive skill.

The other skill — Instant Equip — allowed the user to quickly switch to wielding another weapon from their inventory. There was no need to dig through the items in the 4D bag to find it. The skill wasn't unique to Paladins — everyone who used any sort of weapon would get it sooner or later.

There were downsides to both skills, though. For example, Paladin's Aegis could only be used by jobs in the knight grouping, while Instant Equip had a cooldown of five minutes.

...Well, it's not like I have a weapon I could switch to using Instant Equip, I thought. Nemesis wouldn't shut up about it if I did.

"I won't let you... cheat on me... with another weapon..." Nemesis murmured in between her breaths.

...Is she talking in her sleep? I wondered.

The first thing I did once I went outside was search for info regarding the player killings in the beginners' hunting grounds.

Figaro had said that Sauda Mountain Pass would be open by now, but I had to confirm it for myself. And, sure enough, the player killing terror in that area was over. In fact, it was disappearing in the other areas, too.

"I can understand the south, but the others...?" I whispered. It even included the place I had died at — Noz Forest.

If the timing was anything to go by, the south had been taken care of by Figaro, but what about the others? As such questions went through my mind...

"Ah, Ray!" someone called out to me. "Hey there!"

"Hm?" I turned to the familiar voice's source. It was coming from the front of a store next to the street.

In a mere moment, I realized that it was Rook — the guy I'd met in one of the beginners' hunting grounds. Unlike last time, his graceful face wasn't covered in dirt, and he was smiling at me while — for one reason or another — wearing the uniform of a shop run by tians.

"Hello," I greeted him. "Why are you wearing that?"

"Getting skills while working part-time," he answered.

Apparently, the suitable job Rook had been diagnosed with and had chosen was close to the merchant grouping. Due to that, he'd been able to learn various mercantile skills by working at shops. Just like me, he'd gained skills without having to rely on the hunting grounds.

"So, what job did you pick?" I asked.

"Pimp!" he answered with excitement.

Pimp... as in... Pimp? I wondered. Why does that job even exist? And why is an underage boy able to take it? In fact, why is that his "suitable job" in the first place?

"...My guess is that it's because he has a succubus with him," Nemesis said sleepily, still in the crest.

Well, that makes sense, I thought. Look at those bright eyes of his, though. Does Rook even know what the word "Pimp" means?

"...What kind of skills do you Pimps have, anyway?" I asked.

"I've got these ones so far!" Rook said eagerly and showed me his skill summary.

Wordlessly, both Nemesis and I ran our eyes through it.

In conclusion — he was a true pimp.

There was Male Temptation — a skill that Charmed females and had a chance to tame monsters. Then there were Female Monster Strengthening and Female Slave Strengthening, which did exactly what the names said. I couldn't ignore Influence, either, which increased the rewards from doing work and made the whole picture look very... "master"-oriented.

The only normal skill among those was "Insightful Eye," which seemed to have come as an extra.

But man, "Charm" is quite a scary debuff, I thought.

According to the game's help files, it was a stronger form of the "Confuse" debuff. Charmed creatures would protect the one who Charmed them and attack their enemies. Basically, it made them guard the enemy and fight their allies. Players weren't excluded from its effects, either — their bodies would simply start moving on their own.

"There's a theme here, isn't there?" said Rook. "I guess Pimp is a monster-taming kind of job?”

“...Something like that, I guess,” I replied. Women were a strange kind of monster, after all.

In exchange for him showing me his skills, I showed mine, too.

Upon seeing my Paladin’s Aegis and Instant Equip, Rook’s eyes lit up. He yelled out, “That’s so cool!”

...Why must such an earnest, good young boy be a Pimp? I wondered.

◇

Rook quit his part-time position at the shop, so I waited for him to take care of whatever he needed to, and then joined him for lunch. He had only been working there because of the player killings, so no one had had any problems with him quitting now that they were over.

In fact, the owner thanked him. That was because — during the three days Rook had spent standing in front of the shop — they’d gotten five times more customers than usual. One thing to note was that all the new customers were women — Master and tian alike.

As we walked through the streets, I could feel a lot of people staring at us. To be specific, the women around us were staring at Rook.

“Just look at that pretty boy... he’s so cute, I might faint,” one of them said.

“That’s some amazing character creation skill. Wait, how do you even make a boy that pretty?!” another joined in.

“He seems a bit too natural for it to be character creation,” a third one added.

Hearing their comments made me throw a glance at Rook.

“...Hmm,” I pondered. When I’d first met him, he’d just seemed like a pretty boy covered in dirt from battle, but now that he was clean, it was obvious that he was among the most handsome men in the world. It felt as though he’d been the result of some miracle that had happened in his ongoing transition from “boy” to “young man.” The silver hair covering his head made him look like a fairy representing the ephemeral nature of snow.

“...Master,” Nemesis said, having read my mind. “Is it just me, or is your description of his appearance better than the one you gave me when we first met?”

No comment.

“By the way, Rook,” I said, “how much did you work on your character’s appearance when starting the game?”

“I changed my hair color,” he answered.

“...That’s it?”

“Yes.”

So a guy this handsome actually existed in reality, meaning that his Embryo being Babi and job being Pimp could all be attributed to him being handsome.

I can only assume that the Pimp industry is limited to handsome people, I thought.

“What do you think his relationship is with the blond guy next to him?” the girls continued their chatter.

“Well, I’d say that they’re doing it,” one of them concluded.

“Which one takes it?” a third one asked.

“The blond one,” the other two replied in unison.

“I think so, too!” the third squealed. “The pretty boy’s smile is that of a sadistic top!”

The exchange made a chill go down my spine, but I pretended to not hear it.

“Now that I think about it, I haven’t seen Babi yet. Where is she?” I asked. Is she in the crest? Like Nemesis?

“Babi is working part-time, too,” Rook answered. “She’s in a massage parlor nearby.”

“Massage parlor...?” The implications of a succubus doing such services made me imagine only the most indecent of things.

However, once I got there, I became made aware that it was a wholesome place that didn’t even need to operate from a back alley.

“...Yep, it’s a massage parlor, all right,” I said.

“Yes,” Rook confirmed. “What about it?”

“Rook! I’m done with my job here!” With perfect timing, Babi ran out of the massage parlor and stood right next to Rook.

“Ah, hello there, Ray! Hey there, Nemesis!” she added, noticing us.

“Hello.” I returned the greeting.

“It has been a while.” Nemesis, who was no longer in the crest on my left hand, now stood beside me in her human form.

With all of us back together, it was time for lunch.

My brother had told me about a nearby shop, so I chose it simply because I had no reason not to. His recommendations rarely disappointed, after all.

◇

As we dug into our meals, we continued exchanging information and chatting.

Rook and Babi spoke about their time working, while I told them about the hunting grounds and the Tomb Labyrinth.

“I got a new skill today!” Babi announced.

She’d gotten a skill despite being away from Rook. Humanoid Guardian type Embryos were able to gain new skills by working, training, and learning while separated from their Masters.

Babi’s current setup had a skill called Lilim Temptation, which could Charm males. It was the opposite of Rook’s Male Temptation, which was effective against women. When together, they could Charm both sexes, giving them a great advantage in countless situations. Another interesting skill she had was Lilim Drain, which allowed her to drain HP, MP and SP from Charmed enemies.

As for the skill she’d gained in the massage parlor, it was Angelic Massage, which could take away the effects of Exhaustion.

“By the way, Nemesis’s skills got me curious. Can she use Counter Absorption and Vengeance is Mine when she’s all by herself?” Rook asked.

That was a good question. I could recall her having used Counter Absorption on her own volition, but what about Vengeance?

“I cannot use Vengeance is Mine by myself,” she answered. “It can only be used when I become a weapon and get equipped.”

“Oh, I see,” I said, understanding. According to Nemesis, Counter Absorption was closer to a Guardian type skill, while Vengeance is Mine was more of an Arms type ability. Guardians had autonomy, but Arms and Chariots had a lot of skills which could only work when they were equipped.

“It just hit me that I asked to see your skills, but didn’t ask for your level. What is it now?” I asked Rook, looking at him. He hasn’t been able to grind much these past few days, so if our last meeting was anything to go by, he should be at about level 5.

"I'm level 25," he said.

"25?!" I couldn't hold my shock. That's more than double my level! "How?! Where did you raise your level? The hunting grounds weren't an option, so—"

Hell, I don't think he could get that many levels even if he could use the hunting grounds! I thought.

"Yeah," he agreed. "I couldn't go hunting, but I got lots of XP for completing a Pimp guild quest."

"A Pimp guild quest?" I repeated, dumbfounded.

I hadn't been aware of it, but taking a job unlocked quests from the guild of that particular job grouping, and clearing them rewarded the player with experience. However, with the exception of those given to non-battle jobs, most of the quests in guilds required the player to defeat or defend something, so newbies like myself couldn't do much there.

Hell, I'm a Paladin — a high-rank job — so it's probably even worse for me, I thought.

"I see... but..." There was something I was curious about. "...A job that only a Pimp can do?" I asked.

Is there anything in that vein that isn't R-18?

"The one I cleared was a quest to find a model for a painting," Rook explained. "Here's a copy."

"Let's see here..." I said and looked at it.

Maestro Grantzian Valleno is looking for a model, difficulty level 6.
One of the Kingdom of Altar's greatest artists — Grantzian — is looking for a model for a new painting.
Please bring someone that he would be satisfied with.
Depending on the model, they might be asked to pose nude.
Be advised that Grantzian is a fastidious sort and that his standards are sky-high.

I had no words. The difficulty of this quest was actually a level higher than the one where I'd had to help Milianne.

"So, you went and cleared it by showing Babi to him, right?" I asked.

“No. Well, that was my original intention, but...”

◇◇◇

“Pardon the intrusion. I am Rook from the Pimp guild, and I came here with a model.”

“Hmph, another one of you useless cretins who are only good at handling your crotches. All you wretches ever bring to me are atrocious hags. So, where is the...”

“Umm, is anything the matter?”

“You’re hired!”

◇◇◇

“For some reason, I had to be the model,” said Rook. “Well, it got me some levels and it made Mr. Grantzian happy, so I didn’t mind it at all.”

“...I see. Good for you,” I said.

Man, this world is really kind to handsome people...

◇

By the time we’d finished our lunch, my exchange with Rook was nearing its end.

I’d thought I’d had some strange experiences since I’d started the game, but his adventures had been quite something, too. I had no idea if we were unique in that regard or if getting entangled in unusual events was the norm in this world.

“By the way, Ray,” Rook addressed me.

“Hm? What?” I responded.

“We just talked about the player killers, and there’s something that I can’t get out of my head,” he said.

...It’s probably the same thing that I’m interested in, I thought.

“When you met Figaro, he said he would do something about the player killers in the south, right?” he asked.

“Yeah, he said something about the hunting ground there being the passage to the city of duels,” I answered.

“But the player killing is over in all the hunting grounds, isn’t it?” he asked.

Exactly, I thought. That had been the question on my mind before I'd met up with Rook.

There would've been no surprise if Figaro — the top of the duel rankings — had ended the player killing in the hunting grounds. In fact, if he'd simply given them all the death penalty, the player killing wouldn't be happening for a whole three days. However, Figaro had only mentioned the Sauda Mountain Pass in the south. Therefore, it was strange that the player killings in the other places were over, too.

"I have three possible scenarios in mind," I said.

"Do tell," Rook said, looking interested.

"Scenario number one: Figaro did something about the other three, as well," I said.

This scenario is quite unlikely, though, I thought. He'd probably taken care of the southern player killers to secure the means of travel between the capital and the city of duels — his main haunt. However, he'd had no reason to take care of the problems in the other areas.

"Scenario number two: upon finding out that someone took care of the player killers in the south, the others ceased their activity, as well."

This one seems a bit questionable, I thought. Sure, getting killed would disable the player killers' activity for a whole three days here, but this particular event was organized terrorism meant to prevent Kingdom of Altar's players from growing stronger.

From the way they'd sealed all four sides of the kingdom, it was obvious that they were acting as one. Due to that, it was hard to believe that they'd stop just because one side got neutralized. In fact, I would expect them to make up for the loss by sending over some of their killers from the other areas.

Suddenly, another possibility came to mind.

What if the countermeasures Figaro took aren't as small-scale and haphazard as I think they are? I thought. What if he actually negotiated with the player killers?

If that was the case, it was no surprise that all the player killing had stopped.

However, that's quite a questionable assumption, too, I thought. Figaro was a good guy, but he didn't seem like the type to act like that. I didn't talk to him for long, but the impression he gave me didn't seem to fit that scenario. After all, he almost killed me just because he couldn't see what I was. That brings him closer to "musclehead" territory... or just makes him seem like a person who is rough in the way he operates.

"Umm, Ray," Rook said, "what's the third scenario?"

Whoa, I got lost in thought, I realized.

After a short process of elimination, I voiced the third possibility.

"Scenario number three: at the same time as Figaro was doing his thing in the south, the other places were taken care of by other people," I said.

If Figaro wasn't the one who'd taken care of them all and if the others hadn't just backed down, it could only mean that someone else had gone to the other hunting grounds at the same time as him. After all, they were player killers, so there must've been many people who wanted them gone. Therefore, it was fair to assume that someone had gone to take care of them at about the same time as Figaro.

I felt it reasonable to believe that the single cause led to a coincidence in timing — a synchronicity, of sorts.

"And you are completely right!" an unfamiliar voice broke in.

It was way too sudden. Before I realized it, a woman I didn't know was sitting down at our round table — on a chair between myself and Rook.

Despite her being right next to me, I hadn't noticed her at all until she began speaking. Which was odd, because her appearance was strange and unique, making it nigh impossible to ignore her presence.

Her hair was black and long enough to cover her neck, while her face was that of someone around my age, but neither of those points were what made her seem strange. All of her oddity was in her apparel. However, the reasons were completely different from Figaro's.

That guy had had clothes befitting a fantasy setting, but there had been no uniformity in his overall appearance. This woman's clothing, however, was completely uniform. It just happened to be a men's business suit that didn't fit the fantasy setting at all.

Not only that, but her eyes were covered by a pair of sunglasses. I wouldn't have found her appearance the least bit weird if we'd been in reality, instead of the game. Though, even in reality, it would be pretty strange to wear sunglasses indoors.

"Umm... You are...?" Rook asked as I examined the woman.

“Oh, do forgive me,” she said. “I found your conversation so interesting that I couldn’t help but join in. This is who I am.”

As I noticed that she was talking in a slightly tomboy-ish way, she took out a business card... which was actually just a status window with her name, job, et cetera, but whatever.

Name: Marie Adler.
Job: Journalist belonging to the company known as “DIN.”

The existence of the job “Pimp” is surprising enough, and now I run into a Journalist, I thought. This game sure has great job variety.

“What’s DIN?” I asked.

“Short for Dendrogram Information Network,” Marie answered. “Some call us newspaper reporters. However, when we want to sound cool, we like to go for ‘intelligence agency without borders.’ We gather information from countries all over and sell it to other countries.”

“...Is that a safe thing to do in the current environment?” I asked. The kingdom was at war with a neighboring country. People who could leak info to the enemy seemed like prime candidates for arrest.

“Well, we have many DIN fans in the upper echelons of every country,” she answered. “Though I’m just an underling, so I specialize in info for citizens and Masters.”

“Any examples?” I asked.

“For the citizens, we recently took photos of and wrote about the pandas that were breeding so much they covered an entire mountain in Huang He.”

...Oh yeah, I saw that in the message boards, I thought.

“As for Masters, we recently gathered info about the player killers that were terrorizing the Kingdom of Altar’s surroundings,” she continued.

“...Hmm,” I pondered. If she handled info like that, she might know how it all played out and ended.

“You said that he was completely right. Do you know the truth behind the event?” asked Nemesis.

“Do you want to know? 600 lir per area, please,” Marie said. “You can also buy the info on all four of the places at once for 2,000.”

I see. So she only appeared before us to sell some info, I thought. As much as I hate to admit it, I’m interested in what happened, so...

“...I’ll pay,” I said.

“Ah! Ray, let me pay half of the money!” Rook joined in.

We both gave 1,000 lir each.

“Thank you for your business,” she said. “I’ll start with the conclusion: the player killers who occupied the hunting grounds around the capital city of Altea have been completely annihilated.”

Now that’s a rough word, I thought.

“Annihilated?” I asked.

“Almost all the player killers in the hunting grounds are on their death penalty now,” she answered. “With something so extreme happening, I don’t think they’re gonna do this dirty work again. Some of the relevant clans might even split up.”

Work? Clan?

“Umm...” I expressed my confusion.

“Oh, forgive me,” she said. “The player killer group responsible for this event was actually a union between several player killer clans.”

“A union...?” I raised an eyebrow. I was told it wasn’t a solo effort, but an actual union between player killer clans? I thought. ...Wait, our country actually has enough player killer clans to create a union?

“Yes,” she answered. “Easter Plains at the east was occupied by K&R. Sauda Mountain Pass to the south was occupied by Mad Castle. Wez Sea Route to the west was occupied by Goblin Street. These three clans were responsible for the recent player killing.”

Two of those clan names sound really villainous, I thought. They’d probably chosen them on purpose. What about the north, though? That one’s the most important to me.

“As for their motives... Apparently, they did it because someone hired them to do the player killing,” Marie added.

“Was it Dryfe?” Rook asked.

The question made her slightly raise her arms and shake her head. “That’s the rumor, but we at DIN don’t have any conclusive proof of that, so I can only say that I don’t know,” she answered.

Well, as things are now, the only one who could be happy about Altar being damaged in such a way are Dryfe — the country we’re at war with — so it’s quite likely, I thought. Though it does seem a bit too direct.

“From their perspective, it was probably just an attractive scenario where they could get some extra rewards for their player killing by merely switching their hunting grounds, but the world wasn’t too kind to them,” she continued. “They were annihilated by a certain four Masters.”

“Four...” I repeated the number. Just four Masters had destroyed the player killers in all four areas.

Is that even possible? I wondered. Well, I guess the south made sense, considering Figaro was involved.

With that in mind, the other hunting grounds had been...

“Yes, it was made possible by the work of the four Superiors loyal to the Kingdom of Altar,” she said. “They were the ones who exterminated all the player killer clans.”

Superior.

That was the term used to describe the ones who had made their Embryos evolve to the final — seventh — form. They were the elite of the elite among players, and the total number of them didn’t even cross a hundred yet.

“King of Destruction the Unknown, Figaro the Endless Chain, Tsukuyo Fuso of the Lunar World, and Lei-Lei, the Prodigal of Feasts,” she said, naming the four. “They all went to a separate hunting ground and exterminated all the player killer clans occupying them. Oh, but Tsukuyo Fuso had her clan with her.”

“Oho...” I said, interested.

So Figaro’s nickname is “Endless Chain,” huh? Is it because he uses chains? I pondered. Also, is the King of Destruction’s nickname seriously just “Unknown?” What the hell? We don’t even know his name, so he could be a serious weirdo.

“Now, take a look here.” Marie took out a crystal ball and placed it on the table.

“What’s this?” I asked.

“Well, it’s basically an item to display visual media,” she explained. “It shows what you record on magical cameras.”

Magical cameras? I raised an eyebrow. Well, it’s obviously a camera that works magically, but I can’t help but wonder if the devs think anything goes as long as you put “magic” next to it.

“Due to all the recent happenings here in the Kingdom of Altar, we at DIN increased the numbers of secret cam... I mean, information-gathering equipment we place here,” she said.

...Illegal spying, eh? I thought.

“Some of them happened to film the end of these terror events,” Marie continued as if it wasn’t a big deal. “This thing has it all in full detail.”

She activated the crystal ball.

“Since you two were talking about it, let’s begin with a look at the south, where Figaro the Endless Chain went...”

Chapter Five: Superior

Clan Leader of Mad Castle — Full Armor Giant Barbaroy Bad Burn.

In Dendro, there were two ways for players to fight amongst themselves.

The first one was dueling.

Players would gather in an arena, agree on a set of conditions and rules, decide what items the victor would get and begin fighting. Since no one would die even if their HP hit 0 and all the damage done would be reverted the moment the battle ended, duels were much like a casual pastime.

The other means was player killing.

Players would attack other players outside of an arena and give them the death penalty. Players who died this way would drop money and items at random... just like monsters.

One of the differences between losing a duel and dying from player killing was that the former allowed you to choose what items you lost, while the latter randomized it. The other difference was in whether the defeated side died or not.

That was the reason why there were those who specialized in dueling...

...and those like us, who specialized in player killing.

I, leader of the clan 'Mad Castle' — Barbaroy Bad Burn — love player killing.

In fact, my clan and I are enjoying some wholesome player killing right at this very moment, I thought.

"Uaahhh! Waaahhh!" A newbie player who looked like — and probably was — an elementary schooler was crying as he attacked me with his starting gear. However, no matter how many times he tried, the damage he did was always 0.

"Khahah! Come on! Damage me for at least 1 HP and I'll let ya go!" I laughed.

Not that that could ever happen. Mine was a high-rank job focused on endurance — Full Armor Giant.

Not only that, but I had Damage Decrease, which decreased all incoming damage by 20%, and Damage Reduction, which took away 500 damage from all attacks, so a newbie like him couldn't damage me even if he landed a critical hit.

"Uohh! Uohhh!" Still crying, the newbie attacked me while making an attempt to run away. However, I quickly stood in his path before he could complete his escape.

Despite having a heavy, non-agile job, I was still much faster than a newbie, not to mention that I had my Embryo's ability. I also made sure to prevent him from logging out.

To log out in this game, a player needed about thirty seconds of free time. No one could do it unless they were able to spend those thirty seconds without being touched or attacked by someone else. It was a fact of the game that was meant to prevent crime, but it could easily be used for crime.

Well, player killing wasn't actually forbidden, so it wasn't really a "crime" in any sense of the word.

Also, for one reason or another — likely as a means against harassment — players were able to commit suicide. Even if players were rendered unable to move even a single finger, they could give themselves the death penalty at will. However, by doing that, players dropped way more money and items than when killed by a player killer, so there weren't many who used that function.

"All right, time's up," I said.

"Ah!" the newbie gasped. As he continued his fruitless struggle, I held my large shield in both hands and swung it down on him.

My shield — which was one meter in diameter — became a giant stamp and left a mark on the ground. The ink was the player. Of course, since he'd died, what was left of the newbie quickly disappeared.

Good thing I'd set my visuals to CG. The sight would've been pretty damn grotesque if I'd set it to realistic.

There's something seriously wrong with those who pick realistic visuals, I thought. Battles with undead monsters get really grim from that perspective.

"Eheehee! You sure are a scumbag, boss! You even made me feel bad for the kid!" laughed one of my clan members.

"Khahah! Holy shit, I sure won't be eating any tomatoes today," another joined in.

"What do you say to cheeseburgers for dinner, then?" I grinned. "As you can see, I can get the mincemeat as if it's no big deal."

"I think I'll pass, LOL." The clan members working with me began their usual banter, and I joined in, making sure to sound as scummy as possible.

Roleplaying as a bad guy sure is fun, I thought. Probably has something to do with being able to show off a side of you that you can't show anywhere else.

For example, in reality, Ban-blu — the one grinning at my side — was a public service worker with a husband and kids, but that couldn't have mattered less here.

Mad Castle's motto was thus: "Forget reality, get hyped up, and kill some players."

It wasn't the least bit enjoyable to the ones getting killed, mind you. However, in this game — where everyone was competing for more power — it was the weaklings' own fault for being weak.

"I've heard of people who got so traumatized by player killers that they stopped playing," said one of my people.

"Like I care," I said. Seriously, I couldn't have cared less if I'd tried. "Killing" and "getting killed" were both part of the game.

"So, boss, including this brat, how many have we killed by now?" asked a clan member.

"Well, I stopped counting the ones I'd killed when I hit fifty," I replied.

My Mad Castle clan was occupying the Sauda Mountain Pass south of the capital, and had been killing any players who happened to pass by. We only went for those we were able to handle, but so far, everyone had been weak enough for me to do it solo.

There had been a group that had come here to stop us, but me and my clan had had no problem taking care of them, too.

"But man, this is a good deal we've got," said one of my people. "All we do is kill some players, and the money comes a-flowing like a fountain."

"Yeah, it's great," I replied.

Deal. That's the word for it, I thought. We were player killing here because we had a deal going on. For every death penalty we gave, we received a flat 10,000 lir reward. And this deal would last for a whole month, game time.

We couldn't ask for better conditions. And that was without mentioning that — being a newbie hunting ground — this place was full of scrubs we could crush like insects.

The first day we'd started had been so damn good that it'd gotten us more than 1,000,000 lir. It'd been hilarious.

What was just as funny was the fact that it had become big news.

Unlike the clan in the north, we didn't hide our identities. That led people to find out who we were, but to us villain roleplayers, that was only a blessing.

"Though, man, we sure don't get as many players now as we did at the start," one of my people said. "Guess they're all scared shitless now. Oh, yeah. Last night, at the tavern, I heard that the guys in the east don't have much to do, either."

The other three hunting grounds surrounding the capital were occupied by other player killers. Just like our clan, the ones in the east and west were full of delinquents who didn't give a damn about what people thought and just wanted to kill some players.

"Though I've heard that Goblin Street — the guys in the west — are getting some serious extra cash," another one added.

"Well, that's because they go after NPCs, too," I said.

"Ain't that just scary?" he said.

"Maybe," I said.

Player killing wasn't a crime. Dendro's laws ignored all conflicts between Masters. However, killing NPCs was a serious offense.

Ending an NPC's life without a valid reason — such as self-defense, them being criminals, or taking part in a war event — would cause them to recognize the offending player as a criminal and put them on a wanted list.

Getting on a country's wanted list made the player unable to use the country's save points.

If that had been all there was to it, simply switching to another country's save points would solve the problem, but overdoing it with the killing would get the player on the wanted list of every country. When on all the seven lists, the player would be simply done. They wouldn't be able to use any countries' save points.

Considering that getting the death penalty in such a situation would send you to that place, the risks were way too high.

The guys at Goblin Street probably had save points at Caldina or something, but we had no intention of going through those lengths just so we could kill NPCs.

In fact, killing NPCs didn't make me feel good.

Once, I'd killed a criminal NPC, and it'd made me feel like crap — as if I'd broken an expensive vase. That was why we chose to not touch any NPCs trying to pass through this hunting ground.

Well, we're too scared to try, anyway, I thought.

"Yeah, I'll stick to player killing. It's both comfortable and fun," one of my clan members spoke up again.

"True," another replied. "Something's seriously wrong with the guys in the west. Even if we're all player killers, I wouldn't want to get involved with that lot."

I simply listened to them. In all honesty, I'm more afraid of the one in the north than the ones in the west, I thought.

The person in Noz Forest was bad news.

Unlike in the other places, it wasn't a clan there, but a single player killer. I didn't know his name. All I knew about him was that he was a trickster good at hiding himself, and that what he was doing was his day job.

There was no better term for it — day job.

He'd been playing as a hit man for as long as he'd been known in Dendro.

Players who were killed by other players or received some sort of harassment would sometimes grow vengeful and develop grudges. Killing players based on the requests of such people was part of his daily life. I'd even heard that he'd once gotten a request to assassinate a Superior that was on wanted lists.

"Superiors" were players that had made their Embryos evolve to their seventh forms — the elite of the elite. No one in their right mind would even think of fighting someone like that. I was no exception.

However, though he'd received serious amounts of damage, that player had been able to give the Superior a death penalty and send him to that place. Due to that, he'd gotten the title of "Superior Killer."

Though we were business partners right now, I didn't really want to meet him.

I didn't think I'd lose to him, but hit men like him — adhesive as they were — just seemed far worse than both player and NPC killers. Not getting involved with them was the right idea.

"Boss, we've got another one," one of my clan members called me.

He was contacting me by using an item that allowed communication between members of the same clan.

We had six parties consisting of six people each. Every member of every party had split up and formed groups of six with members of other parties before positioning themselves in different places all across the area.

With this setup, if one group got destroyed in some sort of surprise attack, the actual party members would be able to tell that something was wrong by looking at their party status. It was a large-scale battle tactic that we were all accustomed to using.

"Whoa, damn. This sucker has some good-looking gear on him," he spoke through the long-distance contact item.

"Well then, if he's not a newbie, he's here to hunt us down, huh?" I asked.

"Seems like it," he answered. "He's alone, though."

"Alone? Then there's no problem," I said. "Just attack, threaten him into taking his gear off, and kill him."

"Hee hee hee, sounds good, boss," he laughed. "Today, we'll sell that gear and have a wild part—"

[Party Member "Jordan α" Has Died]

[Resurrection Period Expired]

[Due to the Death Penalty, "Jordan α" was Logged Out]

Huh? was all I could think. "H-Hey! Stop with the jokes! Shit like this freaks me out when it's so sudde—"

[Party Member "Lowered Beltmars" Has Died]

[Resurrection Period Expired]

[Due to the Death Penalty, "Lowered Beltmars" was Logged Out]

Another party member I'd been in contact with had died.

The "resurrection period" was the time in which resurrection items and magic could have an effect. If someone successfully resurrected the player before the period ended, the player would avoid the death penalty. However, the time given was dependent on the state of the corpse.

The two deaths had been instant and had left basically no resurrection period. I could only assume that they'd been turned into mincemeat in but a single moment.

Upon looking at the clan members at my side, I noticed that they had all turned pale.

Once I asked what was up, they said their party members who'd been in the same places as Jordan α and Lowered Beltmars were also dead.

Basically, the twelve clan members positioned at those two places had all met a nearly simultaneous and swift death.

Did they all get ganked by a group of players? I thought. There's no way.

After all, each place had had a person with a great "Enemy Detect" skill. It should've been impossible for a group of players to prepare such an attack without getting noticed.

But if the one who did it was already spotted... and if it's really just one, then...

"I-It's a player! A player from Altar!" one of my party members from another position contacted me. "I saw a chain! It took Marlo and—"

[Party Member "Ma-mdoh" Has Died]

[Resurrection Period Expired]

[Due to the Death Penalty, "Ma-mdoh" was Logged Out]

The screams coming from the other side before getting cut out were a sign that the third group had been eliminated.

However, before dying, the party member had left me some valuable information. He'd mentioned that the player used a chain. There was little doubt that it was the same well-equipped "sucker" they'd seen before dying.

Well, now this "sucker" is massacring our members as if it's nothing, I thought. This one clearly isn't your average Joe.

The Kingdom of Altar happened to have a famous player who used chains. His name was...

"I-It's Figarooooo!" shouted another party member. "Why is the Over Gladiator here?! He—"

[Party Member "Mohawk X" Has Died]

[Resurrection Period Expired]

[Due to the Death Penalty, "Mohawk X" was Logged Out]

...Over Gladiator Figaro.

"The Endless Chain," "One of Altar's Big Three," "The King of Hanging Around the City of Duels," et cetera... He had many names and was one of the strongest players in not just the Kingdom of Altar, but in the whole game itself.

He was a Superior, and there were even rumors that that weirdo raided created dungeons solo.

That lunatic was now with us, on this mountain...

...and he clearly had it in for us.

It wasn't an unexpected scenario.

Since we were committing acts of terror against the kingdom's players, it was only natural for the ones sitting at the top of the kingdom's rankings to come take care of us.

However, the rumors had suggested that Figaro wasn't the type to get involved in such events. I'd heard he spent most of his playing time either raiding the dungeon or dueling in the Colosseum.

After all, he hadn't even participated in the war, and yet...

[Party Member "Goro Mushoku" Has Died]

[Resurrection Period Expired]

[Due to the Death Penalty, "Goro Mushoku" was Logged Out]

Suddenly, I heard some rattling. A frustrated grunt escaped my mouth. Right after I got the message that the members in the fifth position were eliminated — meaning that we were the last — my "Killing Intent Perception" skill went off and warned me about the attack coming my way.

I didn't know the direction it was coming from. Still, I only needed to know it was coming to be able to do something about it.

A moment later, I saw a chain with a pyramid-like tip flying right at me.

"Astro Guard!" I activated a Full Armor Giant defensive skill. It rendered me unable to move in exchange for multiplying my defense by five.

With this, my total defense was now over 15,000 — the greatest I could reach.

The chain hit my shield with a dreadful amount of power behind it.

"...Whoa!" I exclaimed. My HP had gone down.

My defense was over 15,000, I had a skill that decreased all damage by 20% and another one that took away another 500, yet he had been able to break through all these walls and deal damage to me. It was only natural that the guys positioned at the other places had gotten slaughtered without even getting time to heal.

Thus, the chain that I deflected...

“Gyeeaahhh!”

...went towards and pulverized Ban-blu.

She wasn’t the only one, though — besides me, everyone positioned here was attacked by the chains and scattered into a thousand pieces.

“...Sorry,” I said. “I can’t move, so I couldn’t protect you.”

With that, the survivors around me disappeared, and I could no longer contact anyone.

Looks like they’re all dead and dealing with the death penalty now, I thought. Still immobile, I kept up my Astro Guard stance.

Besides the chains — which were making metallic sounds as they hit and slightly damaged me — the only thing moving was the Over Gladiator, Figaro. I saw him walking up the mountain road when I tried to trace where the chains were coming from.

He had a well-proportioned face, so if — unlike me — he hadn’t spent a significant amount of time on character creation and had just gone with the defaults, it was fair to assume that he was handsome in real life, as well.

His apparel was strange, but by using “Identification” — a skill that allowed me to see item names and values — I discovered that everything he was wearing was highly powerful and extremely rare. In fact, some of them were so rare that my Identification level wasn’t high enough to identify them.

“The bastard’s even wearing some UBM special rewards as if it’s no big deal...” I grumbled.

Special rewards for MVPs in UBM battles — Unique Boss Monster — were bound to the MVP and thus couldn’t be transferred or dropped. So, despite being damn strong, they were worthless to us.

Though Figaro’s face and apparel were deserving of a comment or two, there was something about him that just couldn’t be ignored. It was the red chains — several of them — wrapped around both of his arms.

This game had a limit to how many weapons you could wield. The standard amount was either one for both hands or one in one hand and another in the other — like me with my shield. Besides that, normal players could use throwing weapons or items like Gems, but that was the extent of the weapons they could utilize.

However, this Figaro guy was wielding six chains — three on each arm.

And yes, I was completely certain that there were six chains — not just two that seemed separate. They all had the same name — Crimson Dead Keeper — but they weren't connected in any way.

Though Figaro didn't seem to be moving them, all the chains automatically extended and went straight towards me.

Most would think this is a joke, but they'd be wrong, I thought.

According to the Identification results, Crimson Dead Keepers had the skills "Auto Enemy Detect" and "Range Extend." You'd be hard pressed to find a more user-friendly weapon.

From the fact that Identification worked on them, it was obvious that they weren't his Embryo. Which made it all the more obvious that he was actually wielding a total of six weapons.

It was way over the standard wield limit, but I had been aware that the Gladiator job grouping had a skill that allowed the player to wield more weapons. The ultimate maximum was supposed to be a mere three, but since Over Gladiator was a Superior job of that grouping, it wouldn't have been strange for it to have a stronger version of that skill.

Basically, it meant that he'd eliminated all of my clan without using his Embryo and by relying only on his Over Gladiator skills and weapons in hand.

"I'm sure getting blocked a lot today."

Figaro's first words didn't make even a bit of sense to me.

"You have some good defense, but I guess it's normal for a Full Armor Giant," he continued. "Still, it's rare for anyone to be this tough. Is your Embryo focused on defense or something?"

I stayed silent. He was stating his impressions, but I had no reason to respond in any capacity. I could try bluffing, but if he had Truth Discernment — a skill that informed the user if another person was lying — he'd see right through me and I'd only end up giving him info...

...such as the fact that my Embryo's power wasn't defensive at all.

"...Hm. Looks like I've taken care of every player killer besides you," he said.

Either by simply feeling it or by seeing that his chains' Auto Enemy Detect weren't picking up anyone but me, he'd concluded that I was the last. And with those words, it became obvious that he'd come here to kill us — the player killers near the capital.

“So, can I assume that you’re this PK group’s leader?” he asked.

“...What if I said ‘yes?’” I replied.

“My only goal here is to secure the means of travel between the duel city and the capital,” he explained. “If you promise to leave this mountain pass, I’ll gladly let you go.”

“...Is that something you say after killing every single one of my clan members?” I asked.

“If I hadn’t done that, you wouldn’t even be willing to negotiate.”

He’s not wrong, I thought.

Until he’d eliminated us, we’d all considered him to be just another sucker for easy pickings, so we would’ve attacked him even if he’d had something to say. After all, we’d had no idea that there was such a huge gap in power between us and a Superior.

However, that made me consider something.

Just how much stronger is he compared to me — a Master with an Embryo in its sixth form? If I can land a perfect hit with my Embryo’s ultimate skill... I might be able to kill him. Sure, with him having a Superior job, his level is probably far greater than mine. My level is 500 — the maximum I can reach with low-rank and high-rank jobs — and his can easily be two times higher than that. However, the results of PvP battles aren’t decided by level or stats. What matters is how well you can prevent your opponent from using their powers effectively while attacking them with your own. The Superior Killer got his name for a reason. It shouldn’t be impossible for me to do it, too.

“All right,” I said. “I’ll leave this place as soon as I can. We, Mad Castle, won’t be hunting any more newbies here.”

That wasn’t a lie. With players of this caliber now coming after us, our little PK feast in this area was all but done.

We’ll back away... right after I kill him, anyway.

“I have a Contract here. Wanna use it?” I reached into my item pouch and took out a piece of parchment.

It was a Contract — a type of item used in agreements between players. Anyone who went against the conditions would receive either a temporary loss of stats, some debuffs, or even the death penalty.

“Well...” Figaro said. “I don’t see why not. Let’s do it.”

“...Okay, I’m done filling it in,” I said. “Take a look at it.”

Saying that, I began to bring the Contract to Figaro.

Five meters.

Four meters.

Three meters.

Two meters — he was now in range.

A magic circle appeared below my feet and spread around me. It was my Embryo — Atlas.

“Heaven’s Weight!” One of Atlas’ skills was the increase of weight.

It was able to apply continuous damage to everything in the effective range by increasing the gravity of the surroundings.

The effect was stronger based on distance, reaching its peak at two meters, where the gravity was 500 times greater than usual. At the same time, it applied the “Binding” debuff, rendering Figaro unable to move even a single finger.

The chains automatically tried to attack me, but the overwhelming gravity forced them to the ground, where they could only crawl.

So far, no one had ever been able to break out of this combo between Binding and super gravity.

A standard high-ranking player would have already been crushed to death, but I wasn’t naïve enough to believe that the Superior before me would die as easily.

It was time to use Atlas’s ultimate attack.

“Astro Guard!”

I used Astro Guard again to multiply my defense by five...

“Emancipated Giant, Atlas!”

...followed by the skill named after Atlas itself.

It converted my defense to offense and multiplied my attack power by ten for ten seconds. My attack power was now over 150,000. A clean hit from that should’ve been enough to instakill anyone — even a Superior.

And as Figaro was still unable to move, I began barraging him with Atlas’ strongest attack.

“Break and die!” I roared.

The ground below me shattered, caved in, and became a large crater. But I didn’t give a damn.

For all I knew, he could have multiple resurrection or related accessories. I had to spend each and every one of these ten seconds attacking him.

Suddenly, a sound.

As I continued my barrage, a chain wrapped around my neck. It shocked the words out of me.

I looked down. What I saw was the ground I'd shattered with my barrage, but Figaro was nowhere to be seen.

If he wasn't before me, there was only one place he could be at. By that, I meant "at the other end of the chain tightening around my neck."

It was going upwards, so I looked up and saw Figaro hanging about ten meters up in the air.

"H-How?!" I howled in shock. He'd been affected by five hundred times the normal gravity and had had the Binding debuff — there was no way he could've jumped that high.

"...Ah," I said.

Suddenly, a realization.

I had heard many things about Figaro. Among them was that, for the Over Gladiator, raiding a created dungeon solo was part of his daily life. The very idea of solo raiding was stupid, but any lunatics who attempted it had to make sure they met a certain condition.

It wasn't high stats.

Nor was it the means of healing.

It was all about countermeasures to debuffs.

Paralysis, Sleep, Petrification, and, of course, Instant Death.

When going solo, players didn't have any allies that could help them with such debuffs, so getting one of them would be the equivalent of dying.

Thus, anyone raiding solo would have to have a means of dealing with debuffs. Therefore, it was only obvious that this solo-focused Superior would have been prepared for that.

He had some equipment I couldn't identify. One of them probably nullified all Binding effects.

"No... There's no way!" I shouted.

I'd been about to accept that conclusion, but I simply couldn't. The Binding from my Heaven's Weight was a personal skill from a high-rank Embryo. There was no way it could've been nullified so easily.

Suddenly, another realization.

I thought that he wasn't using his Embryo. But what if I'm wrong? What if his Superior Embryo is already active? What if it's the reason why he was able to nullify my Binding and jump as if the 500 times greater gravity doesn't matter at a—?

Another sound. I instantly looked up at Figaro.

Due to the light behind him, I couldn't make out his expression.

However, it gave me chills I couldn't describe.

When he landed, I got a good look at his face, which made the chills turn even worse.

The sound again. His narrow eyes were open wide and shining red. His mouth was in a smile — sharp like a crescent moon and open wide enough to see his throat. The sounds coming from his throat were downright inhuman. It was reminiscent of growls that your average monster would sound — meaningless and thick with bloodlust.

A short scream escaped my mouth. At that moment, he raised both of his chained hands up into the sky.

That motion made the chains wrapped around my neck begin to pull upwards.

My body — more than two meters worth of armored flesh — was separated from the surface and got distanced from the earth.

My ears were overwhelmed by the sound of air grazing my whole body.

Likely by using his chains' Range Extend skill, he made them raise me up at incredible speeds and didn't seem to know where to stop. Figaro was now but a dot on the surface. A moment later, I was higher than the mountain peak, reached the clouds and went beyond.

Soon enough, I no longer had any air around me. I made my lungs work at full capacity, yet nothing was coming in. The word "suffocation" came to mind.

Though Dendro allowed the player to reduce all pain to nothing but dull impacts, it didn't do anything about the anguish of oxygen deprivation.

However, there was no need for me to worry about suffocating, because something far scarier happened.

As if it was only obvious, the chains began to get pulled back down to the ground.

The sights I'd seen on my way up now went by me at an even faster speed, making me feel as if someone had rewinded my life.

"HYAAAAAHHHHHH!" A scream of despair escaped my mouth.

It didn’t matter that I was in a game. The fall I was experiencing was thick with fear of death.

It didn’t matter that there was no pain. The shape of fear living beings feel when faced with imminent death was unrelated to that.

The game’s realism conveyed the fear of death all too well.

From sky high and at a ridiculously high speed, I was falling to my death.

Still with a monstrous smile on his face, Figaro was waiting for me on the surface.

Once again, he made that sinister, incomprehensible sound. One of his chains was replaced by another weapon — a chainsaw-like greatsword.

He swung it straight at where I was falling.

A moment later, a twisted, crunching sound ripped from my own body, and I...

[Fatal Damage]

[Party Eliminated]

[Resurrection Period Expired]

[Death Penalty: 24 Hour Login Ban]

Rangyu Restaurant, Kingdom of Altar — Paladin Ray Starling.

“...That was one brutal fight.” After watching the clip in Marie’s crystal ball, I was seriously taken aback. It was paused at the frame where the huge, armored guy — the PK leader — was getting split in half.

According to Marie, the armor guy was an infamous player who had had high defense and a counterattack-like ultimate skill that dealt serious damage.

Due to that description, I found him somewhat relatable and began to feel that his demise — that mangled corpse — was a glimpse of my future if I ever fought Figaro.

“And that’s how everyone in Mad Castle met with a sad end,” said Marie. “Even if they recover from this, they’ll never return to player killing in that area.”

Makes sense, considering that stopping the traffic there would make Figaro get involved again, I thought.

“If I ever find myself in the duel city, I’ll have to remember to thank Figaro for this,” I said.

“Indeed,” mumbled Nemesis.

“Hm?” I looked at her.

For some reason, she seemed a bit sulky. Instead of looking at the crystal ball, she was merely eating with Babi, who didn’t seem to care about any of this whatsoever.

The amount Nemesis consumed was as great as always, but it almost seemed like she was stress eating.

Why, though? I thought.

“Okay, now let me show you the next one.” This time, Marie’s crystal displayed a familiar place. It was the first hunting ground I’d ever leveled at — Easter Plains.

Sure enough, there was a group of player killers there. Though they were hiding from players and waiting for their next prey, they weren’t hidden from the camera.

A few moments later, another group — and quite a strange one, at that — came from the direction of the capital.

I couldn’t tell the exact number, but there were surely more than a hundred of them — all marching towards the player killers.

Each and every single one of the group had an outfit with a crescent moon and a closed eye on it. The design seemed familiar, but I couldn’t recall where I’d seen it.

In response to the group’s sudden appearance, the player killers became visibly perplexed and only continued hiding.

Soon enough, a single lady walked out of the strange group.

She had black hair that was reminiscent of nightly darkness and reached as far as the back of her knees, which were hidden by her ceremonial kimono. Her beauty made me feel as though I was looking at Princess Kaguya, straight out of the children’s tale.

Suddenly, the beauty raised her hand, making the world go through what seemed like a theatrical blackout.

Mere moments ago, it had been daytime and the sun had been shining, but she’d somehow brought forth a “night.” It was complete with a blue moon that was downright impossible in reality and perhaps even the game.

A moment later, the player killers who were bathed in the blue moonlight grabbed hold of their throats and began to writhe in pain, which rendered them unable to move properly.

As if they had been waiting for this, the strange group split up and began systematically killing the writhing player killers. With their victims unable to move in any capacity, it seemed less like a battle and more like a tedious job.

However, there was an exception.

A certain player killer — a Beastman type female player with wolf-like ears and tail — could still move even when exposed to the moonlight.

According to Marie, that was one of K&R's two leaders.

Using her claws and fangs, she savagely clawed her way through the enemies surrounding her and closed in on Princess Kaguya.

However, it was all in vain.

The hundreds surrounding her were too much for her to handle, so she ended up dying at the edge of a spear.

The sight made the beauty reminiscent of Princess Kaguya cackle in a discomforting manner.

"That's Tsukuyo Fuso of the Lunar World," Marie explained. "She is the owner of the clan known as The Lunar Society... though I guess the term 'founder' or 'spiritual leader' is more appropriate."

"Spiritual leader?" I raised an eyebrow. It was a strange title, but it reminded me that her job was "High Priestess."

Nevertheless, I found it to be somewhat questionable...

"Um, is this Lunar Society related to the Japanese cult of the same name?" asked Rook.

"...Oh." His words reminded me of where I'd heard that before. "The Lunar Society" was the name of a cult that existed in reality.

"Yes," answered Marie. "The clan 'The Lunar Society' is a part — or, rather, the headquarters — of the cult of the same name."

"...Why are they advancing their religion in a game, of all places?" I asked.

"The Lunar Society's first teaching is 'Escape the shackles of flesh and betake yourself to the true world of souls,'" she explained. "I guess they consider Dendro to be that world."

...I'm fully aware of this world's realism, I thought. Our five senses and the tians we interact with can't be distinguished from the real thing. But... is that really enough reason to take it that far?

"If their goal is to 'betake themselves to the true world of souls' and they accomplished it by getting here... what are they doing now?” I inquired.

“Oh, yes. Their second teaching is the main one,” Marie said. “It goes something like, ‘Embrace this free world and celebrate your liberty to your soul’s content.’”

...Sounds like the dogma of some dark god, I thought.

“The Lunar Society is quite feared among the players,” she continued. “Not only are they more than a thousand strong, they also have roots in reality, so many players are afraid that getting on the cult’s bad side might get something done to them in real life.”

Well, that’s a scary thought, I thought. If there’s the possibility of them abducting me or something, I’d rather not get involved with them, either.

“By the way, as far as we know, their reason for going after the player killers was the fact that one of their followers was killed by them,” Marie added. “It’s scary that such a thing can get the entire clan to go after you, isn’t it?”

...Would I be wrong to assume that — right next to the war — the cult is another reason why people are leaving the kingdom? I thought.

Next, Marie displayed what had happened in the west.

What I saw first was Lei-Lei — the girl that had participated in the party we’d had on my first day. Just like that time, she was wearing a Chinese dress despite having a northern European face. From what my brother had told me, she was from there in real life, too.

Lei-Lei’s fighting style as I saw it in the crystal ball was simple. She didn’t bring them up to the sky just to have them fall on a chainsaw, nor did she make them writhe just to have a group come up and impale them.

She simply walked up to the hiding player killers and punched them. That was all. However, the results were downright ridiculous.

Figaro’s chains basically turned his opponents into mincemeat, but this was on another level.

The player killers were completely liquefied. They were bursting so easily, it almost made me think that they weren’t people, but people-shaped water balloons. The moment Lei-Lei touched them, their flesh simply collapsed, leaving only a blood and entrail-colored liquid and the skin that released it.

Speaking of skin, it was flying around everywhere, decorating just about every surrounding tree. Because they instantly died, it would quickly disappear, but the sight itself wouldn't leave my mind as easily.

I think I can see why she's called the Prodigal of Feasts, I thought. No proper feast is complete without meat and drink, and she provided both. ...What a grim thought, though.

Despite seeming like a really jovial character in the party, Lei-Lei had a seriously scary fighting style.

Marie didn't know why Lei-Lei had decided to eliminate the player killers.

With what happened in the south, east, and west now being clear, all that was left was the north — Noz Forest.

It was the place I was the most curious about. After all, I had died there once.

"Now, about the north..." Marie seemed somewhat reluctant.

Just what is she about to show us? I thought.

"Well, I'll just play it, then." Marie controlled the crystal ball and made it show the forest.

It had been filmed during nighttime, when I'd still been raiding the Tomb Labyrinth. Apparently, this was the earliest of the four eliminations.

However, I couldn't see the player killer anywhere.

Sure, the trees and the night's darkness made it hard to see, but there was absolutely no sign of him.

As I continued intently looking at the crystal ball and searching for him, the screen suddenly turned red as the footage ended.

It quickly changed to a recording from another camera, but just like the last one, it quickly got cut off, as well.

The next recording wasn't a clip of the inside of the forest, but an overhead view of the whole area. The camera was probably placed on the capital's outer walls.

Anyway, it showed with great clarity what was happening in the forest.

The forest was being bombarded by artillery shells and set aflame by a rain of incendiary bombs.

Not showing a single person, the clip ended with just that — a flaming forest, making it feel like a scene cut from some war movie.

"Um... what is this?" Rook's question made Marie smile awkwardly.

"Ahaha... This is, uh... the battle between King of Destruction the Unknown and the unidentified player killer widely known as the 'Superior Killer'..." The tone of her explanation made it seem like she had no confidence about what she was saying.

I can see why, I thought. The clip shows neither the player killer nor the King of Destruction eliminating him. It's nothing but a display of environmental destruction.

"...If it doesn't show the King of Destruction, how can you be sure that he was the one who did it?" I asked Marie. "Hell, we don't even see the player killer, so it might not be this 'Superior Killer,' either."

"Good point," she replied. "From what we know about him, it's all but confirmed that the PK is the Superior Killer, but we don't have any conclusive proof about the one who attacked him being the King of Destruction. This is only an assumption based on the extent of the destruction displayed here. But you see, the King of Destruction has always been an enigmatic figure that doesn't let anyone know much about him..."

Oh yeah, I thought. His reason for not participating in the war was that he "didn't want to stand out." Though that's not very convincing when coming from someone who just turned an entire forest to cinders.

"Oh, but there are rumors that the King's Embryo is a battleship! Take a closer look here!" Marie pointed her finger at a certain spot on the crystal ball.

Beyond the burning forest, shrouded by the darkness of night, there was a large, black silhouette. Its outline was too acute to be the ridgeline of a mountain, and indeed, many would assume it to be a battleship.

"So battleship Embryos exist, huh?" I said, not particularly surprised. My brother's was a tank, so this wasn't outside the realm of expectation.

In fact, I'd been more startled by Tsukuyo Fuso's Embryo. I had a feeling that it was the "night" itself.

"But wait, wouldn't such a large-scale attack harm more than just the Superior Killer?" I asked. What if it actually killed some tians...?

"I don't think we have to worry about that," Marie answered. "With all the player killing, almost no one dared to go through there. In fact, I think the King of Destruction only took such a flashy approach because he was certain that no one else would get caught up in it."

"I see." I nodded. Or maybe he'd turned the whole forest to ash simply because he couldn't find anyone. From what I had read on the Internet, no one besides me had even seen the Superior Killer.

Now that I think about it, how did DIN get ahold of information that led them to believe that the player killer was the Superior Killer? I wondered.

"Do you know the reason why the King of Destruction attacked the Superior Killer?" I asked.

"We have no clue whatsoever." Marie raised her hands up in resignation. "Despite being a player that gets strongly involved in many events across all countries, his identity and most of the reasons for his involvement are completely unknown."

"And that's why he's called 'The Unknown,' right?" I asked.

"Yes," she nodded. "We are completely clueless as to what drove him to cause such large-scale destruction..."

...I wonder if something pissed him off, I thought.

"Wait, aren't there too many holes in the information about the north? Isn't this intel a bit too vague?" Rook asked.

I couldn't help but agree with Rook. The price had been 600 lir per area, but the information for Noz Forest seemed worth a lot less than that.

"Oh...?! Now that you mention it..." Marie muttered. "Ah! But wait! There's some extra info that comes with this!"

"Extra info?" I asked.

"Indeed! It's this: the Superior Killer left these flames alive!"

In response to Marie's words...

"Oh?"

...Nemesis — who, up until that point, had been eating with Babi while barely looking at the crystal ball — finally showed some interest.

I could somewhat understand why this was the only piece of info that had gotten a reaction out of her.

In fact, I'd finally realized why Nemesis was behaving the way she was. She was frustrated that the player killers had all been eliminated. She didn't like having the one she'd promised to get revenge on be taken away by someone else. I could relate to that, as well.

However...

"That's great news," said Nemesis.

...he was still alive.

Chapter Six: The Cat’s Tea Party

Noz Forest — Paladin Ray Starling.

After Rook and I bought Marie’s info and made a plan to meet up later, Nemesis and I went to the place that used to be Noz Forest.

“This is just...” I said.

Beyond the northern gate, there was a great wasteland as far as the eye could see. The forest had simply disappeared, leaving only felled trees reduced to nothing but charcoal.

Noz Forest could no longer be used as a hunting ground, nor was it deserving of the name “forest.” In a city-building sim, the wasteland before me would’ve been a great place for building.

Sadly, Infinite Dendrogram was an RPG.

But man, it’s hard to believe that a single player can change the map this much, I thought.

I saw bullet holes, explosion marks, and could even smell the lingering stench of gunpowder. I had no clue if the King’s Embryo really was a battleship, but there was little doubt that — just like my brother’s Baldr — it was either heavy weaponry or something greater in the same vein.

Another thing I noted was that — while the other three had targeted the player killers directly — the King of Destruction had, well... destroyed the map. Sure, he’d lived up to his name, but it didn’t make it less of a bother. It seemed as ludicrous as removing the whole arm in response to a diseased finger.

“...This is gonna have bad aftereffects — no doubt about it,” I said.

“People have already started leaving here at an even faster rate,” added Nemesis.

We were talking about the local tians.

Yesterday’s bombing had put the entire capital into a state of panic. Thinking that Dryfe’s army was launching a surprise attack, the knights had moved out through the northern gate. By that point, however, the bombing had already been over, leaving nothing but a burning Noz Forest.

Though it didn't seem like the flames would spread to the capital, they couldn't have just left them burning as they were, so the knights had spent the entire night putting them out, and were still taking care of the aftermath.

All of this had been told to me by Liliana.

We'd met by accident a short while ago, and she had palpable bags under her eyes. She'd even said, "If you became a Paladin, then come and help us out..." in a slightly whiny manner.

"I know we were underground when the bombing happened and all, but I'm still surprised we didn't notice it," I commented.

"I had other things to worry about back then," said Nemesis. "You, on the other hand, were simply tired and had your senses dulled by fatigue."

Anyway, the event that had reduced Noz Forest — a place the capital's citizens took for granted — to ashes had been enough to make the already-tense populace go into panic mode. Since morning, the amount of people leaving the capital had been increasing by the hour.

Another reason for the increase was the fact that the four PK groups were taken care of. Though the player killers had been primarily targeting Masters, tians were also in danger of getting attacked if they weren't lucky, which had made traffic around the capital grind to a complete halt. Today, the roads were opened again, making the people practically flood out of the city.

Now that I think about it, tians can't differentiate between Masters and other tians, I thought. Though we Masters use Embryos and are basically immortal, both tians and Masters share the basis of being human. Therefore, to tians, player killers are nothing but murderers. That goes double for the player killers who also go for tians.

"Man, taking care of this PK business sure came at a cost," I said.

"One of the hunting grounds became unusable, after all," Nemesis agreed. "Also, the horror experience back in the Tomb Labyrinth was all for naught."

Despite all the money we'd spent on it, the advantage we'd gained had lasted for only a single night. Though I did feel fortunate to have met Figaro.

"I've gotta say, though..." I spoke. "This 'Superior Killer' guy escaped from an attack that destroyed the entire forest."

From what Marie had told me about the player killer in Noz Forest, the source of DIN’s information about him had been Marie herself. Though a bit late, she had gone to gather material about yesterday’s calamity right as it was happening. While doing so, she had happened to see the Superior Killer escape from the onslaught that was turning the forest to ash and run off into the distance.

In her own words, “He was using a skill with a concealment effect that hid his identity, but from the features of the Embryo he was using, I couldn’t be more sure that it was him!”

Once I asked for those features, she said that it was a handgun-shaped Embryo that shot bullet-like animals. The description matched the one who had killed me.

Apparently, the Superior Killer had been using those bullet-like animals to cancel out all the attacks coming his way. By doing that, he’d been able to safely reach the capital. Despite all he had already done up to that point, the King of Destruction couldn’t attack the capital, and had given up on pursuing the Superior Killer.

When all of that was considered, he had been successful where I hadn’t — in a battle with the sole goal of retreating from a stronger force.

I was glad to not have the target of my revenge get taken away from me by the King of Destruction, but that notion made me slightly vexed.

“...Let’s go back, then,” I said. “We have plans with Rook, after all.”

“True... hm?” Nemesis said.

As we were about to make our way back to the capital, Nemesis focused on a single point of the landscape as if she’d just noticed something.

“What’s wrong?” I asked.

“What do you make of that?” Nemesis pointed at something, but I couldn’t see anything there.

“What do you see?” I asked.

“There’s a heat haze despite it not being hot,” she said. “Wait, is that... distorted space?”

Nemesis walked over to where she was pointing... and simply disappeared.

“...Huh?! Nemesis!” I called out, ran over to where she’d vanished, and passed through an invisible curtain.

I described it as a “curtain” simply because — even though there was some sort of resistance — it was extremely weak. Once I’d walked through the invisible curtain...

“...Huh?!”

...I was in a mysterious space that was neither dark nor bright, and didn’t even seem to have the concept of up and down.

The space was littered with countless blue, permeable windows and was already occupied by two familiar faces.

Once of them was Nemesis, who looked back at me as I confirmed that she was completely unharmed. “Master, this place is...”

The other person — no, the word “person” didn’t apply here.

“...Ohh? Why are you heere?”

The creature skillfully operating the windows was Cheshire — the control AI I’d met when I had begun playing Infinite Dendrogram.

◇

A few minutes had passed since we’d found ourselves in the mysterious space beyond the invisible curtain.

Nemesis and I were sitting in chairs and drinking the tea Cheshire had prepared for us.

As we had turned perplexed, Cheshire had said, “I’ll explain it all, but just standing around while I do that isn’t fun, riight?” and made the tea for us.

At first, this space had had nothing besides the windows — there hadn’t even been a floor — but Cheshire had reached into a pocket and taken out chairs and a table as if it was nothing.

It reminded me of that cartoon about a cat robot I had been watching since I was a child. Though, unlike that cat robot, Cheshire had a set of ears.

“So, what is a control AI doing here?” I asked.

“Preliminary arrangements for environmental maintenaance,” it answered. “The real work here will be done by control AIs numbers 3 and 5 — the ones responsible for monsters and the environmeent. This space is basically an impromptu operating rooom.”

Like a prefab used in construction sites, huh? I thought.

“Though, only we can see and enter these placees,” said Cheshire. “But the Embryo girl here seems to be a Maiden-type, and I guess things like this can happen with theem. She basically dragged you in here, didn’t she,

Raay?”

“What’s so different about Maidens?” I asked.

“They’re closer to us in some waays,” Cheshire answered. “They even keep the  functionalityy.”

Hm?

“What did you say just now?” I was perplexed.

“Oh, sorryy,” it apologized. “That’s information I can’t verbaliize. It’s nothing big, though, so don’t mind iit.”

That answer only left me with more questions, but the AI probably had some developer-set duty of confidentiality it had to protect. We were already behind the scenes, anyway.

I also had other things I wanted to ask, so I decided not to push it.

“So you’re gonna fix this area?” I inquired.

Infinite Dendrogram prioritized realism. That was the reason why places such as the Old Orchard could be invaded by bug monsters, but beginners’ hunting grounds such as the Noz Forest could be an exception.

However, Cheshire shook its head.

“Noo. We will not directly recreate the now-lost Noz Forest. However, we can arrange some factors that would allow it to take the form of a similar environment. My job is to prepare for thaat.”

Cheshire stopped speaking for a moment and took a sip of the black tea before continuing.

Not that it matters, but you’d think a cat wouldn’t be able to handle such a hot drink, I thought.

“This is a free world, after aall. We — the control AIs — will never undo the effects a creature’s autonomous actions have on this world — be they player, tian or monsteer. The results of freedom are none of our conceern. However, there are some exceptions. After all, we have a control AI meant for punishmeents.”

“Punishments?” I asked. “If PK is perfectly fine, then what is actually deserving of that?”

“Hmm... Getting on a country’s wanted list, I gueess,” Cheshire answered. “You know how this world has laws, right? However, when arrested, players easily can escape jail by simply logging out or killing themseelves. Neither the police nor the knights have any means of preventing thaat. That’s why we have a control AI operating a jail for players, nicknamed the ‘gaol.’ The AI also processes the player’s inability to use save points when on a wanted list.”

That makes sense, I thought. If getting arrested or receiving the death penalty were the only demerits to committing crimes, some would just go about repeating them.

“That’s part of the setting, tooo,” Cheshire continued. “‘A Master who has sinned and cannot return to a save point shall be transferred to the gaol,’ and all thaat. That’s why you should register on save points in as many countries as you caan.”

“...I have absolutely no intention of doing something that’d get me on wanted lists, though,” I commented.

“That’s good, tooo,” said Cheshire. “Well, even if you get on one, you won’t be sent to the gaol as long as you don’t diee.”

...This system sure is lenient on strong criminals, I thought.

“Hmm... If there are control AIs responsible for punishments... what are you responsible for, cat?” asked Nemesis.

“I’m the control AI handling chooores,” Cheshire answered.

Chores? I thought.

“We AIs also have things we’re good and bad aat,” Cheshire explained. “For example, I’m horrible at management functioons. Especially when it’s related to environment managemeent.”

“That’s not what you’re doing right now?” I asked.

“This is just a preliminary arrangemeent,” it answered. “A proper environmental simulation would include management of the cloud particles’ entropyy.”

I was silent. Just thinking about the scale of it gave me a headache.

Though I guess being able to do that is part of being a proper control AI, I thought. Well, Cheshire said it’s not capable of that, though.

“My primary work is to be the tutorial guiide,” it continued. “It’s work given to control AIs with unallocated calculation resourcees. I welcome half of the players coming heere.”

That sounded like an impressive amount.

“I’m doing the tutorial work right now, in faact. Like soo.” Upon saying that, Cheshire split into five.

Five, differently-patterned cats spoke while handling the windows around them.

"Like soo," said the first.

"But there's no reason to split in heere," said the second.

"Even if there's five of me, it doesn't affect my work speeed," said the third.

"After all, the calculation volume I use doesn't change at aall," said the fourth.

"In fact, it slightly increases the calculation time and slows me down," said the fifth. And thus, the five became one again.

I was silent again. All this talk about calculations had made me remember that we were in a game server. This might've the first time I'd been presented with a display of cyber technology.

"I get to handle the chores because I'm good at processing the splitting I just shoowed," said Cheshire.

"I see," I nodded. "So, if you take half of the newcomers, the other half is taken by other AIs, right?"

"Yees," it answered. "There's even an AI that doesn't allow you to redo your character's appearance after you set it once."

"...Yeah, I really think it should allow that," I said.

That might've been the control AI that my brother had been assigned to.

◇

After an approximately twenty-minute-long chat with Cheshire, we chose to take our leave.

"Not counting the welcoming, it's been so long since I met a person while being in this foorm," said Cheshire. "I'd love to present you with some souveniir... but since I'm part of development, that would be favoritism — a big no-noo."

"No need for that," I said. "The tea and sweets are more than enough. Thanks."

"Indeed," Nemesis agreed. "They were delicious."

...With how much she ate, a part of me feels like we're already in the "no-no" territory, I thought.

"Oh, my. Having you say that makes me feel like making them was really worth iit," said Cheshire.

Those cookies were handmade? I thought. That's unexpected. ...Okay, hold on now. How the hell can those cat hands make cookies?

"You should consider selling them on the market." said Nemesis.

"I'll think about iit," replied Cheshire. "Oh, right. You're heading to Gideon soon, aren't you, Ray?"

I'd talked a bit about that during the tea party.

"Yeah, I am," I said.

"...Take care noow." Cheshire's words seemed ominous.

"Is there something I should know?" I asked.

"There is, buut..." It seemed apprehensive about saying it.

Is it something it can't reveal? I thought.

"I'll just keep it in the safe range, theen: 'The demon's heart lies in its stomach.'"

"Hm?" I raised an eyebrow.

"That's aall," said Cheshire. "Though, it's not like you're guaranteed to meet iit."

Cheshire had given me a riddle... or a clue you'd find in a mystery novel. I couldn't tell.

...Well, guess I'll record it in my memo window, I thought and did exactly that.

"I don't know if we'll ever meet again, but if we do, then until next tiime," Cheshire waved goodbye.

"Yeah, see ya," I reciprocated.

We passed through the exit the cat had created and returned to the previous map. Beyond it was the same wasteland we'd been in before. When I asked Nemesis about it, she said that she could no longer see the entrance to Cheshire's workplace.

I looked at the time and found out that it was a bit past three o'clock in the afternoon. We had planned to meet Rook at four, so we still had enough time.

Nemesis and I made our way to the meeting spot — the facility known only as the Adventurer's Guild.

◇

Infinite Dendrogram had three types of quests a player could accept.

The first type was like the first quest I'd ever gotten — "random event quests.”

The second type was like one Rook did for his job — “job quests.”

The third type was “guild quests.” In other words, the ones received at a facility known as the “Adventurers’ Guild.”

Due to the word “guild,” some could confuse it with job guilds, but the quests were different in nature. The Adventurers’ Guild was a service that managed many and varied requests, such as elimination, escorting, collection, or miscellaneous matters. Once registered, anyone could accept quests, regardless of their job or even if they were Masters or tians.

Of course, I was no exception.

My level was decent, so I decided to continue progressing through the game while making some coin from the requests there.

Also, ever since we’d met, Rook and I had been talking about how cool it’d be to party up, so we decided to do that while taking on the same quest.

And so...

“...There are so many requests that I have no idea which one to choose,” I muttered.

“True...” Rook agreed.

Inside the Adventurers’ Guild, Rook and I were letting our heads lie on a round table as we both eyed a thick book... and honestly, I was tired beyond words.

The books we had were quest catalogs that displayed every request the guild had available.

It was magically enchanted to add new requests and remove taken ones in real-time, making the number of quests being displayed grow and drop without stop. Also, it didn’t display quests from a difficulty level the players couldn’t take.

To us, it displayed all quests up to difficulty level three, and apparently, access to levels four and higher was based on the amount of completed lower-level quests.

Despite the lack of requests we couldn’t see, the catalog was far too thick. It had approximately one thousand pages.

The catalog’s thickness, too, had been caused by the King of Destruction and other Superiors. Due to the King destroying Noz Forest, the amount of people wanting to escape the capital had increased. Not to mention that the emancipation of the roads leading to other cities had revitalized the trading routes. As a result, there was a great spike in requests for escorts that could protect those travelers.

The problem we were faced with, however, was that...

"...The rewards and difficulties for requests from those going to Gideon are so all over the place that I can't choose," I said.

"True..." Rook agreed.

There were dozens of escort quests where the destination was the city of duels — the place where we could find Figaro. However, there were requests that had different rewards despite having the same difficulty, and vice versa.

Since we couldn't accept any quests without thinking things through, the ones with favorable conditions often got picked by other people and disappeared from the catalog right as we were considering them.

"Also, escort quests aren't even appealing," I said.

"True..." Rook agreed.

The ones who took the escort quests had to protect the requesters for the entire journey. However, Rook and I were players. We had to log out every now and then, and we couldn't do any protection when we weren't in the game.

In the game's setting, we Masters got "sent to another world every now and then," and the tians were fully aware of that. Therefore, we players weren't suited for escort quests, so most of them were taken by tians. Though, there were some exceptions made for Masters of a particularly high level.

"Maybe we should look for quests where we have to kill or deliver something," I suggested. "Though the rewards would be smaller."

"True..." Rook agreed.

"...Rook, that's all you've been saying for a while now," I said.

"Oh, sorry," he said, finally speaking a different word. "Reading this made me remember some things..."

From the fact that he looked like a middle-schooler, I could only assume that he was remembering a time he'd studied for his exams.

"Father's handmade textbook was even thicker than this..." he mumbled as he went through the pages with an empty look in his eyes.

If Rook's face was really the same as it was in reality, he was of Western descent.

I guess the exam struggle is severe all around the world, I thought. The college entrance exams I had to go through were so damn hard...

"Hmm..."

"Mmm..."

Nemesis and Babi were intently looking at books, too. However, they weren't quest catalogs.

Nemesis was examining the bounty list, while Babi was staring at the guild's food and drink menu.

"Master," Nemesis spoke up. "It says here that those traveling on the road to Gideon sometimes encounter two boss monsters with bounties on them — King of the Wolf Pack, Lobohta and Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda. I hope we meet them."

"I'm not sure if I want to experience something so blatantly dangerous..." I replied.

"Hey, Rook," said Babi. "Don't you think that this Special Pudding a la Mode would be great with Death Sauce? Want to order it?"

"I don't think I want to experience something so blatantly dangerous..." Rook replied.

We shifted our attention away from their... disturbed suggestions and focused on our quest catalogs.

First of all, it was already set in stone that we would accept a quest we could do on the way to Gideon. Rook wanted to go there because the city of duels had a beast market.

On the subject of Rook, though... In our little information exchange, I had found out that — despite being twice the level I was — he had low stats. Though his MP and SP were higher than mine, I had double or more of every other stat.

It was less about me being a Paladin — a high-rank job — and more about Rook's Pimp being a low-stat job. A Pimp's playstyle seemed to be focused on a gamble — you either Charm or die.

At this point, I had absolutely no doubts that it was Rook's vocation. If not "Pimp," the only possible thing he could have been was "Angel."

"Master, get ahold of yourself," said Nemesis. "You're acting as though you're Charmed."

"W-Whoa," I said, and snapped out of it.

Of course, Rook wasn't using his Charm skill on me. He couldn't even if he wanted to, since it only worked on females. However, he was just so handsome that he made the mind drift away every now and then. Even the other adventurers in the guild were throwing glances at our table. Hell, some were downright staring.

Rook wasn't the only reason for that, though — both Nemesis and Babi were exceptionally beautiful, too. With three out of five of us here being so attractive, it was only natural to become the center of attention.

...Five? I thought.

"Man, it's been a while since I've visited the Adventurers' Guild. There's quite a large pile of quests today, huh?" Marie — the Journalist who sold us info about the PK incident — was sitting at our table.

...Okay, just how long have you been here? I thought. I could've sworn that we'd started with just me, Rook, Nemesis, and Babi. Do you Journalists have some skill that allows you to sit at tables without getting noticed?

"Oh? Why are you here, Miss Marie?" asked Rook.

"I had business that involved going to Gideon, so I decided to pick up a quest I could do on the way and noticed you two talking about going to the duel city, too," answered Marie. "I figured that I simply had to join. May I come with you?"

Had to join, huh...? I thought.

"...Well, I don't really mind," I said. "What about you, Rook?"

"Same here," he answered. "In fact, having her join us would be reassuring."

"...That's true," I agreed.

It was going to be the first time Rook and I ever traveled to another town. Marie, on the other hand, had been as far as Huang He, so there was no doubt that she was used to long-distance journeys. That alone was enough to make her presence reassuring.

Marie joined us in looking through the quest catalog. "I found one that's named 'Elimination Request — Sauda Phantom Sheep,'" said Rook. "The reward is high, too."

"Oh, that one's no good," said Marie. "Though weak, Sauda Phantom Sheep are extremely hard to find. It would take you three days of searching."

"Elimination Request — Blue Lemmings. This one also has a nice reward," I said. "We'd have to kill a whole fifty of them, though."

"They're weak, mouse-like, easy-to-find monsters that come in flocks," Marie explained. "It should be eas—"

"No mice," said Rook.

"Rook?" I looked at him.

"No mice," he repeated himself.

"O-Okay..."

About ten minutes passed as we continued glaring at the catalog, when suddenly...

"Oh! What would you say to this one?" Marie pointed at a certain page.

Difficulty Level Two, Delivery Request — The Guild in Gideon, City of Duels.
Reward: 30,000 lir.
Please complete a delivery from the capital's Adventurers' Guild to the Guild in Gideon.
There is much to be delivered, so it is recommended that only those with a storage bag accept this quest.
You have three days to complete it.
P.S. If you take the delivery and run, we will send an assassin after you.

"This request is from the guild itself," Marie explained. "We only have to take the delivery to the other guild, so it's nothing complicated. The reward is good, too, so it's a really nice deal overall."

...The P.S. is a bit questionable, but I guess there's no need to worry about it if we play it fair, I thought.

"I'm up for this quest. What about you, Rook?" I asked.

"Yes, it seems agreeable," he answered.

"Then it's decided," said Nemesis.

"Already? I didn't get to eat my pudding yet," Babi complained.

Everyone replied in their own way.

Whatever the case, we had chosen the first quest we would do as a party.

"With that settled, you go on and accept it, Ray." said Marie.

"Hm? But you're the one found it, so shouldn't you be the one to do it?" I asked.

"When several people accept the same quest, the proper procedure is to create a party and have a representative go through the acceptance process," she explained. "That involves the representative writing down his main job."

"Which means...?" I raised an eyebrow.

"The guild's receptionist wouldn't be too keen on giving the quest to a Journalist or a Pimp, right?" Marie elaborated.

She wasn't wrong. The request had come directly from the guild, so there was a chance that they wouldn't give it to anyone who was questionable in terms of ability. However, that would never apply to Paladins such as myself.

...But wait, my level is the lowest out of us three. Won't that be a problem? I thought.

"The first thing that comes up is your label, after all," said Rook. "I also think that you should be the one to do this, Ray."

First Marie, now Rook. They were both fine with it, so there was no reason for me not to do it.

I took the catalog to the guild's receptionist and showed her the page of the request we'd decided upon.

"Understood," she said. "Please give us your card and fill in this form."

I gave her my freshly-made Adventurers' Guild member card and filled in all the fields I had to.

"We have processed your acceptance of this quest," said the receptionist. "Please go to that counter and retrieve the items."

Doing as I was told, I went to take the delivery and placed it into my storage bag.

With that, the preparations were done and we officially had a guild quest — a new step in our Dendro career.

Difficulty Level Two, Delivery Request — The Guild in Gideon, City of Duels.

Our destination was obvious.

And so, we began the quest.

◆◆◆

Kingdom of Altar, ???

Cheering.

Cheering as far as you could hear.

It represented nothing but delight.

Countless goblins were fiercely expressing their overwhelming joy.

It was all because they had seen some creatures. Though four-limbed — just like the goblins — they were different from them... for they were human.

The goblins hungered. These past few days, no humans had passed through their territory.

Thus, the goblins — with their love for human flesh and the things they hauled — had become hungry beyond words.

They survived by eating other monsters, but compared to the taste of humans and their food, those were simply unsatisfying.

Thus, the goblins were overjoyed.

The human traffic through this area used to be stopped by something at the mountain, and they couldn't be more pleased that it was revived. For, once again, they had access to the food they loved.

The strangely-dressed human that had recently gone through their territory was too scary for them, so they could have only waited for him to pass. However, the humans passing before them now weren't scary at all.

Thus, the humans themselves and the food they carried were nothing but a feast for them.

"Ghgheeeee!"

"Geghyaaaaahhh!"

Letting out their war cries, the goblins began running towards the carriage before them.

"Goblins?! Why are there so many...?!" shouted a human.

"Sir, this is too much for us to handle! Make the horses go as fast as they can!" roared another.

"A-All right!"

"We have to run, too!"

The merchant man increased the carriage's speed as the tian adventurers responsible for guarding him and his goods ran after it, trying not to fall behind.

They were fleet of foot, so it was obvious that the goblins wouldn't catch up.

Thus, the goblins roared. They roared out their cheer and delight.

"What are they doing?! Are they trying to threaten us?!" asked a human.

"Ignore them! Just keep on running away!" howled another.

The goblins weren't threatening them. They might've done that before an enemy, but when faced with food, such acts were meaningless. They were simply calling.

"Ha ha, looks like we escaped... Huh?"

A moment later, the merchant — along with his carriage — was crushed by something that fell from the sky.

As the something trampled on the corpse — now reduced to fruit-like mush — it faced the nearby adventurers.

"Wh-Wha?!"

"I-Is this actually... the UBM... Gar—"

They weren't even given the time to say anything coherent.

The something before them and the goblins that had caught up quickly overwhelmed them all.

"GOOOAAAAAHHHHH!"

And so, after a satiating feast, the something and the horde of goblins returned to their den.

All of them were full of excitement for the next time they'd become hungry and have another feast pass their territory.

◆

The area's name was "Nex Plains."

It was south of Sauda Mountain Pass and north of Gideon, city of duels.

...And anyone making their way to Gideon would simply have to pass through it.

Chapter Seven: The Ordeal of Rookies

In Royal Capital Altea, in the front of the Adventurer's guild — Paladin Ray Starling.

After we had taken the quest at the adventurer's guild and began getting ready to go to Gideon, Rook spoke up and raised his right hand.

"You can leave the means of travel to me," he said. There was a pale, gem-like object on his hand.

"What's that?" I asked.

"It's a 'Jewel' — an item where you keep your monsters," he answered. "It's the reward I got for my modeling."

Rook began explaining. In the process, he also answered a certain question I'd had while looking at his skills.

Being a Pimp, he had a skill that strengthened his underlings, and seeing that had made me curious about what happened to them outside of battle.

Since we were players, we would return to reality every now and then. Thus, I wondered what his little minions would do while we were away. I was saddened by the very idea of a player who stopped playing after having left some monsters or slaves in a cage or something.

Such problems were solved by Jewels, such as the one Rook had.

Jewels were basically the animal version of the item boxes we always used. It allowed the storage of any underlings you owned, and it was possible to set it so that time inside wouldn't flow at all.

The storage would work even while the player was logged out, and if they didn't log in for two months of real time or half a year of game time, the Jewels would automatically release the creatures inside.

I see, I thought. Having underlings in such a realistic world would be really difficult without these things.

Well, there was a need to feed and have them rest outside the Jewel, but that was all part and parcel of being an underling owner.

It was also possible to make the time inside the Jewel go on as normal. Logging out while the underlings were released was an option, too. However, while being outside, the underlings could always get into some sort of trouble, so whether it would be done or not depended entirely on the owner.

"So, you already have a monster in there, huh?" I asked as I pointed at the Jewel.

"Yes," Rook answered. "Mr. Grantzian told me choose one reward out of a few, but since I had a skill that strengthened monsters, I chose this one."

Pimp was a job that had a low combat ability, but compensated for it with the use of monsters, so that had been the right choice to make.

"Let me show you," said Rook. "'Call' — Marilyn."

Following his words and the unique roar, the Jewel began to shine.

"MMHOOOOOO!"

And, sure enough, a monster named "Marilyn" appeared before us, but...

"...Marilyn?" I raised an eyebrow.

...it was arguable whether the name "Marilyn" was appropriate.

A succinct description of Marilyn would go as such: a triceratops pulling a carriage. Its gigantic body was covered in a blue, solid shell, while its back and shoulders could easily be compared to heavy armor. The very real horns on its head were intimidating enough to make me feel as though they could topple the castle walls.

It was far too obvious that the monster was stronger than us. The thing could even put up a fight against a Demi-Dragon Worm.

Hell, I wouldn't even be surprised if it came out on top, I thought.

"This is Marilyn — a Trihorn Demi-Dragon," Rook introduced the monster. "The dragon carriage came as a bonus."

"Demi-Dragon?" Seriously? I thought. It actually is on the same tier as the worms, then. That name has some serious power behind it.

I was momentarily taken aback by the fact that you could get such a thing as a reward, but since the difficulty of the quest had been higher than the one where I'd saved Milianne, it wasn't that strange.

"Why 'Marilyn,' though?" I asked.

"It's a girl, so I named her after a famous actress," Rook answered.

I see. It's a girl, huh? I guess it's all fine, then, I thought. ...Marilyn Monroe might or might not be turning in her grave right now.

"Wow, what a sight!" Marie commented. "Though, something this strong might exceed your Minion Capacity."

"Minion Capacity?" Rook and I asked simultaneously.

"Oh, let me explain it, then." Marie reached into her item box, took out a sketchbook-like item, and began her explanation while drawing something on it.

A sketchbook? I thought. Why does she even have something like that? Is it because she's a Journalist?

"First of all, in Infinite Dendrogram, the maximum number of people you can fit in a party is six." Marie finished drawing and showed us the result — little chibi versions of me, Rook and herself. All the detail on them made the drawings seem strangely high-quality.

"In our case, three of those slots are already taken," she said. "Now, the other three slots can be taken by tamed monsters or Guardian-type Embryos." Marie added chibi versions of Babi and Marilyn.

"You say they 'can' be taken... Does that mean it's possible to make the monsters fight without doing that?" asked Rook.

"Yes," she answered. "It's possible to not count them as party members and instead treat them as an extension of the owner's power. That's where Minion Capacity comes in."

Underneath Rook's picture, Marie drew a small tree diagram that led to Babi and Marilyn.

"With this method, they won't use party slots, but there is a limit to it," she said. "Minion Capacity is basically the name for that limit."

“I see,” I nodded.

“Open your status screen and look at the additional entries.”

I did as she’d said and took a look at the auxiliary screen. Sure enough, I saw an entry that said “Minion Capacity 0/50.”

“Is this it?” I asked.

“Yes, monsters that fit the Capacity can be used as part of your own power,” she explained. “The amount of the Capacity taken depends entirely on the individual monster. For example, one level 1 Little Goblin would take 1 point.” That meant that I could control a total of fifty level 1 Little Goblins. A nice number, but questionable overall. I could just picture them all getting blown away by a single area attack.

“My Capacity is 500, so I can own five hundred of them,” said Rook.

That’s ten times more than mine, I thought.

“Pimp is a job with a high Capacity,” Marie said. “Though, Ray, since your job is in the knight grouping, you will have to use mounts, so I think that your Capacity is above the high-rank class average.”

Mounts, huh? I thought. I should get one of those someday.

“Anyway, I see how it works now...” I said.

If it was impossible to call your monsters without using party slots, jobs such as Tamer and Pimp — both of which had low base fighting ability — would have a hard time getting into parties. With the use of Capacity instead, they could count their monsters as part of their own power, making them no worse — if not better — than any other job.

“What happens if you exceed the Capacity?” I asked.

“You get a limit on your abilities and stop gaining XP,” she answered.

That’s quite a huge demerit, I thought.

“Miss Marilyn here is too much for your Capacity, Rook,” said Marie. “Demi-Dragons are strong and have a cost that represents that.”

If I had to choose between fighting 500 Little Goblins or one Demi-Dragon Worm, I’d pick the former without a moment’s hesitation, I thought. That’s just how much stronger the latter option is.

“With that in mind, let’s place Marilyn in the party,” Marie suggested. “There aren’t many of us, so we have some free slots, after all.”

“Hey, I have a question! What’s my cost?” asked Babi.

“An Embryo’s cost is always 0,” she answered. “If it weren’t, then Masters who evolved Guardian-type Embryos wouldn’t be able to draw out their full potential.”

That was true.

“Well, that sure took a while to explain. Now, let’s return to the matter at hand,” Marie continued. “By riding Marilyn’s dragon carriage, we could reach Gideon in about one whole day.”

“Then I guess we’ll have to give up on doing it now and depart tomorrow morning, instead,” I said. “Do you two have any plans?”

I was referring to real-life stuff. Our journey to Gideon would take us a total of three days, which meant that we’d have to dedicate an entire real-life day to this.

“Not really,” said Rook. “I’ll be free the whole time.”

“Same here,” said Marie. “I’m jobless right now.”

...I’m having trouble figuring out if I should laugh at that or not, I thought.

◇

The next day, we were riding Marilyn’s dragon carriage on the road to Gideon.

The road was wide enough to let two Marilyns ride side-by-side without any problems. Her size had made me wonder if she would block the road, but my worries seemed to have been completely unfounded.

Marilyn’s walking speed was greater than I’d expected, too. She could pull the dragon carriage uphill without even the slightest drop in speed, which reminded me of four-wheel drive off-road cars.

Looks like our journey to Gideon will be smooth, I thought.

Although we had to take care of the occasional monster attack, so it wasn’t like we could get there without stopping. However, since we were going through a newbies’ hunting ground, the monsters never attacked us in large groups. The most we’d had to fend off at once was three.

In fact, Rook, Babi, and I had just defeated such a group. Marie, meanwhile, stayed sitting in the dragon carriage and cheering for us while sipping on some tea. There were things to be said about this setup. Still, she wasn’t doing nothing without reason. Honestly, it was my own fault for not asking her about it beforehand.

“Journalist” wasn’t a battle job in any sense of the term. However, Journalists had a characteristic skill called “The Pen is Mightier than the Sword,” which increased the XP gain of the entire party in exchange for rendering the Journalist unable to fight. The skill couldn’t be turned off, either. With that in mind, it was safe to conclude that Journalists were like a decoration that were of absolutely no use in battle.

Sure, I appreciated the bonus XP. And yes, we were going through a newbies’ hunting ground, so the enemies weren’t something we couldn’t handle ourselves. She was also more knowledgeable than us. The advice she gave was useful, and her monster info was accurate.

Still, I can’t help but feel that... well, whatever, I thought.

“The skill is called ‘The Pen is Mightier than the Sword,’ so I was expecting it to be an attack with a pen,” said Nemesis.

“That saying’s meaning isn’t physical,” I said.

Though I wouldn’t be surprised if this world had a pen that was stronger than a sword, I thought.

All the same, the journey was going smoothly. Due to the XP bonus, both Rook and I had already gotten some levels. I was now level 16, while Rook was level 27.

The battles were coming and going in a satisfying manner, and it didn’t look like we’d have any trouble with the monsters of this level range.

Speaking of “no trouble,” the mountain pass before us had once been blocked by a bear-like monster. Just from appearance alone, it had seemed like the boss monster of this area. However, before we could even begin our fight with it, Marilyn — seemingly angry at it for blocking her way — had defeated the bear as if it wasn’t a big deal at all.

Rook had retrieved the drops, which had come in a “box,” so yes, it had been an actual boss monster. A boss’s loot was always a welcome thing. However, as a rule of thumb, boss monsters were always the most powerful creatures an area could offer.

And it sure didn’t seem like that when Marilyn handled him, I thought.

Another thing to note was that most boss monsters were multiple-of-a-kind and took part in the ecosystem, but according to Marie, there were some monsters that were unlike any other. They were called UBMs — Unique Boss Monsters.

All of them — without exception — were equipped with special abilities, and some were even powerful enough to eliminate high-rank parties without much difficulty. However, since they were one-of-a-kind, even encountering them was rare.

Once out of the wavy Sauda Mountain Pass, we entered an area of nothing but wide plains. The area was named “Nex Fields,” and the road leading through it was supposed to take us to Gideon.

As we all were thinking about just how smooth of a journey this was, something entered our vision.

On the road ahead, there were several carriages which looked like they belonged to peddlers. They were all under attack by a throng of goblins that easily numbered more than a hundred.

◇

The goblins in this horde had a significantly better physique than the Little Goblins Rook and I had fought back on Easter Plains.

While the standard Little Goblin was about half my size, the ones here reached approximately 80%. Not only that, but they also wielded swords and bows, and were clad in proper armor. Some of them were even riding some small monsters resembling carnivorous dinosaurs. The names above them — Goblin Warrior, Goblin Archer, and Goblin Rider — made it all the more obvious that they were superior to the ones we were familiar with.

And a proper throng of them was attacking the peddler carriages.

I could see some tian-looking people try to fend them off, but alas, the numbers were against them.

“...That sure is a lot of goblins. And it seems like every single one of them is stronger than the monsters in the Mountain Pass. What shall we do?” Marie evaluated the enemy, asking whether we should join the battle or not.

I began to ponder. We were rookies, and calling us strong would be nothing but a mistake. Marie was a veteran, yes, but she couldn’t participate in any battles, not to mention the fact that the opposing force greatly would outnumber us even if she could.

We clearly had a low chance of victory. The safest option would be to turn around, retreat to the Mountain Pass, wait for the goblin horde to go away, and return on the path to Gideon then.

However, that would mean leaving the people there for dead. And that...

would leave a bad taste in my mouth.

“Rook, Marie,” I spoke up. “We might get the death penalty and fail the quest because of it, but...”

...if you guys don’t mind that, then...

“Let’s do it,” Rook said before I could finish. Then he freed Marilyn from the dragon carriage...

“Run them over.”

...and set her on the goblins.

“MMHOOOOOOO!” she roared and burst into a dash.

Keeping her three horns at the forefront, Marilyn charged into the goblin throng with all she had. Once they noticed the presence of something other than the carriages — their prey — it was already too late. Nearly fourteen goblins got pulverized by Marilyn’s horns.

“Let’s go, Ray,” said Rook. “Marilyn might be strong, but that’s still too much for her alone.”

“...Yeah!” I agreed.

“I see.” Nemesis seemed to realize something. “Just like my unexpectedly fiery Master, this Rook fellow seems to have a dangerous side to him, too.”

“Mrrgh!” grumbled Babi. “No fair, Marilyn! I was with him first, so I’m supposed to do the most!”

Rook, Babi, and I all jumped through the space opened by Marilyn and began fighting the goblins around us.

“Hghaah!” I tightened my grip on Nemesis — who was already in her greatsword form — and swung her at the Goblin Warrior before me with all I had. The blade sank into the top of the Warrior’s shoulder, but the armor he wore made it stop after going only about ten centimeters.

“Ghghee!” The wound wasn’t fatal, so the Warrior still tried to swing his weapon at me.

“Then how about... this?!” I raised my greatsword upwards — lifting the Warrior along with it — and quickly swung it down to the ground. The momentum added to my attack made the Warrior — and his armor — split in half.

Thanks to the levels I’d gained recently, such feats weren’t particularly hard for me.

But it takes a while to do it, I thought. So next time, I’ll be aiming straight for the neck.

"Heh heh heh, what an aggressive battle," chortled Nemesis. "It's to my liking."

Well, someone seems to be having fun, I thought. I find it a bit strange that she can't handle zombies, but she's just fine with all this gore here.

"Behind you!" she warned me.

"...Whoa!" I turned around, swung my greatsword sideways and decapitated the Warrior that had tried to attack me from behind.

Sadly for him, having Nemesis at my side basically let me see from every direction. Being surrounded wasn't a big problem for me.

"What are you people?!" one of the escorts fighting to protect the carriages exclaimed.

I chose to make our explanation succinct.

"We're Masters heading to Gideon," I said. "We're here to help. That Demi-Dragon is with us, so don't attack it."

"I see! We will make sure not to harm it, then! Thank you for your help!" Convinced, he began telling his comrades about us.

With that, it was now established who was on whose side. Of course, since the only enemies were goblins and their mounts, simply telling them about Marilyn was more than enough. However, we were still seriously outnumbered.

Surrounded by goblins, Marilyn couldn't get enough speed to kill them as quickly as she had at the start. The carriage escorts were doing their best, but it still wasn't enough to make up for the difference in numbers.

Suddenly, I realized something. Rook and Babi weren't with us.

I looked around and found them both standing in one place.

That was all they were doing. Despite all the chaos around them, they were just standing there, back-to-back.

However, they soon began to move.

"Male..."

"Lilim..."

Rook extended his right hand... while Babi — her left...

"...Temptation!"

...and — while simultaneously saying that word — they motioned their hands as if beckoning something.

The next moment, a particularly fierce female Goblin Warrior decapitated the goblin next to her.

Another one — a Goblin Archer who seemed to have a commanding role — suddenly crushed the head of the mount he was riding on.

“Ghgheee?! Sis! W-What did you dooo?!”

“Captaain?!”

Screams, confusion, and — most important of all — chaos began to spread throughout the goblin army. The number of victims was increasing by the second. One after the other, goblins lost their minds and began attacking their own.

The Charmed goblins were attacking those who weren’t, while those who weren’t Charmed were hesitant about fighting back and could only get Charmed themselves or simply die.

The damage done to the horde increased exponentially, and when all the goblins were either dead or Charmed...

“Lilim Draaain!”

...Babi started draining the life out of every single Charmed goblin.

The process made some of them come back to their senses, but just like before, they either got killed by the Charmed goblins or simply got Charmed again.

“Thank you for the meeaal!”

Considering just how hellish the situation was for the victims, the nonchalance in her voice was quite inappropriate. Nonetheless, those words were what marked the end of the battle.

The throng of goblins had been completely annihilated. Excluding those that had been defeated by me or the carriage escorts, all the goblin corpses had been either killed by their own or sucked dry to the point of making them look like mummies.

“In contrast to our counterattacks — which are effective against single bosses like those damn centipedes — their abilities are frighteningly good at exterminating large groups of vermin,” commented Nemesis.

She was right. Our strengths and theirs were strikingly different in nature. By using Charm, Rook and Babi had created scattered allies within the enemy ranks. That had rendered the enemies unable to focus their attacks, and had destroyed any semblance of cooperation they had.

As they had been trying to recover from that, the effects of Charm had spread and gotten even more of them on Rook’s side. Cue repeating downwards spiral. It was a nightmare scenario in any group-based battle.

"I'm glad he is not our enemy," said Nemesis.

I couldn't agree more.

The tian escorts and even peddlers in the carriages were shocked stiff at what Rook and Babi had just done. That was only natural.

We were fully aware that they weren't bad guys, but there was no arguing that what they had just done had been downright villainous.

Charm was scary — end of discussion. It reminded me of why I was afraid of Rocbouquet.

"This was the first time I've used it in battle, and I'm very glad it was useful," said Rook.

"It wasn't very tasty, but I'm sooo stuffed right now!" declared Babi.

The fact that they are a Master with a low-rank job and his first form Embryo makes me dread imagining how they'll be in the future, I thought.

"Ah! Rook, Rook! I have a new skill! I reached my second form!" Babi squealed.

"Really?!" he exclaimed.

And that was exactly when I heard them say that.

Although her appearance didn't change, this battle — or rather, "extermination"— had caused Babi to evolve. That wasn't unexpected, considering just how many goblins there had been.

I looked at Rook's basic stats and saw that he, too, was quite a bit over level 30 now. I, however, was level 20.

"Congratulations," I said to Rook.

"Thank you!" he replied. "So, Babi, what kind of skill did you get?"

"Umm... It's called 'Drain Learning!'"

Rook took a look at his Embryo window and examined the new skill. He let me have a gander, too, so I read its description.

It said "Gives a low (1%) chance to learn a random skill from the monster being drained."

"...Learning, eh?" I said to myself. It was much like the blue magic from that famous RPG series. Basically, it allowed the user to learn and utilize the skills of enemy monsters.

In Babi's case, the chance of that happening was a mere 1%. However, if my calculations were correct, that meant that she had a greater than 60% chance to get a new skill after draining a hundred times. Since there was no limit to the amount of skills one could have, it had the potential to be an extremely useful ability.

...I have a feeling she's gonna be really formidable in the future, I thought.

Suddenly, Nemesis sounded a groan that seemed really troubled. "Mmrgh..."

"What's wrong, Nemesis?" I asked.

"I feel like you and I didn't do much compared to them, and I find that a bit troubling," she answered.

"...Come on, now. No one cares about that," I said.

Well, it was true that we hadn't gotten to be particularly valuable players since we'd defeated that one Demi-Dragon Worm. We'd even died once. Then again, if all we ever faced were beasts such as the Superior Killer or Figaro, we would be dying all the time.

That's why it's all too bad when we don't get to show off, I thought.

And so, though it was likely unrelated to Nemesis' worries and my sentiments...

"GOOOAAAAAHHHHH!"

...something screamed and landed on the goblin corpse-littered battlefield.

No — the word "landed" wasn't appropriate, for it made the action seem soft. Something large — a demon — crashed down on the battlefield.

The demon's feet cracked open the ground — making it tremble — and yet the monster itself was unharmed.

In awe, I looked up at its daunting appearance.

It was monstrous in every sense of the word. I lacked the words to describe it. Most of it was brown and black in color. The horn on its head — combined with a stature that surpassed five meters in height — made it appear exactly the way I expected a demon to look. However, it had a feature that was wholly unnatural and nothing short of discomforting.

It had large mouths on its head and both of its shoulders. All of them were leaking a dark purple smoke, the very sight of which made a cold chill go down my spine.

Last but not least, the words "Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda" were hanging above it.

The intimidating presence of this "Gardranda" was enough to affect our reaction speed. Before we could even realize, it raised its right leg, crushed one of the escorts... and followed it up with a punch from its huge fist — directed straight at me.

"Counter... Absorption!"

Nemesis spawned the barrier of light just in time to stop Gardranda's fist from hitting me directly, which greatly lowered its damage.

Since she'd had experience in suddenly activating that skill, Nemesis was quick to react. That was about the only good thing about the current situation.

"This one has more power than those centipedes...!" she exclaimed.

"So it's actually above the Demi-Dragon Worms, huh?" I asked.

"Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda." This monster had both a title and a name.

I've never seen a monster with this kind of presentation before... I thought. Wait, wasn't his name on the bounty list Nemesis was reading yesterday?

"Ray! Rook! Be careful!" Marie — who was standing outside the battle — suddenly shouted to us. "That's a Unique Boss Monster!"

Her warning made me remember a certain bit of information I'd seen on the wiki.

UBM.

Just as it said in the name, it was a term that referred to boss monsters who were unique — unlike any other creatures in this world.

Standard boss monsters, such as the Demi-Dragon Worms, often came in groups. But UBMs were different. There was only one of each UBM in the entire world. No current UBMs have ever existed before, and no past UBMs would ever come again. All of them — without exception — were really powerful and even came equipped with their own unique abilities. In a way, they were like the "Masters" of the monster faction.

Thus, they were several tiers stronger than any bosses of the same level.

"Why would such a monster appear here...?" I couldn't help but ask. Considering the power of the goblins surrounding us, Gardranda was simply far too powerful to be here.

Wait... the goblins? I thought.

"I see how it is..." said Nemesis. "This demon is like the ringleader of the goblins. It came out because its subordinates were annihilated."

In other words, it had come here because we'd enraged it. However, there was something else on my mind.

I shifted my gaze and fell silent. My vision was fixed on a single corpse. It belonged to the carriage escort who'd been attacked at the same time I had. It was the same one I'd spoken to not too long ago.

His corpse — the body flattened by the demon — seemed somewhat inauthentic.

Obviously, I only felt that way because my experience with destroyed corpses didn't go beyond fiction. However, the extent of this world's realism was great enough to replicate the weight...

...the gravity of a lost life.

I had fought undead before and had caught glimpses of players vanishing into the dusk-veiled forestry as they were massacred by the Superior Killer. In fact, some of the escorts here had died at the hands of goblins before we'd joined the battle.

However, the one that had gotten pulverized by Gardranda was the first person that had died right before my eyes.

I was at a loss for words. I didn't know his name, nor was I aware of what kind of person he had been. I even had trouble remembering his face.

But... I'd been talking to him just a short while ago.

He was beyond helping now. This world wouldn't allow him to come back. He was simply dead.

"This'll leave a bad taste in my mouth..." I said with a palpable anger in my tone, and looked up at the demon's sizable frame.

I saw veins popping out and pulsating on its head. No — it wasn't just the head. That was happening on the skin around its shoulder-mouths, as well.

"It's releasing some sort of breath!" shouted Marie. "Back away from it!" I couldn't tell if her warning come too late or if it happened too fast.

With great intensity, Gardranda's three mouths simultaneously sprayed out a dark purple smoke.

"...Huh?!" I exclaimed.

It was somewhat reminiscent of insecticide. The sprays that instantly killed the irritating, buzzing pests we were all so familiar with. I had used such sprays myself, of course. However, I'd never once expected to have someone use something like that on me.

The poisonous breath was launched in three directions — at me, at Rook and Babi, and at Marilyn and the escorts — and it quickly covered us all.

The dark purple miasma didn't do any damage at first. However, it soon made me go dizzy and forced me to drop to my knees.

I looked at the status window, where I saw that I was under the effects of three debuffs — Poison, Intoxication, and Weakness.

Poison made my health gradually decrease, Intoxication made it hard for me to even stand up, while Weakness cut my stats to less than half their original value, making it so that even my gear felt heavy to me.

I shifted my gaze and saw that the escorts and peddlers were on the ground, as well.

Rook, however, was above us. Babi had raised him up before the miasma could reach him.

"Mh-mhoooooo...!"

I heard the familiar roar, but it was far weaker than before. Its source was Marilyn. She, too, was under the effects of the miasma's debuffs. And yet, she mustered all she had, pushed her feet on the ground, and charged towards Gardranda.

It was the very same charge that could trample fourteen goblins at once and even instantly pulverize lower level bosses, and yet...

"GOAAAAAHHHHHH!"

...Gardranda stopped it.

The demon extended its log-like arms and grabbed on to the outer two of Marilyn's three horns. Though it was pushed a few meters back, Gardranda was able to stop Marilyn's — a Demi-Dragon's — charge.

Then, the demon added a bit more power...

"GeeeeYYAAAAHHHH!"

...and threw Marilyn into the air.

Drawing an arc through the air, the several-tons beast flew about ten meters before hitting the ground with an unpleasantly strong sound.

"Marilyn!" Rook seemed slightly panicked.

"Mh, mhoo, mo..." Marilyn released a weak sound.

With the damage from the fall and all the debuffs weighing down on her, it was obvious that she was at her limit.

"Recall!" Rook's words made her return to the Jewel. Time stopped for the animals within it, so Marilyn was safe for now.

“Mrrgh! It’s not workiiing!” Babi had been trying to use Temptation on Gardranda for a while now, but since the demon’s level, MP, and SP were so high, Charm simply had no effect.

“Suitability, huh?” I whispered to myself. Rook and Babi weren’t cut out for boss battles.

If there was anyone here who was, however...

“Master!” In response to Nemesis’s shout, I shifted my attention back to Gardranda.

As I knelt there — barely mobile due to all the debuffs — the demon swung its right hand at me as if crushing a fly.

“Don’t underestimate me!” I forced my heavy body to move, swung Nemesis into Gardranda’s palm...

“Vengeance is Mine!”

...and activated the skill the very moment the sword landed.

The damage from the nullified Gardranda’s punch mixed with the HP I’d lost to Poison, got doubled, and made the demon’s right hand burst.

The attack tore the palm apart and made three of the fingers fly straight off.

“GUUUOOOAAHHHHH?!” Gardranda screamed in agony.

But the damage I’d done was low. Since the damage I’d accumulated from Gardranda at that point hadn’t been particularly great, Vengeance is Mine hadn’t done that much damage, either. Also, the attack on the palm had used up all the damage I’d accumulated by then. To use another Vengeance is Mine, I’d have to accumulate damage all over again.

“Ghh!” Following the attack, I swung Nemesis once again and launched a standard attack. However, it was a few tiers weaker than it usually was, and had none of its usual brilliance.

The reason for that was obvious. The debuffs were still affecting my body.

The Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda had both the physical power to let it throw something as heavy as Marilyn and the ability to weaken its opponents in three different ways.

The gradual HP reduction from Poison wasn’t much of a problem as long as I made sure to observe the HP bar. However, Intoxication paralyzed the semicircular canals and thus negatively affected my ability to control my body, while Weakness cut my stats by more than 50% and turned the most basic fighting into a struggle.

"This is bad..." I muttered. Damn it, my chances were low even without these debuffs.

Suddenly, Marie called to me from behind. "Ray!"

I turned around, expecting her to warn me about something, and instead got a glass bottle to hit me right on the face and shatter.

"Khah...!" I exclaimed.

"Master?!" Nemesis was confused, as well. As the impact made me throw my head backwards, I got showered by the bottle's shards and contents.

My pain settings were set to "off," so it didn't hurt at all, but I couldn't help but wonder what had brought this about.

Marie had the stance of a pitcher who had just thrown a ball, so it was pretty obvious that she had been the one who'd thrown it.

As I was about to yell at her for messing about during a battle, I noticed something.

"...I'm healed, and the debuffs are gone," I muttered. My HP was at 100%, and the three status effects were no longer on my status window.

What is this? I asked in my head.

"It's the Elixir I'd prepared just in case! With this, you should be immune to disease-based debuffs for the next 180 seconds! However, I don't have a spare, so use it well!" Marie explained.

Elixir? So that's what was in the bottle. Apparently, it's quite a powerful drug. However, with this...

"Looks like we're at our best again," I said.

"Indeed," agreed Nemesis. "With no debuffs hindering us, this Gardranda is the equivalent of one of those damn centipedes — except with hair."

With my current HP and defense, I could bear the demon's attacks, and if I could bear them — I had a chance of winning.

"For the poison, for Marilyn, and for those who died... you'll get what's coming to you, you demon bastard!" I brandished Nemesis and charged towards Gardranda.

The Elixir's effects would last for another 154 seconds. That was the amount of time I had before I returned to being vulnerable to Gardranda's miasma and got the three debuffs again. Thus, I had to settle it before that time expired.

“Rrraaaghhh!” I held the greatsword aloft and swung it at Gardranda’s knees. It cut through his skin and spilt some blood, but the wound wasn’t deep in the slightest. Though it bit through the skin and sunk into the muscle, it wasn’t even close to reaching the bone.

Even when I was at my best, my standard attacks weren’t good enough to do any proper damage to him.

My STR wasn’t particularly great, and though Nemesis might’ve been a great weapon when I’d been level 1, she was among the weaker ones now that I was level 20. If I tried to beat it with just my standard attacks, not even 1,500 seconds would be enough, let alone 150.

However...

“GUUOOOAAAHHHHH!” Gardranda retaliated with a kick, and I chose to let it hit me.

“Ghh...!” I got blasted away about seven meters, but was able to make a smooth landing.

Though it sent me flying, the attack didn’t hurt me all that much.

The damage it did was about 600. That was approximately a quarter of my total HP.

I was level 20. With the bonus HP I’d gotten for leveling up while being a Paladin, the bonus from my Embryo, and the skill “HP Increase,” my total HP had reached 2500.

One of my skills — Paladin’s Aegis — reduced all incoming damage, and my equipment was far better than it had been when I’d fought the Demi-Dragon Worm. Thus, a creature that hit a little bit harder than them could never kill me in one hit. And if I couldn’t die in one hit, I had the means to earn victory.

“First Heal!” I ran while casting my healing spell on myself and complemented it with a use of one of my Heal Potions. With that, my HP was almost back to full.

“Rrraaghh!”

Then I simply repeated what I’d done before. Attack. Get hit. Heal.

I merely had to repeat this for those 150 seconds. That was my only chance at winning.

One repetition took about twenty seconds and got me 600 damage, which became 660 when I considered the damage nullified by Paladin’s

Aegis. I could do it a total of seven times and gather 4620 damage. Vengeance is Mine would double that amount and damage for 9240.

Can you survive getting that hit on your head, you damn demon? I thought.

“That is our only optio— Master!”

As I calculated the remaining time and the damage I could gather, Nemesis called out to me. Being familiar with her tones, I instantly knew that it was a warning.

“Look above!” she shouted.

I quickly did as she told me. In the sky, hazy with Gardranda’s miasma...

“KIIIAAAAAAA!”

...I saw a large, crimson bird of prey as it dove towards me at high speed and readied its talons.

“Whoa!” I hastily jumped to the side, making the crimson gust go by me.

Seemingly annoyed due to failing to grab me, the bird of prey flapped its wings once and suddenly rose back up into the sky.

Before it completely got away, I caught a glimpse of the name displayed above it: “Crimson Roc Bird — Mount Owner: Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda.”

“A... a mount...?!” I stuttered.

The description made me realize something. When Gardranda had come here, he’d simply fallen from the sky. However, the demon had no means of flying or jumping particularly high, and these flat plains didn’t have any places that would give it the necessary height to make such an entrance. Thus, there was only one reasonable explanation: Gardranda had been brought here by something that could fly. And that something had been hanging above us ever since we’d started this battle.

“...This is bad,” I muttered. I was no longer able to focus on Gardranda.

The bird’s speed and physique made it obvious that it was quite a powerful monster. If I had to guess, I’d assume that it was just as strong — if not stronger — than the Demi-Dragon Worms. It could even grab me with its talons and drop me from a great height, rendering me completely unable to fight back.

This bird was a dangerous enemy, indeed.

However, if I kept focusing on trying to avoid it, the Elixir’s effects would wear off, and I'd no longer have any means of achieving victory.

"What do I do...?" I asked myself.

"Ray!" Before I could figure out how to handle the new enemy...

"We'll take care of the Roc Bird!" Rook shouted.

"I can fly, so leave it to me!" Babi called out to me.

"You just focus on Gardranda, Ray!" added Rook.

"But...!"

Rook and Babi couldn't do anything against a monster that powerful. It was probably immune to their Charm skills. Before I could tell that to them, Rook spoke up.

"We'll buy time until you defeat Gardranda!" he shouted.

"Yeah! So don't worry about us!" added Babi.

Holding Rook, Babi rose up and flew towards the Roc Bird. I silently watched them.

"Master," Nemesis spoke to me. "You are not thinking of letting their conviction go to waste, are you?"

"...Like hell," I replied. I brandished Nemesis and once again ran towards Gardranda.

The reason why I could continue fighting was because Marie had used her Elixir on me. The reason why I could focus on the fight was because Rook and Babi were holding back the Roc Bird. Nemesis and I weren't alone in this battle.

It wasn't like the time we'd been killed by the Superior Killer. I... no, we were fighting as a party.

"57 seconds left," I said. "By lowering our focus on healing, we can do this three, preferably four times."

"Let it be done, then!" Nemesis expressed her enthusiasm.

We ran, attacked Gardranda, got hit back, stood up, and ran again. It was to not waste the opportunity our comrades had given us... and to uplift our chances of victory. I didn't care how tattered I would become doing this.

Soon enough, we only had 10 seconds left.

"Nemesiiiis!" I shouted.

"Accumulated damage: 4973! We can do this!" she cried. "Master!"

Everything slotted into place when Gardranda hit us for the final time. I had less than half of my total HP, but I could still move. All that was left was to hit the demon with Vengeance is Mine.

I dashed towards Gardranda with the sole purpose of landing this lethal hit.

7 seconds left.

6 seconds. 5 seconds. 4 seconds.

“Guuuhhh— GHHAAAAAAAAGHHHH!”

We had only a few more steps to take until the demon was within our range.

That was the moment when the mouth on the head opened wide and released a crimson-red flame.

It wasn’t the miasma this time.

This breath was meant purely to damage anyone it touched.

All this time, Gardranda had been hiding this trump card from us, and there was no way I could survive a direct hit from those flames.

However...

“Take... it... all!” I shouted. “Counter Absorption!”

The barrier of light summoned by Nemesis stopped the purgatorial fire and absorbed the damage it did.

“Vengeance is... Mine!”

The attack carrying the doubled weight of the damage from Gardranda’s hits and fire completely pulverized the demon’s head and ended its life...

...or so it seemed.

The loss of its head made Gardranda turn silent. However, its body continued moving around and attacking me as though it was only natural.

“Huh?!” I exclaimed.

Despite losing its head — and brain — Gardranda swung its left arm at me, making it obvious that it simply didn’t care for the damage I’d done. And I — fresh out of my means of defense and tired due to having just used my most intense attack yet — was unable to evade the demon’s arm.

“...Gh!” It hit me head-on, sent me flying, and had me slipping on the ground for about ten meters after landing.

However — likely because Gardranda had lost its head — the damage it’d done wasn’t as great as before, and it didn’t kill me.

“First... Heal...” I stumbled to my feet while casting healing magic on myself.

However, the time was up. 180 seconds had passed since I’d been put under the effects of Elixir, and the effects were now gone.

The air around me was still thick with Gardranda's miasma, so I was instantly put under the effects of all three debuffs.

"Damn it..." I couldn't even fight properly in this state, yet the demon was still perfectly fine.

At least he can't see without his hea— my thought was cut short.

"Just how much of a monster are you?" I yelled, not expecting an answer. On both of Gardranda's shoulders — right above the mouths — appeared a gory orb — obviously an eye.

It didn't seem like the shoulder-eyes worked yet, but it was clear that they'd soon gain vision and let the demon see and kill me without much trouble.

"Why is this happening?! We clearly destroyed it!" shouted Nemesis in confusion. Our Vengeance is Mine attack had created an explosion with Gardranda's head at its center.

Naturally, the head was gone without a trace, and even its chest had a hole carved out of it in a semicircular shape.

It looks like we even got its heart, and yet...

"...Heart?" I felt something off about my words, that word in particular.

Suddenly, it came back to me.

I controlled my hands — shaking due to Intoxication — went to my menu, and opened my memo window.

There, I found the memo saying, "The demon's heart lies in its stomach. — Cheshire"

"...So that's what that meant," I muttered.

"Master?" Nemesis sounded confused.

Cheshire's words fit the situation perfectly.

The cat had probably known that I'd be facing Gardranda the moment I'd said that I was heading to Gideon. Cheshire had given me those words just in case I got into a situation such as this one.

Gardranda's heart — the core that governed all of its life functions — was in neither the head nor the chest, but the stomach. Thus, Gardranda wouldn't die until said "heart" was crushed.

To this demon, the head was nothing but another means of attacking. Even if I destroyed the remaining "faces" on the shoulders, Gardranda would continue to move as long as the core in its stomach was intact.

My previous attack should've been aimed at the stomach instead of the head.

But even if I figured that out, I'm all out of power to—

"...Like hell," I muttered.

"Out of power?" Who gives a damn? I thought fiercely.

Rook and Babi were still holding back the Roc Bird. Therefore, I — who had been entrusted with the role of defeating Gardranda — had no business giving up while they continued to struggle.

"Not yet..." I said, gritting my teeth.

I couldn't give up. Even if I couldn't move or if my stats were brought down to the gutter, giving up simply wasn't an option. I had to bear through it all for as long as I could and land another hit on Gardranda's stomach.

It wasn't a matter of whether I "could" or "couldn't." My friends had given me this role. They'd entrusted it to me. Thus, I would to do it even if it meant breaking through my limits.

I would grab hold of the chance of victory.

"If I can't do that much, I can't even dream of getting my revenge against the Superior Killer!" I said fiercely. Despite being on the verge of defeat, I gathered my resolve.

"Master!" Nemesis shouted.

"Nemesis, the odds are against us, but it's not over yet," I said to her. "You don't mind continuing this, right?"

"That goes without saying," she replied. "However, that's not what I want to say."

What?

"What do you make of this?" she asked.

On the corner of the windows I had opened, there was an unfamiliar red window.

[Master's life endangerment: confirmed]

[Master's intent to live: confirmed]

[Embryo Type: Maiden, "Maiden of Vengeance, Nemesis," accumulated XP — green]

[* execution available]

[Preparing * activation]

[If you wish to cancel, please do so within the next 20 seconds]

[Do you wish to cancel? Y/N]

What is this? I thought dumbly.

“Nemesis?” I addressed her, hoping for an explanation.

“I know nothing of it, either,” she said.

“What is this...?”

The window was red, making it seem much like a warning.

From the text, it was obvious that it was related to Nemesis. However, the most important part of it seemed to be corrupted — no, my head couldn’t even process it as proper language.

What, exactly, did it mean?

I silently watched as the countdown’s timer continued to go down. When it hit 10 seconds, I began to worry, and reached towards the window with the intention to stop it...

“CUUAAAAGGHHHHHH!”

...but before I could complete the motion, Gardranda’s shoulder-eyes became able to see, and the demon charged at me while roaring from its shoulder-mouths.

“Why now, of all times...?!” I shouted.

The timer on the red window before me was going down as Gardranda got closer to me by the second.

I was left with no choice but to ignore the window and face the demon.

However, with Weakness reducing my stats and Intoxication making it hard for me to move, brandishing Nemesis was about all I could do.

I have to use my defense and healing to create another opportunity to use Vengeance is Mine, and...

[Countdown Complete]

[Acknowledged intent to initiate the emergency evolution process via * protocol]

[Examining the 172 patterns made available by the accumulated XP and calculating the optimal solution to the current situation]

[Target Embryo: “Maiden of Vengeance, Nemesis.” Initiating emergency evolution via *]

[To reduce load, the interval until the next evolution will be extended]

Right after I saw that message, Nemesis lost her physical integrity and was reduced to floating particles.

“Eh...?” I gasped.

That was the exact same phenomenon that had always happened whenever Nemesis transformed from her human form to her greatsword form. This time, however, she neither returned to her humanoid shape, nor did she become a sword again. Instead, the particles whirled around my surroundings.

"CAAAAAAGGHHHHH!"

As I became unable to process the situation, Gardranda only continued to get closer to me.

[* complete]

Not giving me a moment to understand anything, the window output displayed a new line.

[Form 2: "The Flag Halberd"]

Nemesis's particles whirled around me and began to gather in my hand.

After having turned to floating grains of light, Nemesis returned to me in a completely different form than before.

"Jump, Master!" It was her voice.

I hastily listened to what she said, kicked my feet off the ground... and left Gardranda a long distance away from me.

"Huh?!" a voice of surprise escaped my lips. Before I realized it, I had jumped a whole twenty meters.

The surprise was aimed at both my unbelievable jumping power and the fact that...

...Nemesis wasn't human.

Nor was she a greatsword.

She was a spear.

Though, since she had an axe popping out from one end of her grip, the word "halberd" was more apt.

The part opposite of the axe blade was leaving a trail of black light, making the whole of her look somewhat like a battle flag.

I looked at the equipment window and saw the name "The Flag Halberd."

"Nemesis... what happened to you?" I couldn't help but ask.

"I'm not sure I'm able to answer that question," she replied. "I happened to become like this before I could even realize it."

I guess she was unconscious while she was turned into particles, I thought.

"However, there is one thing I'm certain of," she continued.

"And that is?" I asked.

"I've evolved into my second form," Nemesis revealed. "The power inside me is greater than ever."

Evolution.

That was the primary feature of every Embryo — the function that gave them powers from infinite patterns.

The red window had also said something about "emergency evolution."

Is that how it normally goes? I asked myself. It didn't seem that way when Rook's Babi evolved, though...

"...Well, this ain't the best time to think about this, anyway," I muttered. I had to focus on only one thing right now.

"COOAAAGHHH!"

After having lost sight of me once, Gardranda noticed me again and roared with both of its shoulder-mouths.

"By the way, Nemesis," I said.

"What is it, Master?" Nemesis replied.

"You said that your power is 'greater than ever'... to what extent, though?”

I could almost see her put up an intrepid smile.

“Enough to make it possible for us to defeat that damn demon,” she answered.

“Perfect,” I smiled. The possibility was there.

The fact that she’d only said that it was “possible” made me remember the first time we’d met. However, that was all I really needed. If the possibility of us winning was there...

...then, for the sake of Rook, Babi, Marie, and the tians in danger of dying...

...we only had to bet on that possibility and give it all we had.

“Let’s do this, Gardranda,” I said.

Since Gardranda’s appearance after we’d annihilated the goblins, the demon had possessed the upper hand, it had even been able to corner us after getting its head smashed. But now, we had a new way of achieving victory.

I know how you work, I thought. I’ll end it soon.

I brandished The Flag Halberd above my head and roared at the headless demon. “This... is the final round!”

After spinning the halberd above my head, I charged at Gardranda.

Though Weakness was supposed to have lowered my stats, I was running much faster than I could have run while in my normal state. And though Intoxication was supposed to be making my vision turn dim, I felt like I could perceive far more than I ever could.

Gardranda attacked me with a swing from its right arm — the one with fewer fingers on the hand — but I was able to smoothly evade it and sink the halberd’s axe into the demon’s wrist as I did so.

My attack bit through the skin, sunk into the meat, and cleared its bone. I cleanly cut the demon’s hand off, causing crimson blood to burst from the wound.

“We’re doing well,” I said. It was obvious that her evolution had improved Nemesis’s stats and bonuses, but the difference between this and her previous form was just too great.

Yeah, I think we can handle this... Oh, wait... I thought, and remembered something.

I was still under the effects of Poison.

If I’m not careful, my HP might decrease a whole lot, and... Huh?

“...we’re doing way too well,” I muttered.

Though Poison was supposed to be gradually lowering my HP, it was actually going up instead.

The increase in my physical ability, the clarity in my sensations, and the continuous HP regeneration. It was as though the debuffs had been reversed.

“I see, so this is your...” I said slowly.

“Indeed,” said Nemesis. “This is my new skill: ‘Like a Flag Flying the Reversal.’”

Nemesis opened a window that showed the skill’s name and described what it did.

Basically, it reversed the effects of debuffs received from an opponent.

Instead of dealing continuous damage, Poison healed me.

Instead of lowering my stats, Weakness increased them.

Instead of paralyzing my senses, Intoxication made them clearer.

“Like a Flag Flying the Reversal” was a buff skill that reversed all and any afflictions that affected me.

“It’s quite ideal for this situation,” said Nemesis. “It honestly seems a bit overly-convenient.”

“...You’re not wrong there,” I said. “However...”

According to the message on that red window, out of the possibilities available to her, Nemesis had been equipped with the “optimal solution.” However, that message had merely described what happened.

For some reason or another, I was convinced that I was the one who’d summoned this result. Regardless, this skill made it possible for me to find a way out of this situation... It was much like the first time Nemesis and I had met.

Thus...

“For now... I’m betting it all on this possibility!” I shouted.

“Then we are of the same mind!” she called back.

Nemesis and I released a battle cry as I made my way through Gardranda’s arm attacks and continued chopping away at the demon.

The three debuffs it had given me had originally been simply the worst. However, now they were making me stronger and closing the power gap between me and Gardranda.

I was effectively buffed with HP recovery, perception, and physical strengthening, while the demon had lost its head and practically had its miasma's ability completely negated. Our power balance was now equal — no, in fact, it had been reversed.

"CUUUOAAAGGGHHH!"

Seemingly upset at this turn-around, Gardranda began randomly releasing miasma in every direction.

However, to me and Nemesis, those fumes were nothing but a smokescreen.

"Rraagh!"

As Gardranda continued to release the miasma, I pierced into its stomach. The Flag Halberd dug through the demon's meat and touched the weak spot — the core — within it.

"CEEEAAAAGHH...!" Gardranda roared out in anguish. That was proof enough that the stomach was where I had to aim.

However...

"It's regenerating!" Nemesis shouted.

The wound I had just given it disappeared with a dark purple smoke.

"Hah," chuckled Nemesis. "It appears that only the weak spot is protected by regeneration."

"That means it'd take us forever to defeat it if we relied only on weak attacks," I said.

"It's not like we can keep fighting for particularly long, anyway," she said.

I knew exactly what Nemesis meant by that. Due to the effects of Like a Flag Flying the Reversal, my HP was continuously regenerating. However, my SP only continued to decrease. That was the cost of keeping the skill active.

Compared to my HP, my SP wasn't particularly high. It wouldn't last for long. Thus, I had to figure out what I had to do to win.

Upon considering the regenerating core, the limited amount of time and our abilities...

...there was only one answer.

"I have to stop evading and simply let him hit me," I said.

"Nothing else would work," agreed Nemesis.

I would accumulate the damage the demon did to me and hit it with another Vengeance is Mine. This time, however, it would go straight to the weak spot in the stomach.

"There is something to keep in mind, though," said Nemesis.

"What is it?" I asked.

"This form doesn't allow the use of Counter Absorption and Vengeance is Mine," she answered.

"We're already out of Absorption uses, anyway," I said.

"No," she said, refuting that statement. "My evolution increased its stock to three, so there's one more use left. However, just as Reversal can only be used by The Flag Halberd, those two can only be used when I'm in my greatsword form."

Basically, to use Vengeance is Mine, I had to change The Flag Halberd into the greatsword. That meant losing the effects of Like a Flag Flying the Reversal.

To be able to land a clean, lethal hit while under the effects of the debuffs... I have to kill its mobility! I thought.

"Nemesis, let's go for the legs!" I shouted.

"Understood!"

I swung The Flag Halberd and repeatedly damaged Gardranda's ankles.

The demon retaliated with swings from its arms, but I simply let them hit me.

Naturally, I got damaged, but the reversed Poison quickly healed me back to full health.

Things were going much like they had when I'd been under the effects of the Elixir. Except — thanks to the continuous regeneration — I could attack, get hit, and heal much more smoothly than before.

"...3250... 3784."

As I listened to Nemesis speak the amount of damage I had gathered, I looked at the edge of my status window and checked on my SP.

53... 52... The amount of time I could keep the Reversal active was already below one minute.

"...4265, Master!" she called.

All right, I'm betting it all on this!

"Hhaaaagh!"

I dashed through the miasma — which was nothing but a smokescreen to me — dove right next to where Gardranda was standing, gathered my resolve, and horizontally swung The Flag Halberd at the demon's legs.

Both of its tendons had been severely damaged by my attacks up to that point, so with that deadly swing, the ax-head split both of them apart.

"CUEEEEEEEGHHH!!" Gardranda screamed and fell to its knees, making the ground tremble.

"Do it now, Nemesis!" I shouted.

"Form Shift — Black Blade!" she called. Her command made The Flag Halberd lose its integrity and scatter into particles of light, which soon gathered once more to create the familiar black greatsword.

At that very moment, I was put under the effects of the three debuffs. However, it didn't matter anymore. I only had to land my final attack.

As my legs were shaking due to Intoxication, I dashed towards the demon. Gardranda was still kneeling, and when I raised my sword and readied myself to strike...

...I noticed something.

The dark purple miasma smokescreen was hindering my vision. However, it did nothing to hide the fact that both of the demon's shoulders were emitting a bright red light.

"CHHHHGHAAAAHH!"

Deadly flames.

They weren't limited to the head I'd destroyed — Gardranda could release them from its shoulder-mouths, too.

However, I refused to stop.

"Counter Absorption!" Nemesis spawned the third barrier of light — the one she'd gained from evolving. It stopped the flames and absorbed the damage they were meant to do.

Though it was unnecessary, that made the damage I'd accumulated reach the greatest amount ever.

I couldn't be more certain that I had it in the bag.

"Now, Master!" she called.

Once I passed the flames, the barrier of light dispersed.

Finally, I began to swing my sword at Gardranda's stomach...

"CHHHGHAAAAHH!"

...and was suddenly faced with the demon's left shoulder-mouth, ready to spit more fire.

"What...?!" I gasped.

“Huh...?!” Nemesis exclaimed, as we realized that Gardranda had actually learned something from the battle up till now. The demon had used the lethal flames from both its shoulder-mouths separately...

...just for the sake of getting past Nemesis’s Counter Absorption.

All the miasma it had previously released hadn’t been meaningless, either — it was a preparatory action meant to render us unable to see that the demon had separated the flame bursts.

“Master!” shouted Nemesis.

I was already swinging the sword.

The blade was slicing through the air for the sole purpose of striking Gardranda’s stomach with Vengeance is Mine. Even with the debuffs, I could land the hit in a mere three seconds. However, the demonic flames would reach me faster.

As if on the verge of death, I began seeing the world in slow-motion.

The left shoulder-mouth opened wide and was about to bathe me in flame. “Gyaghghghghghgh!”

But before it could do so, something resembling a bullet broke through the miasmic veil and hit Gardranda’s left shoulder.

The familiar object exploded and the demon’s left shoulder — when caught in the burst — blew up before it could release its fires.

The moment the heat waves caressed my cheeks...

“Vengeance is Mine!”

...Nemesis and I shouted the name of the skill, landed the hit on Gardranda’s stomach, and pulverized its core.

Epilogue

Gardranda's body got split in half and fell to the ground with a loud thud before getting reduced to shining particles and vanishing like any other monster.

With the demon's disappearance, the lingering miasma began to fade, as well.

The dense fog vanished into the sunlight as if it was only natural.

[UBM, "Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda," was defeated]

[Selecting MVP]

[Ray Starling was selected as MVP]

[Ray Starling is presented with an MVP special reward — "Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda"]

The disappearance of the miasma and the system message made it clear that the battle was over.

I read the message while lying on the ground.

"It appears that... we've won," said Nemesis.

"Not yet!" I rejected that notion. Rook was still up high, fighting the Crimson Roc Bird.

I had to go help him...

"But Master! You still have the debuffs..."

I looked at my status summary and, sure enough, the three status effects were there. Poison was draining my health, while my MP and SP were at a perfect 0. However, the battle wasn't over yet.

I didn't mean just the Roc Bird, either. There was also the attack that had hit Gardranda before I'd destroyed it.

That was obviously the...

"Ray! Are you okay?!"

I turned to the source of the voice and saw Marie — who I hadn't seen since she gave me the Elixir — running up to me.

She was probably approaching me because the miasma was no longer there.

"Your status screen looks horrible," she said. "Give me a second."

Saying that, Marie reached for her inventory and took out a few medicine bottles. Unlike my inventory — which was bag-shaped — or Cheshire's — which was pocket-shaped — her inventory had the appearance of a wristband.

Some of the bottles she took out were HP potions, just like the ones I'd used. There were also some that had the labels "MP" and "SP."

"Here's some first aid for you," said Marie. "It would be great if I could also remove your debuffs, but I don't have anything that could treat Intoxication or Weakness... And I've already used up all the Antidotes I had..."

With those words, Marie looked at the people at the carriages, who had also been affected by the miasma.

Everyone — including the escorts — was down on the ground due to Intoxication and Weakness, but none of them had died of Poison.

From her words, it was safe to assume that Marie was the one who'd helped them.

"I had quite a lot of Antidotes, too," she said. "But there's a total of twelve people there, and treating them all required all I could give. Walking around and making people drink medicine made me feel like I'd switched my job to Pharmacist," she laughed.

Apparently, Marie had been doing her best to protect the people — the tians at the carriages — from dying.

"Heh..." I smirked a little bit.

"What? Why the smile?" she asked.

Whoa, did I really make it that apparent? I thought.

"Well, it's just that... you're pretty kind, aren't you?" I asked.

"I don't think that kindness has anything to do with that," Marie responded. "I just... wouldn't like it."

"Wouldn't like what?" I asked.

"When killed, we players only get the death penalty, so that's all okay, but tians don't come back to life, right?" she explained. "I simply don't like the idea of them being lost forever."

"...I know what you mean," I said. It was probably akin to the bad taste in my mouth I'd feel whenever tian deaths were involved.

Though she basically just said that player killing is okay, and as someone who was killed recently, I... wait...

"Marie, it just came back to me," I spoke up. "When looking around this place... did you happen to see the Superior Killer?"

"Oh! Yes yes! I almost forgot!" Realizing something, Marie put her hands together. "I saw him! The same man I saw in Noz Forest — the Superior Killer — fired at Gardranda's left shoulder! ...He left right after that, though."

So that thing was actually the Superior Killer's Embryo...

But why had he only shot the left shoulder? If his goal had been to kill Gardranda — a UBM — he'd surely have fired the same way he did when he killed me. With the way he'd gone about it, I could even assume that he'd helped me.

"One more thing about him..." Marie continued. "From the direction he disappeared into, I think it's fair to say that he's heading to Gideon."

"I see..." I said. If that was the case, I could expect to meet him again.

"Oh, are you healed?" asked Marie.

"Yeah," I replied. My stats had replenished while we were talking. Though my HP was still going down due to the Poison, my MP and SP were at max.

Nemesis changed into The Flag Halberd. However, unlike before, the skill Like a Flag Flying the Reversal didn't activate. It was probably because I'd defeated Gardranda — the source of the debuffs.

"Well, whatever," I said. "I can do just fine without the Reversal."

"Indeed," Nemesis agreed. "...By the way, Master."

"What?" I raised an eyebrow.

Nemesis raised the halberd's spearhead upwards...

"How, exactly, are you planning on joining an aerial battle?"

...and asked something that I'd completely failed to consider.

"..."

"..."

"..."

We all turned silent as I realized that there was nothing I could do.

Clearly, I didn't think this through, I thought. There was literally no way for me to assist them.

"Umm... how about hurling some rocks?" asked Marie.

"There's no way I can throw that high..." I said.

They were so high up that even the Roc Bird — with all its great wingspan — looked like a small point in the sky.

And Rook and Babi aren't visible at all... Oh! I thought and noticed something.

"They're coming down," said Marie.

The Roc Bird began to look bigger as it began losing altitude. However, something seemed wrong.

Instead of diving down at high speed — as it had when it'd attacked me — it was descending in a strangely gentle manner.

When the Roc Bird in my sight was large enough for me to make out its details, I finally realized what was up.

Rook — who was supposed to be fighting it — was riding it, instead.

The Roc Bird gently landed on the ground and let Rook dismount.

"Ray! Marie! Are you all right?!" he ran up to us.

"Yeah, we're fine, but... how about you? And where's Babi?" I asked.

"The battle exhausted her, so I had her return to me," Rook answered while showing the crest on his left hand.

"I see." I nodded and shifted my gaze to the bird. "And this is...?"

"Audrey!" he replied with enthusiasm.

"CAAAW!"

Audrey? I thought. Oh, I think I know what that refers to.

"So, does the fact that you've given it a name mean that..."

"Yes!" Rook said before I could finish the question. "I Charmed and successfully tamed her!"

Well, it was true that Rook's Male Temptation skill had a low chance of taming female monsters.

...So this thing's a girl, too, huh? I thought.

"Hey, wait..." I said. "I'm quite sure this bird is Gardranda's mount."

"The Charm skill didn't have an effect on her at first, but it suddenly started to work when the miasma cleared," he explained.

That was basically the moment when I'd defeated Gardranda.

So, with the demon's death, Audrey had no longer been a mount, making the difficulty in Charming and taming her drop significantly.

I looked and saw Audrey rubbing her wings on Rook's back...

Is that some sort of courtship behavior? I thought. Whatever the case, she seemed to be quite attached to him.

I also felt that the name “Audrey” fit her far better than “Marilyn” fit the Trihorn. Though, for all I know, Audrey Hepburn might also be turning in her grave right now.

“The miasma was too thick for me to see what was going on, so I was pretty worried about you guys,” said Rook.

“Well, as you can see, we won,” I stated. “It’s all thanks to you guys.”

“And me, of course!” Nemesis interjected.

“I know that much,” I said. “Thank you, Nemesis.”

“...Y-You’re welcome,” she muttered. “I-It’s fine as long as you’re aware.”

Hm? I thought. What a strange response.

“So everything’s taken care of now,” said Marie.

“Seems like it,” I agreed.

I still had the Superior Killer on my mind, but if he wasn’t here anymore, worrying about him was meaningless. Thus, I left that matter for later.

Using my healing magic and Marie’s potions to restore my HP, we waited for the debuffs to go away. Because the cause of them — the miasma — was gone, the debuffs on me and the carriage people disappeared within ten minutes.

Their leader — a merchant named Alejandro — was beside himself with gratitude. When the people got teary-eyed and thanked us with words like “Without you, my whole family would’ve died,” “You’re lifesavers,” or “We can’t thank you enough,” Rook and I both became a bit bashful.

They, too, were heading towards Gideon, so we offered join them. Personally, since they’d lost a number of escorts in the previous battle and the ones that had survived were not in the best of shape, I was kinda worried about them.

Alejandro instantly — and with great joy — agreed to have us tag along.

After we’d raised up the overturned carriages, I saw the survivors take something out of the pockets of the deceased. Upon further inspection, I realized that they were box-shaped inventories.

A moment later, the survivors stored the remains of the deceased into those boxes. Each and every dead person got stored into their own inventory.

I asked Marie about it, and she said that it was how traveling tians treated their dead — by putting them into those “coffins.”

With monsters terrorizing the roads, tians took the danger of death as a given. If some lost their lives while others survived, the dead would be put into those “coffins” so that they could be sent to their homes and families without decaying. That was why they all carried inventories where they could store themselves.

It made me more aware of how tians — who were always in danger of dying — perceived life and death.

“...Coffins, huh,” I whispered. I’d never cared much for any NPCs who’d died in other games, but it was different here.

It gave me a lump in my throat.

Even if I knew this was a game, I didn’t think I could ever get used to seeing people die here. That might’ve been because Infinite Dendrogram was simply far too realistic.

Or perhaps...

“I... I’ll just leave this for later.” I stopped that train of thought and returned to helping prepare the carriages.

◇

Half a day had passed since we’d gotten back on the road again. Marilyn’s dragon carriage was gently shaking me when I suddenly began to feel extremely sleepy. It was probably caused by me pushing my limits during the battle against Gardranda.

“Why not take a nap? I’ll wake you up if something happens,” offered Marie, and I gladly accepted. Logging out would’ve resulted in me being left behind, so I took a nap while logged in, just like I did at the inn.

Sitting down, I placed my back against the carriage’s cargo and closed my eyes.

Not even five minutes had passed before I felt someone sit next to and lie against me.

Wondering who it was, I opened my eyes and saw Nemesis sleeping with her head placed against my upper arm. Apparently, I wasn’t the only one who was tired enough for a nap.

“Man, you sure are quick to fall asleep... Nemesis,” I said. Then I tried to follow her example and closed my eyes again.

However, probably due to having opened my eyes once, I couldn't fall asleep, and instead began to think about things. Specifically, I remembered the many and various things that had happened since I'd started Infinite Dendrogram.

Despite the fact that only three days had passed in real time, they'd felt extremely dense.

The most vivid memory I'd had so far was the battle against Gardranda. In terms of danger, it might've even surpassed my encounter with the Superior Killer.

Not only that, but — probably because Nemesis and I had told each other how we felt about it — the regret I had been haunted with after getting PK'd had faded, and it wasn't nearly as strong as before.

At the current moment, the dominant feeling in me was the vague pain I felt after seeing the bodies of the tians killed by Gardranda and the goblins.

They were nothing but characters inside Infinite Dendrogram — a game. And yet, my heart was grieving for them as it would grieve for those who'd died in reality.

A part of me felt that such sentiments were wrong. I didn't know what to say to that idea. Before I realized it, I'd opened my eyes and looked at Nemesis.

She was my Embryo, my partner... and an existence that was limited to the game known as Infinite Dendrogram. However, the longer I looked at her sleeping face, the more I felt like I was looking at a living, breathing girl.

She's alive, I thought to myself. I just can't think otherwise.

"'AI with intelligence equal to that of a person,' huh?" I murmured. My brother had said that tians — the inhabitants of this world — were recognized as such. "But..." The drowsiness that I'd thought was gone came over me again and slowly overwhelmed my brain.

As my consciousness became more and more vague, I once again began to run my mind through the things I'd thought at the party on my first day.

Liliana and Milianne — tians.

Demi-Dragon Worms and Gardranda — monsters.

And...

"Nemesis..."

...Embryos like her.

They all felt... so alive to me.

"Is this really..."

...just a game?

Before I could voice those words, my consciousness was finally lost to the realm of slumber.

◇◆◇

Undisclosed Location

["Polaris Bear, Polar Star" was defeated]

[Final level: 83]

[MVP: "God Hunter" Carl Lourlou, level 263 (total level: 763)]

[Embryo: "Indestructible and Everlasting, Nemean Lion"

[MVP special reward: Ancient Legendary item, "Ultimate Suit Series, Polar Star"]

["Ore Dragon King, Dragnium" was defeated]

[Final level: 64]

[MVP: "Giga Professor" Mr. Franklin, level 198 (total level: 698)]

[Embryo: "Magic Beast Factory, Pandemonium"]

[MVP special reward: Ancient Legendary item, "Ore Dragon King's Complete Remains, Dragnium"]

["Navalport Strikefish, Portorpedo" was defeated]

[Final level: 42]

[MVP: "Great Admiral" Koukin Shoyu, level 229 (total level: 729)]

[Embryo: "Great Flame Brewer, Abura-sumashi"]

[MVP special reward: Epic item, "Come-and-Go Torpedo, Portorpedo"]

["Fox-eyed Charcoal, Enryou" was defeated]

[Final level: 56]

[MVP: "The Glaive" Aono Hokugenin, level 335 (total level: 835)]

[Embryo: N/A]

[MVP special reward: Legendary item, "Incinerating Fox-eye, Enryou"]

["Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda" was defeated]

[Final level: 24]

[MVP: "Paladin" Ray Starling, level 20 (total level: 20)]

[Embryo: “Maiden of Vengeance, Nemesis”]

[MVP special reward: Legendary item, “Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda”]

“Hm?” Surrounded by darkness, still recording and doing its preset activities, it suddenly tilted its head.

Considering that it always did nothing but work without as much as saying a single word, that was a rare occurrence.

“How curious,” it said. “To defeat an UBM that’s above you in level... that is quite rare.”

Its confusion was only natural. UBMs were exceptional creatures far beyond the norm. They all had multiple times the power of any boss monster at the same level. Even high-rank Masters had a hard time fighting them.

Thus, it was extremely rare for a UBM to be defeated by someone of a lower level.

Thinking that this defeat had been the result of a large number of low-level players and that the person had only been selected as an MVP by accident, it opened the battle log. However, the reality was far beyond its expectations.

The person — Ray — had defeated the UBM all by himself.

“Hoh?”

That person was equipped with abilities that were optimal for giant-killing. The mid-battle evolution caused by  had given him a new ability that was simply perfect for the situation. That person was equipped with an indomitable will.

There were many reasons for his victory, but there was one that particularly stood out.

“He realized it right after destroying the first head,” it said. “That is far too early.”

The creature it acknowledged as an UBM — “Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda” — was a gathering of traps.

First, there was the head that flagrantly released miasma and flames.

The player would think that to be its weak point and destroy it, but that would cause it to create two new faces on the shoulders.

All of those visages were traps.

Getting rid of them would not only fail to destroy Gardranda — it would cause it to be strengthened even further.

Even if all its heads were destroyed, it would go through more transformations and become even more powerful than before.

It was completely indestructible as long as the core within its stomach was intact.

Due to that, it had expected Gardranda to grow into a particularly powerful UBM. In fact, it wouldn't have been surprised if the demon had reached level 100 — the apex of UBMs and the greatest level available to monsters — and broken through it to join the ranks of the exceptions known as SUBMs — Superior Unique Boss Monsters.

However, in reality, this low-rank Master had been able to miraculously defeat Gardranda and stop its growth process.

"Well, there's no use in overthinking it," it said. "Such cases aren't unheard of. I will keep this in mind in my future work."

It finished analyzing the battle and closed the battle log window.

However, its thoughts suddenly escaped through its mouth as words.

"Whatever the case, this is reason to be joyous. It's all meaningless if only the current Superiors grow stronger. If no new powers emerge, we will never have a hundred Superiors... and never reach Infinity."

After nodding at its own words, it took another glance at Ray's log and continued talking.

"Now... I wonder if he will make good use of Gardranda."

Imagining the future, it formed a faint smile.

"Whether you do or not... just grow stronger while having fun. To you people, this world — from start to finish — is nothing but a game."

And so, control AI No. 4, Jabberwock — the one tasked with handling UBMs — returned to its busy, busy job.

Afterword

Bear: “Time for the afterword!”

Cat: “Thank you very much for buying the first voluume!”

Bear: “As you all can surely tell by the words next to our speech, this afterword will be presented by yours truly — his bearliness Shu Starling...”

Cat: “...and the only Dendro cat so far, Control AI no. 13 — Cheshiire! Just so you all know, at first, the author was thinking of acting proper and greeting his dear readers directlyy...”

Bear: “...but changed his mind and figured that Dendro is best represented by its mascot duo!”

Bear: “Now, bear with us as we tell you how it got published.”

Cat: “Good ideaa. It happened about 11 months ago. The author looked into his inbox on Shōsetsuka ni Narō and found a message from a sender whose name was in red... The red name caused him to quake with fear, but he somehow got himself to read the subject line. It said ‘Publishing Offer.’ It was actually an offer from Hobby Japan’s editor, K!”

Bear: “Naturally, the author was surprised, fur he never expected to get contacted by a publisher whose releases he’d read in his school years.”

Cat: “The author replied with a cautiously optimistic message, soon after which he had to go to a preparatory meeting...”

Bear: “...where he received an explanation and quickly sealed the publication deal with a contract.”

Cat: “However, there was a problem after that... Well, ‘problem’ might not be the right word.”

Bear: “Basically, Editor K raised his expectations and standards so high that the author’s heart couldn’t bear it.”

Cat:

“‘The illustrations will be done by Taiki,’ said the editor.

‘The one who does those designs? I’m so happy!’ replied the author.

‘A month before it releases, we’re putting Dendro leaflets in HJ Bunko,’ said the editor.

‘Wow! That’s so much advertising!’ replied the author.

‘It’s also getting a dedicated site and a preview video,’ said the editor.

‘Y-You’re going that far?!’ replied the author.

‘I’ll also get fifty artists to draw something in support of Dendro,’ said the editor, and at this point, the author could only shake uncontrollably.”

Bear: “All of this is completely true.”

Cat: “The author will be at ease if the work sells well enough to meet Editor K’s expectations. I earnestly hope that this afterword is read by many people, and that means the book is selliing.”

Bear: “Last, but not least, put your paws together for the author’s words of gratitude!”

Hello there.

I would like to give my thanks to everyone who bought Infinite Dendrogram Volume 1, everyone who supported my work on Shōsetsuka ni Narō, my sister — who checked on every part before I uploaded it — and, of course, Hobby Japan and their editor, K, for picking my work for publication.

I will keep on writing Infinite Dendrogram and do my best to live up to your expectations, so I would be thankful if you continued to support me.

Regards, Sakon Kaidou.

Cat: “Now that that’s over, let us meet again in volume twoo!”

Bear: “This afterword was brought to you by Brother Bear...”

Cat: “...and Cheshiire!”

Bear: “The second volume is planned to be released in the coming months, so grin and bear it until then!”

Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Chapter Zero: Infinite Dendrogram

Chapter One: Nemesis

Chapter Two: Dinner and Intentions

Chapter Three: Starting Point

Chapter Four: Tomb Labyrinth

Chapter Five: Superior

Chapter Six: The Cat’s Tea Party

Chapter Seven: The Ordeal of Rookies

Epilogue

Afterword
About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 2 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 1
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson and Nick Nomura
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2016 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2016 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2016 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2017 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: July 2017

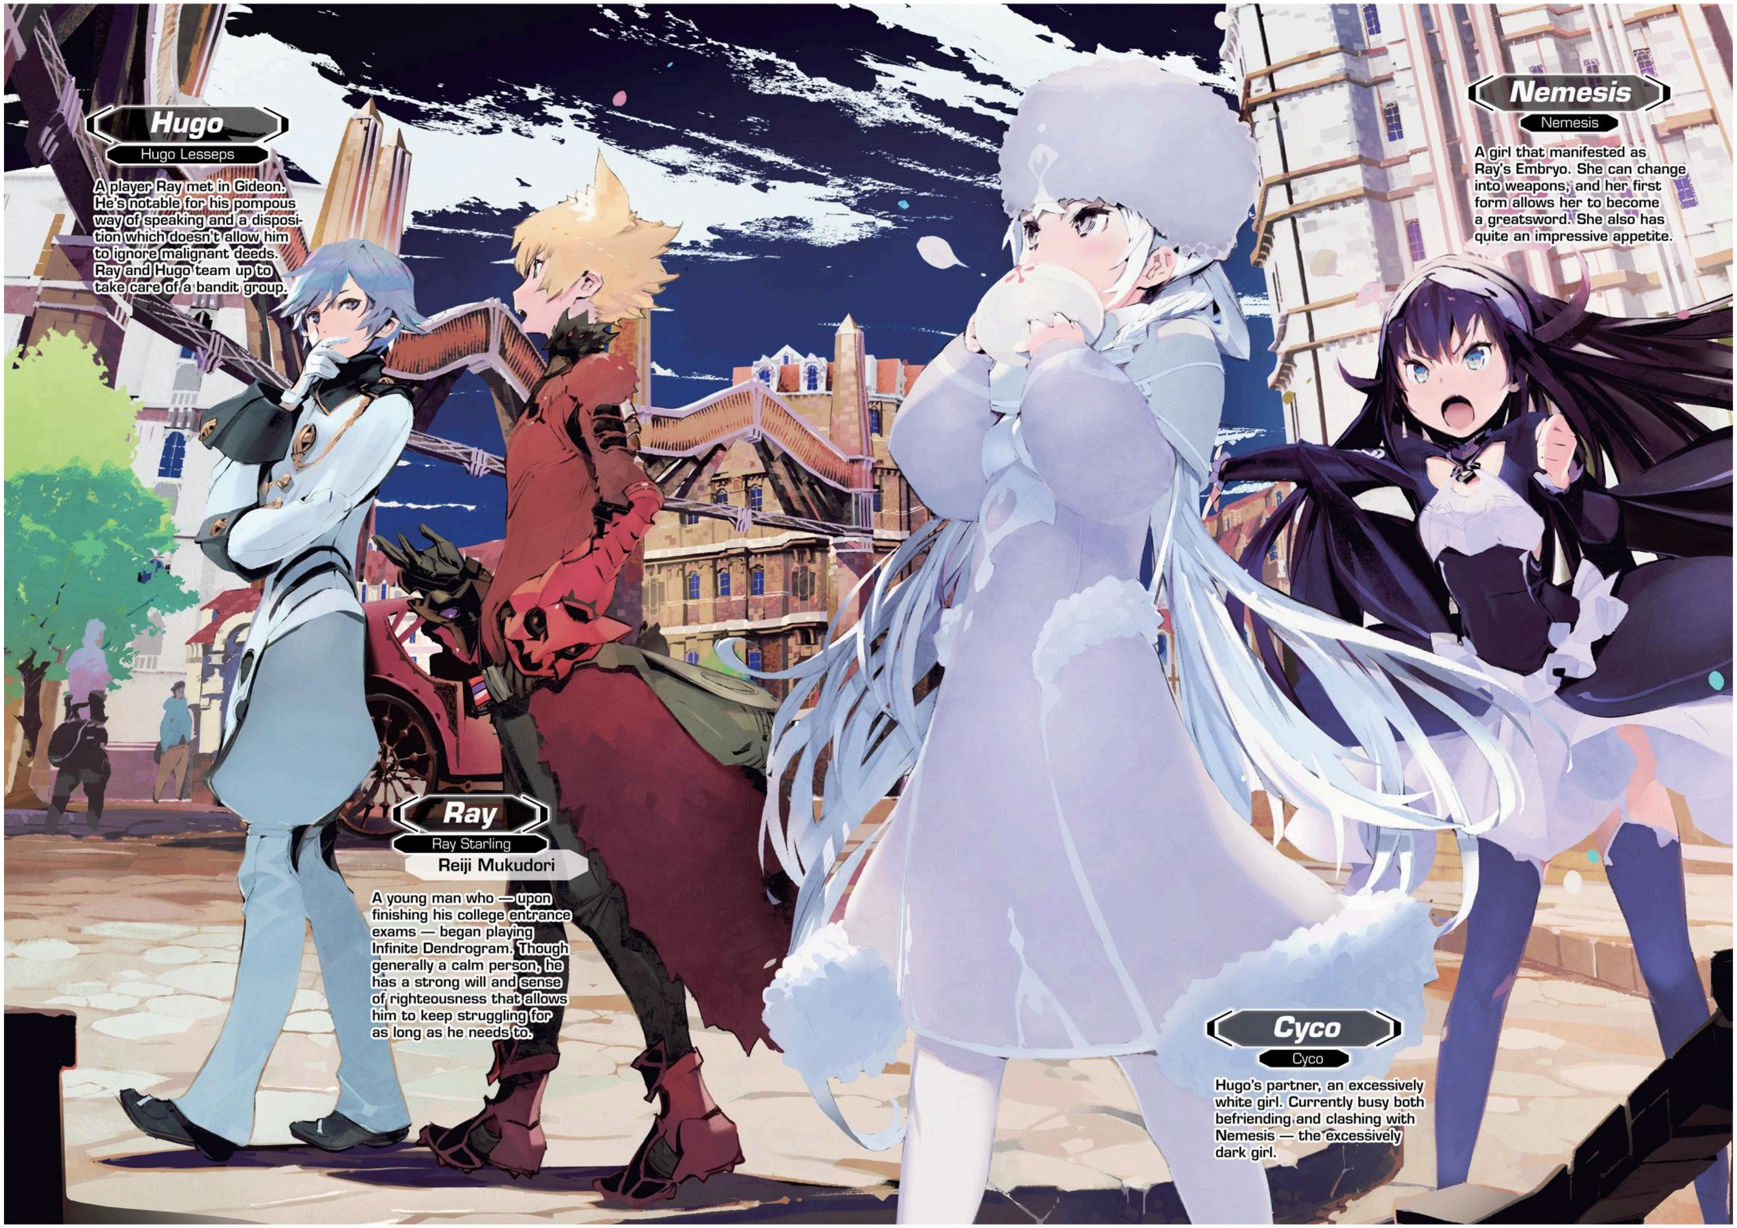
Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki

Infinite Dendrogram

2. The Beasts of Undeath

Infinite Dendrogram
2. The Beasts of Undeath
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki



Hugo

Hugo Lesseps

A player Ray met in Gideon. He's notable for his pompous way of speaking and a disposition which doesn't allow him to ignore malignant deeds. Ray and Hugo team up to take care of a bandit group.

Ray

Ray Starling

Reiji Mukudori

A young man who — upon finishing his college entrance exams — began playing Infinite Dendrogram. Though generally a calm person, he has a strong will and sense of righteousness that allows him to keep struggling for as long as he needs to.

Cyco

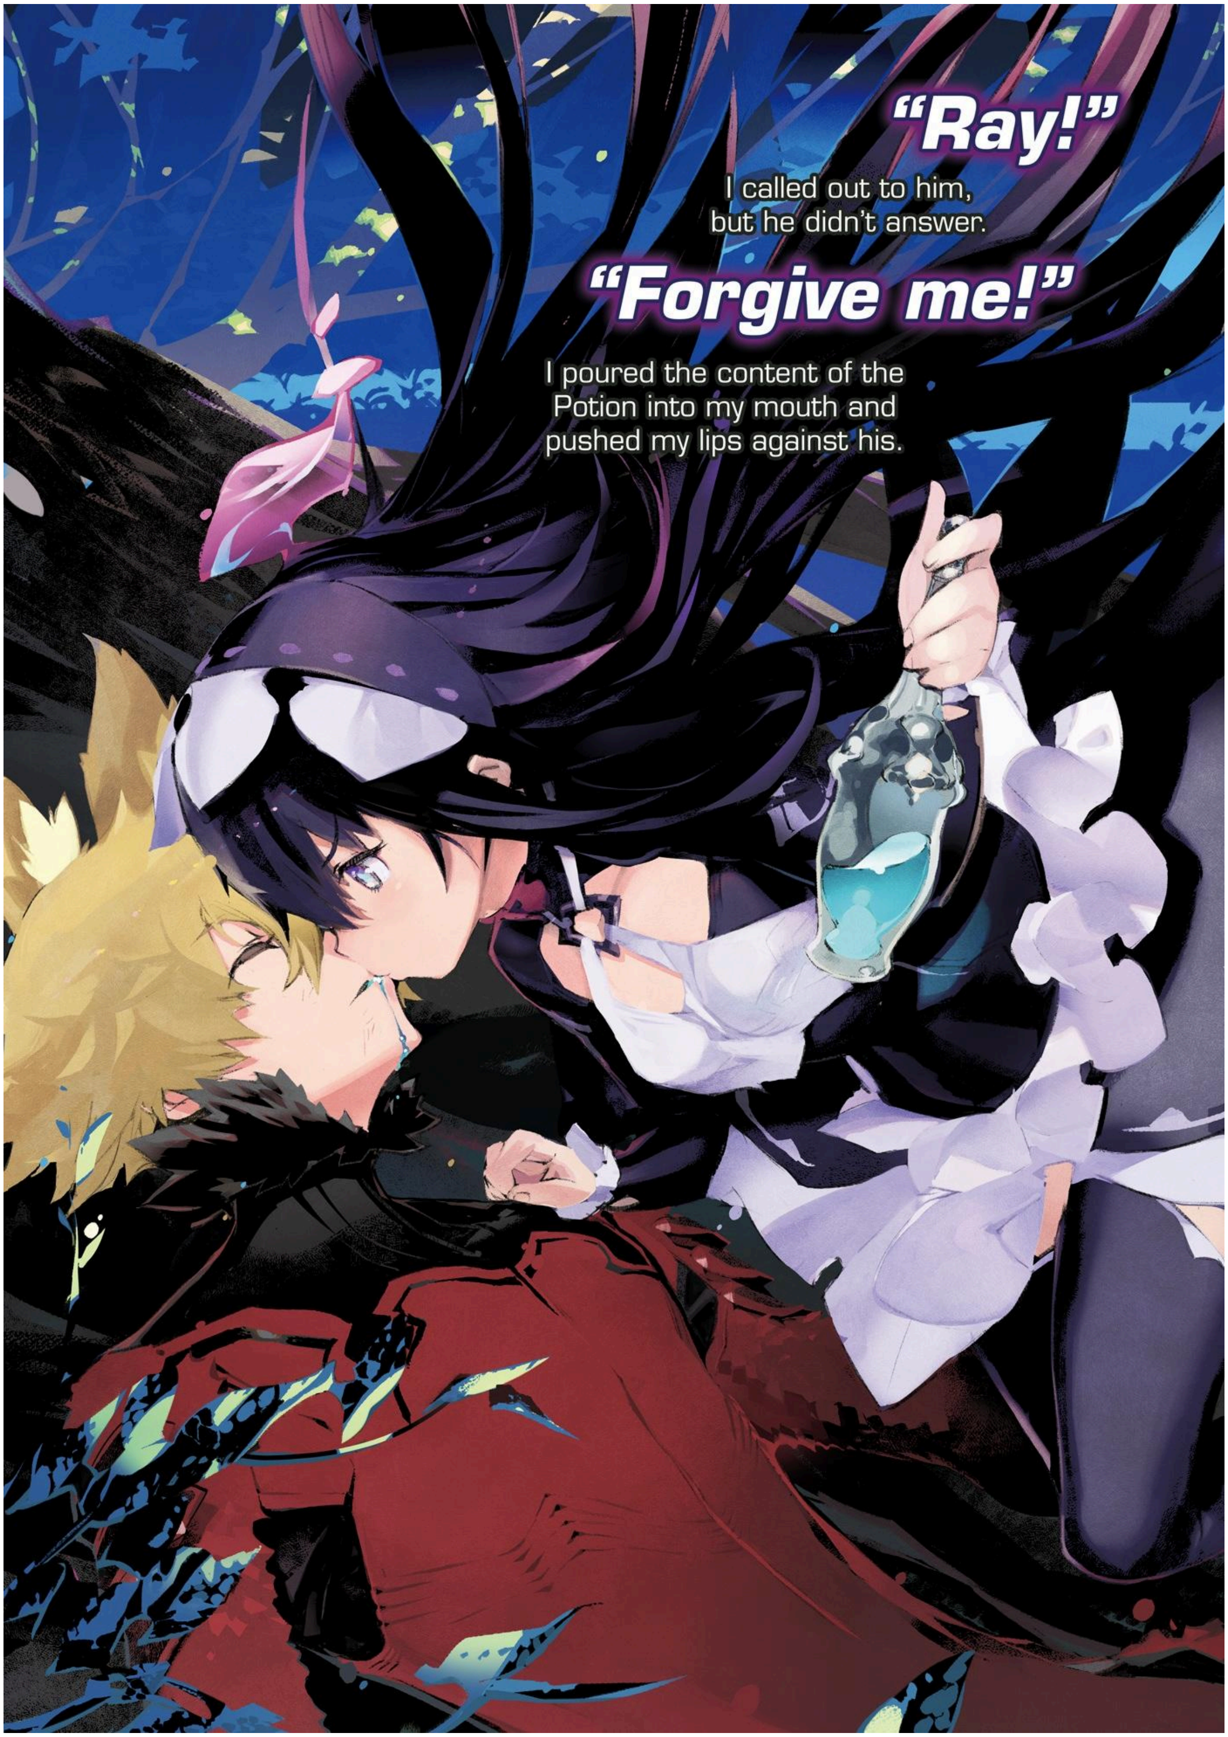
Cyco

Hugo's partner, an excessively white girl. Currently busy both befriending and clashing with Nemesis — the excessively dark girl.

Nemesis

Nemesis

A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. She can change into weapons, and her first form allows her to become a greatsword. She also has quite an impressive appetite.



"Ray!"
I called out to him, but he didn't answer.
"Forgive me!"
I poured the content of the Potion into my mouth and pushed my lips against his.

Prologue: The Emotions of the Dead

Kingdom of Altar, Cruella Mountain Belt

To the east of Gideon — the second largest city in the Kingdom of Altar — there was a mountainous area known as the Cruella Mountain Belt. It was the kingdom's border with Caldina — a country of expansive, desertlike wastelands.

For years, this border area had been a popular place for bandit gangs and their hideouts. Even if some group on a quest from the Adventurers' Guild eliminated one of them, they would soon be replaced by others.

There were two reasons for that.

The first was that the kingdom couldn't do any widescale and thorough bandit hunts due to the possibility of the neighboring country of Caldina seeing it as an act of war and thus provoking them.

The second was that the belt was on the primary trade route between Gideon, one of the kingdom's largest cities, and Caldina — a nation known for its mercantilism. A bandit couldn't ask for an area more plentiful with prey. Thus, the bandit problem in the belt was neverending.

However, it actually wasn't a bad thing for the Adventurers' Guild.

The new bandit gangs were always made up of people who went broke and got reduced to brigandry. Their jobs were low-rank and their levels weren't even maxed. Most active adventurers could eliminate them without much effort, and since it was a net positive for the adventurer economy, the guild wasn't averse to the idea of the problem's continued existence. The only real victims were the peddlers unfortunate enough to be marked by the brigands.

However, at one point, this bandit problem — already reeking of bloody money — took a turn for the worse.

One of the bandit gangs started kidnapping children from Gideon and the nearby villages.

They demanded ransom money for every child, and those with unpaid ransoms were simply never returned. Some relatives didn't get their children back even after paying, while others only received shredded pieces of their corpses. It all seemed like a sick joke.

Naturally, the parents of the children requested to have the Adventurers' Guild eliminate those bandits, and, of course, the guild accepted it.

The officials of the Adventurers' Guild believed that the kidnappers had someone particularly powerful among them. Thus, they gathered and dispatched a party made up of several excellent tian adventurers. It was a group that could even fell a Pure Dragon.

Everyone believed that — regardless of whether the kidnappers had capable people among them — the party would eliminate the bandit gang and bring back any children that were still alive. The party members themselves were certain of that, as well.

The party's leader — famous for his dashing looks — set out on the quest while waving goodbye to the people seeing him off. The intrepid smile on his face made everyone — the guild's officials, other adventurers, and, of course, the inhabitants of Gideon — all the more certain that they would return successful.

The following day, the leader's half-eaten face was placed outside the steps of the guild hall. It was accompanied by a paper saying "Seconds, please," along with a number of small fingers, one finger for every kidnapped child.

Though perplexed by this unexpected turn of events, the Adventurers' Guild quickly made their next move. Their plan was to gather several adventurer parties and annihilate the bandit gang through human-wave tactics. Among the adventurers — numbering nearly a hundred — there were even some Masters. The guild's Masters were absolutely certain that they would emerge victorious.

Three days later, a resurrected Master came back to report what happened. "They killed us all. It just can't be done," he said.

According to him, most of the enemies were absolute weaklings, but two of them were ridiculously strong.

One was a horse-man undead, while the other was a large, ox-headed man. Their power was far beyond that of normal tians, and it was fair to say that they were what had killed most of the adventurers.

With that report, the guild's master realized that this wasn't a job for adventurers. He contacted the knights responsible for the area around

Gideon, but the army couldn't act due to the area being close to the border with Caldina.

Even Gideon's local champion — Super Gladiator Figaro — rejected the request, despite being able to take care of the matter all by himself.

The Adventurers' Guild had exhausted all their options, leaving them unable to do anything. Every now and then, some stronger sorts would accept the request and head out to eliminate the bandits, but they would always end up as corpses and were sent back to the guild along with fingers of the children.

This tragedy continued for a year, and the Adventurers' Guild eventually stopped making the request appear in their catalogs.

Thus, the bandits in question — the Gouz-Maise Gang — were still active in the Cruella Mountain Belt.

◆

It was happening in the gloomy cellar of an abandoned fortress.

"Third this month. Payment received. No relevant materials. To be returned." The man mumbled something while looking at an old desk in a piercingly-cold room thick with suffocating moisture.

"Fourth this month. Payment not received. Relevant materials found. Turned to materials."

He looked through the documents, spoke those words, and wrote something down on the ledger in his hand. It was much like a ledger one would use in a business, and the one under his hand wasn't the only one on the table.

Gloomy as the idea might've been, it seemed as though he had only placed them there just for the sake of having them around, and the man wouldn't deny that idea.

"Fifth this month. Payment received. Relevant materials found. Head to be returned after turning to materials." With those words, the man stood up and walked to a neighboring room.

The way he walked was curious. His upper half was that of a human, but the bottom half was that of a horse. The man was a humanoid creature known only as "horse-man."

Just as there were human-horse mix monsters known as centaurs, so there were human-horse mix humans known as horse-men. An average monster would have its name pop up above its head, but that didn't apply to the man.

Therefore, this horse-man was, in fact, humanoid...

...regardless of just how inhuman his appearance and mental workings were.

"This is the one," he said.

The room had cages in it, and inside there were a number of small animals. They were the man's commodities. The small animals were all asleep and thus completely oblivious to the man's presence.

The horse-man removed the small animal from the fifth cage and placed it on the stony floor of his own room. On the floor, there was a magic circle the man had drawn. The man fixed the shackles, which were chained to the floor, on the small animal's limbs. He took out a black crystal.

"______"

As he whispered something, the magic circle began to shine, and it released small amounts of purple lightning.

At the very same moment, the small animal woke up.

"GYAAAAHHHHH!"

The shriek that escaped its mouth was thick with anguish.

It tried to raise its body up, but the manacles binding it were not so accommodating. As the metal on its limbs tore through its skin, the small animal's body spasmed and hit its back to the stony floor in a futile attempt to break out.

This continued for a long five minutes...

"Mo...mmy..."

...and at the end, the small animal — the miserable little human child — breathed its last.

"This is less than I expected," the horse-man said, looking at the crystal in his hand.

Then he cut off the corpse's head with a large blade he had prepared, stuffed it into a bag, and threw it into a basket that said "To be returned." The rest of the body was carefully put into a container saying "Materials."

Then — as if what had just happened was nothing special — the man returned to the table and continued filling in the ledger.

No one who knew the ledger's contents would ever compare it to those used in business. At this point, it was nothing but a cursed book containing the fates of countless children.

“Sixth this month. Payment not received. No relevant materials. Dispose. Gouz!”

In response to the man’s call, something within the darkness began to move. “Ahh...”

The creature referred to as “Gouz” — a large man with an ox’s head and demonic fangs — reached into one of the cages and grabbed a little girl by her arm. She was sleeping and continued to do so even as he dragged her across the floor.

Many would say that she would’ve been better off if she continued sleeping. However, Gouz didn’t allow that. Gently — like a parent or a close friend — he tapped on her cheek.

The little girl stirred and woke up...

“They taste better when they’re scared, y’know,” he grinned.

...and her flesh was rendered from bone. Eaten alive.

By the time Gouz was done with his snack, the horse-man was done filling in the ledger.

“Gouz, don’t make such a mess,” he said.

“Gahahah!” the ox-head laughed. “Maise, this place is basically painted with the brats’ blood and other fluids! I couldn’t make it worse if I wanted to!”

“I’m talking about your saliva. It reeks.”

“That so? Well, I’ll try to be careful, then.”

The horse-man — Maise — sighed at Gouz’s half-hearted and unreliable response and changed the subject.

“That’s today’s set done,” he said. “Gouz, after we go through tomorrow’s set, we’re leaving this place.”

“Huh? We are?” asked the ox-head.

“Yes,” answered the horse-man. “That event is starting in Gideon in just two days. Some of those who will gather for it might try to eliminate us. It would be far too troublesome.”

“Masters, huh?” sighed Gouz. “Why not just kick their non-serious asses?”

“Because we can’t,” curtly replied Maise. “We could handle those with high-rank jobs, but Superiors and their Superior jobs would be far too challenging. Also...”

He momentarily stopped talking, merely to emphasize the words that followed.

“...they stand where we are aiming for.”

Maise’s words — which had some sort of certainty to them — made Gouz laugh out loud. “Gehahahaha! You’re not wrong there.”

“Ah, it just hit me,” added the ox-head. “You said we’re leaving, but what about our underlings? There are, like, a hundred of ‘em, and they’re still working hard getting the brats and whatnot.”

Gouz’s question made Maise’s eyes — empty sockets where a wisp-like fire popped up and disappeared — light.

“We’re taking them with us, of course,” said the horse-man.

“Gahahah! Hope they all fit!”

Gouz was a man-eating ox-head demon with a high-rank job from the gladiator grouping: Strong Gladiator.

Maise: a grudge-wielding undead horse-man with a high-rank job from the necromancer grouping — Lich.

They were the Gouz-Maise Gang.

They were Gideon’s most feared band of kidnappers and murderers.

Chapter One: A Morning in Gideon

Paladin Ray Starling

Most large cities in the Kingdom of Altar — the royal capital included — were encircled by a large wall. Not only was it a necessary structure that protected against monsters and attacks from other countries, it also separated the worlds inside and out.

Duel City Gideon, where we had just arrived, was no different.

“Whoa...” I couldn’t help but voice my amazement. Beyond the walls — which were similar to the ones in the capital — waited a radically different scenery.

It made me remember how I’d felt when I had first entered Altea. The atmosphere of a hyper-realistic fantasy town was moving, to say the least, and Gideon was making me experience it all over again.

The air here was thick with people’s enthusiasm. I had a feeling that most of it came from the very middle of the metropolis — the Great Central Arena of the duel city, towering right before my eyes. Ancient Rome’s Colosseum was 200 meters in diameter and 50 meters in height, yet Gideon’s pride and joy seemed to be more than twice the size of that.

According to a sign hanging near the gates to Gideon, there were twelve smaller arenas evenly spaced out around the city, and every single one of them was active daily. The sign also said that the Great Central Arena was often used for various events.

With all the liveliness here in Gideon, I found it hard to believe that this city was part of a kingdom that had recently experienced a crippling blow in a war and was forced to the verge of defeat.

I looked around and saw a number of humanoid races I didn’t encounter much back in the capital. Some had beast-like ears, others had dragon-like horns... There were even some fairies, so petite they only went up to my knees. They seemed to be this world’s Demi-Humans — a staple for every fantasy work.

As I watched them, I noticed that there were both tourists and those who actually lived and worked here. Figaro hadn't been lying when he'd said this place was lively.

"What an energetic city," said Rook.

"It's only natural, since this area isn't close to the kingdom's border with Dryfe, which is in the north," Marie said. She began explaining why. "The countries close to Gideon are Caldina and Legendaria. The latter signed a treaty of commerce with Altar, while the former is a full ally, so this city gets many tourists from both."

She showed us a map to illustrate what she'd explained. In the center of the map was Gideon; to the east, a mountain belt, followed by Caldina; and to the south, there was Legendaria. To the west, there was a small patch of land followed by the open sea, while to the north, there was the capital.

"Not only is Gideon positioned in a safe spot — you can also count all the gladiators fighting in the arenas as its soldiers," Marie continued. "It wouldn't be an exaggeration to say that Gideon is the strongest city in the kingdom."

I see, I thought. That makes it the safest city in the Kingdom of Altar.

I could only assume that many people who'd escaped from the capital had chosen this as their destination. After all, in the catalog of the capital's guild, there had been many escort requests from people searching for a safe refuge.

However, there were still merchants like Alejandro, who would go out of their way to stock up in the capital. We and that merchant had gone our separate ways at the entrance to Gideon, but since he'd wished to thank us properly, he'd invited us to visit his shop whenever we had the time.

"Now, let's go to the Adventurers' Guild," said Marie. "We have to finish the quest and report that Gardranda was eliminated."

Rook and I were quick to agree, and we all made our way to Gideon's Adventurers' Guild.

The ceiling inside it was higher than it was in the capital's guild. The entrance was larger, too. The designers were probably being considerate of the larger races inhabiting and visiting this city.

Anyway, we completed the delivery quest without any problems. The reward was 30,000 lir. We split it evenly and got 10,000 lir each. It was a nice amount, no doubt about it. However, we ran into some problems when claiming the reward we were supposed to get for taking care of Gardranda.

Proving that we'd done it wasn't difficult at all. We simply had to go to a special counter and show them the MVP special reward: The Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda.

Items of this type were always named after the defeated UBM, had qualities that fit the MVP, and couldn't be transferred in any way. Thus, the fact that I possessed the item with Gardranda's name on it could only mean that I had been the most valuable player in Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda's elimination.

Of course, it was also possible to prove such things by going through a thorough inquiry. It was only natural, considering that not every bounty was a UBM.

And so, though we got the reward money without any trouble, we found the amount to be quite problematic.

It amounted to a total of 1,000,000 lir. That was the equivalent of 10,000,000 yen, which was quite a fortune. It got us to sit around a table in the guild and intensely argue about how we would split it.

"Oh, come on, now!" I raised my voice. "Let's just all take a third and be done with it!"

"No!" said Marie. "I already took the money for the potions I used, so there's no reason for me to have any more! I didn't participate in the battle at all! You two should just split it in half!"

"I didn't fight Gardranda, either!" cried Rook. "I could never accept the same amount as Ray! He should just take it all, honestly!"

The three of us were fiercely arguing in favor of reducing the amounts we would get.

First, Marie had been given approximately 100,000 lir of the reward to make up for the Elixir she'd thrown at me and other medicines she'd used on the people in the carriages. She'd been apprehensive about accepting it, saying that she'd chosen to use those items on her own volition, but I'd insisted, and she'd soon caved. With that settled, we'd had 900,000 lir left, and that was when things had gotten fiery.

I had argued that it had been the result of us acting as a party, and insisted that we all take a third each.

Marie had insisted that she didn't deserve or need more than what she'd gotten for the medicine.

Rook had stated that he didn't deserve any money because he hadn't participated in the battle against Gardranda.

I sincerely believed that they both were invaluable in the victory against the demon, so I really wanted them to take what was rightfully theirs.

"Honestly, I already got the MVP special reward, so maybe I shouldn't take any of it," I said.

"That would take you beyond simple selflessness and quickly make you look like an unreasonable lunatic," commented Nemesis.

I was being completely serious, yet Nemesis looked at me like I was an idiot. Rook and Marie, too, seemed thoroughly perplexed by my suggestion.

"Hey, these things are downright insane," I said. "I really can't let myself take much after getting something this good."

I raised my hands to show off the things on them. These two-tone colored bracers — one red, other dark purple — were inside my inventory after we had defeated Gardranda.

The description in the equipment window went like this:

Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda
Legendary item
A legendary item embodying the concepts surrounding the three-faced demon of flame and miasma.
In addition to being extremely tough, it increases the physical strength of the wearer.
This item cannot be transferred or traded.
No level limit.

It actually gave a 100% bonus to STR, and had more defense than all my other armor combined. Not only that, but it also allowed me to use the skills "Purgatorial Flames" and "Hellish Miasma," which were probably much like the attacks used by the UBM itself. There was also a skill that I couldn't read for some reason, one that simply said "???".

They were insanely good, no doubt about it.

Not only did they seem to be worth more than 300,000 lir — they'd probably go for more than the whole reward for defeating Gardranda.

I mean, it's a "legendary" item, I thought.

"I know I'm the MVP and all, but taking the reward after getting these would be far too much," I said.

We would have lost the battle against Gardranda if Marie hadn't provided support with her items. Rook, too, had done a great job holding back Audrey — who had originally been the demon's mount.

We wouldn't have achieved victory if it hadn't been for them, so I thought I was fair in insisting that my contributions were worth only a third of the reward.

"...I understand," said Marie. "But I think I have a better idea." She lightly hit the table. "First of all, Ray, you're getting 300,000, and that's final. If you don't accept that money, no one here has the right to have any of it. Now, Rook, I know you don't want to take as much as Ray, so let's cut it by half and give you at least 150,000. And before anyone tells me off for not taking anything, I'll be satisfied with just 50,000, thank you very much."

Rook and I weren't against that split, so that was 500,000 lir taken care of. However, there was still 400,000 lir left.

"We shall use the rest as a party," said Marie.

"By that, you mean...?" I raised an eyebrow.

"You could call it a little lesson for future reference," she answered.

What is she talking about? I thought.

"For now, just leave it all to me," she continued. "I would like you to gather here in the afternoon after three days game time. Is that okay with both of you?"

Three days game time was just one day in reality.

"No problems here," said Rook.

"I don't have any plans for tomorrow, either, but what are you planning?" I asked.

"Let's have it be a little secret for the sake of surprise," said Marie. "Oh, but if you don't like this idea of mine, just say so. I'll give your money back at once."

"No, it's fine by me," I said. I had absolutely no intention of taking any more, so I just let Marie do her thing.

"Then with that, we're done splitting the money," she said. "Good job on finishing this quest, you two."

"Yeah, thanks for the help," I said.

"Thank you very much," said Rook.

And so ended the first quest we had taken up as a party.

We had a small celebration, and by the end, I was so tired that I immediately logged out.

◇

The next day, I logged in soon after waking up.

I'd slept long enough for a whole day to have passed in the game. Infinite Dendrogram's tripled time feature was useful and all, but situations like these made it seem a bit confusing and even bothersome. The time here was six o'clock in the morning, and the sun was just beginning to rise.

As soon as I logged in, Nemesis jumped out of the crest on my left hand and greeted me. "Good morning, Master. You sure are early today."

"...Funny, considering that I basically overslept in terms of real life time," I said.

"So what are you doing today?" asked Nemesis. "It's too early for shops to be open."

"Well, I was thinking of doing it after getting some new gear, but I guess I'll have to do the testing first," I answered.

"Testing? Of what?" she asked again.

I raised both my hands before her. "These." They were covered by two pieces of armor. My Miasmaflame Bracers.

Just like the royal capital, most of the kingdom's cities always had their gates open. There were many reasons for that, but one of them was the fact that there were many Masters who were active at night. It would be extremely inconvenient if they were only allowed to pass during the day, and there would be many people who would go out of their way to try to climb over the walls. Thus, the gates were open 24 hours a day. There were three guard shifts, and it reminded me of part-time jobs in convenience stores.

When I passed the northern gate and greeted the guards standing there, they greeted me back in a slightly sleepy manner.

Soon after leaving the city, I was standing in Nex Plains, the same place I had passed through yesterday.

I roamed about looking for a monster I could do the test on, and it didn't take long for me to find a lone Goblin Warrior. I was familiar with this monster, so I could defeat it even if the test failed. A good target, no matter how I looked at it.

"You said you were going to test the bracers, but is there anything specific you had in mind?" asked Nemesis in her sword form.

“Well, these Miasmaflame bracers have skills on them, right? I want to see if they’re of any use,” I said. “I don’t like the idea of having to try them out on something stronger than myself.”

I had gotten Vengeance is Mine during the fight with the Demi-Drag and Like a Flag Flying the Reversal while fighting Gardranda, but I couldn’t continue to rely on skills I wasn’t familiar with to always match my situation and lead me to victory. Testing was important.

Therefore, I decided to test the two skills on the item — Purgatorial Flames and Hellish Miasma. I couldn’t use the skill named “???”, so that was on hold for now.

One was a flamethrowing skill, while the other was a release of poisonous gas. If I could master them, I would finally have attacks other than standard blows and Vengeance is Mine. Having to use Gems just to cast spells was quite a waste, after all.

“...Oh, it just hit me that I still have some of those Gems,” I muttered.

Suddenly, the Goblin noticed I was here and charged at me while swinging his weapon.

“All right, then... Purgatorial Flames.” I stretched my hand out to the Goblin and opened my palm flat facing towards it.

A moment later, a demon’s mouth opened up on the back of my hand...

“Eh?”

...and it released a fierce stream of crimson fire, painting my vision red.

“AAAGHHHHH!”

Damn, that made my HP go down so fast! I thought. It’s my own attack, so it’s not affected by Paladin’s Aegis and other defensive skills! Oh, crap! I even got the “Burns” debuff!

“You fool! Are you trying to kill yourself?! Oh! The Goblin is coming!” shouted Nemesis.

“OAAGHH!”

The damage I’d caused myself had turned this into an extremely dangerous battle. I desperately defended myself against the Goblin’s attacks, used a number of skills and healing items, and barely emerged victorious.

Lesson learned. As important as testing was, one always had to consider safety.

◇

"...All right, time to pull myself together and test the Hellish Miasma," I said.

"Are you sure it will work right this time?" asked Nemesis.

"It will," I answered. "...I think."

After a short while of looking for a new prey, I had stumbled upon a bipedal, plant-like monster. The words above it said "Walking Grapevine," and just as they implied, it was literally a walking vine with grapes hanging from it.

"Is that thing even breathing?" asked Nemesis. "Wouldn't it be better to burn it?"

"I'm testing the Hellish Miasma right now. And yes, plants do breathe, so it should work," I answered. "Hellish Miasma! Release!"

This time, I made sure to make the back of my hand face the enemy and thus prevent the smoke from hitting myself.

Just as I'd intended, the miasma surrounded the Walking Grapevine... and then a strong gust of wind made it go back to me.

"GYAAAAHHH!"

"I knew this would happen!" shouted Nemesis.

Trying to not breathe any of it in, I escaped the noxious cloud.

Man, that was close, I thought. I almost got destroyed by my own skill.

"Now, let's see what the monster thinks of it," I said. I looked as the wind made the miasma disperse to reveal the Walking Grapevine, clearly suffering due to the debuffs.

"It seems to be effective," said Nemesis. "However, it's hard to make it work on windy days, and trying to use it indoors isn't even an option."

"Yeah, I can't deny that it's a difficult skill to use," I said.

As we were having that exchange, something flew right into my mouth.

"Hghuh?!" I accidentally bit and gulped it down. The aftertaste — both sweet and sour — was that of a grape.

A grape, of all things.

Yes, that Walking Grapevine was actually attacking me with its grapes.

"Whot kind ohf attahck ish that?!" I exclaimed in confusion.

"Master, don't talk with your mouth full," said Nemesis.

Seriously, though, what am I supposed to think about this attack? I thought. The grapes are pretty good, and even if they hit me on the body, they only get me a bit dirty and don't hurt at all—

"Guh..." My face suddenly contorted.

"Master, what's wrong?! Was that attack poisoned?!" asked Nemesis in perplexion.

Poison? I thought. Yeah, it was poisoned.

My stats clearly showed the debuffs that were affecting me. Their names were Poison, Intoxication, and Weakness.

"They're the same debuffs I just gave it...!" I said. Apparently, its fruit had become poisoned by the miasma and I'd gotten its effects transferred to me by ingesting them. I'd had no idea that debuffs could travel like that.

"M-Master!" exclaimed Nemesis. "There's a number of monsters coming this way!"

I looked around and saw some Goblins and beast-type monsters here and there. They were all here because of me — or, rather, the fruit juice on my body.

"I see, so that's the aim of that attack..." I muttered.

And so, still under the effects of the debuffs, I was attacked by a group of monsters which numbered to more than ten.

◇

"We ran into some unexpected trouble, but I think I know how these skills work now," I said.

Despite the tremendous failure on its first use, I had soon found out that Purgatorial Flames was an exceptionally effective skill.

First of all, it was very powerful. It actually did more damage than my standard attacks. I could also continue to channel it as long as I had MP, not to mention that it could apply the Burns debuff or its upgrade — Charring. Just as the name said, it was a debuff that could reduce a burned Goblin's arm to charcoal.

Strong as it might be, however, Purgatorial Flames affected friend and foe alike.

Heck, it includes myself, as well, so I'll have to be really careful when using it, I thought.

Also, its power was lower than that of Gardranda's flames. If it had been the same, the first failure would've blown my head away. I could only assume that Purgatorial Flames was weaker than the original either because it had been reduced to equipment, or because I was simply a weaker creature. Due to the fact that there was a skill I'd yet to unlock, it was quite obvious that I wouldn't be able to master the Miasmaflame Bracers just yet.

And though it had gotten me into the unexpected predicament of getting surrounded by more than ten monsters, the Hellish Miasma test had been successful, as well.

Man, that was tough, I thought. If I hadn't activated the Reversal, I would be dead by now.

The only reason I'd survived was because I'd fought the monsters while powered up by the reversed debuffs.

By the time it was over, the Walking Grapevine had succumbed to the Poison and died. I was lucky to have found out that debuffing a monster and then getting those debuffs by ingesting its body parts was counted as a negative effect from the monster.

Though I have no idea if I'll ever find a use for it, I thought. I don't eat monsters while fighting, after all.

Whatever the case, I had to be extra careful when using Hellish Miasma.

Oh, I almost forgot to mention. Since the Walking Grapevine had died, the Reversal was no longer effective. Thus, I was currently being tortured by the debuffs.

"Uoghh..." I moaned. "First Heal."

While lying on the ground due to Intoxication and Weakness, I used healing magic to restore my HP, which was being drained by Poison.

Since the Purgatorial Flames were weaker, I had hoped that would apply to Hellish Miasma, as well, but that clearly wasn't the case. It was just about as bad as it had been when Gardranda'd given me these debuffs.

"Perhaps it becomes less effective on stronger creatures," pondered Nemesis. "Your level is low, so it seems like its effect on you is still powerful."

"Y-You might be right..." I muttered.

When examining the way the debuffs were applied and the relationship between Burns and Charring, I began to believe that some debuffs could change depending on how great the cause was. Say someone got attacked by something that applied debuffs, causing the attacked person's debuff “level” to rise and make a debuff appear. Would it really be strange for a continued barrage of such attacks to stack the debuff level and make the illness more serious?

In other words, breathing the miasma for too long might cause some new debuffs to appear, I theorized. ...Not that I’m willing to try it.

“But man, this is bad,” I said. “I might have to go back to the city by crawling on all fours.”

“That would be quite unsightly,” said Nemesis. “Oh...?”

As I looked to where Gideon was — still lying on the ground — a shadow came over me.

I realized that someone was standing behind me, so I slowly got up and looked at who it was. I wasn’t in a hurry because I was still under the effects of the debuffs and could simply feel that the presence wasn’t hostile, unlike the Goblins and such.

“...Eh?” I said, startled.

That assumption of mine had turned out to be both correct and wrong. The thing was definitely not a monster. However, it was clearly a creature one had to be cautious with.

“...”

It was a penguin. A large, bear-sized penguin suit was looking down at me.

“Huh?!” I hastily tried to back away, but the debuffs rendered me unable to move as I pleased. Even as I began to panic, the penguin did nothing but continue to watch me, completely immobile.

“...Did Brother Bear get himself a new suit?” asked Nemesis.

“No, it’s not my brother,” I answered.

However, it didn’t seem like a monster or a player killer, either.

It seemed like all it did was observe me.

“What the hell are you?” I asked.

“What am I, you ask? Heh heh heh heh... Oops!” In response to my question, the penguin completely destroyed his — the voice was male — silence and immobility and jumped upwards.

After making a number of mid-air spins, he landed and took a V-like pose.

“My name is Fla...MINGO! Call me Dr. Flamingo, if you will.”

...What a weirdo. I thought.

“Would you say that suits are a signal for oddballs?” asked Nemesis.

We only have two so far, I thought. If we find a third suited weirdo, I’ll accept this theory of yours.

Putting that aside, however...

“Flamingo?” I raised an eyebrow. “That’s a penguin suit, isn’t it?”

It reminded me of Adelie Penguins, common to many aquariums. Its primary colors were black and white, and no one with eyes could mistake it for the flashy, pink bird he’d named himself after.

“Who cares about the details?! What matters here is that you seem to be in a pickle! Do drink this!” The penguin reached for his pocket — which was in the suit’s stomach area — and took out a medicine bottle with liquid inside it.

“And this is?” I asked.

“A drug that removes debuffs!” he answered. “It instantly takes care of all disease-based status effects!”

I didn’t know how to respond. If he wasn’t lying, I would gladly chug it down, but I had basically no reason to believe such a blatantly suspicious penguin.

“Isn’t this a trap?” asked Nemesis.

I had gone through Lei-Lei’s lesson with the fake alcohol and knew the dangers of such offers, but if this penguin had had any intention to hurt me, he would’ve done it while I was writhing around due to the debuffs. He’d had no reason to prepare a trap for me.

“Thanks.” I took the drug from the penguin’s hand, activated Reversal just to be on the safe side, and slowly drank it down.

...Hey, this is pretty good, I thought. It had the taste of mixed fruit juice.

Soon after I drank it, the debuffs burdening my body quickly faded away...

“Drank it all, didn’t you?” spoke the penguin.

...and, at the same time, I was attacked by a sudden, powerful headache.

“Huh?! You little...!” I growled.

“So it was a trap!” exclaimed Nemesis.

The headache made me fall to my knees and grab hold of my head.

“I’ve been watching you and thinking...” said the penguin. “...‘What kind of drug would suit him best?’” The pain continued to get worse.

“It didn’t take long for me to come to a conclusion! It simply had to be this prototype!” he declared.

Soon enough, the headache became completely unbearable... and then it disappeared as if it had never been there.

“Huh?”

What was that all about? I thought. The headache had faded away and not caused anything to happen.

The penguin that drugged me seemed to be strangely satisfied. Not that I saw his face, but still.

“Hey, what the hell did you make me dri—?!”

“M-Master!” Nemesis cut me off. “Ears! Your ears!”

In response to her words, I reached for my ears, but didn’t find anything wrong with them.

“Not those ears! The ones above!” she exclaimed.

The ears above? I thought. But I only have one set of ear—

Suddenly, I felt something fluffy.

“Hm...?”

What was that strange sensation? I once again reached for the place I’d just touched — the area between the temporal region and calvaria. And again, I felt something fluffy. It was actually kinda pleasant to the touch. It reminded me of the ears of a Siberian husky I used to have...

“YES! I knew those ears would look great on you!” From seemingly nowhere, the penguin took out a full-length mirror. In it, I saw myself...

...with dog ears — as golden as my hair — sticking out of my head.

“...” ...Wha— “WHAT THE HELL IS THIS?!”

◇

"I happen to be a humble Researcher, and I merely wanted to test my very own Animal Ear Drug," the penguin explained. "When I went around to look for a convenient guinea pig, I stumbled upon you, just lying there on the ground. Not letting this divine opportunity go to waste, I mixed and blended a drug that removed your status effects with the drug I wished to test. My evaluation didn't fail me! The Animal Ear Drug was a success, and the dog ears look absolutely perfect on you! ...I'm sorry, I am so sorry! I'll genuflect and apologize, so could you please withdraw your sword? You'll tear my suit! Please stop! It might reach my throat!"

I pushed Nemesis against the mad scientist penguin's throat as I found out that I'd been used as his guinea pig.

Forgive me, Lei-Lei, I thought. I deserve this for failing to follow your advice. But man, isn't this a bit too much?

"I'm not too big on fashion, but there are three things I've decided to never wear under any circumstances," I spoke.

"A-And those are?" asked Nemesis.

"Glasses, girl's clothing, and animal ear headbands."

Naturally, this turn of events was quite upsetting.

"Master," said Nemesis, "you are more averse to glasses than girl's clothing?"

"Glasses are great," said the penguin. "This pair, for example, gives you various skills and—"

"Shut up!" I cut his words short.

"Th-That sounded like you intend to kill him," commented Nemesis.

"I'm shorryy!" cried the penguin.

No glasses, not ever, I thought.

"Well... what the hell do I do now?" I tried to hide the dog ears with some random headgear, but I couldn't equip anything. They all got rejected like magnets of the same pole. I brought up my equipment window, and it said that I already had "Dog Ears" equipped on my head. Apparently, as is normal in most such games, you could only wear a single piece of equipment in each slot.

By the way, these Dog Ears had no bonuses or skills on them. It was an item that only changed my appearance. However, just like a generic cursed object straight out of your average RPG, it couldn't be removed through the equipment window.

There were also no relevant status effects to accompany that function, and Reversal couldn't do anything about it, either.

"How do you fix this?" I asked.

"It's growing out of your head, so you can't just take it off," said the penguin. "It's like a sub-type of hair makeovers."

Man, that's annoying, I thought.

"Oh, but it should disappear after some time," he continued. "If I had to guess, it will happen sometime in the evening."

"By which time standard?" I asked.

"This world's, of course."

That was the equivalent of ten hours here or three hours in reality.

"Then I guess I'll just log out until that time comes," I said. I didn't want anyone I knew to see me like this.

"Oh no, time when you're logged out wouldn't count," the penguin said. "It would be boring if it did."

...This mad penguin just said the word "boring," didn't he?

"Hhaah... All right," I sighed, resigned. "Guess I'll just continue like this, then..."

Having to go about with something like this on my head was somewhat embarrassing. But when compared to having to wear glasses... hey, I guess this ain't all that bad, I thought.

"Just what did glasses ever do to you?" asked Nemesis.

Not gonna comment.

"By the way, Ray, my boy," spoke the penguin again.

"What is it?" I asked.

"I have but one humble request." The penguin looked at me with a serious face — not that I could see it, but it felt that way — and stated what he wanted of me. "I want to take a screenshot, so could you take off your clothes? Just the top would be fine."

Without saying a word back, I slashed at him.

"Fwahahahah! Farewell!"

The penguin evaded my attack and quickly ran in the direction of the city.

Man, is he fast, I thought. A penguin has no business being this fleet of foot.

“What do we even make of oddballs like this...?” asked Nemesis.

“No idea. From the fact that he mentioned screenshots, it’s obvious that he’s a Master, but... Hm?” I stopped talking and realized something.

I realized that the penguin had called me by my name before he left. And I definitely hadn’t introduced myself to him...

After that penguin weirdo gave me the dog-ear drug, I made my way back to the city.

Since Gideon was a place where demi-humans weren’t uncommon, the guards didn’t make any comments about my new appearance.

I could hear one of them whisper, “Huh? Did that guy have those ears when he greeted us in the morning...? Guess I wasn’t fully awake,” but that was the extent of it.

“All right, what now?” I asked myself.

Prior to the testing, I’d had plans to go say hello to Alejandro, buy some new equipment, and perhaps even go hunting alongside Rook and Marie, provided they were online. As things were now, however, I didn’t want to encounter anyone I knew. Being seen with these dog ears on my head would be downright degrading.

“I don’t see why it bothers you that much,” said Nemesis.

It’d be weirder if it didn’t bother me, I thought. Imagine a scenario where a good friend suddenly appears before you with a pair of dog ears coming out of his head.

I was fully confident that such a sight would be etched onto my brain forever.

I’m strongly averse to the idea of that happening, so I don’t want to see anyone I kno—

“Ah, Ray, Nemesis. Good morning,” a feminine voice reached my ears before I could finish my thought.

I had no words for this situation.

Seriously?! You do this to me right when I was thinking that?! I thought.

“Well, if it isn’t Marie,” said Nemesis.

“Indeed it is,” replied the Journalist.

“Now, Ray, why do you have such a unique look on your fa...” Marie stopped talking and fixed her gaze on the things sprouting out of my head.

Crap, she's staring at them, I silently panicked. She's seriously eyeballing them.

I had to clear things up before she thought I was some weirdo who got his kicks from wearing dog ears.

"Marie, just so you know, this isn't my thin—"

"Don't say anything, Ray!" she cut me off.

"Excuse me?!" The vigor in her words made me stiffen up and rendered me unable to continue what I wanted to say. With her gaze still fixed on me, Marie reached into her wristband-shaped inventory and took something out. It was...

"A sketchbook and... a pen?" I looked at the items with questioning eyes.

Just like she had during the minion capacity explanation, Marie began drawing something at an incredible speed. I wasn't knowledgeable about the subject of drawing, but I couldn't help but question if it was really possible for such a coherent picture to have come from such fast movements. With nimble strokes, she drew the outline, the hair, the details on the face and — of course — the dog ears.

"Phew," she sighed. Two minutes later, Marie finally took the pen away from the paper and put up a satisfied expression. On the sketchbook in her hands, there was a ridiculously well-drawn picture of a blond youth with dog ears and no upper clothing.

...Huh? Is this me? But I still have my clothes on, I thought.

"Impressive," said Nemesis.

"Well, yeah, it's good, but... It's good, but I, uh..." I stumbled.

It was definitely a high-quality drawing, but I had no idea how to react to a depiction of a shirtless me with dog ears. The art style was a perfect fit for those monthly magazines that were aimed at teenage boys, but which happened to have a lot of female readers, and that made it even harder for me to comment on it.

"Is there a Drawing skill or something?" I asked.

"It's included among the sense skills, yes, but this is all me," Marie answered.

Oh, so she's good at drawing in real life, I thought.

"So, Ray, how did you end up with such a splendid pair of dog ears?" she asked.

“...A penguin drugged me.” I told her the details of my encounter with Mister Flamingo.

“I must say, that penguin has some great taste,” said Marie. “I’ll make sure to buy some of that Animal Ear Drug if it ever gets on the market.”

“Not that I’d stop you, but... are you serious?” I asked.

“Very,” she answered. “By the way, Ray. Dog ears look great on you, but I think that tiger or fox ears wou—”

“Whoa, now! Don’t think of using it on me!” I cut her off.

“...Tch.”

Did this shady Journalist just click her tongue?! I thought in disbelief.

“Anyway, you said that the effect wears off in the evening,” she said, changing the subject. “What do you plan to do until then?”

“I was thinking of paying a visit to Alejandro’s shop, but I can’t really do that with these things popping out of my head,” I answered. I didn’t want people to see them.

Although it may be a lost cause, considering they’ve already been seen by someone I know, I thought.

“Hmm, I really don’t think it’s such a big deal,” said Marie. “You shouldn’t be so self-conscious about them.”

“But—”

“You’d be hard-pressed to find a tian who’d be surprised by a Master who suddenly grew a pair of animal ears,” she cut me off and explained. “To most tians, we Masters are creatures that exist outside the boundaries of common sense.”

Is that how it is? I asked myself. Well, now that I think about it, the King of Destruction destroyed a whole forest in a single night, so it’s perfectly reasonable for tians to see us that way.

“Guess I’ll go to Alejandro’s place, then,” I sighed.

“I’m still busy with something, so I can’t join you,” said Marie.

“Busy?” I asked.

“Various preparations and all that,” she responded, but didn’t make anything clear. “Speaking of which, don’t forget to meet up with me tomorrow afternoon.”

“Yeah, I remember the plan,” I said. “What are you preparing, anyway?”

“It’s a secret,” she answered. “See you tomorrow!”

With those words as her last, Marie ran off towards an uncertain direction. I couldn't help but wonder what kind of surprise she had in store for us.

After splitting up with Marie, Nemesis and I made our way to the shop address Alejandro had given us yesterday, which was located in Gideon's fourth district.

Gideon was a circular city split into twelve districts — making it seem much like a sliced cake — and the fourth was an area focused on trade. Making my way through the bazaars while trying not to get lost among all the people and other things, I somehow arrived at Alejandro's shop.

The large building had a sign that said "The Alejandro Company." I peeked inside and saw a variety of goods being sold. Obviously, there were weapons, armor, and healing items, but I also noticed works of art such as paintings and statues. There were fruit and other foods, as well, and they created quite a contrast with the rows of Jewels on display. The place was much like a department store.

"Good morning," I said as I came in. A moment later, a young girl — clearly an employee — ran up to me.

"Is Alejandro here right now?" I asked.

"Oh! You're the Master from the day before yesterday!" she exclaimed. "Thank you very much for what you did back then! I'll call the owner immediately!" The girl trotted off deeper into the shop.

From her words, it was pretty obvious that she had been one of the tians riding the carriages when Gardranda had attacked. I couldn't tell if I'd seen her back then, though. Things had been pretty hectic, after all.

"What a fidgety young girl," said Nemesis. "From the air about her, I assume that she has the makings of a 'klutz.'"

Not sure how I feel about summarizing people with a single word, I thought. What word would you summarize yourself with, Nemesis?

"Goddess," she answered with no hesitation.

Well, your name is that of a goddess, yeah, but I'd say you're better summed up as an "old loli ha-" I thought willfully.

"Hey! What were you about to think just now?!" Nemesis exclaimed.

"Ha ha ha, don't be so loud," I said. "You'll disturb the other customers."

"That laugh was so forced!" she shouted, seeing right through me.

As we were fooling around, Alejandro walked out from the shop's inner quarters.

“Well, if it isn’t Mr. Ray,” he said. “You are most welcome here.”

“Hello,” I greeted him. “Since you insisted that I pay a visit, I came to take a look at your wares.”

“Oh, please do,” he said. “Look at them for as long as you like. You get a discount on everything I have.”

“Thank you,” I said.

I had to get a lot of new gear appropriate to my current level, so a discount was very welcome.

Also, there was something I couldn’t help but notice. The female employee and Alejandro weren’t making any comments about my dog ears. Sure, the girl gave them a few involuntary glances, but she didn’t say anything at all. Alejandro, on the other hand, acted as though the ears didn’t even exist. A pro if I ever saw one.

Perhaps Marie was right about tians not being mindful of such things happening with Masters.

I was thankful for that. Having to explain the dog ears to every single person I encountered would’ve been really annoying.

Now, I can only hope they disappear before I meet Rook again, I thought.

“Oh, look, it’s Ray and Nemesis,” said someone in the shop. “Good morning. Nice to see that you’re already logged in.”

“Helloo,” followed a feminine voice. “Oh? Why do you have those ears, Ray?”

I turned to see Rook and Babi, who had — apparently — been shopping here before we came in.

I had no words. This is the second time today that my hope has died the very moment I created it, I thought. Are these dog ears cursed or something?

“If you consider everything that’s happened ever since you logged in this morning, the cursed item here might be the Miasmaflame Bracers, not the ears,” said Nemesis.

...You have a point, I thought.

“Ray, how did you end up with that nice pair of ears?” asked Rook.

“It’s a result of this and that happening because of so on and so on,” I said.

"Surely you're not expecting him to understand that," commented Nemesis.

"I see," said Rook. "You ended up like that because a shady person tricked you into drinking some drug, right?"

"He actually got it right?!" Nemesis and I couldn't hide our surprise.

Are you an esper or something? I thought.

"No, this isn't a superpower or anything like that," he answered to my thought. "This level of 'mind reading' is easy once you get the hang of it."

"How can you call it easy when you're talking to my thoughts as naturally as Nemesis does?!" I asked, still perplexed.

"Ohh... what a heavy blow to my identity." Shocked for some reason, Nemesis fell to her knees.

"That's pretty amazing, Rook," I said. "You'd be unbeatable when playing old maid."

"Old maid, huh..." he said. "I don't think this ability of mine would be this precise with anyone I don't know, though. The most I can do with strangers is tell how they feel and notice if they have any ulterior motives."

That's still pretty amazing, I thought.

After Rook surprised us with his special ability, we began looking at the wares on sale here.

"Why are you here, anyway?" I asked him. "To say hi and buy some new gear, I assume?"

"Yes," he answered. "Not just for me and Babi, either. I found out that I can get weapons for Marilyn and Audrey, as well. Also, we went hunting yesterday, so I have some drops to sell."

So there's monster gear here, too, huh? I thought. This shop sure has a wide variety of items.

"Hunting, eh?" I said. "What level are you now?"

"48," he answered.

...H-He's about to reach the maximum level a low-rank job can get, I thought. It's almost two times greater than my level. How am I supposed to feel about this?

"Looks like someone got real busy during the day I was offline..." I muttered.

I could only assume that having Marilyn and Audrey had made his hunting that much more effective. Heck, Rook and Babi were absolute terrors in large-scale battles by themselves.

"I'm about to reach level 50, so I'll have to start working towards switching to a high-rank job soon," said Rook.

"Do you have anything in mind?" I asked.

"Yes, I did my research and found out that a Pimp's high-rank job is called the 'Lost Heart,'" he answered.

Lost Heart, eh? I thought. It was a reference to the Japanese word used to describe a person who'd lost all the eight virtues as they were presented in works such as The Eight Dog Chronicles. The term also referred to people who managed brothels. Quite the unique naming choice.

"Here are the requirements." Rook took out a Catalog and showed me the Lost Heart's page.

Requirement no. 1: Reach level 50 as Pimp.
Requirement no. 2: The sum total of all underling female monster and slave stats must be above a certain point.
Requirement no. 3: The total money gained by making the underling female monsters and slaves work must be above 1,000,000 lir.

"I see," I said. Unlike Paladin, it didn't have any requirements that involved human relations or some special victories. In fact, everything could be achieved by simply playing Pimp for a certain amount of time. These requirements could've been one of the reasons why it wasn't classified as a battle-focused job.

Even though Rook makes it look far more formidable than most battle jobs, I thought.

"I'm about to reach level 50, and the second requirement is already fulfilled," said Rook. "The third one is gonna take a while, though."

"Yeah, that seems like a lot of work," I agreed.

Is it even possible for a Pimp to make money by using creatures such as Marilyn and Audrey? I thought.

"I feel like they would be very efficient in construction sites," said Rook.

I said, "I think that one of the retro games my brother owns had some tamed monster running around a construction site... Hm?"

I belatedly noticed that Rook was wearing a different outfit than he had yesterday. It was a coat that seemed to emit a strange, silver shine.

Well, this looks new, I thought.

“That’s an awesome-looking coat, Rook,” I said. The details on the décor were elaborate, and the metallic gleam was damn cool.

Its sleeves had different lengths, which made it seem very stylish, and Rook — handsome as he was — made it all come together in the best of ways. He hadn’t been wearing it yesterday, so I could only assume that he’d gotten it while I was offline.

“Oh, yes. I like Liz a lot,” he said.

Enough to give it a name? I raised an eyebrow.

Suddenly, the coat seemed to move in an unnatural manner. I had no idea why, but the movement seemed somehow happy.

While doing this and that, I finished choosing everything I needed. Since I was going to wear the Miasmaflame Bracers no matter what, I didn’t go for set armors like the Riot series items.

In my case, one of the most important pieces of equipment was the chest armor, and since Rook looked really cool in that coat of his, I went for a coat-type piece, as well. It had the name "Blaze Metal Scale Coat."

It was created by taking a coat made from the skins of red, wolf-type monsters and strengthening it with many metal scales. It had two skills on it — “Fire Affinity” and “Fire Resistance.” The former increased the damage of my fire-based attacks by 10%, while the other reduced the damage I took from fire by the same amount, giving it good synergy with Purgatorial Flames. Sure, it was a luxury item that’d cost me a whole 80,000 lir, but I had no regrets about choosing it.

I got some other equipment to go with it and made my way to the counter to buy it all.

“Eh?” Right next to the counter, there was a device you’d often see in reality.

It was a rectangular case with many round capsules inside it and a lever on its side. By putting money inside it, you could pull on the lever and make one of the capsules pop out.

It was basically a gacha vending machine.

◇

Gacha vending machines had existed since long before I was born.

I could remember when I used to go to the machines dedicated to my favorite anime or games, pop in 100 yen, pull the lever, and get a random toy related to those series. It was fun because you never knew what you were going to get, and because of that, those memories were dear to me.

However, in-game gacha machines were a completely different beast.

Some time ago, there used to be a game genre known as "social games." They could be played on mobile devices and PC browsers, and you could start them without paying any money whatsoever.

Social games were many and varied. Some were fantasy games with equipment systems, while others revolved around monster growing, robot squad creation, or even idol producer work. The games were free, but if the players wished to get high-quality weapons, armor, monsters, robots, or idols, they had to pay additional money.

The most popular method of distributing such treasures was the real money gacha machine. For about 300 yen, the player could pull the virtual machine's lever and get a random item. The items had levels of rarity, and the rarest items of all had the lowest chances of popping out.

Rarity was often related to quality, too. To either win at the games, boast to others, or simply to enjoy their idols, the players would pull the lever. They would do it over and over until they got what they wanted.

However, it was all just data. The companies would never lose anything, no matter how many high-quality, high-rarity pulls the players got. Many players' desire to get the good stuff only increased with every bad thing they pulled, making them throw even more money at the game.

As a result, there had been many players who would spend 100,000 yen on the games every month. Some would even go above and beyond and break the 1,000,000 barrier.

It had been a very real, very dark time, indeed...

◇

With that in mind, the gacha before me takes lir instead of real money, so it's not a big deal if I pull it once or twice, right? I thought.

"...I see that all those thoughts just now were nothing but a big excuse to do it," said Nemesis.

“Well, yeah, I want to pull it, after all,” I said. I really enjoyed the excitement involved in pulling on gachas and buying random card packs.

All right, back to the thing before me... I thought and looked at the machine. Though its shape was familiar, there were several differences between it and the gachas I knew.

First of all, it was possible to choose the amount of money you wanted to put in. There was a short line before it, and I noticed that some threw single 100 lir coins, while others went in with as much as 10,000 lir.

According to the explanation on the machine, the items that could pop out had rarities from S to F.

Rank C items were worth as much as the money put in.

Rank F — the lowest rank — items were worth only 1% of the money put in.

Rank S — the highest rank — items were worth 100+ times more than the money put in.

The minimum amount of money you could put in was 100 lir, while the maximum was 100,000.

As was natural, low risk meant low reward and high risk meant high reward.

“But doesn’t that make it hard to keep track of the items inside and manage the quality of what pops out?” I asked an employee, and the answer I got was one I’d never have expected.

“It doesn’t work the way you think,” she said. “While it is true that we manage this magic item itself, we have nothing to do with the prizes inside or the money used on it.”

According to her, this gacha machine had originally been a rare item found in the Tomb Labyrinth.

It wasn’t a one-of-a-kind, either. There were records of other people getting these, and some had tried to take them apart and take the prizes by force. Apparently, the effort involved was insane, and yet those who succeeded had found out that the inside of the machine was completely empty.

Thus, everyone had begun to assume that the money offered to it made the machine magically summon an appropriate item. And since it was impossible to retrieve the money used, the gacha definitely wasn’t a part of any successful business model.

"However, the owner believes that it works to attract customers, so we keep it here for everyone's convenience," said the employee. "We also made it a rule that only paying customers can use it."

A wise decision, indeed, for it created a decent flow of money from those who only came here for the machine. I now had no doubts that Alejandro was highly skilled as a manager.

"How did he come to have it, anyway?" I asked.

"When its previous owner ran out of money, he had to part with a lot of property," she said. "This was among the items, and our owner bought it."

"...And the reason for the previous owner going broke was...?"

"...Exactly what you imagine," she said.

So he went broke because he pulled on this thing a bit too much, huh? I thought. That might've been another reason why Alejandro was using it for nothing more but attracting customers.

Anyway, I'd grown interested in the gacha machine, so I thanked the employee that told me about it and took my place at the end of the line.

"So, how much do you plan on spending?" asked Nemesis.

"100,000 li—GUH!"

The moment I answered, she hit me with a blow to my stomach. It came from a really good angle, so it actually made me bend forward.

"How can you let yourself use such a great amount of money right after hearing about someone who lost it all because of it?!" she exclaimed.

"I-I know that 100,000 lir is a lot, but I might pull something really good if I'm lucky..." I said.

"This reeks of a scenario where you get something worthless, if you ask me."

Well, if something like that happens, we'll have something to look back at and laugh about later down the line, I thought.

She sighed. "I hope you don't regret this."

"I'm sure I won't," I said.

Soon enough, it was my turn, so I put ten 10,000 lir coins into the gacha. Once done with that, I pulled the lever, making the machine release a single capsule. The thing had the letter C on it. According to the explanation, the thing inside had the same value as the money I'd put in, so it wasn't a loss.

Excitedly, I opened the capsule and made the item inside it pop out.

Tomb Labyrinth Exploration Permit.

Seeing the familiar item made me drop to my knees.

"Ohh... nooooooo..." I groaned. I could almost hear the thing greet me with a smug "Hey there! it's been a while!"

"Oh dear, a double," said Nemesis.

Well yeah, it's worth 100,000 lir, but... but I... I moaned silently.

"Rook... take it," I said, presenting the paper to him.

"Are you sure? Isn't this a decent pull?" he asked.

"It is, but I already have one, and you don't need more than one..."

Hell, being a Paladin, I don't need even one... I thought.

"Th-Thank you," Rook said gratefully. "Umm, shall we go explore it sometime?"

"That's a good idea..." I replied with little enthusiasm. It really was a good idea, though, since I hadn't gone beyond the first floor there.

All right, time to pull myself together, and...

"One more," I said.

"Haven't you learned your lesson?!" exclaimed Nemesis.

"Come on! There's no way I'll get another one of the Permits! I'm sure I'll pull something good this time!" I said.

"That's what every gambler thinks before losing it all!"

Despite Nemesis' disapproval, I stood in the line again and got ready for a second try.

Like last time, I went with 100,000 lir. Considering the total cost of the equipment I was buying, this was my last chance.

I pulled on the lever while praying to God, Buddha, or whatever was listening.

And the result was...

"...What?" I raised an eyebrow.

The capsule had popped out as normal, but the rarity displayed on it wasn't even in the range of S to F.

It simply said "X."

Is this above S? Or is the X actually a cross that makes it as worse than F? I was thoroughly confused. There was a little warning on it, saying, "Open only in spacious areas." I asked an employee about it, and she said that warning appeared on any capsules that contained something large, like a carriage. That meant that this capsule had something sizable inside it.

Also, the employee said that this was the first time she'd ever seen a capsule with X rarity on it.

I have no idea how to feel about that, I thought.

Whatever the case, since I could only open it in spacious areas, I chose not to open it inside the shop. I kept it in capsule form and placed it inside my inventory.

Okay, now that I've calmed down, there's something to consider, I thought.

One pull had cost me 100,000 lir.

My new equipment had a combined cost of 110,000 lir.

...That comparison made me aware of just how expensive the pulls were. In terms of rarity, I hadn't really experienced a loss, but I couldn't help but feel off.

"That's what you get for gambling away 200,000 lir," said Nemesis.

I was in no position to say anything to that.

By the time I finished buying my equipment, Rook was trying his own luck on the gacha.

Apparently, seeing me try it got him interested, too.

"...You didn't really have to copy the amount of money I used, though," I muttered. Hoping that his 100,000 wouldn't go to waste, I looked at what he got, and...

And, uh... Huh?

Silence overwhelmed the entire shop. The shock was shared by everyone inside, except Rook.

Nemesis, I, the employees, and the other customers were all at a loss for words.

The capsule in Rook's hand was rainbow-patterned.

It seemed to be made from a mineral so vivid that it looked like a rare item by itself.

Its surface had a large S on it.

Rook had actually pulled something great on his first try.

"Ah, Ray! I think I got something good!" he said.

"C-Congratulations!" My shock made me unintentionally raise my voice.

"Rook, let's hurry up and open it!" Babi cried.

"Y-Yes! Let's find out what you have received!" Nemesis agreed.

Since he'd used 100,000 lir, and the value of an S rarity prize was 100 times greater, the item inside should be worth 100,000,000 lir.

Naturally, something that amazing interested not only us, but the shop employees and other customers, as well.

Rook's capsule didn't have any warnings on it, so he opened it on the spot.

What came out was a pair of gloves, long enough to cover the elbows. Made from a blue, leather-like material, they were decorated by an intricate pattern of golden metal.

"'Touch of the Silencer, Veltboule'?" Rook's mutter made me tilt my head.

That naming style was similar to the one on my special reward — "Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda." Such special rewards should be impossible to gain without defeating an UBM, and there was no way to transfer them to others, either.

"...Whoa," Rook said. He was looking at the details of the item — Touch of the Silencer, Veltboule — and couldn't hide his amazement. His face was downright stiff, and it was probably the first time I'd seen him make such an expression.

"So, what kind of item is it, Rook?" I asked.

Looking around, I noticed that some customers — likely Masters and tians with a high Identification skill — seemed as dumbfounded as Rook was.

Okay, now I'm dying to know more about it, I thought.

"Basically, this is an MVP special reward for defeating a UBM," he said.

"Are you serious?" I asked in disbelief.

"Yes," he answered. "Let me tell you the details elsewhere."

After he said that, Rook and I left the shop. As I walked away, I glanced back inside and saw that the line for the gacha had gotten longer and that just about everyone was preparing 100,000 lir.

Apparently, finding out that you could pull UBM special rewards had gotten them all hyped up.

...I hope no one goes broke, I thought.

◇

The place Rook took me to was the room he'd rented at the inn. Rook had clearly learned something that couldn't be heard by other people.

"Basically, this is a special reward that no longer has an owner," he said.

"What do you mean?" I asked.

He explained.

First of all, standard special rewards could only be used by the owner and couldn't be transferred to other people in any way.

However, there was one exception to this rule... and it happened when the owner was a tian who died.

In such cases, the special reward would be automatically retrieved from the body and become either an ultra rare drop in the deeper levels of created dungeons or — as it had been in this case — a high-risk gacha prize.

From that, I could easily understand why he'd gotten all secretive about it.

"You think there'd be more tian-killing if people found out about this, huh?" I asked.

"Yes," he answered.

I had no idea how many special reward-owning tians there were, but I couldn't be certain that there weren't any Masters who would kill them just to increase their chances of getting such items. At the very least, we sure as hell didn't want to be the root cause of such killings. That was the reason why Rook hadn't said that in public.

"Are you sure it didn't slip?" I asked. "What if someone with a high Identification skill saw that part of the description?"

"It wasn't in the item description, but in a personal message," he explained. "No one knows this, I'm sure."

"All's good, then," I said.

Though, now that I think about it, I doubt there would be many Masters willing to take the risk, I thought. Tian-killing could get you on the wanted lists, and there was no guarantee that items gotten this way would ever end up in your hands.

"Here are the details of the item." Rook showed me a window that described the Touch of the Silencer.

Touch of the Silencer, Veltboule
Ancient Legendary Item
A treasure embodying the concepts surrounding the sphinx famed for being a “mage killer.”

In addition to increasing the wearer’s magic and special powers, it provides them with a great resistance to mental status effects and attacks.

Just as the description said, the gloves greatly increased the wearer’s resistance to mental debuffs and attacks while also giving a large bonus to MP and SP.

“So, what are the effects of the skills on it?” I asked.

“It’s pretty interesting,” said Rook. “There are two skills on it. I can’t read one yet, but the one that I can use now is called ‘Silence,’ and it cancels any magic-based skills that are in their preparatory stages.”

“Oh?” I asked.

Preparatory stages? What does that mean? I thought.

“Apparently, if an opponent is chanting or getting ready to invoke a magic spell, this skill will nullify it,” he continued. “But it can’t influence any insta-cast skills or magic that has already been cast.”

So it’s the bane of all casters, huh? Seems like it’ll be useful in many scenarios, I thought.

After all, the skill would cancel any spell that hadn’t been cast yet. Magic-based jobs would become powerless when going against him mano a mano.

“If it was originally owned by a tian, then... I see how it is,” I nodded.

The source of this Touch of the Silencer — the UBM known as Veltboule — had clearly been a creature that specialized in killing casters. It had probably been defeated by a tian who had been strong without having to rely on magic. Later on, the tian had died somehow, and this special reward had ended up in Rook’s hands.

“I must say, Rook,” Nemesis spoke up, “You are quite a lucky sort.”

I couldn’t help but agree.

First Marilyn, then Audrey, now this great pull in the gacha... Rook was definitely a very lucky person.

I wonder if that has something to do with him being a good person, I thought.

“But you pulled something good, too, didn’t you, Ray?” he said.

“Oh right, I got this thing.”

Saying that, I took out the X capsule. I couldn't open it here due to the thing inside being a carriage or something, so I decided to do it after going through the northern gate again.

"I'm going to open it. Care to join me?" I asked Rook.

"I can't. I've been getting messages saying that I need to return to reality," he answered.

"Hm? 'Visitor,' I assume?" I asked.

"'Hunger' and 'Lack of Sleep,' actually," he said. "I've been online since yesterday, hunting monsters and leveling. The only food I've eaten was in-game, and I didn't get any sleep at all."

"Holy crap!" I exclaimed. "Get some food, take a bath, and go to sleep already!"

"Ahaha," he laughed awkwardly. "I'll do just that. I'll make sure to wake up in time for Marie's plan."

"Take care of yourself, man."

After I said that, Rook logged out, so I left his room.

I'd never expected Rook to be enough of a no-lifer to forget his own basic needs.

I guess he's just another student using his spring break for some unreasonable levels of gaming, I thought.

And so, I left the inn. The "spacious area" I was most familiar with was the Nex Plains north of Gideon, so I made my way to the city's northern gate.

"Master," Nemesis said, "shouldn't we have lunch now?"

"Oh yeah, I guess we should," I said. "I'll open the capsule after we do that, then."

I'd probably go hunting in the Nex Plains right after seeing what was inside, so having a meal before that was a good idea.

Since it was noon, most of the nearby restaurants were full, so I chose one that seemed somewhat empty by comparison.

"...Huh?" I said in surprise.

Inside the one I'd chosen, I saw that the shopkeeper was being questioned by a certain group. Wearing full plate mail armor and cloaks that had the Kingdom of Altar's crests on them, they asked something of the shopkeeper while showing him a photo-like object.

Realizing that this was why the shop was so empty, I decided to observe them.

From his ragged voice, I could tell that the one asking questions was in a minor state of panic and that the subject matter was serious. However, looking stumped, the shopkeeper only shook his head in response, making it obvious that he couldn’t help them in any way.

After that, a woman from the group tried to calm down her panicked comrade. She was a familiar face.

“Liliana?” I asked.

“Oh? Well, if it isn’t Ray,” she replied.

It was the Kingdom of Altar’s Knights of the Royal Guard, Vice Commander, Paladin Liliana Grandria. I hadn’t seen her since I’d left the royal capital, and by some twist of fate, we had happened to meet again here in the city of duels.

As I was busy being surprised by the encounter, Nemesis telepathically told me something ominous.

“I feel some trouble brewing.”

Chapter Two: Back-Alley Cliché

Paladin Ray Starling

Liliana was the first tian I'd ever spoken to. Her responses had been so natural and she'd seemed so alive that I hadn't been able to see her as a tian — as nothing more but an NPC. That feeling was still alive, and even though I knew I was in a game, I couldn't see her as just a game character.

"It has been a while," she said. "I didn't expect to see you here in Gideon."

"Well, I've only been here for about two days," I said.

Probably due to her being my first personal — and physical — contact in this world, my manner of speaking automatically became somewhat courteous. She'd said that it'd been a while since we'd last met, but it had actually only been about eight days.

Now that I think about it, since I've started playing, only ten days have passed in this world and only three in reality, I thought. Man, this world's days sure are dense.

"I must ask — why the dog ears?" she asked, looking above my head.

"Please don't," I replied. "Way too much has happened. So, why are you here with such a group?"

Liliana seemed to be somewhat troubled, so I decided to ask her about what was going on. She was surrounded by knights wearing similar armor, flags and unit symbols. Liliana was a Paladin and the Vice Commander of the Knights of the Royal Guard. From that, I could assume that the people with her were part of the Royal Guard, too.

"Well, Ray, we—"

"Lady Grandria!" one of them cut her words short. "We cannot let any outsiders know of this!"

It was the same man who'd been questioning the shopkeeper. He was glaring at me — or, rather, at the back of my left hand.

"But Sir Lindos, he is one of us — a Paladin," said Liliana.

"He isn't the same as us just because we share a profession," retorted the man. “This is something we have to do without relying on Masters.”

It was clear by now that he was Liliana’s comrade — a Paladin from the Royal Guard. He also seemed to have a dislike for us players — the Masters.

“It’s only fair for him to hate your kind,” commented Nemesis.

Indeed. The Kingdom of Altar’s Knights of the Royal Guard had reasons to hate us Masters. Altar’s Masters were the ones who hadn’t helped much during the war, and the Imperium’s Masters were the ones who had done the most damage.

The king had even been killed by a Master, so it was only natural for him to hate us.

“But there are things that only they can know,” said Liliana. “We are not in a situation that allows us to choose who we get help from.”

“...That is reasonable,” he said, giving in. “In that case, please search the way you think is best. We will continue looking for her as we were. However, you should only request assistance from those you trust.”

“I understand,” she nodded. “Be careful in your search.”

“Certainly,” he said. “Come, men, we’re continuing this in the fourth district.”

The man Liliana had called Sir Lindos gave the other knights an order, and they all left the shop.

The only ones left inside were Nemesis, Liliana, me, and the shopkeeper, who seemed visibly relieved.

“I see,” said Nemesis. “From how he expressed his dislike for Masters, I thought he was an impulsive sort, but it seems that he’s malleable when he needs to be.”

Or maybe the situation is just grave enough for a Master-hating knight to accept a Master’s help, I thought.

“I am sorry, Ray. Sir Lindos isn’t a bad person or anything, but...” said Liliana.

“No need for that,” I said. “He seemed to be in a hurry.”

“Yes, about that... there is something I’d like to ask you.” With those words, Liliana took out a single photo.

It gave me a minor déjà vu, making me remember the first time I’d met her. However, the person on the photo was different this time.

“Have you seen this girl anywhere?” she asked.

The person on the photo was a young girl. She looked no older than nine. Her face was a strong contestant for the most good-looking one I'd seen so far here in Infinite Dendrogram. Of course, that was only among females. Rook was incontestably at the top if both genders were considered.

The girl in the photo had golden hair done into rolls and coils, and striking blue eyes that seemed to express a strength of heart. I also couldn't help but notice that her clothes were very well-made. I didn't know much about such apparel, but even I could tell that she wore a high-quality dress.

Her appearance, combined with the dignified way she was sitting in the chair, made the photo look like one of those formal marriage meeting photos.

She's a bit too young for that, though, I thought.

Anyway, there was no way I could've missed a person that stood out this much, so...

"I'm sorry, but I haven't seen her," I said. "So, who is she?"

From how the knights were panicking, I could only assume that she was the young lady of some important nobles.

"Eh?! Umm, uhh..." Liliana couldn't hide her surprise at my question and looked at me with a perplexed expression. It wasn't because she had trouble talking about the lady in the picture or anything. The bewilderment seemed too strong for that. She was acting as though I asked her something weird, like the answer to one plus one.

Once she realized that I really didn't know the girl, Liliana gave me the answer.

"This is the Kingdom of Altar's second princess, Elizabeth S. Altar."

"Ohhhhh." It all made sense now.

"When someone asks you something that's supposed to be common knowledge, it's only natural to become perplexed," commented Nemesis. "I'm not one to talk, though. Since we share most of our memories, I didn't know the girl, either."

How unbecoming of a Paladin, I thought of myself. I really should've investigated the ruling structure of the kingdom.

"So," I said. "If you're looking for her, then..."

"Her Highness went missing while we were visiting Gideon, and we of the Royal Guard are now searching for her," she explained.

This seems like some serious trouble, I thought.

Since I didn't know anything, Liliana gave me all the details about the disappearance of the princess.

First of all, she was the daughter of the king who had died in the war with Dryfe. The king had three daughters, but no sons. The missing girl's elder sister — the first princess — was the acting ruler of the country.

The Kingdom of Altar had no rule that prevented females from inheriting the throne, but historically, the country had had more kings than queens.

Due to that, even though a whole six months had passed since the fall of the king, the accession had yet to happen, and Elizabeth was still just "the second princess."

She had come here to Gideon to participate in some official event. She had arrived here and begun staying in Count Gideon's mansion about two days ago.

Yesterday, she had still been there to talk with the count and participate in the preparations for tomorrow's event. Today, she'd had plans to talk with some powerful people of this city. However, when one of Elizabeth's maids had gone to her room this morning, she found no sign of the princess anywhere.

There had been only a piece of paper — marked with the royal seal — that said "I will be back by evening." From the handwriting, it was clear that she hadn't been kidnapped, but had slipped out on her own volition.

Also, it was well known that the princess had wished to look around Gideon, and had become quite upset when she'd found out that she wasn't allowed to.

Additional info: Liliana made sure to be as indirect as possible when saying this, but the princess was whimsical, excessively vigorous, terribly insolent, and so full of curiosity that it was troubling.

Basically, the princess had slipped out of her roles just so she could go sightseeing in Gideon.

Of course, the Royal Guard couldn't just let her walk around the city by herself, so, naturally, they'd begun searching for her.

If there was one thing I could say to this situation...

"Don't you think you should up your security?" I asked.

I mean, they let this little girl slip past them. That's clearly not right.

"You are completely right about that..." she said.

But it turned out they'd actually had a valid excuse.

During the time period in which the princess had made her escape, there'd been a certain bit of trouble.

It had happened in the process of passing the role of protecting the princess from the Third Order of Knights to the Knights of the Royal Guard. It didn't seem like that could ever be particularly troublesome, but there had been a reason for it being so.

The princess' visit to this city had been planned a long time ago. Back then, it had been decided that her protection — from the moment she left the capital until she finished her business in Gideon and was safely back home — would be in the hands of the Royal Guard.

However, the player killer incident had made them postpone the day they'd left the capital.

Once the killers had been taken care of, they had finally been able to leave, but there had been a whole new problem. It was the event that — as we'd confirmed with our own eyes — had reduced Noz Forest to cinders.

Most assumed that the one responsible was King of Destruction the Unknown, but there was no proof of that.

However, it had to be known, so the role of meeting the King of Destruction and asking him about it had been given to the only one in the kingdom who knew him personally — Liliana. Apparently, everyone else who had been acquainted with him had died in the war.

Liliana was the Vice Commander of the Knights of the Royal Guard. However, since the Commander's seat was empty, she was basically the top of the order.

Since there were some problems with the prospect of the Royal Guard protecting the princess without Liliana's presence, the role had been hastily given to the Third Order of Knights. It had needed to be done because the princess' leave had already been belated due to the player killer incident, and they hadn't been able to afford any more delays. But that was the very cause of the trouble.

After she had finished questioning the King of Destruction about his role in the Noz Forest incident, Liliana and her Royal Guard had made their way to Gideon and arrived today, early in the morning. Right upon arriving, she had tried to take the role of protecting the princess from the Third Order of Knights.

During that process, both groups had looked at each others' documents and found out that there were some inconsistencies. The inconsistencies were so big, in fact, that no one could even believe that they'd actually happened.

They had all had to compare and adjust the documents they had while occasionally using magic communication tools to contact and confirm certain points with the people in the capital, and that had cost them more than an hour of time. Once they had finished that and mentally prepared themselves to protect Her Highness, they'd found out that the princess had disappeared.

"...Oh man," I said.

She had probably noticed the trouble going on and seen an opportunity to make her escape.

Sounds like she's a resourceful girl, I thought.

"The document trouble might've been devised by the princess," said Nemesis.

Ha ha ha, as if... I thought. Then I realized, Wait, you know what? You might actually be right.

Though it was slightly unrelated, Liliana's exchange with the King of Destruction had gone like so:

"Were you the one to do it?"

"YES."

"Why?"

"I was angry, so I just did it. I feel bad about it, though."

"I see. By the way, Noz Forest was a kingdom-owned lumbering ground. I would like you to pay to make up for all the wood you have burned. 130,000,000 lir, please.

"...Take it, you thief!"

"Oh, but I am an authority."

With that, the kingdom had instantly gotten enough money to function despite having lost Noz Forest. Apparently, it had helped them a lot.

I was mostly just surprised that people sitting at the top of the ranks could readily part with that much money.

"But man, he was just 'angry'...? What a troublesome guy," I said.

"Indeed," Liliana agreed. "Make sure to tell him off the next time you meet him."

"Eh? Ah... sure?" I didn't know how to respond.

What makes her think I have anything to do with him? I thought.

After telling me all the circumstances surrounding the princess' escape, Liliana ran off to search for her again.

She seemed to spend a lot of her time looking for people. I could only assume that she'd been born under that kind of star.

"Anyway, though it's a pretty big deal, the princess merely ran away," I said. "We just have to make sure to tell Liliana if we ever see the girl."

She hadn't been kidnapped or anything — she was just sightseeing. It didn't seem like it was something that could leave a bad taste in my mouth.

"I don't think you should be saying anything so careless," said Nemesis. "Try to consider your experiences so far. You seem to be some sort of event magnet. You get into all sorts of happenings, regardless of whether they're related to tians, monsters, or Masters."

...You might be right, I thought. I haven't played the game for too long, yet I've experienced quite a lot.

"I don't know how eventful other Masters' lives are, but don't you think that you're far above the average in that regard?" she asked.

Well, I had been thinking that my days here were pretty dense.

"If that knight girl was born under a star that led her into a life full of searching for people, you might've been born under a star of strife," said Nemesis. "I cannot recommend talking in a manner that could summon more such events."

"You're right," I said. "I'll keep that in mind."

All these exchanges had made me a bit hungry. Hunger was the reason we had come to this shop in the first place, so I began talking to the shopkeeper.

"Excuse me. Can we eat here?" I asked.

"Yes, certainly," he said. "We couldn't do any work until a few moments ago. We have to make up for the time lost."

"Oh yeah, you were questioned." I nodded. "Any specific reasons why?"

“Our shop is popular among young girls, so they probably assumed they could find a trace of the little lady here,” he answered.

“Oh?” Nemesis reacted to something. “‘Popular among young girls,’ you say? Does that mean...?”

“Yes, we have a large selection of sweets,” said the shopkeeper.

Nemesis’ eyes lit up. “Excellent!” she cheered. “Master! Let’s eat to our heart’s content!”

“But I just bought some new gear,” I said. “I’m not sure I want to use much more mon—”

“Two gacha pulls, 200,000 lir,” she cut me off.

“I’m sorry. Please eat all you want,” I said, giving in.

An hour later, Nemesis left the shop looking wholly satisfied after having eaten tons of sweets, while I walked out with my hands on my head as I despaired at the state of my inventory, which had less than 10,000 lir remaining.

That’s too much... You ate way too much!

“And yet it still cost less than your gacha shenanigans,” she said.

There was nothing I could say back to that.

“All right, I guess it’s time to go outside and open up the capsule I pulled,” I said.

“Indeed,” Nemesis agreed. “I hope it’s worth more than 200,000 lir.”

...Yes, please, oh God almighty, I thought.

Once again, I went to the Nex Plains, where I’d tested my Miasmaflame Bracers. I distanced myself from Gideon’s walls and stood in the grass several tens of meters away from the main road.

The capsule said, “Open only in spacious areas.” I didn’t know its standards for “spaciousness,” but the place I was standing at was wide enough for an entire house or a ship to pop out without any problem.

“After all, I don’t want to spawn something huge only to have it get stuck on the walls, destroy them, and get me into lots of trouble,” I said.

“Time to open it, then?” asked Nemesis.

I took out the X capsule, twisted it to make it open, and caused something pop out. It reminded me of that long-running game series where you grow monsters and have them fight other monsters.

“It’s a...” I muttered.

I had been steeling myself for the appearance of something as large as a house or a ship, but the thing I'd gotten was nowhere near as big. In fact, it was even smaller than the shop employee's "carriage" example.

It wasn't too far off the mark, though. For what I had gotten was a horse. However, it didn't seem to be a living creature.

The horse was made of a silver-looking metal that was reminiscent of well-polished plate mail. Its shape was blatantly equestrian. It had been forged from what seemed to be armor pieces, and it had glimmering white orbs where its eyes were supposed to be. It could only be described as a "robot horse."

"So, it's not a monster?" asked Nemesis.

I seemed to be its official owner, and its description in my inventory went like so:

Prism Steed, Zephyrus Silver
Special equipment: Mount
One of the five Prism Steeds manufactured by Flagman — an artisan from an ancient civilization.
He who walks inside the wind.
Details unknown.

Details unknown? I raised an eyebrow. All the description had told me was that it was rideable and that it had a relation to the wind. With questioning eyes, I looked at both the window with the description and the Prism Steed, Zephyrus Silver — who I chose to call just "Silver."

Silver didn't seem to care, and only continued to stand in the field.

Upon further inspection, I noticed that his head didn't seem to have a mouth. The description said that he was manufactured by an artisan called Flagman, so it was obvious that he was a robot. However, he occasionally released sounds similar to neighs, kicked the ground with his hoof every now and then, and moved his fiber-made tail in a very horse-like manner.

The way it was impossible to tell which part of the sky he was looking at made him seem somewhat cat-like.

"How about riding him?" suggested Nemesis.

Good idea, I thought. Thankfully, Silver already had a saddle and reins, so I wouldn't have any problems getting on.

I closed in on him while being wary of kicks or something like that, but he turned out to be very obedient.

Once I took the reins, he lowered himself in a way that made his stomach partly touch the ground, making it easy for me to get on.

What a well-trained and friendly horse, I thought. It was strange that he was actually a robot.

I was quickly growing fond of him. I wanted to get on and speed through these fields on him.

After I sat down in the saddle, I placed my feet in the stirrups. After I did that, Silver stood up.

“Wow...” I murmured.

The view from atop of a horse was slightly moving. My visual point was much higher than when I stood on my own two feet, or when I’d ridden a pony when I was young.

Silver moved his hooves in a way that made it seem as though he wanted to dash through the fields right now.

“Be careful,” warned Nemesis.

Riding together with Nemesis seemed pretty hard, so for now, I had her wait while I tried riding Silver by myself. I’d give her a chance to try after a short run.

“All right, let’s go,” I said. “Hi-yo, Silver! Away!”

Saying those words I’ve always wanted to say, I threw the reins, and at that moment, the sky and ground were reversed.

Unable to tell which way was really up, I felt as if I was falling upwards.

I could see Nemesis, who looked completely taken aback.

I could hear the sound of Silver running through the fields.

With my five senses in such a state, I fell to the ground — head first.

“Good thing it’s just grass,” Nemesis said that while looking down on me.

With my hand on top of my slightly creaking neck, I used healing magic on myself.

Silver was looking at me, and I couldn’t tell whether he was worried or didn’t think anything at all.

“I never would’ve expected you to fall off on the very first step,” said Nemesis.

Same here, I thought. I’d fallen off the very moment Silver had begun to run.

“You had a small audience looking at you from the main road,” said Nemesis. “They all made expressions much like mine when they saw what happened.”

That seemed like an appropriate reaction, honestly.

“...Why did that happen, though?” I couldn’t help but ask. I hadn’t been riding him in a weird way or anything. The way I’d been thrown off seemed to ignore all laws of physics.

“It’s a wonder, indeed,” Nemesis agreed. “You’re a Paladin, so you should be able ride horses without any problems.”

“Exactly, so... hm?” Realizing something, I took a look at Silver’s skills. There was a total of three — Running, Wind Hoof, and one unknown skill that said “????,” just like a skill on the Miasmaflame Bracers.

I took a look at the details of the “Running” skill.

Allows running while someone is riding. The rider must have either Horse Riding or Riding skills.

“Horse Riding... skill?” I read out loud.

I can’t ride Silver without that skill? I thought. I can only make him walk around?

“Well, you don’t have the skill,” said Nemesis. “Strange, considering that you’re a Paladin.”

“There aren’t many skills I can learn from my job,” I said. The only ones I had so far were Paladin’s Aegis and the low-tier healing magic.

“Strange,” she seemed puzzled. “A Paladin is basically an upgrade to Knight, so you have every reason to have the Horse Riding skill.”

“Yeah,” I agreed. “...Wait, an upgrade?”

Wait, Paladins were upgraded Knights.

The realization of the implications made me break out in a cold sweat.

“Nemesis, I’m going offline for a second.”

“Hm? W-Well, if you insist...”

After logging out, I went on my PC and began doing research on the Horse Riding skill and the relationship between low-rank and high-rank jobs.

Horse Riding was a skill that practically represented the Knight — the low-rank job that usually came before Paladin. Therefore, anyone who took the normal path and became a Paladin after having been a Knight would naturally have the Horse Riding skill. But, due to some twists of fate, I'd ended up skipping Knight and going straight to Paladin.

Doing so had given me a great stat growth and a head start over most newbies. However, the number of skills the Paladin job had given me was really lacking. In fact, I only had a mere two — Paladin's Aegis and First Heal.

Rook had far more, as a Pimp — a low-rank job. I could only assume that skills from high-rank jobs required the player to learn skills from low-rank jobs of the same grouping.

According to the walkthrough wiki, Knights had no access to Paladin's Aegis or any healing spells — they could only be learned after becoming a Paladin. Other skills that could be learned by Paladin were Grand Cross — which was considered to be the job's ultimate attack — and Purifying Silverlight — which no one really knew how to get.

All skills except for these four were extensions of skills learned by Knights. That included offensive and other skills... such as Horse Riding.

I sat at my PC and silently processed the facts.

I didn't have a single offensive Paladin skill. My level was in the mid-20s. I definitely should've had one by now. But I didn't, which meant that my assumption was correct.

Most Paladin skills required the player to learn the skills from the low-rank job of the same grouping — Knight.

Why didn't my brother warn me about this? I thought. ...Oh, I guess he just didn't know anyone who'd started with a high-rank job, so my case was a first to him.

I had a feeling that — like Rook's Lost Heart — many high-rank jobs required the person to have reached the max level on low-rank jobs of the same grouping. Even Paladin requirements weren't ones that could be fulfilled by your standard level 0 newbies, so it was natural for him not to know about this.

"...I see," I muttered. It all made sense now. I couldn't learn the skill and ride Silver without switching to the low-rank job, Knight.

I didn't care much about the offensive skills. I had Nemesis with me, and I'd recently gotten my hands on the Miasmaflame Bracers. However, to ride Silver, I had to find a way to learn the Horse Riding skill.

I searched around for a way to learn it without switching to Knight, and it didn't take long for me to find it.

There was an accessory called "Amulet of the Equestrian Tribe," which gave a +1 to the Horse Riding skill. That was the only thing I would need to be able to ride Silver.

That wasn't all. Jobs which had the aptitude for skills acquired through accessory effects could actually master those skills and make them their own. Since Paladin was an upgrade to Knight, it was obvious that I had the aptitude for Horse Riding.

"Yes! This is it!" I exclaimed.

Quickly concluding that I had to go to Gideon's marketplace and buy one of those accessories, I took a look at how much they went for.

Amulet of the Equestrian Tribe — Market Price: 100,000 lir.

I fell to the ground.

◇

"We have to find ways to get money." I logged back in and stated our next course of action.

"Well, we have less than 10,000 lir left," Nemesis nodded. "We would've had to get money even if we didn't have this problem with Silver."

She was right. We were nearly broke, so we had to do something about it regardless.

I seem to have a knack for getting big money and quickly losing it all, I thought. Strange, considering that I'm not actually wasting it.

"Gacha," said Nemesis.

A-Again, I-I'm not actually wasting it.

"By the way, unlike the first Permit, the second one wasn't signed, right?" she said. "Why did you just give it to Rook instead of selling it? I can't be sure if you would've gotten the 100,000 lir you spent on it, but you could've received at least half of that, no?"

"...Ah," I said. She had a point.

"You..." Nemesis couldn't find the words to express what she felt.

"No, it's fine," I said. "I already gave it to Rook. A man does not go back on his word. We'll find other ways to make money."

"That's easy to say," she said. "However, Rook is currently offline and asleep, while Miss Sunglasses has her hands full with some other business. There's a limit to how much we can do just by ourselves."

"Yep, that's a bit of a problem," I agreed. I could go and accept some quest, but since I was solo, my choices were limited to the ones with low difficulty and thus low rewards.

There was also the meeting we had planned for tomorrow afternoon, so I couldn't take any quests that would last too long.

"Perhaps we should hunt for a bounty? Like that demon?" suggested Nemesis.

"That'll get us a death penalty if we fail, though," I said. "We wouldn't make it for tomorrow's arrangement."

"I see this world just isn't nice enough to give us a means of getting 100,000 lir in a short amount of time," she said.

Time wasn't a big problem — I'd have had tons of it after the surprise Marie had in store for us tomorrow. However, I wanted to ride Silver as soon as possible.

"What about the arena, then?" asked Nemesis. "It allows fighting without the risk of death penalty and rewards the victor, no?"

"Yeah, well, I looked it up and found out that you can only participate when your total level is above 51," I answered.

During the testing this morning, my level had gone up to 26. I still had a way to go before the arena was open to me.

"Oh, yeah!" Something came to me. "I can still bet on the fighters! I'll put my money on who I think will win and—"

"Don't," Nemesis cut me off. "Fortune might favor you when it really counts, but most of the time, you're just plain unlucky."

...You're not wrong there, I thought.

"Guess I'll have to give up on getting the Amulet of the Equestrian Tribe by today or tomorrow and just do some basic money-making instead," I sighed.

"Good idea," Nemesis agreed. "With that in mind, let's make our way to the Adventurers' Guild."

Nemesis and I began walking towards Gideon's first district, where the guild building was.

"By the way," Nemesis spoke up again. "I know that borrowing from Rook isn't an option, but what about Brother Bear?"

“Having him lend me money would make me feel like a loser,” I said.

“Hmm...” she pondered. “What about your old equipme—”

“Already sold it,” I answered before she could finish. And all the earnings I got from it have disappeared into your endless stomach, I thought.

The only property I owned currently was the gear I was wearing and the less than 10,000 lir I had remaining.

“Oh, this talk about equipment reminds me...” said Nemesis. “Why are you so averse to glasses?”

“...What?” I asked.

“I’ve been wondering about it since our exchange with the penguin,” she continued. “I tried looking through your memories, but I couldn’t do it because it’s in the deepest, most private section of all. Honestly, the defenses on it are way too strong, and I can’t help but wonder why.”

...That seems like a strong sign that I don’t want to talk about it and that you shouldn’t be asking me this, I thought. But okay, I’ll talk. Nemesis and I were basically one and the same, so there should be no harm in telling her.

“Back when I was a kid,” I said, “my eyesight was very poor. When I got into year 4 of elementary school, I happened to be the only kid in class who wore glasses.”

“Well, things like that happen every now and then,” Nemesis commented.

“My nickname instantly became ‘Noby,’ like the character from Doraemon,” I continued.

“...Hm?” she raised an eyebrow.

“My classmates used ‘Noby’ more than my real name,” I went on. “They often pressed me to say his trademark Doraemon phrase, even though I didn’t sound much like the character. Not only that, but the theme of the school’s arts festival somehow became Doraemon, and, of course, I was given the role of Noby.”

It wasn’t like I had been bullied. Nor had I been some sort of outcast. In fact, I’d had a lot of friends. My classmates at that time had clearly had no ill will, and had only given me the nickname because we were somewhat close. However, the lack of a proper outlet had made a certain sentiment grow within me.

It could basically be summed up with the words “Who are you calling ‘Noby’?” Or, “I love Doraemon and all, but this is a completely different matter.”

Nemesis was silently staring at me.

“What wrong, Nemesis?” I asked her.

“The reason is just so trifling that I don’t know how to react,” she answered.

“...Well, even I know that it’s not such a big deal,” I admitted. My big sister had reacted the same way when I’d told her about it.

“You said you had poor eyesight,” Nemesis spoke again. “Do you still wear glasses in real life?”

“No,” I answered. “My vision was corrected over the course of the five years after the school’s arts festival.”

I had eaten things that were good for my eyes and trained them by looking far ahead and by moving my eyeballs daily. It’d been hard work.

“I admire your tenacity, but wouldn’t it have been better to just get contact lenses?” she asked.

“The idea of putting things in my eyes scares me,” I answered.

“Master, you...” She was completely out of things to say.

“Naturally, laser eye surgery scared me, too, so I had to fix my eyesight with steady training and... Hm?”

As Nemesis and I were walking through the streets and chatting, I suddenly heard some unpleasant sounds coming from a nearby back alley.

They made me curious, so I went towards their source.

A short distance away from the main road, between the buildings, there was a slightly larger area where I saw five men encircling a single girl.

The men looked like the most stereotypical, run-of-the-mill, boorish punks. The sight reminded me of what Liliana had told me about the princess who’d run away, which had made me picture a generic scenario where I encountered her being harassed by a bunch of evil bastards. Thinking that it couldn’t be the case, I took a better look at the scene, and... it actually wasn’t.

The damsel in distress had a decent appearance, but her facial features were definitely those of a commoner. She wouldn’t have seemed out of place if I’d seen her standing outside a restaurant and attracting customers. The girl definitely wasn’t the princess, but that didn’t matter, considering how much trouble she was in.

The contents of their exchange could be summed up like so:

The girl had a little brother who had been kidnapped yesterday.

These men had blackmailed her, saying that she had to prepare 200,000 lir if she wanted him back. They had also added that her brother would be killed if she told anything to the knights.

The girl had run around, borrowing money and selling their family's possessions until she'd barely managed to gather the 200,000 lir. She had then brought the ransom money to the place the kidnappers had named — this back alley — and given it to them.

The men had readily accepted the money, but they'd had absolutely no intention of giving her little brother back. Not only that — they were about to take the girl herself as an extra.

Well, damn, I thought. They're scumbags to the core.

They were tians, not monsters — at least not in the game sense — but it was clear that kicking their asses wouldn't give me any pangs of conscience.

And letting it slide would leave a bad taste in my mouth.

With that thought, I stood up and showed myself to the scumbags.

"Stop right there!" I exclaimed and instantly realized that my voice was doubled for some reason.

"...Hm?" I said in surprise, and it happened once again.

Okay, what the hell? I thought.

I'd done nothing special — I'd merely jumped out and said something — but my voice had come out as if it was in-sync with another one.

A moment later, I noticed the cause. There was another person standing behind the scumbags and the girl — at the other side of the back alley.

It was a young man who looked about as old as I was and had donned some strangely-designed clothing that seemed to be a mix of a military uniform and a rider suit. The gloves he wore exposed the backs of his hands, and the left one had a crest which made it obvious that he was a Master.

"It matters not," he said. "Back away from that fair lady, you vile scoundrels."

Apparently, he was just a guy who'd happened to be thinking the exact same thing I had been thinking at the exact same time.

"P-Please, help!" pled the girl.

"Heh," he grinned. "Why, certainly. All beauteous flowers have thorns. And it is my mission in life to be the thorn for ladies as lovely as yourself and to sting any ruffians trying to harm you."

Though we seemed to be alike in some ways, I wasn't nearly as pompous as him. The aura around him almost made me imagine roses and unnatural rays of light like in some manga aimed at young girls or a Takarazuka Revue performance.

"Who the hell are you two?" demanded one of the scumbags.

Another got excited. "Huh? Ya wanna go? Let's do this!"

"Hyahaah!" one just cheered in a discomforting way.

"There's five of us, ya dumb shits!" spoke yet another.

"That's two times more than you!" the last one added.

That's not two times, you numbskull, I thought. It's 2.5 times.

"Heh," the pompous Master grinned. "Indeed, there are more of you, but what are your levels?"

"Huh?!" One of them got scared.

"From what I can tell, you are all on your first low-rank job," said the pompous weirdo. "My total level, however, is 126."

"W-What?!" They all freaked out in unison.

"Heh," he grinned yet again. "Now, bear witness to my power. I'll just summon my Garage and..."

"Get him before he does anything!" shouted one of the scumbags. The other four let out a battle cry and charged at him.

"What?!" the guy was surprised. "Wait, I need to get in my Magingear and... No matter! I will do this with my bare hands if I must!"

I felt as though I was reading a delinquent manga. All five of the hoodlums ran towards the guy in the military uniform with their fists ready to strike.

And so, due to just how much the weirdo was standing out, I was being completely ignored.

"Oh well," I sighed. The timing was good, so I spoke to the girl. "You should run away now."

"Th-Thank you very much!" She thanked me with palpable fear in her voice and ran to the street behind me.

"Okay, that's done," I said. "And the battle is... wait, what?"

I looked to the other side and — to my surprise — saw the guy in the uniform getting beaten to a pulp. The five hoodlums weren't unharmed or anything, but it was still safe to say that the battle was completely one-sided.

Seems like there are too many of them for him to take on by himself, I thought. But wait, his total level is 126, so how... Oh, I see.

"Having a high total level doesn't mean that you have high stats, as well," I said aloud. He was probably like Rook, who — due to being a Pimp — had half of most of my stats despite his level being two times greater than mine.

Nonetheless, 126 was a formidable level. If the five scumbags were taking care of him that easily, it was entirely possible that I wouldn't fare so well, either.

As that thought went through my head, one of the five raised his fist and charged towards me. "You're next!"

I hastily evaded his attack and countered with a punch directed straight into his face.

The next moment, the man got blasted away to the other side of the alley.

"...Eh?" The other four hoodlums were shocked.

"...Why?" I asked, as perplexed as the scumbags.

Thinking that Nemesis had done something, I turned around and looked at her. She responded by heaving a light sigh and pointing at the back of her hand. That action made me look at the backs of my own hands and reminded me of a certain fact.

I was wearing the Miasmaflame Bracers.

While testing them today, I had focused mainly on their ability to release fire and gas, but those weren't the only features they had. The item could also be used for defense and gave a bonus to my stats. Specifically, it increased my STR by 100%.

Back when I had been level 0, my STR had been somewhere around 10. I hadn't had any problems moving my body back then, so I could only assume that that amount was representative of a standard adult male's strength. I'd leveled up and increased my stats since then, and with the bonus from Miasmaflame Bracers, my STR was now over 400. That meant that I'd just punched a hoodlum in the face with the strength of more than 40 average adult males.

“Is he dead?” Slightly worried, I took a look at the guy, who was lying on the other side of the alley.

He was twitching, so it was safe to assume that he’d survived. I heaved a sigh of relief. It was pretty obvious that their jobs were combat-oriented, so they were probably tougher than the average Joe.

“It’s all good, then,” I said as I closed in on them while bashing my bracers together.

The results wouldn’t have been pretty if I’d used Nemesis, so I chose to settle it with the bad boys on my hands.

“Who’s next?” I asked.

“Eee!” one of them shrieked like a little girl.

I probably looked a bit too menacing, since they quickly turned pale, whirled around, and ran away like roaches.

“D-Damn it!” one of them shouted. “Don’t get cocky, you shits! We still have that bitch’s brother!” With that, they disappeared into the main road.

Man, what a generic set of scumbags, I thought.

“Are you okay?” I asked. “First Heal.”

I walked over to the uniformed guy they’d beaten up and cast my healing spell on him.

His wounds weren’t deep by any stretch of the imagination, and my basic healing magic quickly closed them all.

“Heh, thank you,” he said gratefully. “Hm? Those ears are...” He looked up at the things on my head — the dog ears I’d grown because of the mad penguin.

“What about them?” I asked.

“...Oh, nothing,” he answered. “It’s a nice accessory.”

“Find a penguin and you can get your own pair,” I said.

“Heh.” He grinned yet again. “I will keep that in mind.”

The man stood up and dusted his clothes. Even that action seemed a bit pompous.

“I feel that this meeting is fated,” he said. “Allow me to introduce myself. My name is Hugo Lesseps. I am a Master and my job is High Pilot.”

“I’m Ray Starling,” I responded. “I’m a Master and a Paladin. And this is my Embryo, Nemesis.”

“I see... Embryos of the Maiden type are quite a rarity,” he said. “It’s a pleasure to meet such a lovely mademoiselle.”

“Pleased to meet you, too,” said Nemesis.

I found it interesting that he could tell that Nemesis was a Maiden and not a Guardian just by looking at her.

But man, the way he talks sounds like it belongs in a play or something, I thought. I wonder where he’s from. If his name is anything to go by, then he’s probably French.

“By the way, why did they beat you up so easily?” I asked. “Is your job not battle-oriented or something?” They’d been pretty weak when I’d fought them, so I would’ve assumed that someone with a total level of 126 could’ve handled them easily.

“Heh.” There was that grin again. “I am a level 50 Pilot, level 50 Mechanic, and level 26 High Pilot. Leveling with these jobs only raises my HP, MP, SP, and DEX, so all my other stats are about what they were when I started out!”

That didn’t seem like something to be proud of. Also, I couldn’t help but wonder just what kind of jobs they were to have such a biased stat growth.

Does he drive a car or something? I thought. Is he like a character from Metal Max or something?

“U-Umm...” I said.

As I pondered the nature of Hugo’s job, someone called out to me.

I turned around to see the girl we’d helped out. Apparently, she’d chosen to stay nearby instead of running away completely.

“Th-Thank you very much for helping me!” she cried.

“Oh, no need for that,” I said. “I did it because I felt like it.” Also, it would’ve left a bad taste in my mouth if I hadn’t.

“Heh.” Hugo grinned again. "I feel the same way. I don’t know if I could sleep at night after having ignored a lady in distress.”

Isn’t that much like my go-to phrase for these situations? I thought.

“U-Umm... Are you Masters?” the girl ventured.

“Why, yes,” said Hugo. “Myself and Ray here are both Masters.”

The girl dropped to the ground before us and pushed her head against it.

“Lady...” Hugo didn’t seem sure how to react. “Please raise your head.”

“Please... Please save my little brother!” she pled. “I beg of you!”

Oh, yeah, the scumbags said something about that while running away, I thought.

“Save him? As in, from those hoodlums?” I asked.

“Y-Yes!” she said. “They’re the Gouz-Maise Gang... They kidnap children, and if they don’t get the ransom for them, the boys and girls get killed and e-eate— ohhh...”

Her words made me turn silent.

Killing and eating children? I thought in disbelief. Ohhh, man...

“They kidnapped my little brother, so please, save him!” she exclaimed. “I can give you this money! And if that’s not enough, I’ll do whatever you want...”

She extended the bag with the ransom towards us and begged while crying her eyes out.

I knew the circumstances from the eavesdropping I’d done before jumping out to help her. As things were, her brother would’ve been killed and eaten sooner rather than later. To prevent that result from becoming reality, one had to act fast, and the only ones who could do that were Hugo and me.

Honestly, I had a feeling it would come to this the moment I showed myself to the scumbags, I thought. That’s why I’m fully prepared to face the risks.

“I’m down for it,” I said. “I don’t need any compensation, though.”

“B-But...”

“You went through great lengths to gather this ransom money, right?” I said. “I can’t take it.” I had a feeling that I would’ve done something about it even if she hadn’t asked me to. If I’d ignored it, the aftertaste in my mouth would’ve been downright foul.

“What about you, Hugo?” I asked.

“Heh,” he grinned. “A foolish question. Of course I’m doing it. And I don’t need any money, either.”

Hugo went down on one of his knees, gently placed his left hand on her chin, and made her look upwards. He then gently wiped her tears away with the thumb of his right hand.

“Lady,” he said gently. “We shall stop your tears.” And so — as if acting out a scene from a play — Hugo smiled at her. “I promise that you will greet tomorrow’s morning with a smile on your face.”

[The quest “Rescue Roddie Lancarse, Difficulty Level 8” has started]

[Please see the quest window for further details]

A message directed to my ears announced the beginning of an event quest. Apparently, the same thing had happened to Hugo.

“Let us go, Ray,” he said. “The mission awaits.”

“Okay,” I sighed. “I can dance to this tune of yours.” Our target quest was the difficulty level 8 “Rescue Roddie Lancarse.” Our destination was the hideout of man-eaters and kidnappers — the Gouz-Maise Gang.

Our goal... was a morning of smiles.

And so, we began our quest.

Chapter Three: A Maiden's Master

Gideon, the city of duels, Paladin Ray Starling

Nemesis, Hugo, and I got on a difficulty level 8 random event quest called "Rescue Roddie Lancarse." Just like the quest to save Milianne, it was going to be a race against time. However, I had two other worries about it.

First was the quest difficulty. I didn't know just how difficult level 8 quests were, so I asked Hugo about it...

"Difficult enough for level 500 tians going solo to fail spectacularly," he said. "Even a full party of such tians would have a hard time."

...and that was his answer. So, level 8 quests were too difficult for max level tians. Even if we Masters were generally stronger than tians, it was clearly a bit too much for me — someone below level 50 — to handle. However, I had no intention of leaving the child for dead just because it was hard to save him.

"I must say that letting them escape was a grave mistake," said Nemesis.

And that was my other worry — the five scumbags we'd faced.

The one I'd punched was still spread out on the back alley's pavement, so Hugo tied him up with a wire he had on him. We decided to hand him over to the guards, so the girl we'd helped — Rebecca — ran off to the guardroom.

The other four had run away with a threat regarding her brother, unfortunately. We didn't know where their base was. If they got there before us and told everyone about what happened here, the boy's life would be in more danger than ever.

"Man, I should've gassed them," I said. A whiff of the poison from my Miasmaflame Bracers would've rendered them completely immobile.

"We're in the city, so wouldn't that count as terrorism?" asked Nemesis.

You have a point, I thought. Although I could've also scorched their legs with fire from the left bracer and make them unable to walk, and...

"I can tell that you're thinking something disturbing," said Hugo. "Let me assure you, though, that there’s no need to worry about them.” He then pointed to the street they’d run off to.

I couldn’t see what was behind the corner, but I could hear something being dragged on the ground.

“What’s that sound?” I asked. The source got closer and closer until it soon entered my vision.

“Shorry for the waith, Hugo.” It was a girl. If you ignored the ushanka hat on her head, she would’ve been about as tall as Nemesis.

The first thing I noticed about her was her whiteness. White hair, white cheeks, white hat. Despite it not being particularly cold, she also wore a white felt long coat and a white scarf. And, for some reason, she was also biting into a white manju sweet. The only non-white thing about her were her blue eyes.

“Heh.” Hugo turned pompous again. “Well done, Cyco.”

She gulped down the manju before responding. “It’s a pain, but they were weak, so don’t mind it.”

I looked down and saw that she was holding people — the four hoodlums that had escaped — by the clothes behind the napes of their necks.

The ease with which she was holding two people in each hand clearly didn't fit her appearance, but I soon noticed the Master crest on her left hand.

Well, I guess her strength makes sense if she's a Master, I thought.

The way she spoke was extremely monotone, and I couldn't tell if she was role-playing or if that was her normal way of speaking.

She noticed me examining her and shot a glare at Nemesis and me. "Hugo the girl pamperer befriended a lolicon? You like little girls, mister?"

"Who are you calling a lolicon?!" I shouted.

"Who are you calling a loli?!" Nemesis howled at the same time.

She actually marked me as a sexual deviant with her first words to me! Who the hell does that?! I thought.

"That flat chest and low height are exemplary loli features," she said. "And anyone who has a loli service him is a real lolicon."

Slander if I'd ever heard any. Nemesis was a part of me, so she didn't count.

"No!" said Nemesis. "This form of mine merely prioritizes beauty over function!"

"A Master with an Embryo who claims that form to be beauty is a lolicon to the core," said the white girl.

"You little...! Seems like I have to do something about that mouth of yours!" Nemesis shouted.

"Try it."

Nemesis jumped on the girl, who faced her head-on, as emotionless as ever. They began fighting, but I felt like I was watching two cats mess about.

It sure is rare for Nemesis to be this honest with anyone that's not me, I thought.

"So, Hugo," I spoke up. "Who is this monotone and monochrome girl who has no qualms about labeling strangers as perverts?"

"Cyco," he answered. "She's my... party member. I contacted and told her to catch the ones that ran away. The girl's a bit foul-mouthed, yes, but as you can see, she's quite reliable. Oh, and just so you're aware, the things she just said are far from the worst you can hear from her."

"Seriously?" I raised an eyebrow.

"Yes," he nodded. "Especially when compared to the abuse she spouts at our clan owner."

...I don't think I can even imagine that, I thought.

Well, her foul mouth aside, we now had a total of three Masters in our party. Naturally, that increased our chances of successfully completing the quest.

"All right, Cyco, tell us what you found out," said Hugo.

"Okay," Cyco replied while her hands were fixed with Nemesis' as they pushed each other in what seemed like a situation straight out of a pro wrestling match. Still in that state, she turned her face to Hugo and began talking. "After I beat up and interrogated them, they told me where their hideout was. It's beyond the east gate, in the Cruella Mountain Belt. The specific location was in a map they had."

Skillfully using her mouth, she bit into a paper she had in a pocket on her side and threw it over to Hugo using only her head.

"Cruella Mountain Belt?" I repeated the place name. It was an area I hadn't been in before.

"That's the name of the mountains to the east of this city," said Hugo. "The area beyond them is Caldina's territory."

"So it's basically the border between the two countries," I said.

"It's a great place for a bandit hideout," he continued. "Any Kingdom of Altar military operations done in the Cruella Mountain Belt would be taken as acts of war against Caldina."

"Why don't the two countries team up to take care of the bandits, then?" I asked. Bandits lurking near the border seemed like a big problem for both Altar and Caldina, so it would've been natural to team up and exterminate them.

"That will never happen," said Hugo. "Caldina only acts when there's money to be had. In fact, they would do anything for it."

"By that, you mean...?" I asked.

"For the right price, the vilest bandit could be a valued customer."

So they're in on this? I thought.

"I would guess they get paid a lot and provide passive cooperation in exchange," he continued. "Caldina probably agreed to react in some way if the kingdom's army made a move. Even if it was all just an act, the kingdom still couldn't do what they wanted."

Hugo opened the map that Cyco had given him. On the left side of it was Gideon. The right portrayed a desert, and the area right in the middle of them had several mountains. The second closest mountain to Gideon had a circle marking something.

"This is the place," said Hugo. "It's beyond a mountain. Seems like we'll have to make haste."

"Yeah," I agreed. "We'll have to run real fast."

For some reason, Hugo gave me a strange look.

"What?" I asked.

"Ray," he said. "You're a Paladin, aren't you? Won't you be riding a mount?"

"I have a horse, but I can't ride it because I don't have the Horse Riding skill," I answered.

"So that's how it is..." he said, looking completely weirded out.

"...Yeah."

Well, this is awkward, I thought.

"Heh," he chuckled. "This is the first time I'm seeing anyone who doesn't have the Horse Riding skill while being in the knight grouping."

"Is it normal for us to have it?" I asked.

"Well," Hugo said. "Let's just say that I feel as though someone just told me that they're a swimmer, but can't do the front crawl, backstroke, breaststroke, or butterfly stroke."

"Is there even anything more to swimming than those four?" I asked.

"The dog paddle and traditional Japanese swimming?" he suggested.

Those didn't seem like they fit.

"Anyway, I see how it is," said Hugo. "Leave it to me. I have a means of travel that allows us to get to their hideout in a short amount of time."

"Thanks," I said gratefully.

In unrelated news, Nemesis and Cyco had become friends during the fight, and were now exchanging a firm handshake.

Friendship is a great thing, I thought. But man, the fact that one is black and the other's white reminds me of a girl's anime from a few decades back.

Our party — Hugo, Cyco, and me with Nemesis as my blade — had made our way through the eastern gate in Gideon's third district and were now standing before the entrance to the Cruella Mountain Belt area.

There was a road leading towards the mountains, which was being used by carriages and the like.

We were about to make our way to the gang's hideout by using the means of travel Hugo mentioned, but...

"What is that means of travel, anyway?" I asked.

"This isn't the right place for it," he said. "We have to go where there are even fewer people."

He can't show it to anyone or something? I thought. "Does it stand out or something?"

"You could say that, yes," he answered.

And so we walked for about fifteen minutes. We weren't following the road, either. Hugo actually led us into some forest.

All right, this is weird, I thought. We were nowhere close to any proper road that could be used by carriages and such.

If we were about to use something rideable, the mountain road near Gideon would have been much better for it.

"This place seems good," he said upon discovering an opening in the forest. It was circular and had a radius of about ten meters. There was a curious lack of tall trees, and it seemed like the plants here had only just begun sprouting.

"My guess is that someone with a magic-based job used an area-of-effect offensive spell here," said Hugo. "I don't know how it was for those affected, but it's convenient for us."

He reached into his inventory, took out a silver sheet, and spread it out on the ground.

Once he did that, I realized just how big the sheet was. It was a square with sides that were about five meters in size.

"I've prepared the Garage," said Hugo. "Cyco, any hostiles nearby?"

"None at all," she answered. "I'm not picking up any monsters or people."

"Roger that." Hugo opened a window and began doing something on it. A moment later, sounds of machinery began coming out from under the sheet he'd spread on the ground.

"...Wait, machinery?" I muttered. Suddenly, I realized something.

Hugo's job was High Pilot. The noun "pilot" was generally used on people who operated something mechanical. However, this world didn't have any machinery that could be "driven" in that sense...

...unless it was related to a certain country.

“Hugo,” I said. “You’re...”

“Ray,” he spoke up before I could finish. “I am taking part in this quest as a person and as a thorn protecting the beautiful flowers we call ‘women.’”

His statement made it obvious that he’d known exactly what I was gonna say.

“Why are you on this quest?” he continued. “Is it because you’re a Paladin of the kingdom, or because you’re your own man?”

There was only one thing I could say in response.

“Ignoring this would leave a bad taste in my mouth.” It was the exact same thing I’d thought when I accepted this quest. “At the very least, I’m not doing this because of my occupation.”

“Nor am I.” With those words, Hugo gave a wry smile and pushed down on a button on the window. It said “sortie” on it.

Right after that, the sheet on the ground began to expand. Its surface began to slip and open up like a garage shutter, exposing a cavity that completely ignored the sheet’s thickness.

Four pillars rose up at the corners of the sheet and stopped when they were about five meters tall.

A moment later, a roaring sound came from the bottom of the cavity as a lift began rising up until it reached the surface.

On it, there was a large object. Its two arms and legs gave it a humanoid appearance. However, it was nowhere near human.

It was about six heads tall, but its height was above five meters and it was covered in a dark green steel coating.

On its pelvic area, there was a gun and an army knife that fit its great size, and it didn’t seem like that was the extent of the weaponry it had in store.

Its chest area was open, and inside, I saw a cockpit that bore a striking resemblance to one I had seen in some old anime.

In conclusion, it was a humanoid battle robot.

“‘Magic and Gear,’” he said. “More widely known as Magingear. The main weapon of the Dryfe Imperium.”

Hugo — a High Pilot of the Dryfe Imperium — said that as he got into the cockpit.

“...Hugo,” I said, impressed.

“Right now, I am but a knight fighting for a lady’s tears,” he told me. “You are not a Paladin of the Kingdom of Altar, either. Am I correct, fellow knight?”

“...Yeah,” I nodded.

Yet again, he’d donned that aura straight out of a young girls’ manga or a Takarazuka performance and spoken as if he were a character from a play. Despite how ridiculous it seemed, I couldn’t help but agree with what he’d said.

The Kingdom and the Imperium had been at war once. There was a ceasefire going on right now, but it was rumored that it was going to get heated again within the next few months. The countries we served were true enemies.

However, as we were right now, that didn’t matter to us. It was also completely irrelevant to the girl who’d cried for her brother and the boy we were going to save.

Our standings had absolutely no connection to what we had to do. When we’d taken this quest, we had been acting as our own individual human beings.

“Shall we go?” he asked from his cockpit.

“We shall,” I answered and jumped on the hand of the Magingear he was piloting. The other hand was already occupied by Cyco.

With both its hands full, Hugo’s Magingear stood up.

“Demi-Dragon-tier Magingear, Marshall II... Sortie!”

And so, the Marshall II began dashing towards our goal — the other side of the mountain.

◇

Magingear. That was the abbreviation of “Magic and Gear” — a term used to describe the imperium’s main type of weapon.

As I sat on this weapon’s right hand, all the shaking caused by its running made me think of something.

The first Embryo I’d seen after beginning to play Infinite Dendrogram had been my brother’s Baldr. That was a technological weapon, too, but since it was an Embryo — something that was unique to each Master — it wasn't quite the same as something made by technology.

The Magingear, however, were weapons born from Dryfe Imperium's scientific prowess — a part of the world's setting.

As far as I was aware, the imperium was the only country in Infinite Dendrogram that excelled in technology and science. That fact made me curious as to why the other countries didn't follow its footsteps.

Technological innovation was something that would normally spread like wildfire. The imperium had been a technological nation for more than a hundred years. Reason suggested that their knowledge should've spread to other countries by now.

When you looked at it as a game, it was probably safe to say that the reason was that the developers wanted to keep each country unique. However, Infinite Dendrogram's setting was detailed enough to incorporate the basic function of logging in and out. That made me think that the technological gap between the nations wasn't without a world-building reason, too.

So, as we made our way to the hideout of the Gouz-Maise Gang, I asked Hugo about it. "What do you think?"

"Heh," he grinned. "To know the answer to that, you have to know about a certain civilization."

"Civilization?" I repeated.

"Yes," said Hugo. "It's called either the 'lost' or the 'ancient' civilization."

...That name seems familiar, I thought. Oh, right. Silver — the horse I pulled from the gacha — had "ancient civilization" in his description.

"That civilization existed a few thousand years ago," Hugo continued.

According to Hugo, the ancient civilization had been highly advanced in terms of technology. It was similar to the imperium in that regard, but their technology had been superior to anything Dryfe had now.

However, the civilization perished, leaving behind only a few machines and texts that archeologists stumbled upon every now and then.

"You're gonna have to tell me more than that," I said.

"There are theories that the grand civilization disappeared because their technological advancement made the people too arrogant, and therefore it incurred some divine wrath," he explained. "According to the legends, a god and his thirteen servants went around destroying every civilization that existed back then. Every country besides Dryfe and Granvaloa believes that legend, so the people choose not to make any scientific and technological advancements."

I see, I thought. So they're actively avoiding technology because they're afraid of divine punishment. Hm...? Dryfe and Granvaloa?

"That doesn't apply to those two countries, then?" I asked. "And wait, Granvaloa is scientifically advanced?"

"Well..." he said and pondered. "You might say that Granvaloa has science and you might say that it doesn't."

How am I supposed to process that?

"First, let me tell you about Dryfe," he said. "Dryfe has always presented itself as the true successors of the ancient civilization and thus didn't shy away from technology and science. However, all their attempts to recreate the technology of the ancient times have failed, so they had to compromise for machines such as the Magingear, which only functioned by using people's magic.

"People's magic?" I asked.

"Yes, they can only move at the cost of MP. Right now, my Marshall II uses 1MP per minute. In battle, it would be 1MP per second. There are differences in extent, but this is how every Dryfe machine works."

MP per second, eh? Reminds me of my Reversal, I thought.

Anyway, a certain thing made sense now. That was the reason why Hugo's jobs — Pilot, Mechanic, and High Pilot — were so focused on MP growth.

"So the machines of the past were different?" I asked.

"Many of the ones that have been excavated had generators installed in them," he answered. "They provided the machines with all the magic they needed to operate, and as far as I'm aware, they're a technology lost to the modern world."

Interesting, I thought. I wonder where Silver stands in all of this.

"Can you expand on Granvaloa?" I asked. "I didn't know that they had machine technology." All I knew about it was that it was a country on the sea, so I had always imagined it functioned with sail-based ships, like the ones in the Age of Discovery.

"Heh. That country is less about machine technology and more about ship-building technology," said Hugo. "For example, steamships aren't uncommon among their people, but there are no automobiles to speak of. In a sense, Granvaloa is more unbalanced than Dryfe. After all, though their magic technology is behind that of most countries, their magic ships are unmatched."

"So that's how it is," I nodded. Though it was limited to shipbuilding, the maritime nation excelled in both magic and technology.

Yeah, it's safe to call it unbalanced, I thought.

"Also," added Hugo. "Since they're the only ones salvaging things from underwater ruins, not even Dryfe knows what they really have."

Well, that sure piqued my interest. I should go there someday.

"Hmm... Hugo," Nemesis spoke up. "Did you get the knowledge about this civilization from the world's official description?"

"No," he answered. "I've been told about it by archeologist tians and some trivia-crazed acquaintances who've explored ruins all over the world. The clan I belong to has many people with strange hobbies."

"Your clan?" I asked.

"Yes," Hugo nodded. "It's one of the bigger clans in Dryfe, so there are quite a lot of us. If you ever switch to serving the imperium, I'll help you join."

"Ha ha ha," I laughed. "I don't see that happening."

"Heh. I think that depends on the results of the upcoming war."

He wasn't wrong. That could easily happen if the imperium came out on top and the kingdom became its domain.

"Though it's not impossible that the results lead to me joining your clan," he added.

"My own clan, huh?" I said. "I actually don't have one yet."

"Then you should find one that has people you get along with and join it. It'll give you more things to do in this world. You can also make one yourself, if you like."

"I'll think about it... Oh?" I said, startled.

As we made our way through the forest, the Magingear had lowered its engine's output and reduced its noise to a minimum.

"Looks like we're here," said Hugo.

A few moments later, we came close to the forest's edge.

"I see it," Cyco said.

I looked through the spaces between the trees.

Outside the forest was a large building — a stone fortress. With its walls covered in ivy, it stood in the middle of a forest clearing that extended for at least a few hundred meters in every direction.

It was easy to tell that it had been built a long time ago, eventually been abandoned, and was now being used as the bandits' hideout.

"It's just like it was shown on the map," said Hugo. "That's the place, no doubt about it. There're even some guards there."

He was right — I could see some bandits standing on the fortress' walls. However, the boredom in their mannerisms and the occasional yawns made it obvious that they weren't too serious about their job. At the very least, they still hadn't noticed us hiding in the forest.

I had my worries about the possibility of them seeing Magingear, but that didn't seem to be necessary. The trees in the forest were tall enough to hide it without any problem. The dark green coating probably worked as a good camouflage, too.

"What now?" asked Nemesis. "Shall we all charge at it?"

"Don't be stupid," I said. "It'll all be over if they start using the kidnapped children as hostages."

Then again, that was going to happen in any scenario where we made an attempt to fight the bandits and do the rescuing. However, since we didn't know the inner structure of the fortress, sneaking in without getting spotted would be difficult. Also, no matter how negligent the guards were, they'd quickly notice us if we showed ourselves in this wide open space.

"...I happen to have an idea on how to go about this," said Hugo.

"An idea?" I asked.

The Magingear he was driving nodded in a highly convincing manner and pointed at itself.

"Everyone in this world knows that this weapon belongs to Dryfe," he said. That was the reason why we got here through a route on which no one could see us.

"Again, this is a weapon belonging to Dryfe," he continued. "The same Dryfe that has absolutely no reason to save the kingdom's children."

"Hm...? Ah!" I finally realized what he meant. "If I attack the fortress, they will likely think that it has nothing to do with the kidnappings. After all, there's no reason for a man of the imperium to come rescue the children of an enemy nation. That will prevent the bandits from using them as hostages. They will probably believe that I wouldn't discriminate and kill any children they brought out, and that would be unfavorable for them because less children means less ransom money."

So, Hugo's true affiliation is actually gonna be useful to us, huh? I thought.

"They won't be able to use the children as hostages," he continued. "And they certainly won't just sit and do nothing while I attack the fortress. They will surely come to face me. And while they're busy with me, you can sneak into the building and rescue the kidnapped children. That's the plan I have in mind, anyway."

"Sounds good," I nodded. "Are you sure you'll be okay, though? Being a distraction isn't easy."

"A Marshall II has a strong frame," said Hugo. "It won't go down easily. Also, I have Cyco with me."

"Yep," she nodded. "What do we do?"

"You use Enemy Detect," Hugo said. "Also, ready some Smoke Dischargers to make a smokescreen for us to hide in while we lower their numbers."

"Oui, umm... monsieur."

"You can use the smoke to close in on the fortress," Hugo added, turning to me. "Save the children, and stay out of sight."

"All right," I nodded.

"Understood!" Nemesis declared. "This is nothing Ray and I can't do!"

"It will probably be a battle against time," Hugo added. "You will need to be both fast and precise."

"I know," I nodded again. A battle against time while trying to save children. It was going to be much like my first quest, when I'd had to save Milianne.

However, back then, I'd had Liliana and — most of all — my brother with me. Without him, I couldn't have made my way to where Milianne was, and if he hadn't kept the Demi-Dragon Worms busy, the situation would've gotten much worse.

Also, that had been a difficulty level 5 quest. The quest we were doing right now was a difficulty level 8. I had no idea what kind of monsters I would have to face, and I didn't have the people I'd relied on back when I'd saved Milianne.

Still, this time, I had Hugo and Cyco with me. I was stronger, as well, and Nemesis was more reliable than ever. I didn't know how far that would get me, but...

"...Backing out isn't really an option when the lives of children are on the line."

"Hm?" Hugo asked.

Wait, did I say that out loud? I thought. Hugo had apparently heard what I'd said and stared at me with the Magingear's head camera.

"What?" I asked.

Well, I kinda understood what he wanted to say. He probably thought I was getting a bit too serious about Infinite Dendrogram, which — from beginning to the end — was nothing but a game. However, game or not, having children die on me left a bad taste in my mouth.

Hugo stayed silent. He looked at me through the camera while thinking about something.

"If you've got something to say, just say it," I said.

"...All right." Hugo finally spoke up. His words were far from what I'd expected. "It's nothing much... I just realized that you, too, are a real Maiden's Master."

"Hm?" I raised an eyebrow. I didn't see what he meant by that. I wasn't aware of any relationship between what I'd said and the fact that I was the Master of Nemesis, a Type Maiden.

"Do you know what Masters of Type Maiden Embryos have in common?" he asked.

"They have something in common?" I asked back.

"Yes. A Master I know told me that such Masters have a certain common feature."

I had yet to meet a single other Maiden's Master, but I was mildly surprised to hear that we all had a similarity. "Which is...?"

"They don't feel Infinite Dendrogram is a mere game."

...What?

"That's stupid," I said. "I'm well aware that we're in a game here."

I had no grand delusions about being in an old light novel type of scenario in which the game I'd started playing was actually a real other world. Infinite Dendrogram was a game, and I wouldn't argue against that.

"The Master I mentioned said the same thing," said Hugo. "However, somewhere deep inside, they don’t believe that to be true. And that’s why...” He fell silent.

“Why... what?” I asked.

“It’s nothing. Never mind. Sorry for saying something weird right when we’re about to attack the fortress. I got a bit derailed.”

Damn it, don’t leave me hanging after getting my attention like that! I thought.

“Oh, by the way,” he spoke up again. “The enemies might be tians, but killing them doesn’t count as a crime when they’re criminals or if you’re just defending yourself. Keep that in mind.”

“Yeah... I will,” I nodded.

After that, Hugo fell silent once again.

I’m still wondering what he was going to say, though, I thought.

“Master,” Nemesis spoke to me telepathically.

What?

“Do you know what he was about to say?” she asked.

No, I don’t. You don’t either, right?

“I wouldn’t say so. But if you say you don’t know, it might be best for you if things stay that way.”

“Hm?” I raised an eyebrow. What do you mean by that?

“Ray!” yelled Hugo in surprise. “Look over there!” Cutting short my conversation with Nemesis, his Magingear pointed at the fortress. I looked in that direction and saw that its gates were slowly opening.

“Look there,” said Cyco. “A carriage is coming.” I shifted my gaze to where she was pointing and saw a mountain road leading through an opening in the forest surrounding the fortress.

On it, there were several carriages moving towards the bandit hideout.

“Did they kidnap more children?” I asked.

“Seems like it,” said Hugo.

“They’re saying something,” Cyco muttered. She placed her hands on her ears, closed her eyes, and focused her hearing. “‘When we’re back in the fortress’... ‘we’ll kill him’... ‘our buddies’... ‘got caught’... ‘revenge’... ‘we’re killing’... ‘the brat.’”

“Crap!” A realization made me mutter my frustration.

“Wait, do they mean...?!” Hugo seemed to have realized it, too.

They were talking about the five underlings we’d beaten, caught, and handed over to the guards.

"It seems there were more than those five," Hugo muttered. "They've noticed what we did back there."

And if that was the case, then the first child they were going to kill when they reached the fortress was the very same one we had to save.

"It seems like time is short." Hugo made the Magingear go from a kneeling position to standing upright. "I'll attack the ones at the carriages. That should make the ones in the fortress come out and help them. When that happens, I'll create a smokescreen you can use to get in undetected. Cyco, you support me."

"All right!" I nodded.

"Understood!" said Nemesis in her sword form.

"Yes, sir!" Cyco snapped to attention.

As soon as he confirmed that everyone was fine with his plan, Hugo made his Magingear jump out of the forest and charge at the bandits.

This time, he wasn't running like when we had traversed the forest. Instead, he used the wheels installed in its legs to do a rolling dash that made him the fastest I've seen yet. Not slowing down, he took out a gun that was mounted on the robot's pelvic area and began firing at the front of the group of carriages.

A single attack was enough to make the horses drawing the first carriage burst, while the resulting shockwave blew the coachman away and made the carriage fall to its side.

The sudden disaster made the carriages trailing behind it stop, and the Magingear — not letting the opportunity go to waste — began firing at and instantly killing the bandits surrounding them.

"Hm?" The sight actually made me feel strangely uncomfortable. Nemesis seemed to notice my reaction, but chose not to say anything.

After a number of bandits had been killed by Hugo's preemptive attacks, they finally began retaliating and fighting back. However, they weren't coordinated in any sense of the word, attacking independently with the methods each of them were familiar with. Some used swords, fists, and axes, while others took the ranged approach with bows and arrows.

Reason stated that such things would be able to do nothing against the Magingear — which was as tough as a tank — but we were in Infinite Dendrogram. The bandits likely had low-rank battle-oriented jobs. Due to that, their stats would be higher than those of normal people, allowing their attacks to occasionally break and pierce through the Magingear's armor.

"Hghh!" Hugo exclaimed as his Marshall II showed no sign of stopping. He used the robot's army knife to cut down anyone who got too close.

Well, the term "knife" was only appropriate when compared to the Magingear. It was equivalent to a longsword for any bandit and it had absolutely no trouble slicing through their armor and splitting their torsos.

Hugo used the gun to shoot down anyone attacking him from a distance. The bullets were equivalent to cannon shots, and they made the bow-wielding bandits burst and scatter in all directions.

Though the bandits greatly outnumbered him, Hugo was far stronger than all of them combined. The sight made me recall the way Marilyn — Rook's Demi-Dragon — had gone rampaging within the army of Goblins. The robot was probably as powerful as she was. When he'd gotten in, Hugo had called it a "Demi-Dragon-Rank Magingear," and it was clear that the description was appropriate.

Hugo was also highly skilled at controlling it, and from what he'd told me on the way here, the Piloting skill he had from being in the Pilot job grouping greatly increased the stats of the machines he rode. As a result of all of that, he had an upper hand in this battle despite the bandits greatly outnumbering him.

"But his advantage isn't absolute," I muttered.

Though the bandits were dying one after the other, some of their attacks were landing on the Magingear. Little by little, the damage done by them was piling up and becoming obvious.

"Flaw," Cyco said from beside me. Then she told me about the robot's greatest disadvantage.

"Magingears can't be healed," she said. "They need to be stored and fixed."

"I see." I nodded.

Though fueled by magic, the Magingears were machines. Healing magic and medicine didn't work on them like they worked on people and monsters. Due to the constantly falling HP and the per-second MP cost, these iron giants could only fight for a limited amount of time.

And yet, for the sake of saving the children, Hugo played his part in the plan by facing the bandits head-on and distracting them.

“That’s why we have to do our best, too,” said Cyco.

“Of course,” I agreed.

All at once, several dozens of bandits ran out of the fortress. They went to help their endangered comrades by joining their battle against the Magingear, but that came at the cost of reducing their numbers at the hideout.

“Now,” Cyco said.

At about the same time...

...the Magingear covered the area in can-like objects it had kept around its waist. After rolling on the ground a bit, they began spinning around while intensely releasing great amounts of white smoke.

“Smoke Dischargers, released,” said Cyco. “We can go now.”

She disappeared from my side. Not only that, she disappeared from the party window, as well. Whether that mattered or not, she’d probably gone to assist Hugo.

“We’re going too, Nemesis!” I said.

“Understood!” she agreed.

As the white smoke covered the surroundings, I tightened my grip on Nemesis in her sword form and ran towards the fortress.

I had to make good use of the opportunity Hugo had given me.

This was all to free the children and make sure they survived.

Letting the smoke shroud me, I broke into the fortress.

◇

We’d saved Rebecca from her predicament in that back alley and instantly begun making our way to the hideout of the Gouz-Maise Gang for the sake of saving her little brother. That was why — by the time I broke into the fortress — I was grossly uninformed about what kind of group the Gouz-Maise Gang was. All I knew about them was that they were a bunch of scumbags who kidnapped and killed children.

I was far too clueless.

However, even if I’d known the kinds of things they actually did, it wouldn’t have changed anything.

All that mattered was whether I was too late or not.

◇

The smoke from the Smoke Dischargers used by Hugo's Magingear permeated even the interior of the fortress, allowing me to go through the entrance and reach the building's inner passages without being detected.

Despite the thick smoke overwhelming the rooms and hallways here, I didn't have any problem seeing which way was which. In fact, I could see right through it by merely straining my eyes a bit. I could only assume that it was made to not affect the vision of the user's — Hugo's — party members. I had no idea how that worked, though.

"Well, we're inside," said Nemesis. "But we don't know the structure of this place."

Since we had to be sneaky while moving through these hallways, Nemesis and I were talking to each other telepathically.

Every now and then, we passed by some bandits running to fight Hugo, but it was clear that they couldn't see us due to the smoke.

"Master, where do you think we can find the children?" she asked.

Either windowless rooms on the second floor or higher, or somewhere below.

"Why do you think that?"

The chances of them escaping would be higher if they were kept in the first floor, and I saw ivy growing on the walls around the windows of the upper floors. They could use that to go down and get out. By simple process of elimination, it's safe to guess that they're either below or above.

"Then they're probably underground," she said. "It's standard for kidnapping scoundrels to keep children locked up in the dungeon."

I didn't know if I could be as sure as her. However, the possibility was there, so I had no reason not to test it.

As those thoughts ran through my head, I came across a split in the hallway. There were three ways to go — forward, left, and right. A short distance up the right path, I saw a flight of stairs leading down — basically beckoning us in.

I chose to follow the call and went down underground.

"Ugh!" The moment I put my foot on the first stair, a strange stench came from the bottom and attacked my nose. It was a vile, yet familiar smell that I couldn't remember — or perhaps didn't want to. However, I couldn’t back away just because of it, so I gathered my resolve and went further down.

The stairs, floor, walls, and ceiling were all made from stone, exactly as you’d expect. The ceiling was two times higher than my full height, while the distance between the walls was even greater than that.

I won’t have any problems swinging Nemesis in here, I thought.

I also couldn’t help but notice the unique humidity permeating the air and the dark green moss growing on the ceiling and the walls.

“How gloomy,” commented Nemesis.

It’s a dungeon, after all, I told her. Also, this moss and humidity is a clear sign that there’s underground water leaking in from somewhere.

“Well, it’s an abandoned fortress, after all.”

Staying here for prolonged periods of time can’t be good for the children’s health.

“If the scoundrels cared about the little ones’ health, they wouldn’t be kidnapping or killing them.”

...True that.

A single look at the underlings we’d beaten in the back alley or the ones around the carriages was enough to know that they didn’t care for the children’s lives whatsoever. Just remembering their words and behavior made me sick.

“Gh...”

“Do you feel it, Master?” asked Nemesis. She didn’t say what she meant by “it.” However, I knew without her having to put it into words.

“It started when I began going down the stairs,” I said with my mouth. I finally recalled where I last breathed this stench.

There was no need to speak telepathically anymore. Hiding was unnecessary...

...because something at the other end of the hallway had already noticed us.

“There’s something there...” said Nemesis.

“Yeah,” I nodded.

I was being assaulted by multiple smells. The smell of the wafting humidity, the stuffy air, and the moss covering the walls mixed with the stench of blood and rotten meat. I was familiar with this smell because it had been all around me during my night in the Tomb Labyrinth. There was no way I could mistake it.

"Uuuaaaagghhh..." A groan reached my ears. It was followed by the rattling of bones. The sounds completed the imagery and made me all the more certain that the smell was that of the "undead."

Wounded Zombies were groaning as they closed in on me. Their decaying flesh clung to their bones, vile juices leaking from pustules and boils. The Civilian Skeletons closed the distance between us, their teeth rattling as they shambled ahead.

The sight robbed me of words. That reaction might've been unwarranted, given that I had already faced undead monsters in the Tomb Labyrinth, but there was an important difference between the Zombies and Skeletons there and the ones before me.

It wasn't the number of them. Sure, there were several dozens of them, but the difference I had in mind was far more important.

It wasn't their physical might, either. A single look was enough to tell that these undead were significantly weaker than the ones in the Tomb Labyrinth.

The great difference I had in mind was that they were all the result of someone's death.

"...F-Fuck off."

I didn't know who I was talking to — probably the vile reality that had allowed the sight to happen — but those words were the first to escape my lips before I began repeating them in my head.

"How horrid..." Nemesis broke in.

I closed my mouth, rage overcoming me in the form of a dull grind of tooth against tooth, while Nemesis — despite having a phobia of the dead — showed far more pity than fear.

The undead horde was composed of very small skeletons. I was about two times taller than any of them.

They were numerous enough to cover the whole hallway.

Nobody had to say it. I knew exactly who they had been before they were... this.

"I'm gonna be sick..."

The tiny undead closed in on us, extending their little arms. Grasping worn-out weapons, they slowly charged at us — the intruders.

I'd seen similar things in the Tomb Labyrinth, but undead that were made from the corpses of people were far too different from those that were created as undead to begin with. Just looking at them was enough to fill me with emotions that I could hardly bear.

"It appears that the bandits have someone who can use necromancy among them," said Nemesis. "They've repurposed the children they killed."

"Are you okay, Nemesis?" I asked.

"Ha!" she laughed with no humor in her tone. "My fear is irrelevant right now. How could they do this to children?"

"I feel the same," I said.

With my eyes fixed on the undead horde, I couldn't help but wonder whether it was possible to save them. But I already knew the answer to that. The children were lost.

If there was a way to bring people back from the dead, this war-ravaged country would've done it ages ago. That meant that it either didn't exist or it was a method that even the kingdom couldn't do. As things were, I simply couldn't save them.

"Tell me, Nemesis," I spoke up.

"What is it?" she asked.

"What happens to the undead when they die?"

The undead in the Tomb Labyrinth — a created dungeon — weren't actual corpses, but mere creations. However, though they had the same names as the monsters back there, these Wounded Zombies and Civilian Skeletons before me had once been living beings. That made me wonder about what would become of their souls.

"I do not know," said Nemesis with a regretful tone. "Some are being used as nothing but empty corpses, while others still have their souls trapped in the bodies. I am not one to know what would happen to them when the vessels are destroyed."

"I see..."

"However, I believe it's best to end their painful existence as undead," she added.

"...Yeah."

The distance between me and the undead children became a mere five meters.

The dimly-shining lights on the walls lit up the faces of the zombies and made me painfully aware that some of them had traces of facial features from when they had been alive.

I tightly closed my eyes and stayed like that for a few seconds. Then I opened them and directed the back of my left hand at the undead children.

"I'm sorry."

I made my left Miasmaflame Bracer burn them all with a stream of Purgatorial Flames. Their thin bones, decaying flesh, and what little hair they had left were embraced by the intense blaze and quickly burned away. It only took a moment for them to lose their HP and continue burning as actual corpses, rather than undead monstrosities.

A black smoke shrouded the hallway before beginning to follow the ceiling up the stairs and mix with the white smokescreen.

I ended the flow of fire, making them stop burning, and leave behind nothing but cremated remains.

[Successfully eliminated over 100 monsters that fit the condition "Undead of the appropriate total level"]
[Due to fulfilling the job condition, "Paladin" and the elimination total condition, "Eliminate 100 appropriate monsters," the skill "Purifying Silverlight" has been acquired]

A message told me that I'd learned a new skill, but I felt no joy from the news. My heart was bogged down.

I stood silently. I slowly put my hands together. Like I would do while standing before a grave, I prayed for their happiness in the next world.

All of a sudden, an airflow created by the heat made a gust of wind pass through this underground hallway.

"Thankyou."

As the wind blew by, those words entered my ears.

But I was certain it was just wishful thinking on my part. It was an illusion born out of my wish that their souls were saved.

"Master," Nemesis called out to me.

"Is this it, Nemesis?" I asked while placing my hand on my chest and trying to bear the heaviness of the situation. "Is this... Is this the feeling Hugo was going to mention back then?"

"...Yes," she said. "If, somewhere deep inside, Maiden's Masters don't believe this world to be just a game... If you acknowledge this world's lives to be just as real as those of your world...”

I was silent.

“...then the weight of the lives you shoulder in Infinite Dendrogram is much too real for you.”

“Too real, huh?” I asked. The harsh reality of the heaviness of life. “You’re probably right...”

This world was so realistic that it was hard to tell it apart from reality. Somewhere deep inside, I even believed that the tians living here actually had minds and souls. Even if my head told me that it was all just a game, I wasn’t able to shake that feeling. That was why seeing tians die to Gardranda had left such a bad taste in my mouth. It was also the reason why I’d gone all out to protect Milianne from such an ending.

This case was no different. Except now, all I had before me were a bunch of people who had reached such sad conclusions.

I didn’t know the courses of their lives. I had no idea how they’d ended up like this. They had been nowhere near me, so there was no way for me to know. However, the way they’d ended was just far too cruel for me to disregard it as your everyday tragedy, and the feelings overwhelming my heart were too powerful to ignore.

An aftertaste so bad that it seemed to burn my throat now permeated my chest, mixing with great amounts of sadness and anger.

“In this world — where lives are lost far more easily than in yours — this disposition you have might bring you great pain,” said Nemesis.

“...That’s true,” I said weakly. I was actually on the verge of crying. It was so bad that a part of me wanted to throw it all away.

I probably wasn’t the first to feel this way. Many of those who shared my nature probably couldn’t stand to experience this overwhelming pain of loss more than once and instead chose to never touch Infinite Dendrogram again. A side of me was actually urging me to do the same.

“However, I... Not yet.” I was still unbroken.

I still had to save the rest of the children. I still had a promise to fulfill.

And most of all, I still had to make sure that the shithead who’d created this sight got what was coming to him. I had to make him pay.

I shifted my gaze to the children — now nothing but dust.

Hidden under their remains was a piece of metal that had something written on it in Infinite Dendrogram’s common language.

It said “Maise’s Utility Child Civilian Skeleton, Specimen No. 87.”

It was a tag. That was all that child had been to the one who’d put it on.

The words and the number on it made me all the more aware that this enemy of mine was beyond redemption. Whether this was a game or not, I simply couldn’t let him be.

“Let’s go, Nemesis,” I said. “We’re bound to find him at the end of this hallway.”

“Understood!”

And so, we began walking forward.

◆◆◆

One of the two leaders of the Gouz-Maise Gang — Lich Maise.

“Hm?” I said. A drop in my Minion Capacity count made me aware that some of the undead under my command had vanished.

To be more specific, the dead units had just been the trash I’d made to kill some time. I’d left those little things in the underground hallway to act as sentries.

They were weak, so their only use had been as alarms. I had gotten worried about nothing. I’d thought I might’ve lost something of actual value.

It did catch me by surprise, however. I’d been aware that some intruder was causing a ruckus on the surface, but I’d had no idea that there was someone underground, as well.

“Gouz.” I used a magic item that kept me in contact with the surface.

“Yeah?” he asked.

“How are things up there?” I asked.

“I give it five or six more minutes,” Gouz answered. “It should all be over by then.”

“In that case, when our underlings are all dead, move in to crush the intruder,” I said. “I’ll take care of the rat here in the dungeon. Once it’s dealt with, we’re moving.”

“Gotcha,” he said. “Oh yeah, it looks like this’ll get me lots of packed lunches, so take some extra inventories for me, will ya?”

“Of course.” I had some empty inventories meant for corpse retrieval somewhere around here. I intended to take everything with me along with the inventory containing my ultimate treasure and ritual.

"Once you're done with the intruder, wait in front of the gate," I said.

"Sure," Gouz said.

I cut the connection.

That's the surface taken care of, I thought. Though our underlings were all weaklings still sitting on their first low-rank jobs, having faced all of them and surviving was no simple task. It meant that the intruder was quite tough. However, Gouz was on another level.

He'd reached the maximum level, had a high-rank job, and — when it came to the entire gladiator job grouping — he was surely among the top five in this country. If Figaro hadn't existed, it wouldn't have been strange for Gouz to have taken the seat of the Over Gladiator.

I, too, was at the maximum level. Not only that, but I was at this country's pinnacle when it came to necromancy, and had a Superior Job within arms' reach. I didn't know how powerful the intruders were, but as long as they weren't Superiors and didn't have Superior Jobs, there was nothing for us to fear.

However, something about them was highly curious.

"Just what is their business here?" I muttered. They should've been well aware by now that trying to eliminate us was not worth the effort.

Are they interested in our treasure? I thought. Even when the amount I sent to Caldina was considered, the money we had with us was great. If someone wanted to get rich quick, taking it would be a perfectly viable method.

However, if they were actually planning to delve into such daredevilry, it told me everything I needed to know about them.

"Well, now... I believe it is time to prepare a welcome to my inhuman intruder."

Chapter Four: The Two Leaders

High Pilot Hugo Lesseps.

The clan I was part of was a gathering of players that mostly focused on crafting.

Engineers, Mechanics, Pharmacists, Smiths... This world had many such jobs that produced all sorts of things, but when the work of tians and players was compared, most of the time, players were the ones that came out on top.

Just like with battle jobs, this was due to the abilities and bonuses to stat growth given to them by their Embryos. The quality of the item and the production success rate were dependent on skill level and DEX — not any real-life ability. Due to that, even a player who was a novice at the craft could produce work showing true mastery.

As my clan leader often said: “Unlike battle — which now involves moving your body — production in this game isn’t too different from how it was when MMORPGs weren’t VR. That’s why even the slowest klutz can do it.”

That wasn’t all, though.

“Mind you, that only applies when they’re making something that has already been made,” he liked to continue. “To create something new, you need the power to imagine it. When making something without the instructions, the necessary materials and inventiveness are on a completely different level.”

Infinite Dendrogram’s crafting came in two types — the production of known items and the creation of new items.

Both methods required the person to have sufficient materials, skills, and stats.

However, while known items could easily be made by following the instructions displayed on Recipes, the creation of new items required the creation of those very instructions.

Naturally, they weren’t easy to make, since they required a deeper understanding of the processes involved, detailed knowledge of this world's science and magic, and a proper grasp of the necessary materials.

Simply put, creating new items was far too taxing. Thus, even after half a year had passed since the game's release, Masters had still been making only known or slightly customized items.

That had changed with our clan.

Our clan leader had made a breakthrough in the game's crafting department. In hindsight, it had been pretty simple, for he'd merely begun gathering people who were skilled and knowledgeable in reality.

The Dryfe Imperium was a country that had machine technology. Though there were many differences — such as the fuel of the machines being magic — the Imperium's technology had similarities to what we had in reality. The clan leader had made good use of that fact.

He'd gathered various people who had knowledge about machines, which included graduate school students that had majored in mechanical engineering, skilled workers from automobile factories, designers of heavy machinery, and even those who were simply nutty about cars, trains, or weapons. And it was all for the goal of creating a new item.

Of course, people hadn't gone to him just because he was recruiting. The clan leader had begun to receive a significant amount of applications when he'd revealed a specific project of his.

Its goal was to create a humanoid battle robot.

Back then, Dryfe hadn't had any humanoid mobile weapon-type Magingears. When the game had begun, the only Magingears Dryfe had had in their arsenal were the powered suits nicknamed "Marshall" and the tanks known as "Geist." While bipedal, human-like robots weren't even being invented. Thus, the clan leader had made it his goal to create them.

Many people had been intrigued by the idea, so by the time the clan had been created, it'd already had dozens of knowledgeable and skilled people. They'd all quickly begun cooperating and working towards the common goal.

"All you need is knowledge, equipment, manpower, materials, money, imagination, skill level, luck, and guinea pigs!" the leader had announced when he'd kickstarted the project.

Clearly, it had been a demanding task. However, they'd been able to prepare everything they needed.

They'd mixed and matched their knowledges of machinery, compared and adjusted their magic technology, and performed lots of trial and error while trying to make it all click. There had been countless failures, great costs, and members leaving one after the other. However, they'd continued despite the many problems.

One of the senior members had compared the whole thing to something called "Project X," and there had been many who'd nodded to his words. I had been uninformed and knew nothing about that show, but it seemed to click with those from his generation — especially the Japanese people.

And so, after two months in real life — half a year in Infinite Dendrogram — all the trouble has finally paid off as they completed a new item.

The name given to it was "Marshall II." It was a mass-producible weapon with the power equivalent of a Demi-Dragon. The humanoid battle robot Magingear was a straight upgrade to a Marshall — the powered suit.

Once the Marshall II was complete and the Recipe became public, our clan quickly began growing into the largest one in Dryfe Imperium.

◇◇◇

The battle before the fortress was nearing its end.

"Hugo, five o'clock, one Gunner," said Cyco.

"Oui."

As Cyco scouted the fog and gave me directions, I acted accordingly by turning my frame and firing from the Hand Canon on my left hand.

The Gunner that was aiming at me with a magic gun failed to evade my attack, and the explosive shot from my MRW03 Hand Canon made him burst into little pieces, leaving only the arm that was gripping the weapon.

That gun is one of the Imperium's older models, I thought. Looks like our technology is leaking through that country's black market again.

"Six o'clock, two Fighters," said Cyco.

"Got it."

I made my upper half turn around and used the centrifugal force to cut them down with my SRW02 Battle Knife.

The first one was unable to react as it broke through his armor, flesh, bone, flesh, armor — in that order — and split him at his torso. The second one reacted and stopped my Battle Knife with his greatshield.

Unlike in reality, Infinite Dendrogram's Fighters of this vein were tough. Though a Marshall II had power that made most heavy machinery pale in comparison, many Fighters could — evidently — block mine's attacks and even harm it.

This one had both reaction speed and power.

However...

"Your legs are wide open," I said.

Making sure he didn't move by forcing him to struggle against the force of my Battle Knife, I used the Marshall II's legs to step on his. The robot's overall weight — which reached a whole ten tons — was far too great for his plated boots to handle, and his legs were crushed.

"HHHH?!"

The moment he released a voiceless scream and lowered the power on his shield arm, I used my blade — now free to move — to split his head in half.

"No enemies nearby," said Cyco.

"Got it," I replied. "Continue keeping an eye out. And dedicate extra attention to the direction of the fortress."

"Oui."

Apparently, I'd handled everything they've sent at me so far. The realization that I'd prevailed made me heave a deep sigh.

My Marshall II was standing in the middle of the battlefield, surrounded by countless bandit corpses. I silently looked around. The one responsible for this horrible scene was me.

I was fully aware that there were things to be said about me killing so many people, but my actions didn't make my heart hurt, nor did I regret them.

I'd known about the existence of the Gouz-Maise Gang before Rebecca had told me about them. In fact, I'd been aware of them before I'd even come to Gideon. During the research we'd done for the plan, I'd noticed them among the factions surrounding the city and engraved them onto my mind.

They had killed far too many children and far too many noble souls trying to save them. It was only natural for people who took the lives of other humans to — in turn — be killed by them, as well. I thoroughly believed that to be true.

Though, considering that I was an immortal Master, that belief might be insolent and contradictory.

“All right, now...” I muttered.

Though the result of the battle made it seem like my victory had been flawless, that was far from the truth. My own HP hadn’t dropped a single percent, but the damage to my Marshall II was severe. Due to the attacks it had sustained, about a third of its armor had come off, which had exposed the inner frame to considerable amounts of damage. The movement of its left arm had become quite slow, as well.

Special equipment like cars, ships, and Magingear didn’t have any HP displays, but if they did, my Marshall II’s gauge would be at about 30% of the total. That was a testament to just how difficult the battle had been.

Though a Marshall II was a humanoid robot straight out of science fiction, my opponents were all true inhabitants of this fantasy world. The axes they’d swung could break steel, and the arrows they’d fired had easily pierced through the robot’s armor. If my fellow clan members hadn’t increased the Marshall II’s stats by fine tuning it for better use by the clan’s Masters, and if I hadn’t given it the bonuses from a High Pilot riding it, I would’ve been overwhelmed by their numbers and lost.

I sighed yet again, reached into my inventory and took out an MP Recovery Potion.

Moving and fighting in the Magingear came at a cost to my MP. During the battle, it had dropped to a mere 20% of the total, and if I didn’t restore it, the damage to my Marshall II would be the least of my worries in the upcoming battles.

“Hugo,” Cyco addressed me.

I drank the contents of the bottle and replied to her. “What is it, Cyco?”

“It wouldn’t have been this hard if you’d used your Embryo’s skill,” she said.

“Indeed.” I nodded in response. She was completely right. If I’d used my Embryo’s skill, I could’ve won without getting as much as a scratch on me. After all, it was basically the natural enemy of people such as these.

However...

“I can’t,” I said. “I will only allow myself to use that skill after the plan begins. I am not touching it before that. That’s an order from the clan leader, and I made a promise to follow it."

"But no one's watching — not even Ray."

"Even so," I said. "If I were to use the skill before the plan begins, it would have to be a situation when I simply have to do it." And thankfully, it hadn't come to that.

"How stubborn," she said.

"I'm aware," I nodded. "Now, I wonder if there are any kidnapped children in those carriages."

I could easily help them right now, but doing so would made it obvious that using them as hostages would be effective against me. If another battle began while they were aware of that, the scum would begin using them to threaten me.

That would be fine if there were no more bandits left or if Ray had exterminated all the ones still at the fortress, but if some were still alive, trying to help the children in the carriages would be dangerous. I had to leave them there for now.

As such thoughts went through my head...

"...Heh," I grinned.

"Hugo," said Cyco.

"I know."

I sighed slightly and moved the levers to make the Magingear replace the Hand Cannon's empty explosive shot magazine with a full one it had hanging on its waist. Even while doing such a simple action, I couldn't help but be aware that the left arm's movements were noticeably duller.

"I could've put the Marshall II back in the Garage and fixed it up, but it seems I'll have to give up on that," I said. After all — I was all out of time.

Aiming towards the entrance of the fortress, I fired a shot from my Hand Cannon. It went through the open gates and exploded upon hitting the thing standing right behind them.

Any normal human hit by such an attack would've burst into pieces so small that none of them would've reached one kilogram in mass. However, that didn't happen to the creature standing there.

"Damn, that hurts!" it said. "It's kinda hot, too."

With those words, the thing showed itself while displaying no signs of injury or pain.

It was a demon of a large stature. Despite its head being that of an ox, the teeth lining its mouth were all hound-like fangs.

Its height almost matched that of my Marshall II. It even had to bend a bit to fit through the fortress' gates, which were twice as tall as the average person. A single glance was enough to know that it was on an entirely different level from the bandits I'd been fighting until now.

The sight of it made me tremble.

"...I assume you're one of the leaders of the Gouz-Maise Gang?" I asked.

"Ayup," it said. "Yer talkin' to one of the two great leaders of the Gouz-Maise Gang — Strong Gladiator Gouz."

◇◆◇

"Hugo, do you know about category-based personality analysis?" the clan leader had asked soon after I'd joined the clan. It had happened about a month ago in terms of reality's time.

The clan had already become the largest in Dryfe. It was known for having played a great role in the war and was flourishing in terms of both budget and human resources. There was no end to the Masters trying to join, and the total number of members was quickly closing in on a thousand.

Back then, I had still been a rookie whose total Infinite Dendrogram playtime didn't even break a month — a Master who'd just happened to join at that particular time. However, due to some things in reality, the leader had taken an interest in me and invited me into his clan. Because of those circumstances, he and I often had talks such as these.

"Is it something like blood type-based personality analysis?" I asked. "It certainly sounds like it."

I wasn't fond of the idea behind blood type-based personality analysis. Rather than trying to research my character by examining the traits I was born with, I preferred to strive to be someone I wanted to be. A person's character was best left for the person to decide. Whether here or in reality, I sincerely believed that to be true.

"Blood types, eh?" said the leader. "I don't like personality analysis based on that because the basis for it is extremely weak. I still think that brain — not blood — should be the first thing to look at if you wanted to know how a person ticks. Well, anyway...”

He reached into his inventory and took out a whiteboard. Then he began writing something down on it with a marker. He liked explaining things, so he always had those objects with him.

He also liked scheming, so he often used them to lay out the plans that came to his mind. It wouldn’t have been too bad if the schemes could be laughed off, but he often made plots which — while amusing to us — were nothing short of tragic to those affected.

A part of me was often disturbed by such plans, but the part of me that would stop him simply didn’t exist.

...Back to the matter at hand.

On the whiteboard, the leader drew a humanoid shape which represented a Master and wrote down several Embryo categories to the side of it.

“You know how, in the Zeroth Form, an Embryo examines the Master’s actions, character, and other personal things before using the results to go into the First Form, right? Well, some decided to turn it around, creating this idea that you can find out what kind of person a Master is by looking at the type of their Embryo.”

That made sense. Since Embryos were born from the inner workings of Masters, they were far more reliable than blood types.

“The idea was popular about one year ago in terms of real time,” said the leader. “I tried my hand at it, too. However, High-Rank Embryos and above had so many irregularities that I couldn’t make sense of them at all. There were even some Embryos like mine — completely unique in terms of typing. In the end, the only results that were somewhat reliable were those I got from four of the five base categories and a certain extra.”

The categories he wrote down were Arms, Guardian, Castle, Territory, and just “extra.”

“Boss,” I spoke up. “I don’t see Chariot among the five main categories.”

“Chariot, eh?” he repeated. “I actually didn’t notice anything definite among Masters with those Embryos. That’s why it’s not in my results.”

What a shame, I thought. I was actually quite curious about that category.

“Now, let me describe them for you,” he said. “Arms often belong to people who are courageous and unafraid to get hurt. Reckless, stupid, emotional, hot-blooded. There are many ways to describe them. Guardian Masters are the opposite — they're cowardly, afraid to get hurt, lonely, or just want to have someone protect them. These two fit the general image, don't you think?"

Weapons and defenses. When the nature of those Embryos was considered, that evaluation seemed to be quite correct. Though I couldn't help but wonder where non-weapon Arms were in all of this.

"Castle Masters are introverted, gentle, careful, cooperative, and have an artisan's temperament. Seems right, no?" he said. "Territory Masters have a lust for control, tend to hoard their stress, create rules for themselves, and are self-righteous and lone wolves. By the way, my Embryo's first category was Castle."

I see, I thought. So, depending on the person, there was room for objections. Especially when you considered the leader's personality and aligned it with the description of Castle Masters.

"There are some hybrids that mix several categories at once, so it's hard to be completely sure," he added. "But anyway, that's the main categories covered."

"So, boss," I spoke up. "What's the extra category?"

"Maiden."

His answer made my eyes widen, though only a little bit.

"Type Maiden," he said. "A rare category you will encounter every now and then. These Embryos have two main features. First, they're always hybrids that come equipped with another category. And second, their base form is always that of a human. Sure, there are Guardians that take the shape of humanoid monsters, but Maidens are always humans, through and through."

I was fully aware of those features.

"Just so you know, the term 'Maiden' is only used when their human form is female," he continued. "It's different when it's male, but those are just so damn rare."

"So, leader... what are Maiden Masters like?" I asked.

"They don't think that this world is a game. To them, the weight of the lives here is just as great as it is in reality."

His answer made me silently gasp.

"So, got anything to say about my deductions, Hugo?"

I had trouble formulating an answer to that.

◇◆◇

Finally, one of the two leaders of the gang had left the fortress and introduced himself as Gouz, the Strong Gladiator.

“Strong Gladiator” was one of the high-rank jobs from the gladiator grouping. I’d heard that it focused mainly on hand-to-hand combat. What mattered more than the job itself, however, was the fact that he even had a job, which meant that — despite appearing so monstrous — he was actually a Demi-Human. That reality was also supported by the fact that he could hold a conversation.

“Man, did you make a mess here,” he said. “My boys were such a nice little bunch, and you went and killed them all.”

“You say that,” I replied, “but I don’t see a hint of anger or sadness in you.”

“Well, yeah, means I get a buncha free meals, right?”

...This wretch, I thought.

“A kid’s meat is sweet and tender, sure,” he continued. “But every now and then, I feel like sinking my teeth into the bitter meat of an adult. Did ya know that adult flesh actually becomes more bitter and tastier the more of a dreg they are?”

“Sorry, but I’m a vegetarian,” I snapped.

“Really, now? Surprised ya can stay healthy like that. Guess that immortality you Masters have comes packaged with some tough bodies, eh?”

So he knew I was a Master.

“I was watchin’ the whole fight from the fortress,” he went on. “Your movements are too good. Don’t hafta be a genius to see that you’re not the usual soldier.”

“Heh,” I grinned. “Then you could’ve come out before I’d killed every single one of your underlings.”

“Oh, but having you take care of them saved us the hassle,” he said.

“...What?”

“Well, we were actually planning to move out of here,” he explained. “By ‘we,’ I mean me and the other leader, of course. The underlings and the brats were just in the way, ya know? We planned to kill and eat them all.”

The leaders were leaving their hideout and getting rid of their underlings? I thought. What drove them to do that?

“So what’s the reason?” I asked.

“Not telling,” he said. “Well, I don’t actually need any reasons. He said we’re doing it, so I’m just tagging along.”

So the other leader was above him, while he merely acted as his right hand man.

...That relationship reminded me of a certain someone.

“Thanks to you killing our underlings, all that’s left is to eat ’em,” he added. “Then just gotta take care of the brats in the dungeon... and the ones the boys just brought us.”

He shifted his gaze towards the carriages behind me... specifically, towards the children inside.

“I won’t allow that,” I said coldly. I made my Marshall II brandish the Battle Knife and aim the Hand Cannon at him.

“Ha ha ha!” he laughed. “Thought as much. But...”

Gouz lowered his center of gravity, and...

“Y’CAN’T WIN AGAINST ME WITH THAT BROKEN PILE OF JUNK, YA DUMB SHIT!”

...with a roar that seemed to shake the fortress — no, the whole ground around him — he charged at me while perking his shoulders.

In response to that unrefined — almost suicidal — attack, I swung my Battle Knife at him. Since the explosive shot from my Hand Cannon hadn’t worked, I chose to use my melee weapon — a means of attack with a more focused type of damage — to hit his weak point. Specifically, I aimed at his carotid artery, which was sure to become a fatal injury when damaged.

However, the result was far from my expectations.

“NOT GONNA WORK!”

My Battle Knife actually broke — not by his horns or claws, but by the skin covering his carotid artery.

“Huh?!” I exclaimed.

A moment later, Gouz’s large body rammed into my Marshall II and greatly shook the inside of the cockpit.

“MGHHHOOOOOO!”

Though the robot was several times heavier than him, his power was great enough to overcome that difference in weight. After pushing the Marshall II for more than ten meters, Gouz grabbed hold of its torso and threw it in an uncertain direction. Following a momentary floating sensation, the Marshall II crashed into the ground.

"Ghh! Ahhh!" Though the harness fixing me to the machine didn't show any signs of letting go, the force of the impact made the air escape my lungs. I hurriedly tried to regain my breath, but my respiratory system didn't seem to be functioning properly.

I then tried to move the levers to make the Magingear get into a proper position, but it didn't go too well. The Marshall II or myself — I couldn't tell which one was broken.

"Hugo!" said Cyco.

"Heh... ha ha ha," I laughed. "I underestimated him. This ox-head's tough. Clearly among the best high-rank job wielders. He could even aim for a Superior Job if the conditions were right."

However, that couldn't ever happen because the Superior Job of the gladiator grouping — Over Gladiator — had already been taken by that "Figaro" fellow.

Still, there was no denying that Gouz was strong. He could easily defeat high-rank Masters such as myself. Honestly, I wasn't certain if I could've won against him even if the Marshall II had been in perfect shape.

This robot's ability was equivalent to that of a Demi-Dragon. My level 7 Piloting skill increased its power by 140%, but that still wasn't enough to match this man.

"Hugo," Cyco said again.

"Yes, I can hear you, Cyco," I responded.

"Will you use the skill?" she asked.

I was silent. I still didn't know if that was a good idea.

My power was below that of Gouz. The gap between us was made even greater by the damage I'd sustained.

The Marshall II and I can't hope to win against this tough man-eater, I thought. However, if I use the skill — my Embryo's skill — the result will change drastically. My victory will become certain due to the fact that he is a tough man-eater.

However, I'd made it a point not to use my Embryo's skill until the project, and...

“Man, I’m really workin’ up an appetite here,” he cut my thoughts short with his words.

Hearing Gouz say that, I looked at him through the Marshall II’s cracked camera-eye. Despite being in battle with me, he was facing towards the other direction. Considering my condition, he might’ve been thinking that the battle was over.

Gouz was messing with a corpse of one of his underlings. He removed the armor, stripped off the clothes... and sank his fangs into the flesh.

“Mm, them’s good eatin’,” he spoke while eating, courtesy be damned. “It’s just so... complete. Wouldn’t expect less from my boys.”

With those words, bite by bite, he devoured his underling whole. As the sight filled me with an urge to vomit, I looked at my equipment window and tested the levers to determine the Marshall II’s condition.

More than 70% of the armor was lost, while the damage to the armor that remained was critical. The left arm wasn’t moving at all. The right arm’s movements were dull. The legs, however, were still mobile.

As for weapons... the Hand Cannon had been lost along with the left hand. The Battle Knife had been completely destroyed. The Marshall II had been rendered useless for battle.

“My choices are...”

...to use the skill or retreat without using it, I thought.

I couldn’t use the skill because of the plan.

I couldn’t let myself get the death penalty here because the plan was commencing tomorrow.

Thus, I had to run away...

But if I retreated, Ray was still here. There was the possibility that he could defeat Gouz. Therefore, even if I retreated...

“Main course over — guess I’ll have dessert!” He cut my thoughts short again and took something out of the bag hanging at his waist.

Once I realized what it was... my mind almost blanked out completely.

The thing in Gouz’s hand was about the size of a ball. Small eyes — open wide and filled with terror, swaying hair — long and drenched in blood... It was unmistakably a human head. The head of a little girl.

Gouz threw it into his mouth as nonchalantly as one would a piece of candy. The demonic fangs lining his oral cavity fell downwards, mashing the child’s skull with ease.

"Man, it's so good," he said. "Kid meat's tastiest when they know they're about to die, y'know that? But my appetite ain't quite sated yet."

Saying that, Gouz began making his way towards the carriage, and his intentions became immediately clear.

"Gh..." The deed I'd just witnessed and the realization of what he was going to do made all the hesitation in my mind fade away like it had never been there. What took its place was pure, unadulterated wrath.

"Hugo!" Cyco called out to me again.

"Cyco," I replied.

"Will you use the skill?"

"You already know the answer to that."

Though it was still severely damaged, I made my Marshall II stand upright.

"Gouz!" I yelled.

The ox-head turned around when he heard his own name called out.

"Huhh? Ya still awake, ya Master piece of shit?" he asked.

Awake? I repeated the word in my head. How appropriate.

Indeed — I had been half-asleep until now. I hadn't used the skill because of the plan. And because of the same plan, I'd chosen to avoid getting the death penalty and run away.

How thoroughly absurd. That wasn't me at all.

The Hugo Lesseps I strived to be wasn't this unsightly an individual.

Thus, I made my wrath known.

"I declare that I will no longer tolerate you!"

My words made Gouz laugh. "Ha ha ha! Big words, comin' from a Master who treats my entire world like a little game! You aren't the first of your kind to come here, and let me tell ya — none of the ones before ya were actually serious about whatever they were doing. You shits can't die in this world, so what's it matter to you? You can't ever know the fear of death my kind know!"

"Indeed," I said. "We Masters all enter this world with the intention to play. However, there are some that listen to the voices of those who call this world their home. Some that grieve when hearing the dying cries of the weak. And some who use that to set what they really are."

Thus, I had decided on my role in this world.

I was the thorn of a rose. A spike meant to pierce any and all scoundrels trying to ravage beautiful flowers and precious lives.

That was the true Hugo Lesseps. The role I'd willingly given to myself.

"Be aware," I said. "For the sin of ending lives too many to count, I will send you into the bowels of Hell."

Following the set role, I faced the scoundrel — Gouz — and declared, "My hell will destroy you." He would pay for all his sins.

"DO YOUR WORST, YA PIECE OF SHIT!" Gouz screamed in exasperation, and charged at me once again.

Another attack from him could completely destroy the Marshall II and kill me alongside it. However, that had no chance of happening at this point.

"Cyco!"

Cyco stood up on the robot's shoulder.

"Crest Disguise... Disable," she said. Through the camera-eye, I could see Gouz's face fill with surprise. It was only natural, considering what he'd just seen.

Cyco suddenly appeared on the Marshall II and made the crest on her left hand — the proof of a Master — disappear.

Indeed — Cyco was not a Master.

A Master of that name simply didn't exist.

Cyco's true identity was...

"Cocytus, it's time."

"Yes, Master."

Cyco — Cocytus — disintegrated to become a gathering of white and blue particles that showered the Marshall II, merged with it, and drastically changed its appearance.

The surroundings were momentarily overwhelmed by a whirling blizzard, followed by a brief whiteout.

In the center of it all stood Cocytus and I — taking the shape of a completely reconstructed Marshall II.

The robot was now equipped with new armor reminiscent of transparent, white ice. In its hands and on its head were cross-like blades that were made of blue ice.

Due to its replenished magic, the Marshall II's output was now greater than it had been when it was completely unharmed. Its appearance was reminiscent of an anthropomorphized church made of ice.

This was my Embryo.

The true form of Cocytus — a Type Maiden with Chariot.

“GRRROOAAAAGGHHHHHHH!”

Despite what had just transpired, Gouz didn’t stop his charge.

That was the correct reaction. Not knowing hesitation or fear, Gouz was a perfect example of a true warrior.

He was strong, indeed.

But it was already over for him. The moment I’d decided to use Cocytus’ power, Gouz had lost all chance of emerging victorious. It didn’t matter how tough of a man-eater he was.

The stage was set.

The gates of hell were opening to welcome another sinner.

“Omnes relinquite spes, o vos intrantes.”

After reciting the words etched onto the entrance to hell — “Abandon all hope, ye who enter here” — I activated the skill.

“La Porte de l’Enfer.”

Moments later, Gouz’s life reached a bitter end.

◇◇◇

Paladin Ray Starling

The world of Infinite Dendrogram had a job system.

Just as I had my “Paladin” job, so did other Masters and tians have theirs. The only people who didn’t have jobs were Masters who had just started Infinite Dendrogram and tian children.

Jobs were many and varied. Vanguard roles alone had job groupings such as Knight — which included my Paladin job — Swordsman, Warrior, Gladiator, Pugilist, Samurai, and so on.

Then there were job groupings for rearguard roles, support roles, crafting roles, et cetera... When summed up, they were just too many to properly grasp.

The catalog my brother had given me had the conditions for acquiring every low-rank and high-rank job. The entries there amounted to several thousands, and — naturally — I still had trouble remembering them all. The number of active Masters was several hundred thousand, and I had a feeling that — if jobs had been split evenly among them — there would’ve been fewer than one hundred people on each of them. Of course, the actual job distribution was nowhere near “even.” Rook’s Pimp job, for example, wasn’t too popular among Masters.

There was no denying that the number of jobs available for people in other MMORPGS was incomparable to that of Dendro’s freedom. But despite this overwhelmingly great amount, there was one job that was etched into my mind. It was one I couldn’t quite forget about.

It was a job named “Necromancer.”

Its selling points were its many debuff skills, offensive dark magic skills...

...and, of course, Necromancy — the skill that allowed one to turn corpses into tamed monsters at the cost of MP.

It could be used on both people and creatures without any problems.

Of course, the difficulty of turning a corpse into a tamed monster depended on how powerful the creature was when alive.

On the other hand, that meant that children — being nearly powerless — could be turned into undead without much trouble.

The catalog said that one of the conditions to get the high-rank job of the Necromancer grouping was related to the number of successful uses of the Necromancy skill. I’d read on the wiki that some tian criminals were Necromancers who used children and the sickly to increase that counter for that very purpose. Some theorized that getting the Superior Job of this grouping involved a similar condition.

The implications of the idea made me sick, so I’d etched the existence of Necromancers into my memory. And now, it all came back to me.

Trying to make sense of why the Gouz-Maise Gang was kidnapping children, I made my way towards the end of the underground hallway.

◇

It was a straight path without any branches, so all I had to do was go forward.

Although I didn’t encounter any bandits, I had to face some undead — adults this time — blocking my way.

They’d probably been made from corpses that had gathered here when the fortress had still been occupied by the army. Then again, they could’ve just as well been the remains of the adventurers the bandits had defeated.

I destroyed each and every undead in my way. Even if they had been people once, I couldn't let them stop me. If I did, the dead would just keep piling up.

Finally, I reached the end of the hallway, where I was greeted by a door. A heavy-set thing of wood, secured by a steel padlock, it separated me from the room behind it, where I felt the presence of living creatures.

"Hhgh!"

I swung my Nemesis down on the door itself, rather than the padlock. As pieces of wood scattered all over, I jumped inside and examined the surroundings.

I was fully ready to cut down any gang members that were awaiting me, but the only living creatures here were caged children.

There was a total of seven of them.

From their closed eyes, I could tell that they were in deep sleep. I didn't know which, but I had little doubt that one of them was Roddie — the one we had to save. Of course, I fully intended to save them all, quest-related or not.

I found it a bit strange that the children seemed to be the only people here.

"Not a single gang member?" I said in confusion.

"This room had a padlock on it, after all," said Nemesis. "It might be fair to assume they left the child-watching to the undead."

"I guess that makes sense." I cautiously examined the children and the condition they were in. Reaching through the grates, I gently shook some of them, but they showed no signs of awakening.

"I assume they're either drugged or under the effect of some debuff spell," commented Nemesis.

"Probably," I nodded. It was just my intuition, but I believed it to be magic. After all, the one who'd done it was probably the one who'd made undead out of those children in the hallway.

To him, they were just cards to use to get ransom money. And if it didn't come, he'd readily kill them and use his Necromancy to desecrate their corpses. I was beyond disgusted.

"Master, look to the right," Nemesis said.

I looked, saw another door — an iron one this time. Upon approaching it, I lightly spun the doorknob. The way it felt made it obvious that it wasn't locked and that I'd have no trouble opening it.

"Will you go inside?" asked Nemesis.

"Of course," I replied.

I spun the doorknob and quickly kicked the door open. I had already broken one door. If there was someone in here, then there was no reason for me to act all stealthy.

"Is that a...?" I began.

The first thing I saw after entering was a person. A young boy, to be precise. He was sleeping — just like the children in the cages. In the middle of the room, on the floor under him, there was a highly detailed magic circle.

"There's a lot to be said about the tastes of the owner of this room." Nemesis' voice was steeped in anger.

The magic circle on the floor wasn't the only thing she was referring to. In fact, the magic circle was tame when compared to the rest of the scene.

Stains of blood covered both the walls and the ceiling. Something's leather was heaped against the edge of the room. A nearby barrel was overflowing with white bones. The table next to the wall was covered in utensils and materials, but nothing really stood out until I saw a taxidermy construction of a right hand with twenty fingers, which compelled me to shift my gaze away.

I silently suppressed my rage. There was no denying that we were standing in the laboratory of the Necromancer who'd created those undead.

However, the Necromancer himself was nowhere in sight. It was safe to assume that he'd gone out to face Hugo.

The child on the magic circle was probably going to be his next guinea pig. We'd saved him by coming here.

"What now?" asked Nemesis. "Should we ensure the children's safety or go help Hugo with the bandit elimination?"

That was a hard decision to make. Saving the children was our primary goal, but carrying all seven of them somewhere safe would be too difficult for me alone. However, if I left them here and went out to fight, I'd increase the possibility of them being used as hostages.

My other option was to stay here and protect the children while Hugo took care of the bandits, but it'd all go to hell if Hugo got killed.

"Man, this is a tough one..." I sighed.

“For now, I think you should take that youngling to the other room,” said Nemesis. “I don’t know what kind of magic circle that is, but I don’t believe it’s safe for a child to sleep on.”

I nodded and moved towards the child in the circle.

After a few steps, I stepped on something that seemed strange. It was a particularly thick piece of cloth. At first glance, it looked like a thin mattress made of felt, but I soon noticed that it had a pair of sleeves sewn on it, making it clear that it was a piece of clothing — a robe, to be precise. What seemed strange wasn’t the fact that clothing was lying on the ground, but the fact that I could feel something hard under it.

I kicked the robe away to find out what it was.

“These are...”

...bones — that was the source of the hard sensation beneath my feet.

Their presence didn’t surprise me in the least. The nearby barrel was full of them, after all. However, I found it strange that half of the bones were those of a human, while the other half belonged to something else. The non-human bones were thicker and reminded me of a horse skeleton I’d seen in a museum once.

“How did human and horse bones end up lying in the same place?” I asked.

“I would guess they belong to a horse-man,” said Nemesis. “As far as I am aware, this is just about how their skeletal remains look.”

That reminded me that, back in Gideon, I had seen some members of a race that looked much like the centaurs from Greek myth.

I glanced back down at my feet. The upper body and skull bones clearly belonged to a human, while the bones that matched to the lower body seemed about the right fit for an equine. Indeed, there was little doubt that they belonged to a horse-man.

However, there were things to be said about their large size. I didn’t know that race’s average, but at the very least, it was clear that it didn’t belong to a child.

How did the bones of a mature horse-man end up here? I thought.

“The Necromancer might’ve somehow gotten his hands on one of their corpses and used it in his experiments,” said Nemesis.

“He would’ve cleaned it up if that was the case,” I argued. “After all, he’s already preparing his next guinea pig.”

I looked at the child on the magic circle. It didn't take a genius to see that the Necromancer was fully ready for the next experiment. He wouldn't have left the bones from a previous experiment just lying on the floor like this.

I mean, the madman is methodical enough to put all the other bones in that barrel there, I thought.

"Trying to understand the thought process of a madman is a fool's errand, if you ask me," said Nemesis.

"...No point in considering it, huh?" I muttered.

She had a point. My prime objective was to move that child away from here.

After using Nemesis to shatter the magic circle multiple times and making sure that I wouldn't activate some strange magic, I stepped inside and picked the boy up.

Sleeping on the cold floor had made his body temperature drop. Still, he was breathing properly and had a stable pulse. Slightly relieved, I began carrying him on my back and made my way out of the room.

Suddenly, I felt his breath behind me.

That was normal — considering where he was — but for some reason, a chill arced down my spine like lightning...

"Die."

I was unsure of where that word came from. But it was too late. I heard the sound of a blade slicing my neck.

Somehow I'd missed it, but the child on my back had a dagger in his hands.

As my carotid artery began oozing blood, I fell to the cold, stony floor.

◆◆◆

One of the two leaders of the Gouz-Maise Gang, Lich Maise

This world had a power most referred to as "Superior Jobs."

Out of the thousands of jobs available to humanoid creatures, those were the ultimate peak — available only to a select few.

Superior Jobs allowed people to surpass the limits of their corporeal form.

One of the people who had a Superior Job was the Arch Wiseman — the one they called the kingdom's guardian deity. His magic power was nothing short of divine. He could part the ground beneath and even bring down the heavens themselves.

However, in the war with Dryfe, the Arch Wiseman had been defeated by the King of Beasts — a Master and another owner of a Superior Job.

Though that had been nothing but a tragedy for the Kingdom of Altar, a number of people were glad that he was gone. After all — the throne of a Superior Job was exclusive to the one possessing it. With the kingdom's Arch Wiseman dying, the role of the Arch Wiseman became open for those wanting to take it.

I, too, was aiming for a Superior Job. However, it was a job completely unlike the Wiseman's.

The Superior Job I set my sights upon was at the apex of the Necromancer grouping. It was a job known as the King of Corpses.

Its power was far above the magic of common Necromancers... and beyond even the Necromancy of Liches — those who became undead themselves.

Anyone seated in the throne of corpses would be immortal, undying, and commanding power surpassing that of all the deceased. It was the only method to receive the undeath that only Masters had.

That was the King of Corpses.

I started leading the Gouz-Maise gang to further my efforts at getting this Superior Job. The kidnapped children were there to help me practice my Necromancy. The money was necessary for me to get certain magic items and to bribe Caldina.

In that country, money was the start and the end of the conversation. Everything in Caldina had a price. A sufficiently-greased palm could even get their army to act in response to movements from Gideon's soldiers.

Since this place was near the border, that made the kingdom hesitant to attack us because it could provoke Caldina.

Also, with all the Conceal and Presence Manipulation magic items I'd bought from them, the kidnapping of materials had become significantly easier. Blessed with abundant ingredients and the perfect environment, I was able to study the path of Necromancy to my heart's content and slowly made my way towards the throne of the King of Corpses.

Getting this Superior Job required the fulfillment of several difficult conditions and then passing a certain test. I had learned the conditions by deciphering an ancient text describing the secret processes.

The first condition there was “Turn 5,000 years’ worth of life into death,” which I’d easily achieved by making this fortress my hideout and having the gang work for me. Since I focused on children — who were both easy to convert into undead and still had long, happy futures ahead of them — it all went extremely smoothly. I needed fewer than a hundred of them for this, but since the undead were a great asset, I continued on doing it.

The second condition — which I’d achieved, as well — was the creation of a Crystal of Resentment. It was made by forcing enormous amounts of fear — or grudge, to be more precise — into a Crystal of Purity — an item that cleansed the corruption of the undead.

Gouz helped me a lot with this. The fear of the children he ate while they were still alive manifested in exquisite, sorrowful grudges.

Of course, the grudge I got from them when using the Anguish Circle to turn them into materials for the undead wasn’t too bad, either.

The once-white crystal that had emitted an irritatingly divine light was now blackened to the very core.

With that, I’d had already fulfilled the conditions to become the King of Corpses. All that was left was going to Legendaria — the place where the job’s throne was sealed — to clear the ordeal quest and make the title my own.

Both the fortress and the gang had outlived their use. Gideon would soon become crowded with some particularly pesky individuals. Before that happened, I planned to take Gouz — my only useful subordinate — with me, then destroy all the knowledge I might’ve left here and leave once and for all.

That was when a particularly reckless intruder sneaked into the fortress.

◆

“Die.”

A moment after I spoke that word, I heard the sound of a man dropping to the laboratory floor. I couldn’t see the look on his face, but the ground was drenched in his fresh blood.

Standing next to him was a child I’d magically controlled to slice open the man’s throat.

An undead would’ve easily been recognized by the description over its head, I thought. In such cases, it’s better to use them alive.

“So a child got you to let your guard down, huh?” I muttered. “What a fool you are.”

I began rebuilding my scattered body. Once my horse-man skeleton came together, I re-equipped my robe. Then, skin and leather began covering my bones before expanding to fit the flesh inside.

A moment before, I had been nothing but bones, which was made possible by one of my Lich skills — Corpsification. To the man now lying on the ground, I’d probably looked like a standard set of skeletal remains.

I was undead and had Lich — a high-rank necromancer job — as my own. Having such trickery at my disposal was only natural.

“Oh? You’re still alive?” I said while looking down at the man. Although he’d lost so much blood that the stream from his neck had significantly weakened, he still seemed to have a pulse. In his right hand, he held a black halberd with a flag trailing from behind. I tried identifying it, but didn’t get any results. That could only mean one thing: the weapon was an Embryo and the man was a Master.

“You’re still conscious, too?” I spoke again. “Well, it matters not. The dagger was coated in a Poison and Paralysis-causing fluid, specially concocted by yours truly. A Lich’s poison is nothing to sniff at, either. You’ll die without being able to do anything about it.”

The Bleeding and Poison was draining his life, while Paralysis sealed all and any movement. Shame that he was a Master — I could’ve harvested a truly potent grudge from him if he hadn’t been one.

Masters were a terrible source for grudges. When killed, they would simply come back to life three days later. Compared to tians, their fear of death and resentment towards their murderers was simply... mediocre. Not only that — their absolute immortality made them live as though everything was just a game.

That was exactly how the party of Masters that’d attacked this place had been. My magic and Gouz’s strength had been more than enough to take care of them, but since I hadn’t even been able to turn their corpses into undead, they’d been absolutely useless to my Necromancy work. Masters irked me to no end. Their treatment of this world as a plaything, and the fact that they automatically had immortality... the one thing I had decided to make my life's work.

...Oh, that made me remember. The first party to come here had been comprised entirely of tians, and the grudges I'd collected by torturing them had been simply superb. Ah, the fun I'd had back then. Their corpses had become some excellent materials, too.

Turning tians into undead was extremely easy. I was rather intrigued by the idea of making undead out of Masters, as well, but for now, I had to make due with merely getting rid of them whenever they intruded.

By now, Gouz had probably taken care of this man's ally on the surface. All I had to do now was leave the fortress, go where I must, complete the ordeal, and become the King of Corpses.

"With that in mind, it's time to move out and head towards Legendaria," I muttered.

As I made my way towards the laboratory door, I noticed the materials... the children I'd put to sleep in the other room. I'd nearly forgotten.

"The gang act is over," I said. "Better kill all the children and turn them into materials for my undea... hm?"

The moment I said that, I saw the fingers of the man on the ground twitch a little bit. That small action — combined with the look on the side of his face — made me realize something.

"Did you actually come all the way here just to save the children?" I asked. "It wasn't for my treasure?"

He didn't say a word. Not like he could, considering his current condition, but his reaction was more than enough.

"Hah... hah... HAHAHAHAHAHAHAHA!" I placed my hands on my belly and laughed out loud.

No other reaction was appropriate. How could I not laugh?

"Hahahahahah! An inhuman immortal? Going out of his way to save a few brats? Ghahahahahahah! Oh my, quite a heroic way to play you've found, Mister Master."

Thought you'd roleplay as some champion of justice, huh? I thought. The fact that this was where it had gotten him filled me with great bliss.

"Heheheh," I continued laughing. "All right, this is how it will go. I'll create some lovely little undead creatures, and you will watch it happen until the poison kills you. Who knows? You might learn something. After all, I’m quite skilled at it, if I say so myself. But that is only natural, considering that I’ve already created hundreds of them!”

In response to my words, the man on the ground exuded some horrific, traumatic emotions.

Excellent, I thought. It appears that even a Master can be a good source when properly agitated. But even more than that, as one who will soon be the King of Corpses, I know now that I will thoroughly enjoy the freedom to look down on any and all immortal Masters.

“Now, then...” I said. “The children with thick-looking bones will be turned into Skeletons, while all the others will do fine as Zombies. Oh, but it might be a good idea to turn these pretty-looking ones into taxidermy pieces and sell them off somewhere. Despite appearances, my hands are quite dexterous, so I’m actually pretty decent at managing the finer details. Some men of culture value my work quite highly.”

In response, I got more angry silence.

Ah, the joy, I thought. This is pure bliss.

I’d never have expected to have this much fun with a Master. His sorrow was like the perfect seasoning.

However, it was time to end it.

“Now, let’s start with the brat that cut your neck!” I exclaimed. “First, I’ll have him cut his own neck and—”

Suddenly, a gust of wind...

...followed by the sound of something hitting the ground.

“...What?” Confused, I looked to where the sound came from and saw something very familiar.

It was a left hand, covered in magic rings. Magic rings that had cost me a fortune.

Isn’t that... my own left hand? I thought, stunned.

“If you... are...”

The man whose defeat was all but certain slowly spoke up. His right arm was raised in the air.

“If you... are not among the living...”

The blade of the halberd he held was emitting a noble, white gleam. I recognized it. It was imbued with the bane of the undead — Purifying Silverlight.

“If you... lost sight of what it means to be a person...”

He slowly stood up and faced towards me. The neck wound that was surely there less than a minute ago had disappeared without a trace.

“If you... are the one responsible for that scene...”

His expression had neither the weariness of Poison, nor the heaviness of Paralysis.

“If you... claim that you will keep on doing it...”

The only real emotion on his face was in the light in his eyes — a blaze of pure rage.

“...then I will kill you.”

It was the first time I had seen a Master — one of those immortal, inhuman beasts of undeath — make such an expression.

I couldn’t articulate it completely, but what I felt was dread. Utter and unmatched dread.

My instincts were screaming, telling me only one thing:

Run! He is going to extinguish you.

“■■■■ — Abyssal Delusion!”

Dead Man’s Bind!

I quickly used the most vile hexes I had at my disposal. They were two high-rank debuff spells — one was vocal and came accompanied by a chant, while the other came from the magic item on my right hand and didn’t need any words.

Abyssal Delusion was a powerful hex that gave the affected the Death Sentence, Weakness, and Deterioration status effects, making them rot and become corpses while still alive. Dead Man’s Bind was another spell with three debuffs — Binding, Curse, and Lethargy. Together, they gave a total of six particularly powerful status effects.

This combination had sent many of my enemies to their deaths. Anyone unlucky enough to receive it was rendered completely immobile.

“Ghaah!”

Yet he didn’t stop. As though he’d reversed the effects of my hexes, he became more intimidating and horizontally swung his halberd — shining with Purifying Silverlight — towards me.

“Guh?!” I exclaimed. If I had been but a step closer, his attack would’ve split my torso.

I couldn’t let that happen. Taking fatal damage from him was something I had to avoid at all costs.

I was a Lich — an undead master of magic. Most of my wounds would mend a moment after they’d happened. I could lose an arm or get my body split in half — no such damage was critical to me.

However, in this case, the mending didn’t work at all. In fact, the arm he’d cut off had already turned to dust.

That was only natural. After all — he was wielding Purifying Silverlight. It was a gleam used only by a limited number of Paladins and Temple Knights — a light meant for the sole purpose of purging the undead. No matter how great of a Lich I was, I couldn’t come back from a fatal attack by a weapon blessed with that loathsome shine.

The fear of death overwhelmed me. It was a feeling that had become alien to me over time. It was a feeling that would never again strike me once I became the King of Corpses. But here and now, it was raw. It shook my very being.

“Awaken Undead!” Using my Necromancy, I activated the undead monsters I'd stored in the barrel in this room.

Countless Skeleton Soldiers answered my call.

However, they meant little.

There was no chance of them winning against this aberration, but it mattered not. They only had to buy the time I needed to run away.

As the undead began charging at him, I turned around and left the laboratory. If I stayed any longer, I knew it would become my grave.

Then — as my breath became ragged — I ran towards the surface through the underground hallway. Once we Liches became undead, our hearts and lungs ceased their function and were replaced by a gathering of crystallized magic. Thus, physical lack of breath was something I should never have experienced again. And yet, I felt as though I was suffocating.

"Why is a Master...?!" Through my ragged breath, I voiced my dread. "Why is one of those immortal abominations... actually furious?"

This fear was unknown to me. The fear of that thing's emotion. The terror I felt towards that aberration.

Terror — that was the word. Having one of those abominations direct such pure killing intent and rage towards me was nothing short of terrifying. After all, that meant that an immortal, indestructible animal would be hunting me for all eternity.

I had to escape. Anywhere near that aberration was certain death, so I had to leave this fortress and run where he could never find me.

I had to do it — and I could do it.

Though I was a Lich, my Agility was greater than his, so it would be perfectly possible for me to distance myself from him.

Reaching the surface would mean regrouping with Gouz. Then, I'd simply have to make him fight the abomination while I made my escape.

"I can do it...!" Picturing that future made me relieved.

Due to me being a horse-man, the underground hallway's soundscape was dominated by the sound of my horse legs hitting the floor.

However, the sound soon mingled with another.

"...What?" I burst out.

Its source was approaching me from behind. Systematic, yet rough impacts on the ground — the sound was exactly the same as the ones coming from under my feet. It was the sound of a galloping horse.

"Gh...!"

Unable to bear the tension caused by the approaching sound, I turned around.

What I saw was far beyond my imagination. It was an artificial, silver horse, speeding through the underground hallway. And to the side of it was the abomination.

For some reason, he wasn't riding it. The aberration was holding the silver horse's reins with his right hand, scraping his leg armor across the ground. It was reminiscent of a Granvaloan water sport.

In his left hand, he was still holding the halberd as the flag flowing out of it fluttered wildly in the air.

Why isn't he using his Riding skill? I thought.

That way of riding it should soon break his legs and render them useless, right? But why doesn't it look like he's taking any damage?

The strange sight left me with several questions, but their answers didn't matter.

What mattered was the fact that he was still chasing me... and that the horse was faster than me, meaning that he would soon catch up.

"AAAAUUUGHHHHHHH!"

Disregarding my shame and reputation, I screamed in fear while running towards the surface as fast as I could.

On the surface, I would meet up with Gouz. He could buy me all the time I needed to run away.

"Awaken... AWAKEN UNDEAAAAD!" Not slowing down whatsoever, I activated the undead monsters I had buried in the walls for emergencies such as these.

They were called "High-End Skeleton Warriors." I had made these high-rank undead by using the corpses of skilled tians. They were the remains of the party Gouz and I had taken care of.

Six High-End Skeleton Warriors stood between me and him. Though turned undead, they had all been owners of high-rank jobs once, so there was a chance that...

"Out of our way!" two voices — his and another, feminine one — said that at the same time. A moment later, the mass of silver went through the Skeletons and returned them all to dust.

The halberd in his left hand and the hooves of the man-made horse ended my undead in a blink of an eye. I then noticed that not just the halberd, but the entire body of the steed was shining with the Silverlight.

"Aaagh?!"

That was no living horse — it was a piece of equipment. Emitting the Silverlight and galloping at a great speed, it pulverized all and any undead that touched it.

It didn't matter if the undead were high-rank. The thing was the bane of all undead. It was a silver bullet that brought forth the ultimate end.

"GGGHAAAHHHHH!"

Completely desperate, I used the moment my undead monsters had bought me to climb up the stairs leading to the surface. With the Master being dragged by the horse, he couldn't get up the stairs properly. It ought to affect his speed.

A moment before he could catch up, I ran up the stairs and escaped to the surface.

"GOUZ! GOOUUUZ!" I screamed while dashing through the fortress.

Once I ran through the hallway on the first floor and could see the gates of the fortress, I was overcome with relief. That was because I saw Gouz's face.

A moment later, that relief changed into despair.

That was because Gouz's face... was the only thing there.

I couldn't grasp what had happened, but Gouz's dismembered head — completely frozen — was impaled on the gate.

Wh-Where did his brawny body go? I asked myself. It was nowhere in sight. All I could see were pieces of frozen meat, scattered all over the area outside the gate. Two of those pieces — placed close to each other — looked much like Gouz's feet.

Right next to them stood an anomaly looking much like an anthropomorphized church made of ice — an enemy of my kind if I ever saw one.

"Choose your fate, sinner," spoke the anomaly. "Which end do you desire? Hell, or Divine Retribution?"

I instantly understood what it was talking about.

It was telling me to choose to meet my end, either at the hands of the icy anomaly or the silver aberration.

"No!" I shouted. "This is not happening!"

I can't die here! I've come so far! And now, when the throne of the King of Corpses is within arms reach, I...

"Why...?!" I voiced my despair yet again. "What...?!"

What did I do to deserve this?!

"Very well," the anomaly spoke again. "Divine punishment it is."

It then pointed an icy blade towards something behind me.

I turned around and saw the silver aberration.

The abomination had caught up with me.

A sound thick with dread escaped my mouth. I could no longer run or hide.

Th-There must be something I can do! I thought. Don't I have a teleportation magic item on me? No?! I should have something! I just...!

"Huh...?" As I dug through the inventory in my robe, my fingers touched something that made me gasp. I slowly took it out. It was a pitch black, crystalline object that emitted no light whatsoever — a Crystal of Resentment.

"No..." I said in despair. I held the obsidian-like object in my hand. It was an item without which I had no hope of becoming the King of Corpses. Creating it had required me to lead the Gouz-Maise Gang and spend nearly a year sacrificing a great number of children.

However, aside from being the condition for becoming the King of Corpses, the crystal was also the ultimate medium for the Necromancer grouping's magic. Using it here was painful, but...

"If I die... it will have all been for naught!" I screamed.

I had to pick between dying and using the Crystal to survive, so I gladly picked the latter. If I didn't, the time and effort I'd dedicated to my cause would've all gone to waste. I simply had to survive and do it all over again in some other town. After all — the time, the work I was willing to dedicate and the sacrifices were endless.

As long as I'm alive, I can restart as many times as I have to! I thought. Indeed — I cannot let myself die here! Dying to this accidental encounter is unacceptable!

"YOU DISGUSTING, MONSTROUS CURS!" I roared while filling the Crystal of Resentment — my greatest treasure — with great amounts of magic. "YOU MONSTERS WILL NOT TAKE MY LIFE FROM ME!"

After reforming the wicked feelings within the crystal to pure destructive energy, I released it all towards the abomination, fully aware that it would destroy the fortress, as well. After all, it was the strongest offensive magic skill any Lich could have.

“DEADLY MIXEEERRRR!”

With great dread and frenzy overwhelming me, I unleashed the most powerful attack I’d ever cast. It was great enough to instantly eradicate a Pure-Dragon. There was simply no way for him to survive it.

“Counter Absorption.”

And yet...

“Ah...? Ugh...? Eahhh...?” Confusion escaped my mouth in the form of strange sounds. The magic I’d dedicated my entire being to was blocked by a barrier of light he created before it. “Th-This cannot be!”

The shock made me lose my footing and fall to the ground. A moment later, the abomination was right in front of me.

“Ghah?! N-No!”

The moment I attempted to stand up and run away in fear, his halberd — still emitting a silver gleam — penetrated my torso and pinned me to the spot.

“GYYAAAHH!”

I was unable to move — both due to the halberd piercing me and the pain caused by Silverlight — and the aberration stood before me.

“Stop... running,” it hissed through its ragged breath.

“W-Wait!” I said. “I won’t run! You caught me!”

Escape was impossible at this point, but I still had to survive, even if it meant begging for my life.

“L-Let’s make a deal!” I spoke in a panic. “M-Money! I’ll give you money! I still have lots of it! 70,000,000 lir, to be precise! It’s yours! Take it all, but please, let me go!”

The aberration said nothing.

Yes! I thought. He reacted to my offer! I don’t care if I have to give him all my coins! I have already sacrificed my Crystal of Resentment! Money is a small price to pay for survival!

“Hhaaahh...” He sighed and extended his right palm towards me.

Excellent! It worked!

“Khah! Hahahah!” I laughed. “G-Give me a moment. I’ll just take it all out of the inventory, so—”

“Your life is payment enough,” he said, cutting my words short.

“Eh?”

As confusion overtook me, his open hand changed into a fist, and the bracer on it began to emit that painfully-familiar silver light.

I heard my own skull crack and squelch. And then I was gone.

◇◇◇

Paladin Ray Starling

The headless corpse of the Lich became dust and began to crumble.

At the same time, my body quickly became too heavy for me to stand properly and I dropped to the ground before I could do anything to soften my fall.

“Looks like... it’s over,” I forced out a mutter. My status window displayed Poison, Paralysis, Death Sentence, Weakness, Deterioration, and a number of other debuffs. There were so many that keeping track of them all seemed like a fool’s errand.

However, the fact that the status effects I’d gotten from my opponent had come back left me with no doubt that he was defeated.

“Like a Flag Flying the Reversal.” That was the unique skill that Nemesis had gained with her second form — The Flag Halberd. It reversed all the debuffs given to me by hostile creatures. On the flip side, that meant that it would stop the moment the relevant hostiles were dead. The return of his debuffs was the ultimate proof of his death.

The moment after he’d manipulated the child into slicing my neck, I’d made Nemesis go from her greatsword form into The Flag Halberd and activated the Reversal. Thus my reaction to the debuffs displayed in my status window. Once the skill was active, Bleeding began to increase my bloodflow, Poison healed me, and Paralysis upped my physical abilities.

The damage I’d gotten from the surprise attack had been healed by the reversed Poison while I was still on the ground. Once that effect had closed the wound on my neck, the Bleeding status effect had completely disappeared.

Later, when he’d hit me with those debuff spells, I’d turned them all into buffs, as well. Though I’d felt that some of them didn’t seem like they got reversed, it was clear that I was under no negative effects.

He’d ended up greatly buffing me and reversing the power balance.

He'd also had the problem of compatibility. The Purifying Silverlight was a skill meant for purging undead, and that was exactly what a Lich was. Also, Silver had been a great help in catching up to him when he'd run away.

Of course, I still didn't have the Riding skill. So I hadn't been riding him, per se. I'd merely let Silver gallop towards the Lich while I held on to him, letting my feet get dragged along the floor.

It hadn't been too different from one of those generic Western flick scenes where people got pulled around while tied to horses. In that state, my feet had gotten continuously damaged, but I'd been able to cover it with the healing from the reversed Poison.

Once on the surface, I'd blocked his final spell with Counter Absorption. Though it was far more powerful than Gardranda's flames, we had somehow been able to handle it.

For a moment, I'd thought the debuffs would make me collapse, but after the attack had been done, Nemesis had quickly changed back to The Flag Halberd and re-activated the Reversal, letting me come out of it unscathed. Then I'd pinned him with down with my weapon and ended his life with my fist.

This whole battle had been extremely dangerous to me. I had only managed due to the convergence of several very specific circumstances. This wasn't a feat I'd be repeating any time soon.

"...I got really lucky here," I said.

"I know all the reasons why we emerged victorious, but even I can't help but think the same," Nemesis agreed.

Perhaps fate itself helped me hunt down and punish the scumbag who toyed with the lives of countless children, I thought.

I silently looked at my hand. The sensation I'd felt when I'd pulverized his head was still there. Either due to him being undead or because of my Silverlight, it had felt much like shattering a withered tree, but it'd been there nonetheless.

Though he was a piece of filth beyond any redemption, he was also the first tian I'd killed.

If I — being a Maiden's Master — felt as strongly about this world as I did about reality, this killing might cause me pain.

"I have nothing against such considerations, but you should leave it for later," said Nemesis.

"Nemesis?" I asked, slightly puzzled. She had already returned to her human form and was looking down at me.

She pointed at one part of the status window — specifically, the Death Sentence debuff. Upon further inspection, I noticed that it had a counter next to it, saying "362 seconds."

Is this one of those debuffs that kills you when the counter reaches 0? I thought.

"So, Master, do you happen to have any anti-debuff medicine?" she asked.

"I've got some Antidotes for poisons, but I never expected to get a debuff like this," I said.

This is bad... Really bad. At this rate, I'll get the death penalty.

Hugo was here, the children were safe, and the gang was eliminated, so I didn't have to worry about any of that. However, dying would mean missing the time we'd agreed on with Marie. I didn't like that scenario at all.

"Curse you, you wretched horse zombie!" shouted Nemesis. "You just had to leave us with this parting gift!"

"...Crap," I muttered. Due to all the debuffs on me, only my mouth worked properly, so I couldn't even hold my head in despair.

Nemesis began rummaging through my inventory to see if I had something that could help me. Silver — who I still hadn't called back — was looking down at me in a somewhat worried manner.

"You should drink this." Something hard was pushed against my jaw.

I looked and saw Hugo — who'd just jumped out of... what I could only describe as a see-through ice robot with a Magingear inside — pushing a potion against my mouth.

Once I gulped down the contents, my body became so light that it felt as though the debuffs were never there.

He followed it up with another potion. Once I drank that one, I looked at the status window and saw that all the status effects were gone.

"I'm healed!" I cried.

"Indeed you are!" said Nemesis. "You have our thanks, Hugo!"

"You're welcome," he smiled.

"What was this medicine, anyway?" I asked.

“An Elixir and a curse-removing High Spirit Water,” he said.

“And you didn’t mind giving them to me?” I asked.

“Not at all. After all, they came out of the inventory of the one I defeated.” Hugo pointed at the ox head hanging on the gate.

I looked at that general direction and saw a number of items lying around the remains.

Some of them were bottles, just like the one I’d just drunk from.

“Why are the items scattered like that?” I asked.

“His inventory broke with my attack,” answered Hugo. “I, uh... might’ve overdone it.”

That made me remember the tutorial, when Cheshire had said that this was just about what happened when an inventory shattered. Though the power of the release often left the contents break, it was the easiest way to take the possessions of others. Due to that, some bad guys chose to attack rich people and spread their items all over the place.

The other ways to take someone’s items were the Bandit grouping’s Steal skill — which directly stole the items from people’s inventories — and the Burglar grouping’s Plunder skill — which switched the ownership of the taken items to the user. When I’d learned that, I had wondered why these two skills were in different job groupings despite not being that different.

“Hm? Is that a...?”

I noticed the inventory of the Lich I’d defeated peeking out from under his robe. While mine had the shape of a bag, his was a black, cube-like box.

In his last moments, he had been reaching into it to take his money and buy me off. So, by breaking that, I could probably get the money and some of the rare items he owned, but...

“I don’t feel like touching the stuff left behind by that freak,” I said.

His life was more than enough for me. Also, it was easy for me to imagine how he’d come to have those riches, and that didn’t make them look attractive at all.

“I share the sentiment,” said Nemesis. “That money is so dirty that simply picking it up might sully our hearts.”

“I understand,” said Hugo. “Feel free to leave it there, then. Someone will come across and take it eventually.”

“True,” I nodded.

Though, with the defeat of the Gouz-Maise Gang, this fortress was now as abandoned as it had been before they'd made it their hideout. It was uncertain if anyone would ever set foot here again.

Then again, reporting this event to the Adventurers' Guild would probably cause them to launch an investigation. It might be a good idea to tell them to gather any treasure the scumbags had left behind. Perhaps the money would become cleaner if it was used for the good of society... and those who'd suffered due to the gang's vile deeds.

"Oh yeah, Hugo," I said. That thought reminded me of something. "I encountered some kidnapped children in the dungeon. Eight of them are still alive. From what I can tell, they've been put to sleep via magic. I'd like us to band up and carry them outside, so... Wait, where's Cyco?"

We were done with everything here, and yet she was nowhere in sight.

I recall her leaving her party slot before the battle began, but she wasn't showing up at all anymore, so... did she get the death penalty?

"Cyco's fine," said Hugo. "Give me a moment. Cyco, come here... Yeah, it's fine."

He said that while facing the Magingear clad in armor that looked much like an icy church. A moment later, the armor scattered into countless white and blue light particles.

Without the frozen armor, the Magingear collapsed, making Hugo say something about getting a spare one from some "leader." However, Nemesis and I were more interested in where the light particles were heading. They all gathered in one spot and took a humanoid form.

"Hellooo."

It was the Master clad in white — Cyco. However, she no longer had the proof of Masterhood — the crest on her left hand.

Also, the way she'd changed shape was like a differently-colored version of Nemesis' shapeshifting.

"I see," said Nemesis. "So Cyco and I... are birds of a feather."

"Yes," she nodded. "My real name is Cocytus."

"Birds of a feather...?" I raised an eyebrow. "So she's actually a..."

...Type Maiden Embryo — the same as Nemesis. And Hugo was her Master.

"But didn't she have a crest on her left hand before?" I asked.

"It was there because of Crest Disguise — a skill unique to Type Maiden Embryos," answered Hugo. "It makes their hands and status displays look like those of a Master."

"I had no idea such a skill existed..." I said, slightly surprised.

"They get it after a while of fighting in their human forms," he said.

During my entire play time, I had yet to let Nemesis fight on her own. Obviously, I didn't have it.

"What use is that skill, anyway?" I asked.

"You'd be surprised," said Hugo. "Due to them being unique and unpredictable, Embryos are powerful wild cards. With Crest Disguise, you can make it seem like there are more Masters — and thus, Embryos — than it appears."

So you can use it for bluffing, huh? I thought. I feel like it might have other uses, too, so perhaps we should learn that skill ourselves.

"Anyway, now that we're all here, we should go to the dungeon and take the children back to the light of day," I said.

"Agreed," nodded Hugo.

Nemesis, Hugo, Cyco, and I all began making our way towards the fortress' dungeon.

With there being four of us and with me having Silver, there was a chance that we could take them all in one trip. Also, with the Lich being dead, the children might've woken up from his spell, so we had to hurry up and calm them down.

◆◆◆

The surroundings of the abandoned fortress.

"...Are they gone?" a voice asked.

"Yeah, they went in the fortress."

In the forest surrounding the abandoned fortress, in an area that had even denser foliage than the route taken by Hugo's Marshall II, there were five suspicious-looking men.

"I didn't expect the bosses to get beaten," said one of them.

These were the remnants of the Gouz-Maise Gang, and the very same five men that Ray and Hugo had encountered back in Gideon.

After Ray and Cyco had beaten them up and handed them over to the guards, some of their allies had jumped out and rescued them before they could be jailed.

After that, they'd followed the gang's carriages from a considerable distance — just to make sure that they weren't followed — and when they'd reached the fortress, they'd found their hideout and fellow gang members being completely destroyed.

They'd been lucky that they were in a place where Cyco's Enemy Detect skill couldn't reach them. Thus, they'd been able to hide it out and survive the massacre.

"What now?" asked one of them.

"What do you mean, 'what' — we're getting outta here!" answered another. "We can't do shit against monsters that can kill our bosses, who were pretty damn monster-like themselves."

"Crap, that means that we have to leave all the treasure behind." One of the men — specifically, the one that'd gotten punched by Ray — clicked his tongue in frustration. "...Oh, wait." He seemed to have just gotten an idea. "Yeah, that's what we should do!"

He nodded, completely satisfied with himself.

"The hell's got into you?" The other men looked at him, completely confused.

"They're in the fortress now, right?" he spoke up. "So it's a good time for us to take all the money and items the bosses left behind! Also, we can easily take the brats in them carriages there. We can use them to get the ransom money or just sell them somewhere in Caldina. Or maybe we can buy our way into some other local gangs!"

"Oh, man!" another man cried.

"That's an idea I can get behind!"

Their fellow gang member's suggestion made the other men turn joyous.

"There's no better time than now, then..." said one.

"Yeah!" howled another. "Let's get the items and the brats and get the hell out!"

They then split up. Some began gathering the items, while the others linked the living horses to the carriages with the children.

However, one of them — the one that'd suggested that they do what they were doing — was tilting his head near Maise's corpse, which was nothing but dust now.

"What's up with you?" asked another man.

"Boss Maise's inventory isn't broken," he answered. It was the very same inventory that Ray and Hugo had decided not to break.

"Huuhh? Break it, then, retard," the other man said. "All of us who had Plunder have already croaked, so that's the only thing we can do here."

As was natural for a band of brigands, the gang had people with Steal and Plunder skills. However, all of them had died to Hugo's Marshall II.

"True that," the man nodded. "Guess I'll do just that, then."

The man took out a dagger and — with great force — pierced through the inventory. Naturally, it broke and released its contents all over the area.

"Whooaaaahhhh! Get a load of all these coins!"

"Seriously! I don't think we even have to be bandits anymore! We can live like nobles with this!"

"We have the brats, too, so maybe we should start being Slave Dealers!"

"Good idea!"

The money Maise had left behind made them all imagine a bright future. They were surrounded by great riches. Just as Maise had said to Ray, the amount he'd had on him was over 70,000,000 lir. Of course, there were many rare gems, equipment pieces, and materials, as well.

With all of this, they could easily make all their dreams come true. Their futures would become even more secure after the next step. Every man was thinking it at this point. Every man wanted to kill the others and make all of the riches their exclusive property.

However... that was completely impossible.

"Huh?" one spoke in confusion. "What's this?"

He picked up an item that was lying on the ground. From its outline alone, it looked much like a hen's egg. However, it was dark red in color and had a single area on it that looked much like an eyelid.

At first glance, it didn't look too different from the materials owned by Maise the Lich, but the man holding it wouldn't have said the same.

He had a high level Identification skill and could identify just about every item he came across, but he didn't get any results for the egg-like object. It confused him, for he'd never had any problems identifying materials or monster eggs. However, it was obvious that he couldn't see what the thing in his hand was. After all, it wasn't an item, a monster, or any other living creature, for that matter.

It was nothing but a curse.

“Awakening.”

A voice rang out from every inch of the shell as the egg opened its “eyelid.”

“Eee!”

It surprised the man into attempting to throw it away, but the egg seemed to be stuck to his fingers like a strong vacuum.

“What?”

“What’s wrong?”

The other men called out to the one who’d screamed — their faces still grinning due to the great amount of coin in their hands.

If they’d had the mind to realize that something was wrong and run away, the man with the egg in his hand would’ve been the only one to die.

However, that was hopeless. Anyone with that amount of sensitivity to danger would’ve never touched the belongings of Maise in the first place.

Maise had been among the greatest users of Necromancy in the Kingdom of Altar. Not only was he extremely thorough in his work towards becoming the King of Corpses — he was also a man who made use of people in a way most couldn’t fathom.

He was the type of person to discard his most precious Crystal of Resentment — a necessity in becoming the King of Corpses — just to survive. He also hadn’t hesitated to try prolonging his life by trying to buy off Ray with all the riches he’d amassed.

If a man with such an attachment to life were to be killed and had his treasure taken away...

Just what would he do?

Just how far would he go?

The men were defeated the moment they didn’t consider those questions.

“Destruction of inventory: confirmed,” said the egg. “Search: Lich Maise’s Magical Wavelength... No response. Termination of Lich Maise: Confirmed. Assumption: plundering by hostiles. Invoking final spell — Undead Grudge Construction.”

Once the voice had finished speaking, the fingers of the man touching the egg were sucked into it. Much like sewage going down a drain, his body began falling into the egg, his body cracking and spurting out blood as his form was compressed.

“AUGH!! UuGgh!! EeuGH!!”

Leaving only his completely inhuman screams, the thing that was once a man disappeared into the object.

The egg gained in size, becoming about as large as the egg of an ostrich.

“EEEEEK!”

“WH-WHAT THE HELL?!”

The spectacle made the other men panic, and they turned around and attempted to run away.

A moment later, the egg released pipes reminiscent of blood vessels and forced them into the backs of three out of four men that tried to escape. And — as if drinking juice through a straw — the egg began sucking the men into itself.

“GHHHY! JAUHGHH! EIHH!”

“EGGH... UGHAAAHH!!”

“ASSHHDIEDEAAAGAUGHH!!!”

Experiencing pain beyond their imagination, the men disappeared while speaking words that didn’t belong in the realm of the sane.

“AAAAAHHHHH!”

The only survivor — the one who’d suggested they take the riches to begin with — dropped to the ground in fear and tried backing away while wetting himself. He thought the egg would launch a pipe at him, as well, but for some reason, it didn’t happen. Instead, the egg began extending pipes towards the corpses surrounding the area.

The remains were numerous. All of them belonged to the Gouz-Maise Gang members who’d lost their lives in the battle against the Marshall II. The pipes reached into the pieces of meat scattered by cannon shots, the body halves split by knives, the corpses crushed by the robot’s frame, and the head of Gouz hanging on the gate.

That wasn’t all — the egg’s surface also grew a funnel-like organ that began absorbing something invisible — the grudges — from both the air and the ground beneath. And — though his body had already become dust — that also included the regrets, hatred, and sorrow of Maise the Lich. All the flesh and grudge it’d gathered made the egg expand once more.

It was now an orb that seemed to mix the size of a gas tank and the fragility of a balloon. The scene before his eyes put the last survivor of the Gouz-Maise Gang into a complete stupor.

Soon enough, the orb cracked.

A moment later, it broke and birthed a beast too foul. A beast too hideous.

It was the ultimate result of the Gouz-Maise Gang and all they had done.

It wouldn't have been an exaggeration to say that this creature — this gathering of villainous flesh and emotion — was like a being straight out of hell. The corpses of hundreds were linked together like a jigsaw puzzle, forming the shape of an ox-headed horse-man.

Instead of blood, the only thing flowing through its veins was ill will, malicious grudges.

The gathering of the deceased showed nothing but disdain for all living creatures and moved only with the dark intention to make the whole world as dead as they were.

And, of course, the first target of its grudge was...

"Ah... Eh... Aahh?" ...the last survivor of the Gouz-Maise Gang.

The abomination's cadaverous hands grabbed hold of the man. Then it switched to holding him by the arms — with only its thumbs and index fingers — before beginning to pull on them. The action was so slow that it almost seemed gentle.

"AGH! AAGHYAAAAAHHHH!"

Slowly, surely... like a child toying with an insect... it continued pulling until one of the man's arms was torn from his body. Then it did exactly the same with the legs. And when the man was left with only one limb, the ox-headed horse-man opened its large mouth.

Though the pain he was in drove the man to the edge of insanity, he still had enough mind to understand why the creature was doing what it did. After all, he'd seen it happen many times during his days with the Gouz-Maise Gang.

"Ahaha... am I the... dessert...?"

Torn apart like an insect, the man was finally pulled into the ox's mouth and crushed by the countless, lethal fangs there.

And so, the Gouz-Maise Gang became one. Literally as one, they all composed a single being of hatred.

While the metaphorical sense might've been noble and grand, what was actually happening here was nothing short of vomit-inducing.

It was the birth of the most hideous undead.

◆◆◆

[Non-player announcement]

[Discovered a monster that meets the conditions to be recognized as a Unique Boss Monster]
[Confirmed that no similar specimens have existed prior]
[Informed the control AI managing UBMs]
[Received approval from the control AI managing UBMs]
[Recognizing target as UBM]
[Strengthening the target's ability and providing it with the upon-death special reward function]
[Granting the target Epic status. Granting the target the name of "Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise"]

Chapter Five: Revenant Ox-Horse

Paladin Ray Starling

The children had already woken up by the time we got to the dungeon, likely because the Lich had fallen.

At first, they thought we were with the bandits. They began to cry with fear, but thanks to Cyco and Nemesis calming them down, they soon believed that we wouldn't harm them.

As it turned out, Roddie — the child our quest requested us to save — was the very same boy that'd slit my throat back in the lab. He had no memory of ever being controlled, so I didn't see the need to bring it up.

When we were about to take the children back to the surface, I saw Hugo — who'd been looking around the lab — inquisitively examine the documents he'd found on the table there.

"Research on grudge, the Crystal of Resentment... and that's not all," he said. "It looks like he'd been studying the means of creating a Flesh Golem that uses grudge as its power source. Heh, reminds me of that one prototype we had. I guess people thinking the exact same thing exist everywhere in this world. Though I'd never have expected anyone to create something like this completely on their own... It's both impressive and horrific at the same time."

He put the documents he'd been examining into his inventory.

"What are those, Hugo?" I asked.

"Oh, just the research papers left behind by the Lich who made this fortress his hideout — Maise or whatever he was called. The concept is similar to the one behind a robot our clan was researching a while back, so I decided to take it to them. You know — as a souvenir."

"A robot?" I asked. "What does grudge have to do with that?"

"Let's go. I'll explain on the way."

We began walking out of the dungeon, and I was instantly met with a certain problem. Because they had been sleeping for so long, some of the children had become weak, rendering them unable to walk properly. Due to that, we had them ride Silver or carried them on our backs, but...

"Woof woof! Woof woof!" one of the kids cried.

Yep, I still have the dog ears, I thought. And the kids just can't stop playing with them.

"Me next! Me next!"

"No, me!"

I'm not sure how I feel about this popularity.

The relatively lively children were pestering me for a piggyback ride just so they could reach the dog ears.

"Looks like they're a big hit," smiled Hugo.

"...Good to see they're useful for something," I replied.

But man, they sure last a long time, I thought. Flamingo had told me they'd be gone by sunset, but it was already evening and they still didn't show any signs of disappearing.

"How curious," said Nemesis. "The lack of the Horse Riding skill made you fall down the first time you got on, yet these younglings can ride without any problem."

Getting the children out of the dungeon was a task that needed more people, so Nemesis was in her human form. She held Silver's reins as he was strutting forward like a pony.

Since it was unlikely that they had the Horse Riding skill, I was wondering about that, too. I could only assume that making Silver run while riding and simply leading him by holding the reins were completely different things.

"Okay," I spoke up. "So tell me about this thing about grudge and robots."

"All right," nodded Hugo. "The clan I'm in is focused mainly on crafting, and our current main products are Magingears. In fact, the Marshall II — Dryfe's official mass-produced machine — started out as an original item made by us."

That robot was actually built from scratch? I thought.

"Since Marshall II's completion, we've been developing new models, variation models, and better-armed models, but recently, we've been making plans to merge it with other crafts," he went on. "One of those plans focuses on the creation of a machine that uses dead people's grudge as a power source."

"Well, that sure doesn't sound good," I commented. "Why did that plan even exist?"

"Because all of Dryfe's machines — not just the Magingears — are huge MP sinks," he answered. "Replacing that MP with grudge would allow us to operate for longer and simplify the usage of stronger weaponry. That's the grudge power plan."

"How can grudge become power, anyway?" I asked.

"Heh," Hugo grinned. "You saw the answer to that just a few minutes ago, didn't you?"

I did? What does he mean?

"The last magic skill used by the Lich — Deadly Mixer."

"Oh, that," I said.

That attack had been immensely powerful. If I hadn't blocked it with Counter Absorption, I'd have vanished along with the fortress. In fact, the skill was even stronger than Figaro's chains. It was just that Counter Absorption was tougher now, due to Nemesis being in her second form, so the attack this time just barely hadn't been strong enough to break through it.

"That was a vile skill that turns grudge into destructive physical power and releases it at the target," Hugo continued. "Our craftsmen thought that — provided it was released on a smaller scale and handled more carefully — the same power could be used to power our engines. After all, this world already has Living Armor, which move due to the souls of the dead haunting it."

Living Armor, huh? I thought. A not-too-uncommon monster type in fantasy RPGs.

"One of our members said, 'If this goes well, we might create a weapon that absorbs the grudge permeating the battlefields and stays active semi-permanently,'" Hugo quoted. "Our clan was intrigued by the idea, so we got the help of a famous Master from the Necromancer grouping and began researching the utilization of grudge power, but..."

Hugo suddenly stopped talking, making me instantly understand how it must've gone down.

"It failed, huh?" I said.

"And how." He nodded. "The prototype was a failure that was both hard to control and had a tendency to go on a rampage. I helped with its disassembly and disposal. It happened back when I was still leveling up my Mechanic job."

"So, you're saying that the Lich... Maise had the same thing in his research paper?" I asked.

"Not at all," he said. "Though modified, the thing we at The Triangle of Wisdom were trying to build was but a machine weapon, while this is more along the lines of a Flesh Golem."

Flesh Golems were exactly what it said in the name — golems made of joined human or animal flesh. They were common in the more grotesque RPGs.

Now that I think about it, though I've encountered a number Zombies and Skeletons here, I haven't seen a single Flesh Golem... I thought.

"But if the Lich did such research, why didn't he use it?" I asked. "It sounds pretty strong."

"Clearly, it was because he couldn't control it," said Hugo. "The problem with the grudge power plan was that it involved absorbing the grudge from the surroundings. That was the prime obstruction to any success it could've had."

Hugo momentarily stopped talking and made the child on his back sit on his shoulders instead. Then, with his hands free, he raised up both of his index fingers.

"When a Necromancer uses grudge to power a Living Armor or a Flesh Golem, he normally uses a single person's grudge or soul for a single unit."

He then raised all of his fingers on only his right hand, indicating either "five" or just "many."

"However, grudge power absorbs all the surrounding grudge," he said. "And it doesn't matter how many and varied the source creatures are."

That was enough for me to understand the problem.

"So the individual grudges start fighting for the lead, and that makes the thing impossible to control, right?" I asked.

"Right," he nodded. "At least, that's what happened with the experimental machines our clan created. Our people then tried using both magic techniques and programming to ensure control, but apparently, their efforts were in vain."

Grudge-powered creatures seemed comparable to action game characters that were being controlled by tens of people fighting for the controller. There was no way they'd act properly.

"In the end, they went on rampages and began acting based on the consensus of the grudges," he went on.

"Consensus?" I raised an eyebrow.

"It always boiled down to the expansion of the grudge. They'd begin attacking either undead or other grudge power machines and attempt to merge with them. Then they'd react to the grudge — and negative emotions in general — of the living, and attack them instead. They'd continue rampaging like that until they broke."

...Man, that sounds bad, I thought.

"And so, the project was a failure," Hugo continued. "It was made clear that, while the grudge of many could be gathered and used for offense with skills such as Deadly Mixer, unifying and controlling it was a fool's errand."

"I see." I nodded.

As we talked, we finished going up the stairs and finally returned to the surface.

"...Huh?" I said.

A moment later, Nemesis, I, Cyco, Hugo and even the children... all shook with dread.

I could feel weak vibrations below me and heard voices coming from the outside — though it was arguable whether the term "voices" was appropriate. It was more like a choir of the macabre. Weeping, crying, sobbing, bellowing and just about any other possible sound representing negative emotion. That was more than enough for me to grasp that something alarmingly abnormal was happening outside.

"...Hey, Hugo." Urged by the bad feeling I had — or, rather, the very certain chills going down my spine — I spoke up.

"Yes?" he replied.

"If grudge power isn't controllable... what would happen if you used it regardless?"

"Heh, that's obvious," he said.

Beyond the gates leading outside, within the light of the sun sinking to the horizon, I saw the shadow of something massive.

"The uncontrolled grudge-powered thing would start absorbing the surrounding grudge, converting it into power, reacting to negative emotions, killing the source if it’s alive, and once again absorbing the residual grudge,” Hugo said.

I heard a loud roar and felt the ground under my feet vibrate as the massive thing shuddered and shifted.

“It would repeat that ad infinitum... and thus you’d have a rampaging monster equipped with a semi-permanent engine.”

The beast outside the fortress came into sight. It looked like it came straight out of hell.

The first thing I saw were its repulsive legs, clearly made from human corpses. Then, as it moved nearer, I became certain of what it was.

The creature with the words “Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise” above its head was a gigantic undead that seemed more abnormal the more I looked at it. It had the head of an ox, the silhouette of a horse-man, and dead, familiar faces mixed in with the parts forming it. And it had a naming pattern used only by Unique Boss Monsters.

The visages of the dead were voicing words or merely sounds that were thick with negative emotion.

They were the Gouz-Maise Gang members that Hugo had killed. I could even see the faces of those we’d encountered back in Gideon.

...That was enough for me to conclude that it was made of the corpses of the gang.

“I see,” said Hugo slowly. “It looks about the same as the predicted result.”

Hugo took the documents out of his inventory and began looking through them. Sure enough, there was a picture of an ox-headed horse-man with countless dead faces on it.

“So he prepared for his own death by making a plan to create that thing by sacrificing everyone in the Gouz-Maise Gang,” I said.

“Or perhaps he merely planned to use the surrounding corpses, and it just so happened that the ones around him were those of the bandits,” added Hugo. “The ox-head, however, was a guaranteed ingredient.”

Well, he’s certainly following the plan, I thought.

“ＦｆＧｇＳｓｓＦｆｆＳｓＤｄｄＷｗＳｓＳＤｄｓＳＤｄｅＥＷｗＤＡｓｓＳａＡＡａａＡａＡ———！！”

Gouz-Maise was passionately smashing something to pieces, letting out a roar no sane mind could comprehend.

Exposed to that noise, and such violence, the children started to scream in fear. Cyco embraced them to make them feel safe and gently tried to calm them down.

"Is that your...?" I began.

I noticed that the thing Gouz-Maise was breaking was the Magingear used by Hugo. Even though it no longer had a hint of its original shape, the monster didn't stop attacking it. Since it was running solely on the power of countless grudges, it was currently on a warpath. Due to that, I'd have expected it to spread its violence with no rhyme or reason, but it seemed to focus solely on the Magingear.

Are most of the ones that became the "ingredients" of that thing actually acting united due to their collective grudge towards Hugo and the robot? I thought.

"I'm the one who killed most of them, after all," he said. "It's only natural for my Marshall II to become its target."

So, even in that state, they haven't forgotten their resentments from when they were alive... Wait, no. It's more like that resentment is all that they are.

"Heh." Hugo grinned. "I feel like I'm looking at Rodin's Gates of Hell."

"Ironic of you to say that, Hugo," said Cyco.

The Gates of Hell, huh? I thought. Yeah, watching this gathering of dead sinners is much like looking at that sculpture. And on the note of Rodin's sculptures, it's high time I stopped being The Thinker and actually did something about that abomination.

"Well, Master?" spoke Nemesis. "Do we defeat it?"

"I'd love to if I can, but..." I could feel it in my bones. That thing was stronger than even Gardranda. Hell, I was certain that ten out of ten fights between Gouz-Maise and Gardranda would end in Gardranda's defeat.

"Man, creating UBMs is just unfair," I mumbled.

"Normally, it'd be completely impossible," said Hugo. "I know a person who can do something similar — with a higher standard, too — and even he has yet to create a single UBM. In fact, if it were possible to mass-produce UBMs, someone would be making them nonstop. After all, defeating them gets you special rewards."

So they could constantly create items such as my Miasmaflame Bracers, huh? I thought.

"That 'Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise,'" he continued, "is the result of several unfortunate superimposed coincidences.”

“Accidents?” I raised an eyebrow.

“First of all, this place is bad,” he said. “It’s an abandoned fortress on an ancient battlefield. There are tons of corpses filled with grudge right under our feet.”

He pointed at the ground, then at himself.

“Second, I killed most of the gang. Due to that, the surroundings became thick with the grudge of vile scoundrels and got covered in fresh corpses. Corpses of people from a single group, even. There was even the Strong Gladiator Gouz — a real tough guy.”

Next, he pointed at me.

“Third, you cornered Maise and pushed him into using the Crystal of Resentment — a concentrated gathering of grudge — as a medium to release a Deadly Mixer. Though you survived it, the dense grudge that didn’t get used with the skill was released into the air. And let’s not forget the Lich’s own grudge after you killed him.”

Finally, he pointed at Gouz-Maise.

“Lastly, someone activated the grudge-powered undead creation spell that was mentioned in the papers — Undead Grudge Construction. It used the surrounding grudge and corpses to form a grudge-powered Flesh Golem. However, due to the conditions being far too good, the resulting undead greatly surpassed its original specifications and — because of how abnormal and otherworldly it was — reached the realm of UBMs. With a slight change of perspective, it’s safe to say that this creature is the child born from you, me, and the Lich.”

“Well, that sure sucks,” I said. “So, what now?”

“We simply lack the power to face it,” replied Hugo. “It’s far too strong an enemy for just two high-rank Masters and their low-rank Embryos. Not only that, but — as things are — it’s highly incompatible with Cyco’s power, and... well, just look at my weapon.”

After shifting his gaze at the Magingear — which was reduced to a pile of scrap with pieces so small they could each be held in hand — Hugo heaved a long sigh.

I could still use Vengeance is Mine in the same way I’d used it against Gardranda, but it would be far more complicated in this case. Since the battle with the demon, I had gotten some levels, equipped the Miasmaflame Bracers, learned Purifying Silverlight, and become stronger overall.

However, the difference between Gardranda and that thing was just far too great. Its size alone was at least four times greater. Its height was about the same as that of an eight-story building. And naturally, its stats were much higher. I wasn't confident that I could survive until I charged up the damage needed to kill it. I also had only one more Counter Absorption use.

There's little doubt that I'd die if I fought it, I thought.

"True," agreed Nemesis. "...Hm?"

What's wrong? I asked.

"I just felt something strange... but it instantly went away. Was I just imagining it?"

"Ray," Hugo addressed me. "For now, our priority should be taking the children — including the ones in the carriages — and leaving this place as quickly as possible."

He pointed at the two carriages with the newly-kidnapped children inside them. Unlike the one at the front — which Hugo had destroyed with his preemptive attack — those two were in fine shape.

It was good thing that Gouz-Maise was too busy destroying the Magingear to do anything to harm the children. I could only assume that it was because they were sleeping, and thus weren't releasing any negative emotions that could've attracted it. Whatever the case, it was good that they were okay.

"Yeah, the carriages look ready to go at any time," I said. Both of them were already linked to horses.

Why didn't it attack the horses, though? I thought. Does it only react to people?

"Thankfully, both Cyco and I have the Piloting skill," said Hugo. "It works with carriages, too, to a certain extent, so we can both handle one carriage each."

"What about after we escape, though?" I asked. "Just leaving it there to do its thing doesn't seem like a good idea."

"We'll go to the Adventurer's Guild and tell them everything about it," answered Hugo. "It's a UBM, after all. There will be lots of Masters who'll go after it to get the special reward. Though, since I'm with Dryfe, you'll have to be the one to tell them about it."

"All right," I nodded. "Now, let's find the right timing to get to the carriages and... Ah!”

As we were about to act out the plan we’d set up, the situation suddenly changed.

We had been too unobservant...

...and we had failed to consider a certain scenario.

“Mommyyy! Daddyyy!”

It was the scenario in which the children in the carriages woke up and walked out of them.

“ＧｇＨｈｕＵｓＳｓＤｄＳｓｓＤｃＣａＡａａＳｓｓＷｗｇＧｂｂＢａＡＳＡａＡＡ！！”

Releasing a scream that nature surely didn’t intend, Gouz-Maise turned around. Its gaze became fixed on the crying children, all exuding the negative emotion we knew as “fear.”

“ｇＧｏＯｌｌＬｆｆＦｆＡａＳｓｓＡａａＡａＡａａＡ！！”

It was hard to tell whether the action was caused by the consensus of all the grudges, or the eating habits one of them had had while it was alive. However, Gouz-Maise’s intentions were clear the moment it began running towards the children. Its right arm was extended towards them, saliva was pooling from its mouth.

“Damn it!” Before I could even think things through, I’d jumped out through the gate, and aimed my left bracer at the abomination. “Purgatorial Flames — full power!”

The Miasmaflame Bracer began violently draining my MP and converting it into fire. Though it was less intense than the deadly flame once used by the Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda, the blaze I launched could easily reduce a hundred standard undead to ash, and it went straight for the arm that Gouz-Maise was extending towards the children.

“ＹｅＥｇａａＡａｘＸＡｘＳｓＡａａＡｆＦｆａａＡａａＡａ？！”

The way it screamed and swung its arm around was enough reason to believe that — despite being reduced to an amalgam of corpses — Gouz-Maise still felt pain.

“Take this! Gahh!!” Making use of the opportunity, I closed in on it and swung Nemesis — blessed with the Silverlight — at its front left leg.

The undead-killing shine split apart the dead faces of the gang and severely damaged both flesh and bone.

Though the leg was too thick for my attack to sever it, it was enough to make the abomination lose its balance.

"Cutting it feels awful!" Nemesis squealed in disgust.

Gouz-Maise dropped to the ground and made it shake like a demolished building would. As I'd somewhat intended, the monster's body landed in the direction opposite to the carriages.

"Hugo!" I shouted. "I'll divert its attention! Leave this to us and get out of here!"

"Ray, but you...!"

I knew what he wanted to say. If the carriages left, I wouldn't be able to run away from Gouz-Maise. Though I had Silver, I couldn't ride him, and my legs weren't fast enough to let me outrun the abomination. My death penalty would be guaranteed, and I'd end up missing the time we'd decided on with Marie.

However...

"There's no other option!" I shouted again. "Hurry up and get the children out of here!"

I brandished Nemesis, kept her blessed with the Silverlight, closed in on Gouz-Maise's head — which was near the ground due to it falling over — and swung at its eyes. Though my prime objective was to buy time for Hugo and the children, I still wanted to try my best to survive... and perhaps even win.

"ＧＥｅｅＨＡａａＡｕＡａｓｓＳａＡｇＧＡａ！！"

As liquid rot oozed out of its eye sockets, Gouz-Maise began to writhe. Due to its great size, the vibrations caused by that action were like a minor calamity.

"This thing's body is unexpectedly fragile," I commented.

"It's a gathering of cadavers, after all. It's only natural for it to not be particularly tough," said Nemesis. "However..."

"...Yeah, I expected it to have such tricks up its sleeve."

Once the fire on its arm faded, new rotten flesh popped up from under the carbonized skin. The leg, too, fixed itself while releasing some filthy fluids. The eyes I'd split fell out of their sockets and were replaced by new ones.

"It has Automatic Restoration," said Nemesis.

But undead hit by Silverlight are supposed have wounds that will not heal, I thought. How can it restore itself from that?

"I believe the grudge power is being used to sustain and mend its large corpus," said Nemesis.

And that allows it to come back from such great damage in mere seconds? Is it unkillable or something?

"Well, it's already dead," said Nemesis.

"Not the time for such jokes!"

Still on the ground, the UBM swung its left arm at me, which I avoided by jumping backwards.

The swing seemed rather clumsy — probably due to its eyesight not being back yet — but it was still aimed at my direction.

Backing away from the carriages, I focused on evading its attacks.

“What now?” asked Nemesis. “We’ve opened hostilities on the fiend, but we don’t really have anything that would be effective against it.”

“The regeneration is too fast for most of our attacks to have any meaning,” I said. “If there’s something we can do, it’s...”

...the same thing we’d done against Gardranda — a well-charged Vengeance aimed at its weak spot.

“Though the charging process would be really difficult here,” I muttered. The fiend’s defense was much lower than I’d expected, but the way it was rampaging was more than enough to show just how powerful it was. One or two good hits would kill me.

“It would’ve been grand to have a full stock of Counter Absorptions, but... oh, there’s that strange feeling again,” said Nemesis.

“What?” I asked.

“It’s the same feeling as before,” she said. “It has something to do with my accumulated damage counter and... Oh, it’s gone again. What am I supposed to make of this?”

“Gouz-Maise might be up to something,” I said. “Be on your guard.”

“No need to tell me that.”

As I talked with Nemesis, I looked at the carriages at the edge of my vision. Hugo and Cyco were sitting on separate carriages and were about to drive off.

I was about to make sure that Gouz-Maise didn’t attack them by cutting its leg again but... the abomination wasn’t moving at all. Instead, it simply used its freshly-healed eyes to stare directly at me.

“ＧｇｉｉＩＮｎｎＮＮｎＡｓＳａａＡｓＳｓｓａａＳａＡａＡａＳＡｄＤＷｗＤｗＷｄＤａＡＱｑＡｑ！！”

Acknowledging my form made it feel or remember something that caused it to release a furious roar.

“...Oh, I see,” I said. A few minutes ago, the grudge of those who had become materials for Gouz-Maise had caused it to go on a rage and vehemently attack Hugo’s Magingear. However, this monster had been created by the Lich himself, whose grudge was in it, as well. Thus, its primary target was...

“...me, of course!” I yelled.

Gouz-Maise raised its front legs and reared like a horse. Then, with great speed, it threw its pillar-like front legs towards me and the ground beneath.

I quickly evaded it, but the attack was powerful enough to pulverize the ground and sink it slightly. Not missing the opportunity, I closed in to attack a leg again, but unlike before, it nimbly kicked me away.

"GUH!" I blocked it with the broad side of my greatsword, yet I still got blown away about six meters back.

"...Well, looks like someone got in the mood," I said.

Unlike before, when it had simply been rampaging, Gouz-Maise was now moving with the intention to kill me. Apparently, seeing me had caused it to get serious.

"How troublesome," I mumbled.

"However, I now see a glimmer of hope for us," said Nemesis.

"What? How?"

I checked on the carriages at the edge of my vision. They were moving away from here.

Well, that's one success, I thought.

"You know how I told you about my accumulated damage counter?" asked Nemesis.

"Yeah," I nodded.

"The damage we received just now made me understand what was causing it. It was happening because it had already given us a great... no, the greatest amount of damage we've ever accumulated against a single creature."

"What?" I asked.

The greatest amount? But we only just started fighting it.

"Remember Deadly Mixer?" she said. "The skill the Lich used before you killed him? We absorbed its damage with Counter Absorption, but we ended up not having to use Vengeance. It's still there."

"Wait, that doesn't make sense," I said. "The Lich and Gouz-Maise are separate... Oh."

I suddenly understood. Lich Maise and Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise were different... but not completely separate.

"The Lich's grudge is in there, after all," Nemesis continued. "Thus, the accumulated damage is still valid. However, it seems to come and go at random. Vengeance will probably only be effective when his grudge is the dominant one."

One Gouz-Maise body. Tens of grudges controlling it. My chance at defeating it existed only when it was being possessed by the grudge of the Lich.

“I see how it is,” I nodded. All I had to do now was find the core and hit it with Vengeance is Mine while Maise was the one in charge. Though still challenging, defeating the abomination was no longer a fool’s errand.

So...

“It’s possible for us to win against this undead,” said Nemesis.

“Good enough for me.” I readied myself.

...There was only one thing left for me to do.

It was exactly the same thing I’d done when I’d fought the Demi-Dragon Worm and the Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda. I simply had to give my all to that possibility.

“ＧＥｅｒＲｒｒＲｕｕＵＵＡａＡＳｚＤｄＳｓＡａａＡＡａ！！”

As the fiend bellowed out the sound of its grudge, the faces and mouths covering its body began to whisper, oozing pus and blood as they did so.

“You won’t escape!”

“You’re dead!”

“Join us!”

“Kill them all!”

“Destroy!”

“Eat!”

“Ravage!”

Those were the kinds of things they were saying.

Even after they’d become a giant abomination, these men were thinking the exact same things they had when they were alive. Thus...

“Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise!” Nemesis shouted. “You beasts who have inflicted great suffering upon countless younglings, taken many lives and are still endangering the living...”

I pointed my greatsword towards it. “We refuse to let you kill anyone ever again!”

I looked straight up into its eyes, and became one with Nemesis as we both proclaimed:

“You will fall by our hand!”

Now, about ten minutes since it had begun, our battle against the Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise reached peak intensity. I was searching for its core, while the abomination tried to crush me beneath its feet. The battle would end the moment either of us were successful.

Both of us had attack potential that surpassed the opponent’s HP. Gouz-Maise’s offensive ability was truly overwhelming. Unlike Maise, it didn’t use undead or cast magic debuff skills, but its physical prowess was incomparable to that of the Lich.

A single punch or kick could put me on the verge of death. I had only one use of my fatal attack. The conditions weren’t in my favor.

“Hhah!!”

To both divert the abomination’s attention and make it lose its balance, I swung Nemesis — blessed with the Silverlight — towards its leg.

“ＧＤｄＥＳｓａａＡａＡＡＳｓＡａＡａ！！”

As the thing howled in pain, I jumped backwards.

A moment after I distanced myself from it, Gouz-Maise swept its leg through the place where I was standing. By that time, the wound had already healed.

I’d been repeating the same attack for a while now. I probably looked stupid, but through such repetition, people could notice things they didn’t before.

“I was wondering why this undead thing could heal from wounds left by Silverlight... and I’ve finally figured it out,” I announced.

I could see small bits of flesh sticking to the area around its injuries. At first glance, they looked like pieces I’d chopped off with my attacks. However, they were actually flesh that had it cut off by itself.

“It removes the flesh around the injury and then restores itself by multiplying its cells.”

To undead like Gouz-Maise, wounds from weapons enchanted with Silverlight were unmendable. Thus, the abomination simply killed the cells surrounding the wound, disconnected the wound from itself, and effectively turned the Silverlight injury into normal damage. Since the corpses used in its creation were fresh, the cells were still alive, so making them multiply for healing purposes wasn’t a hard task. That was the reasoning behind the trick.

The restoration was probably done by using the energy of the same grudge driving it. Also, Gouz-Maise was protecting the living cells from dying. This trick was impossible for Skeletons — since they were nothing but bone — and Zombies — since most of their cells were dead.

But man, grudge energy sure is versatile, I thought. I can see why the Imperium wanted to utilize it.

“So the cells are alive...” said Nemesis. “Though that comes with the demerit of pain sensitivity, which is unusual for undead.”

“Seems like it,” I nodded.

I’d gained some experience fighting undead during the night I’d spent in the Tomb Labyrinth. Not a single Skeleton or Zombie I’d fought there seemed to care about any damage they’d received. Thus, it was fair to assume that sensitivity to pain was a feature unique to Gouz-Maise.

“Or perhaps the Lich deliberately left the pain sensitivity in to make any damage caused to it increase its grudge,” mused Nemesis.

“I see,” I said. “So it could be less of a demerit and more like a proper part of the equatio—”

Before I could finish my sentence, I had to jump to the side. A moment later, the abomination’s hoof landed right where I’d been standing.

While evading it, I swung my greatsword and cut into the hoof. The injury that caused was weaker than the previous ones, but if Gouz-Maise wanted to detach it and restore itself, it would surely lose its balance.

“Purgatorial Flames!” I complemented that wound with a stream of fire from my left Miasmaflame Gauntlet.

“HhooOSsSDdAASsaaAAaAhh!!”

It staggered and fell over, making the ground shake.

“GAH!!” I screamed, using the opportunity to get to its side. I changed Nemesis into The Flag Halberd and forced her into the area where the heart should’ve been. The Silverlight burned and melted both the faces on the surface and the rotten flesh under them before reaching the heart behind its ribcage.

“GEEEEAAAAAAEEeeEEeeAAaaAAaaEeeEeAAAAA!!”

Though the scream the monster released as it writhed violently was of a higher pitch than the previous ones, it didn’t show any signs of becoming weaker.

Its flesh and skin fixed themselves the moment I pulled Nemesis out.

That applied to the heart, as well.

“Doesn’t seem like the core is in the heart!” I shouted.

“Then it must be the head!” said Nemesis.

Reason suggested that cores had to be put in either the heart area, the head area, or in the stomach area, as it had been with Gardranda. Due to other parts of the body being used in combat, no one in their right mind would put such a weak spot in the limbs.

After all, that would be the equivalent of punching people with your own innards, I thought.

“Or hitting them with your testicles!” added Nemesis.

I’m not fond of that example in any way whatsoever.

“Now, it’s fine if it’s in the head,” I said. “But things would get a bit troublesome if it’s in the stomach.”

Once you included the horse part, the monster’s stomach was pretty damn large. If the core was in there, searching for and destroying it would be extremely difficult. If it was doable, I wanted to use Vengeance is Mine while directly touching the core.

“Why?” asked Nemesis. “With the current amount of accumulated damage, it’ll be possible to destroy a considerably large part of its body.”

Well, it was true that the hit I’d landed on Gardranda’s head had also destroyed its chest, but...

“It’s different this time,” I said. “With this self-amputation thing Gouz-Maise has going on, there’s a chance that it could negate the damage from Vengeance.”

I didn’t know what would happen if I landed Vengeance on the general area of the core and it suddenly detached the part that I’d hit. However, I had a feeling that the spread of the damage wouldn’t go beyond the detached part.

That assumption was based on my experience as one who’d used Vengeance is Mine many times before. No matter how great the damage I’d give back to my enemies, the skill never seemed to have a noticeable effect on the surroundings. Vengeance merely doubled the damage I received from hostiles and gave it back to them — it didn’t do any physical damage on its own. So, if the abomination could detach the part of the body I hit, there was a chance that the damage — no matter how great — wouldn’t reach the core. I couldn’t risk having my one chance go to waste like that.

“The best move right now is hitting the undetachable core and then using the skill,” I said. “Now, let’s try the skull!”

“Understood!” said Nemesis. “First, we have to make it fall to the ground again!”

Gouz-Maise was already standing tall, and the wounds we’d given it were gone without a trace.

We’ll get it to the ground, hit its head, see how it reacts and... Huh?

“Ｇｈｕｏｏｈ...”

For some reason, it had completely stopped moving. The creature had shifted its gaze away from me and was staring somewhere far into the distance.

“Master,” Nemesis said.

“What is it, Nemesis?” I asked.

“The accumulated damage counter has disappeared.”

“Wait, you don’t mean that...”

The moment I understood what she meant by that, Gouz-Maise had already begun moving.

“ＧＩｉｉｏｏＵｕＪｊｊａａａＡａＡ！！”

Unlike before, it now completely ignored me and started to run to where Hugo and Cyco had taken the carriages. Nemesis’ words and the abomination’s actions led me to the one reasonable conclusion.

“Damn it!”

The dominant grudge has changed! I thought, panic setting in. I didn’t know if it happened because of the repeated restoration making the total grudge level drop or because I’d destroyed the heart once. However, it was obvious that the body was now being controlled by a grudge that didn’t belong to the Lich.

From the fact that it was going after Hugo, it was safe to assume that it was someone he’d killed. Or perhaps it was only going after the children so it could kill them and stock up on more resentment.

“What now?!” screamed Nemesis.

“We’ll do what we have to!” I yelled back.

To defeat Gouz-Maise, I had to find a means to make the Lich’s grudge the dominant one again. And I happened to have a plan for that.

“Where is it...?” I asked while looking at the ground. “Found it.”

I picked up a certain item and put it into my pocket rather than the inventory. With that, I was prepared. The only problem now was catching up to the monster. I needed something that could let me move fast enough to catch up to that semi-equestrian body.

I don't have the time to hesitate about this, I thought.

"Silver!"

My mount instantly answered my call and ran over to my side.

"...You're doing that again?" asked Nemesis.

"Not like I have any other options," I replied. "Though it should be a bit better than before."

I grabbed a piece of detached Magingear armor that was lying on the ground and put it under my feet. Then I grabbed hold of Silver's reins...

"Away!"

...and ordered him to move.

He soon began speeding through the road. Holding on to his reins, I was trailing right beside him while using the armor plate to slide on the ground.

Fortunately, the path we were following was a simple dirt road with no tree-like flora on it. It was good enough for the armor plate to slide on relatively smoothly. Though it was only slightly better than having my feet get dragged on the ground, I didn't mind it. After all, I was certain that I could catch up to Gouz-Maise this way.

"Don't forget to heal when necessary," said Nemesis.

"I know." I cast First Heal on myself.

Water skiing: land edition was a little bit too hard on my legs. If I didn't heal, the damage to my feet by the time I arrived would be severe enough to render me unable to walk.

After a few minutes of such sliding...

"I see it!" shouted Nemesis.

"Me too!"

...we found the giant creature. Its base form was that of a horse-man, but since Maise — the only one there who knew how to move such a body — wasn't the one in charge, it wasn't running as fast as it could. Silver's speed was more than enough for us to catch up to it.

"But man, this is bad," I said. "I can see Hugo's group less than a hundred meters away from it."

"At this rate, it will..." Nemesis cut her words short. "Can't you use the Miasmaflame Bracers' flamethrower?!"

“No.”

I couldn’t launch Purgatorial Flames because Silver’s movement speed was greater than the projectile speed of the fire. Not only would it not reach Gouz-Maise, it’d end up burning us.

However, the creature was going to reach the carriages before we caught up with it.

“Hey, wait,” I said. “I still have some of those, don’t I?”

As I held the reins with my right hand, I used my left to reach into my inventory and take something out.

“Those are...!” Nemesis seemed surprised.

“Guess leaving some of these unused worked in our favor!” I cried.

And so, I threw the items — the leftover White Lance Gems I’d used against Spirits while leveling in the Tomb Labyrinth — towards the abomination. Mid-air, the Gems changed into spears of light and went straight towards the back right leg of Gouz-Maise.

These Gems were basically the market’s substitutes for offensive magic. Though the spell inside was a skill from low-rank jobs, it was purely anti-undead. Its effects were evident the moment the White Lances hit Gouz-Maise’s leg as it ran. A fist-sized hole opened up in its flesh, causing it to completely lose its balance and fall to the ground.

“Go!” I shouted.

Silver closed the distance between us and the abomination. I brandished Nemesis in my left hand, enchanted her with Silverlight, and had Silver go parallel to the creature.

Syncing my attack with my horse’s running, I sunk the blade into Gouz-Maise’s body. Breaking through the many faces on its skin, my silver sword cut through its back.

First, it was the horse-like back, then the part linking the horse and human bodies, then the back of the human-like body. I evenly split the spinal cord.

“GaEiIruUrRuuOuuUeeEAaaEKeeaAA!!”

Releasing a scream from all the mouths it had, the abomination writhed and tried to crush us, but Silver quickly fixed the distance between us and went out of its reach.

“It’s not over yet!” I roared.

My blade went through its back, cervical vertebrae, skull, and finally reached the brain.

“GhH!! DaSqQ! AaSz! wQaA?!”

It released cries of pain that were completely unlike any previous ones and quickly got up with an intense jump. That action made me release the reins, and I was thrown several meters away, dropping to the ground with a roll. The impact made me turn off the Silverlight. However, it was fully worth it.

“That reaction was...!” said Nemesis.

“Found it!” I shouted.

It had reacted to that damage in a completely different way than before. There was no room for doubt that the core was in its skull.

“This is where we’ll end the battle,” I said.

I took out the thing in my pocket and threw it upwards. It was a piece of a shattered crystal. Specifically — a piece of the Crystal of Resentment that the Lich had so treasured.

“HEEIYAAASAASAGAAAAAAAA!”

Upon seeing the shard, Gouz-Maise released a roar that seemed somewhat unlike the others. I felt like it was thick with desolation, frustration, and regret.

“The accumulated damage counter is back!” shouted Nemesis. “He’s the one controlling it!”

Just as planned.

“Let’s bring it down to the ground!” I yelled.

“All right!”

I channeled the Silverlight again and used all of my STR, buffed by the Miasmaflame Bracers, to jump. The shock caused by me preparing for the jump made the ground under my right foot crack, but I paid it no heed. The jump covered more than ten meters worth of distance and put me right next to Gouz-Maise’s legs.

“Ghh...!”

Going all-out took a toll on my muscles and brought them close to tearing, while my right leg turned somewhat numb.

Still, I’ll end it here and now! I thought.

Using my left leg — the one I’d landed with — as the origin, I put the impact and speed of the jump into my greatsword and swung it at the abomination's front right leg.

"SPLIT APAAAAAART!"

With the sounds of a slash and Silverlight's light burning, the blade smoothly cut through its skin, flesh, and skeleton. Gouz-Maise's leg bone was completely cleaved open. The skin and flesh on the opposite side of the cut wasn't enough to let the leg function and made the creature lose its balance. Obviously, it instantly tried to detach the wound and fix it, but...

"Not happening! Haaaahh!!!" I followed up my attack with another slash aimed at the injury, causing its leg to break off completely. Without its support, Gouz-Maise lost all the balance it had left and fell to its right.

I used my left leg to jump away from there and then ran straight towards the place where its head was about to land.

The plan was simple — hit it with Vengeance is Mine.

"With this..." I screamed.

...it's done! I added silently. Victory is ours! We've won!

I suddenly had a feeling that we weren't the only ones to think that. As the distance between me and Gouz-Maise's head shortened, an inexplicable chill went down my spine, and not for the first time, either. It was much like the one I'd felt when I was about to launch my final attack on Gardranda.

My eyes met with the two eyes on its face... and the third eye on its forehead.

No. There was no such thing. That wasn't an eye.

The thing peeking out of its torn forehead was a gem-like stone that didn't reflect any light.

What is that? I thought.

But I knew exactly what it was. It was the abomination's core.

Why had it revealed it to us — the ones trying to destroy it?

"...!"

The answer to that came in the form of great gathering of energy that started to whirl around its forehead. It was reminiscent of something I'd already experienced today — the transformation of grudge into unbridled, overwhelming power.

The Deadly Mixer.

The magical destructive force the Lich had used for his last stand.

I'd been too careless. The fact that Gouz-Maise didn't manipulate undead or use magic debuff skills had made me believe that it couldn't use this, either. However, Hugo had said that Gouz-Maise operated by transforming grudge into energy. Thus, it was perfectly reasonable for it to be able to use Deadly Mixer, which worked on the same principle.

Still on the ground, the abomination fixed its aim on us as we closed in on its head. Just like myself, the thing was looking for a good opportunity to finish me off. Its grudge helped...

No — its grudge was the very reason why it was able to gather its shattered intelligence and devise a plan to end the life of the one it was compelled to kill.

“DdEeAaADddLlLyyYyy MmMiiIxxXeeeEEerRrrRRr!”

Due to Gouz-Maise being an amalgam of grudge, the sorcery that it released, which converted grudge into destructive power, was nearly instantaneous.

“Counter Absorption!” I screamed.

I hastily extended Nemesis and used the last Counter Absorption I had in stock. That was enough to block its Deadly Mixer. However, that didn’t save me from being placed into checkmate.

After all, the distance between us had become short...

Short enough for its arms to reach me.

Guarding against the Deadly Mixer had rendered me unable to move. Gouz-Maise used the opportunity to swing its boulder-like fists at me. The next moment, my body was launched into the air... and my consciousness faded.

◇◇◇

Maiden of Vengeance, Nemesis

Right after we used Counter Absorption to block Gouz-Maise’s Deadly Mixer, its large fists hit Ray’s body. Still holding me in my greatsword form, my Master was blasted to the side. Passing between the trees in the forest, he flew through the air like a leaf in the wind.

The scene was reminiscent of a truck accident from Ray’s memory... and the time the Superior Killer had given him his first death penalty.

“Ray!” I called out to him, but he didn’t answer.

He had already lost consciousness. And his unconscious body was heading straight for a tree.

“Ah!” I quickly went into my human form, held him from behind, and tightly closed my eyes. A moment later, I felt a strong impact and pain spread through my back. As the tree we hit shook, we both fell to the ground beneath.

“Khh... Ah...” The pain was still there after we hit the surface. The impact I’d felt when squeezed between the tree and Ray — who was considerably larger than me — seemed to have made my ribs crack. However, I was certain that it prevented Ray from feeling any of that pain. That was more than enough for me.

“Ray!” I called out to him, but he didn’t show any signs of waking up.

Looking at his status, I saw that his HP was below 10% and that he had status effects such as Fainting and several Bone Fractures. Reaching into his inventory, I took out an HP recovery Potion and poured it over him. That healed some of his HP, but it didn’t take care of a single one of his status effects. The wounds were simply too deep. Also, Potion-type consumables were more effective when ingested, and due to being unconscious, Ray couldn’t drink any Potions I tried giving him.

“Forgive me!” I poured the content of the Potion into my mouth and pushed my lips against his. I then did it two more times. With that, I got Ray to swallow an entire bottle’s worth of medicine.

It became effective almost instantly, healing about a third of his HP and fixing the lighter Bone Fractures. His HP stopped going down, as well.

Though Ray was still unconscious, it was clear that he was no longer on the verge of dying. However, I was unsure if I could look him in the eye after this.

“Now’s not the time to think about that!” I cried desperately.

We were still in a particularly dire situation. I could hear tremors encroaching towards us, warning me that Gouz-Maise was getting closer. If the aberration saw Ray in this state, it would instantly kill him.

He would die a second time.

“I won’t allow that.”

I couldn’t stomach the idea of Ray being killed by that thing.

“Ray,” I said.

Still unconscious, my Master was lying near the tree we’d hit.

I gently caressed his cheek and turned away from him. “I will buy you some time.”

I believe in you. The evening after we lost to the Superior Killer, we made a promise. Back then, we were both weak and could do nothing against him. Thus, we agreed to become stronger and emerge victorious. Now, we both fight as one. I know you will wake up soon. So I will buy you all the time you need... because that is what will lead us to victory.

“Here I go!” I transformed my right hand into a black blade. Though relatively small, it was about as strong a weapon as my sword form.

I shoved myself in front of Gouz-Maise before it could find Ray. “You’re not getting past me, Gouz-Maise!”

“ＤＨＩＳＳＳＳＩＩＩＩＵＡＡＡＡＡＡＡ！！”

Every face on its body screamed. Each and every eye on its body swiveled and fixed on me.

The counter within me didn’t react, which meant that it wasn’t being controlled by the Lich’s grudge. It had noticed me simply because I was a living creature.

I had to face it and keep it occupied long enough for Ray to wake up.

“Augh!” I used my right hand-blade to attack Gouz-Maise.

My strategy was the same as Ray’s. I attacked it, was attacked back, and evaded.

Though Gouz-Maise was tough and powerful, it wasn’t fast at all. Even I didn’t have any problems dodging its attacks.

However, unlike when Ray had swung me, I didn’t seem to be able to hurt it at all. Without Silverlight, the most I could do was give it the most meager of cuts.

My stats were far below Ray’s. Not only that, but I was out of uses of the one skill I could do by myself — Counter Absorption.

Gouz-Maise, on the other hand, attacked me with nothing but blows that could kill me instantly. Unlike when I was a sword, a single direct hit would make my body shatter.

Though a single mistake could be fatal, I pressed on. If I gave up, the possibility of Ray waking up and us emerging victorious would become zero.

Neither Ray nor I could accept that. Thus, I fought to keep the possibility alive.

This feeling had been within me ever since I was born. I was certain that

Ray had it, as well.

It was the one true thing that kept us tethered and connected.

◇◇◇

Paladin Ray Starling, within a dream

I instantly understood that I was dreaming.

I still had the appearance of my Infinite Dendrogram avatar, but everything felt somewhat hazy, making me feel like I was in a lucid dream.

Despite that, however, I had no trouble processing my situation and the state of my surroundings. For example, I could clearly see a child — a young me, to be precise — running somewhere.

"Oh... I remember this," I said.

I could easily tell that this dream depicted the past. I even knew the time. It was the summer of 2035 — nearly ten years ago.

Obviously, Infinite Dendrogram hadn't been out yet, so my brother and I were playing different games.

Back then — when he was 16 — Shu had been all about retro games and martial arts. He'd gradually improved his fighting skills by frequenting a long-running dojo run by the family of our sister's friend, and he'd eventually become a considerably famous contestant through U-17 — a tournament for minors.

My days back then had consisted of playing retro games with him while looking forward to seeing his matches. On days when those happened, I'd tended to head to the venues they were held in while being all giddy about it.

Just like in this memory.

"Man, what is this?" I muttered.

My question was only natural. After all, I — as my avatar, Ray — was following my younger self. Not only that, but I had something unknown standing next to me. If I had to describe it with one word, it would've been "silhouette."

Yes — a humanoid silhouette was just floating in the middle of this normal-looking midsummer day. Its color was a mix of red and black, making it seem somewhat sinister. In my Ray form and still wearing all my armor, I was walking through this standard Japanese day with this silhouette by my side. The strangeness of this situation was another reason why I'd concluded that I was in a dream. Something this weird would only happen in a dream.

The silhouette was completely silent.

"How about you say something?" I spoke to it.

"Replay," it said.

R-Replay?

"So this is your doing?" I asked.

Since the silhouette's voice was feminine, I momentarily assumed it was Nemesis, but I quickly got the feeling that it wasn't.

"I want to ask."

Hey, I have several questions, too, I thought.

"Turns."

Turns...? So we'll take turns asking questions? I thought.

"Okay," I nodded.

And so, myself and this dark red silhouette that seemed to be able to read my mind had a little information exchange.

"Where is the boy going?" asked the entity.

"The venue where my brother's having a tournament match," I answered. "This is when, uh..."

Of course, I knew exactly where I was heading, what was supposed to take place there... and what would actually happen.

"This is when he participated in Un-kra's U-17 tournament."

"Un-kra?" The dark red entity questioningly tilted its head, but now it was my turn to ask a question.

"Tell me," I spoke up. "If this is a dream, then what's happening to me? I'm quite sure I was in the middle of fighting Gouz-Maise. Did I get the death penalty?"

That seemed unlikely, since it seemed like I was still in the game.

"Alive... Fainted."

So I'm unconscious, huh? I thought. ...Wait, doesn't that mean that I'm open to getting hit by a finishing blow at any moment?

"What's Un-kra?"

"A death match-type martial arts tournament with no weight limit, no style limit, no rules besides the use of weapons and threats, and no end without KOs and give ups — Unlimited Pankration. Also known as 'Un-kra.'"

It was a popular tournament that had begun — if I recalled correctly — in 2027. With it allowing karate, judo, boxing, kickboxing, sumo, wrestling, Muay Thai, capoeira, koryu, and countless other styles, it seemed like an event from some fighting manga. The level of violence earned it lots of criticism, but it continued to be popular regardless.

". . ." The silhouette looked somewhat excited.

Does it like martial arts? I asked myself. Or death matches?

"My turn to ask," I said. "How do you not know what Un-kra is if — as you said yourself — you're the one replaying this scene?"

Nemesis had had some of my memories since the moment she was created, so I found it weird that this entity didn't.

"O n l y . . . r e p l a y i n g . . . n e c e s s a r y . . . m e m o r i e s."

So it's replaying only the memories deemed necessary, huh? I thought. But man, if it can scan my memories, yet isn't an Embryo... just what is it? I guess I could ask it directly...

"W h a t w i l l h a p p e n n o w . . . ?"

I'd expect someone replaying the scene to know that much, I thought.

"Keep watching and you'll see in a few minutes," I said. "Now, my question: have we met before?"

"Y e s," it replied. "H e r e , w e a r e a l w a y s t o g e t h e r . . ."

"What...?" I said, baffled.

"Here," as in, within Infinite Dendrogram? But the only person I'm always together with in this world is Nemesis.

"B o y i s a l o n e , n o t d a n g e r o u s . . . ?" the silhouette asked while pointing at young me.

"The security system observing public roads was already there ten years ago, so no, I wasn't in danger of getting kidnapped or anything," I said.

I had trouble remembering when the security guard machines had become widespread. I had a feeling they'd already been there by the time I was born.

"S t i l l , a c h i l d b y h i mself . . . ?"

"It might've been my summer holiday, but it was still a normal weekday for adults, so yeah. ...Wait, wasn't that a second question?"

"Ask t w ice , t o o , Ray." Though its words were still monotonous, it was gradually getting better at talking.

"How can I regain consciousness?" I asked.

"Wake up when finished watching."

"Finished watching what?" I asked.

"Your birth."

M-My birth...?

"Watch why you became the Ray you are."

"...I see," I said.

The reason why I turned out to be the way I am, huh? Seeing the events that are about to transpire will be more than enough to know that.

"Won't be long now." Saying that, I pointed at young me, who was walking before us.

He was already near the venue and only needed to walk through a pedestrian crossing to get to the entrance. As eight-year-old me waited for the traffic light to change, there was an even younger girl standing right next to him. She had a childish accessory in her hair, but due to the poor way she'd put it on, it flew off the moment a stronger gust of wind went by. It fell on the road.

The light was still green for traffic, and when the girl tried to go and take her accessory, she didn't notice the truck headed right for her. A few moments before it could hit her, the young me ran in, took her hand, and tried pulling her off the road. However, he was too slow and weak.

At eight years old, he was far too powerless to take her to safety before the truck hit them both. As a result, all young me did back then was simply increase the number of victims. And so, the truck was about to run over two children.

However, a moment later, a person who'd come over from the other side of the road took them both and jumped out of the way.

Normally, that person wouldn't have made it. In fact, normally that person wouldn't have made it even if he'd come over the moment the girl ran out to the road. However, the feat was perfectly possible for this person. Due to his astounding leg strength, he'd closed the distance in but a moment and swiftly taken the girl by the hand.

However, there was also me — who was nothing but a burden at this point. Due to me jumping out to the road, the person needed to take both of us. And though he was capable of jumping while holding two children, it — naturally — slowed him down.

I remembered it clearly. After a moment of being airborne, there was another impact. Then — while still being held — I rolled on the ground.

Even so, I didn't feel any pain. The person holding us did a great job protecting us. I could hear some people nearby start to scream. I, on the other hand, was at a loss for words.

That was only natural. After all — the one who'd saved us was my brother.

Knowing I was coming, he'd walked out to meet up with me. And it just so happened that he'd saw us in great peril and saved us. He'd paid a price for that — his right leg was hit by the truck. With how blue-black and swollen it was, you didn't need to be an expert to know that it was broken.

Shu was about to participate in the final match of the tournament. However, right before it happened, his leg got shattered...

...and it was all because of me trying to save the girl while being completely powerless to do so.

Chapter Six: Beyond the Radix Point

At a certain place in the City of Duels, Gideon.

“Heyoo! Haven’t seen you fur a while, Figgy.”

“Oh? I know that voice, but not the face. A new costume, Shu?”

“You assume correctly. This is an MVP special reward called ‘Hind Bear.’”

“...Another costume, I see.”

“Yeah, it’s another costume. Got a problem with that?”

“How many do you have by now?”

“Sorry, but that’s not something I bear in mind. All I know is that I only have one that isn’t a costume.”

“...I see there’s a bit of a bias.”

“Every special reward besides the thing I got from Gloria is a costume! This makes bearly any sense!”

“It’s quite unusual to be able to defeat so many UBMs, though.”

“Sorry, but those words have bearly any weight when said by you, of all people.”

“You’re probably right. Oh, it just hit me... You’ve worn bear costumes since that time, right?”

“‘That time,’ as in...?”

“The time we met.”

“Oh yeah, I was beary ursine back then, too. Though that one was store-bought.”

“It was also the first time we fought UBMs, right?”

“Yeah. That takes me back.”

“We sure had a hard time handling them.”

“It happened when Infinite Dendrogram had only been out for only ten or so days, right? Our levels were still pretty low.”

“Yep, that sounds about right.”

“I’m still impressed that we were able to win... To be honest, looking back at it, it’s actually beary weird that we did.”

"But you didn't show any signs of giving up back then, right?"

"Ha ha ha! As if I would. Like I said back then: 'The possibility is always...'"

◇◇◇

Paladin Ray Starling, within a dream of the past

On that summer day of 2035, my brother had gotten into an accident while protecting us. His life hadn't been in danger. However, his right leg — hit by the truck — had been seriously injured. The flesh was swollen, the blood vessels under the skin had burst, and the bone was broken. In a game, healing magic or items would've made short work of such a wound, but in reality, it was a grave injury that would need quite a while to be fixed.

It was bad enough for him to be hospitalized. And the tournament's final match was supposed to happen about an hour after he'd received it.

"Nothing t h a t cou l d be done?" asked the entity.

"Indeed," I nodded. "It was hopeless for him."

...If reason had its say, anyway, I thought.

I could see the passersby begin to surround us and make a stir. Some were panicking, others were calling ambulances, while some journalist-looking sorts who were focusing on my brother as a fighter in the final match called out to him with a "Mr. Mukudori!"

Standing next to my brother — who was lying on the ground — was young me and the girl, both crying. The girl was probably crying because of the fear of being involved in such an accident, while I was crying due to the fact that Shu had gotten injured because of me.

I could clearly remember the things I'd thought back then. It could be summed up as guilt about what I'd done to him mixed with begging someone to help him.

In response to all the sympathetic looks and my sentiment, my brother — still on the ground — looked at young me for a moment and...

"Owie!"

...jumped up after saying that in a tone one would use when accidentally hitting their head on a ceiling frame.

Everyone was dumbfounded.

The young me, the girl, and the passersby all looked at him with eyes open wide with shock. To add to that — even the silhouette right next to me seemed surprised.

"Well, darn... This sure looks broken," he said as he looked down on his broken right leg while standing on his healthy left. Yet again, his tone was unfitting, making him sound like he'd broken a piece of a plastic model rather than his limb. And no, it wasn't "better than it looked" — his leg was severely injured.

"That r e a ction is s t range." The silhouette made a comment.

"Well, it's him we're talking about, so yeah." I was used to seeing my brother act and talk like that by now. But the young me still hadn't had much exposure to his eccentricity at that point in time, so he was reasonably shocked.

"I-I just called an ambulance! It should be here soon! Please don't move too much!" one of the passersby told my brother.

However, in response, Shu said, "Eh? Oh... Well, thank you for the concern. But there's no need for that right now."

"'No need'?" a number of people simultaneously repeated his words in disbelief.

"I have a final match to participate in over at that building, so I'll go to the hospital after that's done," he said.

The moment he'd said that, I'd felt as though time had stopped.

It seemed like I and everyone else on the scene — except for my brother — was thinking exactly the same thing: What is this guy saying?

From its reaction, it was safe to assume that the silhouette shared the sentiment.

◇

The place of the dream changed, and we were now in Shu's waiting room.

Moments before this scene, this place had included doctor who'd given my brother some first aid and the master from his dojo who'd tagged along to see the fight, but they were no longer here. The only ones present now were me and Shu.

His right leg was covered in a compress and bandaged. But that was all. There was no cast or any kind of support on it. After all, Shu was about to go fight in the match. He'd refused casts and supports because they would've been counted as weaponry. The injury was bad enough to need an operation, and yet...

"... H e w ill fight?" asked the entity.

"Yeah," I nodded.

Due to the lack of expression on the silhouette, it was hard to tell what it was thinking, but even I could tell that it was half amazed and half shocked. "No one s t o ps him?"

"In a normal martial arts tournament, the fight would've been called off due to doctor's orders, but this is Un-kra we're talking about."

Again, Un-kra allowed anything besides the use of weaponry and threats, and would only end with KOs and give-ups. It was actually strange that such a tournament could exist in this day and age.

"But it's b roken," the silhouette protested. "He ca n win? Doesn't nee d right l eg?"

"The koryu martial arts dojo my brother went to is based around blows, rather than throws and such," I answered. "Naturally, kicks are a crucial part of it, and proper leg control while punching is highly important, as well."

Now that I think about it, that style is ridiculously manga-like, I thought. Seriously, during the demonstrations I saw, their kicks were breaking logs as thick as people's torsos. What was the name of that kick, again? All I can remember is that it sounded pretty cool.

"Is h i s opponent w eak?" asked the entity.

"The opponent in the final match was Gregory Asimov Kaiser," I said. "He was nearly two meters tall and weighed over a hundred kilos, most of which was well-trained muscle. Being well-versed in blows, holds, throws, and locks, he was easily the strongest student participant at that time. He's now doing his best to be the top professional martial artist."

"Student... c h ild... child?"

"He was seventeen at that time, which is underage, so yeah." Also, even after ten years had passed, Gregory was still a well-known face in the end-of-year martial arts shows. Last New Year's Eve — when my brother had returned home for the occasion — I could recall us both watching TV and seeing Gregory still doing his thing.

"Brot her can' t wi n, n o?"

"He would've had little chance even if he was in top form, and yet he went in with a broken leg," I said. "It's only reasonable that people tried to stop him."

Not like he listened, I thought. Now that I think about it, the master from his dojo was one of the few who didn't try to make him reconsider.

"Shu, don't! If you fight someone so strong with that wound, you'll die!" The young me was still trying to get him to withdraw from the match.

That was only natural. After all, when Shu had gotten injured because of me, I'd been overwhelmed by great fear. And yet, despite his state, he was about to go on and do something reckless, if not downright crazy. My fear back then hadn't allowed me to stay silent and let him do it.

"Well, I guess doing the Kodachi with my leg like this isn't the best idea," said Shu, completely nonchalant.

Oh, yeah, I thought. That's what the kick from his school is called.

"Kodachi," the wood-splitter or "battle ax," was a frontwards roundhouse kick aimed at the opponent's head. My brother was particularly good at it. The kick which — as the name implied — was strong enough to split wood and seemed capable of doing the same to people's heads was feared as much as Gregory.

However, with his right leg broken, my brother couldn't do it anymore. He couldn't do it with his left leg, either, since he would've had to use his right as the pivot leg. Shu was going to have to fight without his ultimate kick.

That meant only one thing — he had no chance of winning.

He'd gotten the wound because of me. And since it was going to be the reason for his defeat — or perhaps even death — I couldn't stop blaming myself. Thus, I was trying to stop him.

However, Shu showed no sign of changing his mind. He was always like that. Though facetious and eccentric, my brother wasn't one to easily let go of something he'd resolved to do.

Once the young me came to understand that trying to convince him was useless, he bowed his head in sadness.

"I shouldn't have jumped out to the road..." he muttered to himself.

"Hmm." Hearing that, Shu thought about something, leaned over to the young me, placed his hands on his shoulders, and looked him in the eyes. "Honestly, Reiji... I think you would've regretted it more if you hadn't tried to save her."

"B-But you're the one who actually saved her!" the young me protested. "I couldn't do it by myself! All I did was get you hurt!" The young me wept about his powerlessness. All he felt was regret, grief, and anger at himself.

"You're right. I got hurt." Shu agreed with me. "But you know, it's entirely possible that I wouldn't have saved her if you hadn't tried it."

"Eh?" That surprised the young me.

"Because you tried to save the girl, I — without thinking — jumped out to save both of you," he explained. "In the end, she was saved because of your choice."

That might've been the truth, or just a lie to make me feel better. However, there was sincerity in his eyes.

"That's good enough, Reiji," he said. "There's no need to regret the act of choosing something. After all, it's the ultimate premise to grabbing hold of the possibility leading to the future you desire."

He added a lot of emphasis to the words that followed.

"After choosing something, all that matters is whether you can see it or not and grab hold of it or not."

"Grab hold of it or not?" the young me asked.

"Yeah. The possibility is always..."

These words of his...

"The possibility is always there — with your will. No matter how small, no matter behind how many zeros beyond the radix point it lies — it always exists. The only time the possibility isn't there is when you've given up on grabbing hold of the future you desire. As long as you don't give up and keep making choices towards the future you want to see, the possibility won't disappear, even if it's far beyond the radix point."

These words of his were still etched onto my very core.

"That's why your choice to save the girl back there wasn't a mistake," he added.

"Shu..." the young me said.

He gave the young me an intrepid smile and stood up. "Today's the perfect chance, so I'll show you the ropes. You'll soon see what it means to give your all to grab hold of the possibility."

With those words as his last, Shu left the waiting room and used his crutches to make his way to where the match would take place.

◇

That was when the dream portraying my memories reached its end. The venue we were in vanished, leaving only an empty dreamscape vaguely reminiscent of a pale haze.

The young me and my brother were nowhere in sight, meaning that the only ones here now were me, as Ray, and the silhouette.

“Is it over?” asked the entity.

“Well, the match was supposed to happen right after this,” I replied.

Though, if the dream’s objective was to display my roots, it makes sense for it to end with the exchange between me and Shu, I thought.

“Can I ask another thing?”

“Sure.” I knew exactly what it was gonna ask.

“Did he win?”

“He did.”

Indeed — Shu had gone into the final match against Gregory and actually emerged victorious.

“How?” the silhouette asked.

Man, I really don’t wanna say it, I thought. Though I don’t want to keep the silhouette in suspense, either, so I guess I will.

The news about my brother’s right leg being rendered useless had already spread among the people in the venue. Even the spectators around my seat had been talking about it. Also, the way Shu had gone towards the ring — crutches and all — had made him look extremely pitiful. While he was climbing into the ring, he hadn’t let his right leg touch the floor beneath him. Having to use his left one alone had given him a really hard time and gotten people to understand just how bad of an injury it was.

For some reason, the people already knew that it was caused by an accident he’d gotten into while saving children, making him get lots of sympathetic glances. Some martial artists were praising him for not withdrawing from the match after getting such a grave wound, calling him “a true fighter.”

His opponent, Gregory, shared the sentiment. “It’s a shame I don’t get to fight you at your best,” he said. “Though I’m sure that one day we’ll get to go all-out on each other.”

Though he looked menacing, Gregory was actually quite a gentle person.

“I’m sure we will,” replied my brother in a rather cheerful manner.

There was a difference in height. In weight class. And a critical problem with the state of one contestant. The outcome was clear. What was about to happen was nothing but a ritual-like event meant only to preserve my brother’s pride and honor as a martial artist.

That was what everyone present thought.

Thus, the gong sounded... and Shu launched from his right leg, performed Kodachi, smacked Gregory across the jaw, and knocked him unconscious.

The match had ended there.

The fifth Unlimited Pankration U-17 had ended with my brother’s victory.

“That was nuts,” I said.

“...It was broken, right?” asked the silhouette.

“Yes, he actually used his broken right leg to launch a jaw-cracking kick that gave his enemy a cerebral concussion and won by one-hit KO,” I said.

Naturally, no one had expected Shu to do something that intense with his injured leg. Gregory certainly hadn’t seen it coming and hadn’t been ready to guard against it, letting my brother land a clean hit.

“...Unfair.”

“You can say that again,” I said. He’d made all the sympathy he’d gotten from the audience go to waste.

Now that I think about it, it was kinda suspicious how the very reason for that sympathy — the news of him getting into that accident — spread throughout the whole venue, I thought. It had allowed him to perform the perfect surprise attack. That was enough reason to believe that Shu had actually done something to make it happen.

And with that in mind, it was possible to assume that even his cheerfulness before the match had actually been a strategic move in preparation for the kick.

Whatever the case, that reckless attack had naturally made the injury worse, extending the recovery period from one month to three months.

Once I’d met my brother after the event, he had put up the most obnoxiously proud face and said something along the lines of “This is what it means to give your all to grab hold of the possibility!”

To which I had replied with, “Bro, you idiot! What are you doing?!” while throwing a towel at his face.

Oh yeah, I thought. That was actually the point when I started calling him “bro.”

“What an intense brother,” commented the silhouette.

“Indeed he is,” I nodded.

Even though he’d seriously ruined the words he’d said back in the waiting room, they were still etched deep into my heart. That was the reason why I was always ready to reach for the possibility leading me to a future without regret or bad aftertastes.

“That was probably why the replay ended after the talk in the waiting room,” I said. The match itself wouldn’t have added anything of value.

Though it was probably a good show of his “grab hold of the possibility no matter what it takes” stance, I wasn’t the type to take the mentality that far. I’d also never thought I’d get into a situation where I’d have to, but...

“Desperate times, desperate measures,” said the silhouette.

“Yeah,” I said.

With the memory replay being over, I was about to wake up. Once that happened, I would have to face Gouz-Maise in an even worse situation than before. Thus, if I was going to seize the possibility, I’d have to get some new methods.

“Well, I’ll have a go at it, anyway,” I said.

“I see,” nodded the silhouette. “Then, wake up.”

It seemed to me as though the entity smiled.

“Ray, have a question?”

Well, there’s one thing I want to know, I thought.

“All right, I’ll ask directly... What are you?” My own conjecture wasn’t enough to figure out its identity.

“...Eheheh.” I couldn’t see any eyes on the dark red silhouette, but I could easily tell that it looked into mine and laughed. “You won’t master me if you only use the flames, Ray.”

Those words were enough for me to understand what the entity was. “Y-You’re Gardran...?”

Before I could finish that sentence, the world of dreams began to fade.

“I am a fragment. A power left unused because of you defeating us while we were incomplete. I am the life and mind that the demon failed to birth.

The life that was reborn as your item. I am the ‘me’ that wants to know the man who slaughtered my mother.”

The silhouette — Gardranda — spoke while its appearance gradually became less vague. Its form wasn’t that of the great demon, but that of a small girl with horns.

“I understand you now,” she said. “So please, understand me, too.”

And so, our world of memories and dreams began fade.

“Wake up, use all you have, including me and Nemesis, and grab hold of the possibility, okay?” She spoke those words, and reality came flooding back.

◇◇◇

Maiden of Vengeance, Nemesis

As I had evaded its attacks and used feints, I’d bought about five minutes of time. My body was covered in many light wounds. Though I was able to dodge its legs and fists, I was getting damaged by the pieces of the ground and trees that it shattered.

Though it hurt to admit it — my non-weapon form was weak. Since I had no means of healing myself, I wouldn’t last long.

Gouz-Maise, on the other hand, was completely unharmed. Since my blade couldn’t even give it as much as a scratch, it didn’t even need to use Automatic Restoration.

“ＢｏＵｓｙｕＳｓＡｄａＳＡＡ ａａＡ!” Even though it wasn’t hurt, Gouz-Maise was irritated that it couldn’t kill me and expressed it by letting out enraged roars and secreting some indescribable bile from the faces all over its body.

The sight was downright vile.

The creature was the very embodiment of the vileness involved in any gathering of corpses. Both its appearance and way of existing were revolting enough to turn the very sight of it into something that made my mind creak. That was how I felt about undead in general.

Back when Ray and I had visited the Tomb Labyrinth, I’d been scared beyond words. I didn’t know why, but undead were extremely dreadful to me. When looking through Ray’s memories for an answer, I’d thought that I was simply weak to horror.

However, that wasn't it. I had come to understand it after facing the undead in the dungeon and the abomination before me. I wasn't afraid of their appearances. What I found dreadful was their very existence.

They were dead, yet they didn't go to any afterlife, nor were they reborn.

They were dead, yet they continued to walk among us.

That nightmarish state was so frightening it made my heart tighten.

I didn't know the reason why.

However, my heart was telling me that I simply couldn't let it continue on like this.

"My heart, eh?" I murmured.

How peculiar, I thought. According to Ray's knowledge, I am nothing but an AI inside a game. Do I really have a heart? Wait.

"At the very least, I have enough of it to feel one thing," I said.

It was certainly there. I had a heart that felt something for Ray.

"Heh heh." I couldn't help but laugh. There was no denying that it was quite comical. After all — he was the very cause of my existence. Yet, the way my heart felt about him was no falsehood.

I...

"ＤＡｓｄａＳＡＡａＡａａａＡ!"

"You just had to ruin the moment, didn't you, you uncouth lout?" I snapped.

Lengthy protrusions squirmed out of several mouths all over Gouz-Maise's body.

They were tongues. The rot dripping down from them wasn't the only thing suggesting that they were quite unlike those of humans — their very shape was reminiscent of the tongues used by chameleons or frogs from Ray's memory.

It was obvious what it was planning to use them for.

Clearly, it had grown sick and tired of my constant evasion. Much like snakes raising their heads, the tongues were readied to strike at me.

"I won't be able to dodge this," I said. Not only was I injured — I simply didn't have the skill and ability to evade such an attack. There was no way for me to stall it any longer.

"...Heh heh."

Look at me, Ray, I thought. This is how strong I am by my lonesome. This is the extent of what I can do when I'm just by myself. While alone, I can't go any farther than this. So...

"So just come here already."

The moment Gouz-Maise was about to pierce me with its tongues...

"Sure."

...I heard that single word, which was followed by a stream of dark red fire that burned the fleshy extensions.

The fire on its tongues made Gouz-Maise wail in anguish. At this point, the blazing, dark red flames were familiar to me. After all, the one commanding them was my Master.

"You sure took your time, Ray," I said.

"Sorry, a little dream made me oversleep," he replied.

"You shouldn't keep a lady waiting too long," I scolded. "But, well... you made it in time, so I don't mind."

"Thanks, Nemesis."

Hearing that made my expression turn softer, but I made a conscious effort not to show it.

"So, shall we continue?" I asked. "We're out of Absorption uses and have wounds all over us. The situation is worse than before. Do you think we can do it?"

"Yeah," Ray nodded. "I remembered something... no, two things. We'll use them to defeat this thing."

"Remembered two things? Care to share?"

Before answering my question, Ray wore an intrepid grin. "Something I neglected to use... and my brother's words."

The moment he said that, I instantly understood what he was thinking and came to know his plan.

Oh my, I thought, both impressed and slightly shocked.

"Heh heh! Are you insane?" I asked.

"Nope," he answered.

"This will be an act of pure madness with a low probability of success. It will be as dangerous as a walk on a tightrope, won't it?!" I was thoroughly puzzled by his thought process.

"If the possibility is there, I'll just give my all to seize it," he said.

I see, I thought. Then I shall accompany you.

"Though, the chance of this plan leading us to victory is about... 30%, and that's being generous," he added.

About a third, eh?

“Seems enough to me,” I said.

“More than enough,” Ray agreed. After that exchange, I took my sword form and became Ray’s weapon.

“Let’s win, shall we?” I said.

“Yeah, let’s win.”

And so, turning to face the abomination that was Gouz-Maise, Ray and I became one.

◆◆◆

Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise

The creature the world proclaimed to be “Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise” was enraged.

Since the moment it’d been born, Gouz-Maise had felt only indescribable amounts of hatred. That was because the creature was an actual amalgam of the rage and resentment left behind by the deceased. It was the result of those who had left nothing else behind but regret.

“ＧＵｄｓＦＤｇａａｄＡＳａａＡＡａＡｄＳｄＡＡａ！”

That was all that Gouz-Maise was.

The dead that were its base were those who had lived by avarice and vice — people who had failed to leave behind anything but their grudge. If at least one of those inside had died with love in their heart, this amalgam of death probably wouldn’t have grown this powerful and might not have become a UBM. But alas, that hadn’t happened, and Gouz-Maise — as it was now — would never reflect upon itself. The grudge boiling within the creature was enraging it, compelling it to use its might against the living and forcing them to join the grudgeful chaos within it.

However, at this point in time, Gouz-Maise was even more enraged than usual. That was because the puny, mouse-like living creature below it couldn’t die.

It was a Master.

Masters were immortal.

Killing them just made them momentarily disappear. However — that was the extent of it. These living creatures would simply brush off that transient death as if it was nothing and then just continue existing.

This one, in particular, had faced Gouz-Maise and tried to prevent it from drowning other living creatures into its grudge.

Even if hurt, left alone, or shattered with a punch, the Master would continue getting in its way.

Gouz-Maise couldn't stomach that. It didn't have a mind to understand why, but it just couldn't tolerate that Master.

However, it was about to be over. Gouz-Maise had a means of ending it. It was a powerful spell used by one of those who'd become the creature. The undead intended to finally kill the Master by casting it once again.

Once that was done, it intended to go to town. A significant part of its grudge wished to kill the people inhabiting the places within its memory and make them join the grudge within it. It believed that — in doing so — it could become more powerful and thus become able to sink even more living creatures into its grudge. And it would continue until the whole world was sunk.

Yes... yeah, I... we are all dead here. So, a world where people still live is a mistake. It's... wrong, it's so wrong! All of it, all of it, all of it, all of it, all of it must sink into the abyss. Kill and consume everything there is in this world.

Gouz-Maise's consciousness was like a colored marble that mixed objectivity and subjectivity. Chaotic as its mind was, however, it could still become puzzled. Not by its own thoughts, obviously, but by the actions of the puny one below.

The puny one used his left hand to push a cloth against his mouth... while the bracer on his right was directed at Gouz-Maise.

Those bracers released fire. Gouz-Maise already knew that much. However, so far, only the left bracer had released the flames, and it had no recollection of the right one ever doing the same.

As Gouz-Maise's chaotic mind tried to figure out what the right bracer released...

"Hellish Miasma... full power!"

...the blond man declared something, making a dark purple smoke gush out of his right bracer with great intensity.

Gouz-Maise wasn't familiar with this attack. It didn't know what it was, its effects, or what the enemy was planning. Using its limited reasoning power, Gouz-Maise tried to understand what it was, and it didn't take long for it to come to a conclusion.

The smoke was harmless to it — beneficial, even.

It was miasma. A poisonous mist that afflicted, weakened, and led the living through a slow death.

To Gouz-Maise — an undead — it wasn’t much of a problem.

Because it had living cells, it couldn’t avoid the debuffs, but their impact on its body was insignificant. In the first place, slight amounts of Weakness and Intoxication were meaningless against an amalgam of corpses. Even if Gouz-Maise received the debuffs, their effect was negligible. Though Poison damaged its cells, it wasn’t anything that couldn’t be taken care of by its Automatic Restoration.

Thus, because it only pushed living people closer to death, the miasma was a net positive for Gouz-Maise. Trying to figure out why the man had done something so foolish, it finally became aware of a certain fact.

It couldn’t see anything. The dark purple smoke had spread all the way up to the base of its throat, and not even the use of the eyes on the faces all over its body could help it make sense of the surroundings.

This smokescreen was exactly what the man had intended. Even though the miasma was dangerous to him, he’d used it regardless just to hinder Gouz-Maise’s vision.

“ＤａａＤＦｄＺｆａａＡＳｓａＤＡＳａｓＡａＡａａＡＡ！” Gouz-Maise roared and began rampaging wildly. Its ground-shattering, indiscriminate movements were meant to crush the man, who was surely still around. Gouz-Maise kept stomping for a while — not minding the damage it was doing to both the surface and the faces on its legs — yet it didn’t feel anything living under its feet.

It couldn’t hit the man. Nor did it know where he was. That situation made it both angry and uneasy, but within its chaotic grudge, there was a composed part that came to a certain conclusion.

The man is aiming for the head. However, he’s both puny and cannot fly. To attack the head, he will try to cut the legs. At that moment, we must cast the ultimate spell and kill him along with the limb he attacks.

The plan involved sacrificing a part of itself. However, due to Gouz-Maise possessing Automatic Restoration, it wasn’t a heavy price. Even if the man had hidden himself, there was still only one way for him to emerge victorious. As long as Gouz-Maise didn’t let him do that, its victory was assured. The man could still use the flames, but they only gave it pain and never came close to being fatal.

Next moment... The next moment we feel pain, we will launch the spell towards it, thought Gouz-Maise. The cost of using it a second time is heavy. However, it's a small price to pay to kill him.

With those thoughts, it focused its attention on its legs and gave the body's control to the grudge that could use the spell.

Then, it exposed the core in its head and readied itself to cast the magic.

Suddenly, Gouz-Maise's back left leg was touched, causing its semi-rotten neural system to send it a signal.

"ＤＥｅｅＥａＡＤｄＬｙｙＹｙＭｉｘｅＥＥｅｅＲｒｒＲＲＲｒＲ!!"

A moment later, it launched the spell with the intention to disintegrate both the man and its own leg.

The speed at which it had turned its head to do that caused the rotten skin on its neck to rip and shred apart, but it didn't care. Though its aim was extremely forced, the power of the attack was great enough to make its back left leg disappear. Gouz-Maise lost its footing and screamed due to the searing pain it felt, but the damage wasn't something that couldn't be handled by its restorative ability.

What's important is that we killed hi—

The second that thought went through its head, the man that was supposed to be disintegrated jumped up on Gouz-Maise's back.

It couldn't understand what had happened. Countless grudges within it became astir and caused it to momentarily stiffen.

Then, it noticed the man's state.

His right hand was covered in blood and held a familiar piece of flesh. It was a part of Gouz-Maise's body, and — by looking at his mouth — it was easy to tell that he'd taken a bite of it. Lastly, he held a halberd with a black flag flying behind its ax blade.

Just now, with abnormal swiftness, he'd jumped on Gouz-Maise's back, and he was now getting ready to charge towards its head. His speed was far greater than it had been a few moments ago, or even when he'd been completely unhurt. It was hard to believe that he was heavily hurt. In fact, his wounds were disappearing right before its eyes.

Suddenly, the grudge that controlled Gouz-Maise shuddered with fear.

After all — it was reminiscent of the chase back in the dungeon.

“Looks like... it worked,” said the man through his ragged breath. The deathly faces all over its body heard the man’s mutter. “If you get a debuff by eating a part of a debuffed opponent’s body... Reversal recognizes it as a negative effect caused by the enemy. That was proven by the Grapevine I fought this morning.”

Gouz-Maise didn’t understand what the man was saying.

“I didn’t know if Hellish Miasma had any effect on undead, and there was a chance that the thing with the Grapevine only happened because it was caused by its attack,” the man said. “If that was the case, I’d have ended up dying from my own attack... but it worked.”

Gouz-Maise couldn’t make sense of the man’s current state.

“Ha ha... What a disgusting gamble,” the man laughed.

Gouz-Maise just barely had enough mind to understand that the man had created this situation by consuming its rotten flesh.

“ＧｇｉｉＩｉｉｅＥｅ!?ＤｄＧｇＡａａＡＡａＡｑＱａＡａ!?” it screamed through its head and all the mouths all over its body.

“You scared?” the man asked.

Indeed — Gouz-Maise was afraid. All as one, the consensus of the Gouz-Maise Gang — the group of scoundrels that had taken many lives and consumed great amounts of human flesh — feared the man before them.

“Guess it’s the first time you’ve gotten eaten, huh,” the man said. This was the man who, as if to give it payback for its sins, had consumed Gouz-Maise’s flesh and drawn ever closer to end its deathless life.

Naturally, the amalgam of undead was afraid of the way the man functioned.

He was truly a God of Death.

His hands — one blood crimson, other a deathly black — held a dark flag. On his head, there were wolf-like ears. He didn’t hesitate to consume the flesh of man-eaters. If he wasn’t the reaper sent himself to end them — no one was.

“ＫＡｄｓＦａ！？ＡｓａＳＡＤａａＡｑＡＳＱａ!”

Gouz-Maise began wildly swinging its arms down at him, but the man was able to evade it all, making it seem as though the amalgam of corpses had become pitifully sluggish. Not only that — he jumped on the left arm it swung down and began running up towards its head.

Little by little, the god of death... the Grim Reaper... the ultimate end... approached Gouz-Maise.

Overwhelmed by despair, it used its final card.

“ＤｅＥｅＡＡ—ＤｅＥａａＤＡａａ—ＤｄｄＤＬＹｙｙＭｉＸｅＥｅｅＥＥｒｒＲＲｒＲ!?!?”

That was the third time it cast the ultimate spell.

It didn’t care about what would happen because of that. Since the spell consumed great amounts of grudge — which was the core of Gouz-Maise’s being — there was a chance that using it thrice in such a short period of time could made itself self-destruct. However, its fear of the man running up its arm was just too great for it to hold back.

The burst of destructive magic made the god of death and everything below the elbow completely vanish. Though Gouz-Maise’s arm was thicker than a large tree, the spell disintegrated even its bones.

The pain signals were abnormally powerful, and due to the loss of its grudge, its Automatic Restoration didn’t work at full capacity. The grudge flowing through its corpus was reduced to just that of the one who could cast Deadly Mixer and a few others. Despite that, however, the faces covering its body and the few remaining grudges all smiled in relief.

One leg, one arm, and approximately 80% of the grudge composing it.

The losses were great, but they had been enough to make their bane — the reaper himself — disappear. The battle was over. Now, it simply had to wait for the Automatic Restoration to complete, head to town to stock up on new grudge and...

“ＡａＨｈＨｈ?” All of a sudden, a shadow came over it from above its head.

Gouz-Maise looked upwards.

Before the sunset, bathed in the light of the sinking sun, there was the source of the shadow.

The black silhouette held a black sword in the hand behind him. And, with great speed, he closed in towards Gouz-Maise’s head.

“You beasts, wallowing in undeath...” a feminine voice began.

“...go to sleep... forever!” the Reaper finished.

The tip of the black greatsword pierced through Gouz-Maise’s forehead and touched its core.

“VENGEANCE IS MINE!”

Thus, a strike worth all the damage Gouz-Maise had ever given the man... no — a retributive attack avenging all the people that had suffered because of those composing the amalgam of death...

...completely destroyed its core and ended its very existence.

Epilogue: A Morning of Smiles

Undisclosed Location

[“Maw of the Desert, Azmore” was defeated]
[Final level: 56]
[MVP: “The Earth” Fatoum, level 1,157 (total level: 1,657)]
[Embryo: “Overflowing Divine Vessel, The Grail”]
[MVP special reward: Legendary item, “Bag of the Desert, Azmore”]

■

[“The Crimson Armor, Exademon” was defeated]
[Final level: 63]
[MVP: “King of Termination” Albert Schwartzkaiser, level 620 (total level: 1,120)]
[Embryo: “Seven Star Turnover, Septentrion”]
[MVP special reward: Ancient Legendary item, “Crimson Armor-Piercer, Exademon”]

■

[“Four-Dimensional Kaiju, Todoghilas”]
[Final level: 51]
[MVP: “Commander-in-Chief” Gray α Centauri, level 490 (total level: 990)]
[Embryo: “Unidentified Flying Stronghold, Laputa”]
[MVP special reward: Ancient Legendary item, “Ultimate Suit Series, Todoghilas”]

■

[“Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise”]
[Final level: 34]
[MVP: “Paladin” Ray Starling, level 35 (total level: 35)]
[Embryo: “Maiden of Vengeance, Nemesis”]
[MVP special reward: Epic item, “Grudge-soaked Greaves, Gouz-Maise”]

“...Hm?”

In a space enlightened by countless data windows, it sounded a voice of confusion.

At first glance, it appeared to be an adult male human, but upon further inspection, one would notice that the skin covering its body had patches of draconic scales and beastly leather, while its head was decorated by devilish horns. Overall, it certainly looked more like a “humanoid monster” than a person, but the glasses it sported successfully moved the impression it gave off into the “human” territory — if only barely.

It was doing one of the jobs it was assigned to — the checking of the data concerning the defeat of UBMs over a set period of time. In Infinite Dendrogram, its role was the acknowledgement of UBMs.

Though UBMs were abnormally powerful and had abilities just as strong, their primary unique feature was their transformation into special rewards upon defeat.

Many non-UBM boss monsters also had great strength and unique abilities. When defeated — either by people or other monsters — they dropped Treasure Coffers or items they possessed before death.

However, the special rewards left by UBMs were completely unlike any basic boss monster drops. They were the materializations of the image — the concepts — surrounding the abilities of the defeated UBM, adjusted to best suit the most valuable person in the battle.

Indeed, it wasn’t their strength or abilities. That very transformation was the prime feature of UBMs.

No standard monster possessed it. But if the control AI responsible for UBMs acknowledged a unit as a UBM, it would become exactly that — a monster with the function to transform into a special reward upon death.

The creature working in this space was Jabberwock — the very same control AI responsible for acknowledging, giving features to, and sometimes even designing UBMs.

“‘Ray Starling,’” it murmured. “Going by Earth time, I saw this player name yesterday.”

It was the very same player that had, at an unreasonably low level, defeated the Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda — a UBM of Jabberwock’s design. Naturally, Jabberwock was slightly surprised to see the same person become an MVP in a UBM fight two days in a row.

In this world, the UBMs Jabberwock had either designed or acknowledged were many. However, the same couldn't be said for MVPs.

Many people couldn't defeat them. Others couldn't even encounter them. Others just plain couldn't become MVPs.

Not to mention that the strongest of the strong — Superiors — were actively hunting UBMs. As a result, only the few lucky enough to encounter and successfully defeat them could become MVPs.

Thus, Jabberwock was quite intrigued by an entity that had faced UBMs two days in a row and — through hard struggles — emerged victorious both times.

"Fascinating," it said. "If only most defeated UBMs like he did. I'm quite dissatisfied by how Superiors hunt them as if it's a chore. Truly, treasure is best when earned through harsh struggles and intense drama. No good saga or epic is complete without those things, after all." Jabberwock continuously nodded to his own words before beginning to ponder. "I believe I should make my designs even more tenacious."

Saying that, he closed his eyes in thought...

"Let's start by giving it atomic breath. Like Godzilla."

The moment Jabberwock said something truly foreboding, something gave a response. "No radioactive pollution, pleease!" Before he'd realized it, a cat-like mascot was sitting in the space behind him.

It was Cheshire — control AI no. 13. Shaking its head at just how troublesome its colleague was, it began commenting about what Jabberwock was trying to do.

"Leave the unreasonable amounts of power to SUBMs. They create enough calamities as it iis. We don't need anything that could cause irregular evolutioon. Do you have any idea how much trouble we had with the last two irregularrs? Even Humpty's favorite and Granvaloa's Superiors could barely stop the Corpse Stronghold, while the Disaster Bioweapon is still space-sealed in Red King's 'gaol,' you know? The ones who do all the work to take care of your UBMs are the tians, us, and the players, you know?"

"I'm aware," said Jabberwock. "Now, what is your business here, thirteen?"

"Oh yeah, I almost forgot," said Cheshire. "The control AI responsible for monsters, Queen, has a message for you."

"Which is...?"

"'Explain your previous acknowledgement.'"

"What am I supposed to make of that?" Jabberwock demanded.

"She gave me a letter, but — just as you'd expect from her — it was both overly emotional and too verbose, so I shortened iit," said Cheshire. "Also, it's about Gouz-Maise — the last monster you acknowledged as a UBM."

"I see." That was enough for Jabberwock to understand Queen's problem.

"If I had to add a bit more detail to that, it'd be, 'It wasn't born naturally, nor was it created or arranged by us. Why are you giving UBM status to an undead born from human sorceryy?'"

"Gouz-Maise had interesting unique abilities," said Jabberwock. "Its stats and the circumstances behind its birth were more than enough to give it Epic status. Also, by looking at the series of events that led to its creation, it's safe to say that there will never be another Gouz-Maise."

Thus, Jabberwock believed that acknowledging it as a UBM had made perfect sense.

"That's truue," said Cheshire. "Queen is probably just complaining because she's upset that not many of the boss monsters she singled out and improved are being acknowledged as UBMs."

"I'm just doing my job," replied Jabberwock. "Also, does it actually matter to us whether I acknowledge something as a UBM or not?"

"...I think she's just being peevish because she doesn't feel appreciateed," said Cheshire. "But oh weell."

While thinking about the relationship between this thickheaded fellow AI and the Queen, Cheshire heaved a sigh.

"Also, no. 3's designs are unrefined at best, and overly predictable, at worst. Too lacking in both inventiveness and potential," added Jabberwock. "When it comes to those points, this Gouz-Maise creature and some player designs make far better UBMs."

"Queen is a simple and straightforward girl, after aall... Wait, what?" Cheshire realized that Jabberwock had just said something that simply couldn't be ignored. "Player designs? What do you mean?"

"Exactly what I said," said Jabberwock. "I'm talking about that Superior from Dryfe.”

“...Ohh.” The mention of that single person was more than enough for Cheshire. The Superior in question was more than capable of creating a monster that could catch Jabberwock’s eye.

“A part of me feels like Ray will get involved in thaat,” said Cheshire.

There was no basis for the cat’s assumption. One could write it off as standard intuition, but with the control AIs all having calculational capabilities that no human could match, it was difficult to call it “standard.”

Jabberwock wondered why Cheshire’s mutter had included the name of the player he’d been intrigued by just a moment ago, but chose not to react to it in any meaningful way.

The cat in question, on the other hand, became curious about something relating to its own murmur and chose to ask about it. “Oh, yeah. Thinking of Ray made me remember. Hey, Jabberwock.”

“Yes?”

“Remember the ‘Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda’ that he defeated recently?” said Cheshire. “What would’ve happened if it had reached completion? It died when it was only in its second form, so I’m kinda curious.”

I know it’s my own fault for telling Ray its weak point, but still, it thought.

In response...

“It would’ve been born.”

...Jabberwock said something far too concise.

“...Sorry, but I don’t get iit,” said Cheshire.

So concise, in fact, that not even an AI with inhuman calculational capabilities could make sense of it.

“Its final form was the creature that was supposed to be born based on the demon’s accumulated fighting experience,” elaborated Jabberwock.

“A separate unit?” asked Cheshire.

“No.” The UBM control AI shook his head. “It’s better to look at it this way: the ‘mother’ was only a cover, and the child that was supposed to be born was the true Gardranda. Sadly, it didn’t get a chance to reveal itself.”

Power left unused — a life and mind that had failed to be birthed. That was exact same thing that the silhouette in Ray’s dream — the non-mother Gardranda — had told him.

So that's why the demon's weak point was the stomaach, Cheshire thought and nodded to itself. "By the way, what kind of creature would it have been born aas?"

"If I recall correctly, the mother fought and ate primarily humans," said Jabberwock. "Thus, it's fair to assume that it would've been humanoid."

"It's also fair to assume that it won't get another chance at being born, riight?" Cheshire asked.

"Yes, indeed."

However, Jabberwock thought to himself, that might change depending on the final skill it received when it became an item.

There was a chance that the effect of the skill Ray had yet to unlock could give another chance to the creature that'd failed to be birthed. However, due to there not being any similar cases, Jabberwock concluded that it was highly unlikely.

"Now, if you'll excuse me, I have work to return to," he said.

"Sure, I have some tasks to do, tooo."

Jabberwock ended the conversation and faced a window displaying a stream of information.

Cheshire left his colleague's work area and went to do his own work.

◇◇◇

Paladin Ray Starling

[UBM, "Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise" was defeated]
[Selecting MVP]
[Ray Starling was selected as MVP]
[Ray Starling is presented with an MVP special reward — "Grudge-soaked Greaves, Gouz-Maise"]

"So that's done, huh...?" I murmured.

With Gouz-Maise's body disintegrating into particles of light and me receiving a message window similar to the one I'd gotten after defeating Gardranda, I could finally be relieved that I'd killed the abomination. However, my situation didn't allow it. After all, since Gouz-Maise was about forty meters tall, defeating it from the head had left me to fall the entire way down.

Not to mention that I couldn't move my body, either.

To win this fight, I'd used a downright insane method of activating Like a Flag Flying the Reversal. Thanks to the debuffs I'd received getting turned into buffs, I had become more powerful than I was at my best, and had been able to emerge victorious against the abomination. However, just like it had been with Gardranda, the switching of weapons or the defeat of the enemy, Gouz-Maise, had caused the skill to get canceled. Thus, I was left burdened with a number of debuffs. My status window displayed Poison, Weakness, and Intoxication — the three effects of Hellish Miasma — along with Curse and Food Poisoning, which I'd most likely gotten for ingesting Gouz-Maise's flesh.

Well, I ate a part of a goddamn undead's body, so I can't really be surprised, I thought.

Moments after I canceled the Reversal by switching Nemesis to her sword form, I was able to move my body long enough to activate Vengeance is Mine, but the debuffs had gotten worse since then. I could no longer move so much as a muscle.

As things were, I was seconds away from crashing to the ground, and I would be able to do nothing to break my fall. With my current HP and the general state of my body, it was highly questionable if I could survive the hit.

"Better say my prayers, then..." I murmured.

A moment after I closed my eyes and braced myself for impact, I felt the touch of something unnaturally light.

The sensation repeated a couple of times. After the gentle swaying, I felt my body land on the ground.

I was thoroughly confused.

Fearfully, I opened my eyes and saw a shining artificial horse, Silver, standing at my side. Just like the first time I'd fallen off of him, he was looking down at me, seemingly worried.

It was apparent that Silver had gently caught me as I'd fallen and softly dropped me to the ground. I had no idea how he'd done it with his equestrian frame, but there was no other explanation.

"Ha ha," I laughed. "Thanks, Silver."

Not being an animal, he had no mouth and thus couldn't make any natural sounds, so he responded to my gratitude by simply rubbing the end of his “nose” on my cheek. That action made him seem much like a real horse.

With how he’d helped me chase down the Lich, it was safe to say that Silver had been an invaluable asset in this event. And if I hadn’t had the Miasmaflame Bracers and hadn’t seen that dream, there would have been a large chance of me losing this fight. However, there was someone who’d done more to help me than anyone else.

“Thanks, Nemesis,” I said. “If you hadn’t persisted like you did, it would’ve all been over for us.”

If I hadn’t had Nemesis and she hadn’t bought the time I’d needed to regain my consciousness, I’d have been given the death penalty, and that pile of corpses would’ve been free to attack someone else. Nemesis was the sole reason why that hadn’t happened, so I expressed my thanks.

However, all I got in response was peaceful, systematic breathing. Before I knew it, she’d disappeared from my weapon equipment slot, returned to her humanoid form, and had fallen fast asleep. It reminded me of a similar moment back in the dragon carriage after the battle with Gardranda.

The peace in her expression felt like the ultimate proof of the hard work she’d done today.

“Well done... Nemesis.” I touched her with my left hand, causing her to instantly return to the crest.

Left alone and unable to move, I kept my HP up by casting healing magic on myself, and looked through my items to find a way how to neutralize the status effects. The misadventure from today’s morning had made me learn my lesson, so I’d prepared for the three Hellish Miasma debuffs by buying the appropriate items when shopping.

After taking those, I lessened the effects of Food Poisoning by vomiting a few times, and made it go away completely by following that up with a swig of the right medicine.

The last status effect — Curse — went away by itself as I was busy taking care of the others.

Since I hadn’t gotten attacked at all while doing any of that, I assumed that Gouz-Maise’s rampage had probably caused all the local monsters to scatter, letting me completely heal myself and remove the debuffs completely unbothered.

Even though my status screen now said that I was in perfect shape, I certainly didn't feel like it. The entire time interval from the moment I'd infiltrated the fortress until I'd ended the battle with Gouz-Maise had been a great drain on my mental and physical energy. My HP might've been at 100%, but I wasn't confident if I could wring up even 60% of my usual performance. Not to mention that Nemesis was in no state to fight, either.

Anyway, it was as good a time as any to check out the MVP special reward I'd gotten from Gouz-Maise.

As it said in the name, the "Grudge-soaked Greaves" were a pair of boots made of a malicious-looking purple metal and some leather — hopefully not human leather — and its description in the window went like so:

[Grudge-soaked Greaves, Gouz-Maise]
[Epic Item]
An epic item embodying the concepts surrounding the ox-headed horse-man clad in grudge.
In addition to converting surrounding negative emotions into pure power, it grants the wearer an understanding of the unity between man and horse.
[This item cannot be transferred or traded.]

"'Epic Item'?" Those were the first words that escaped my lips once I saw the status screen.

Given that the Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda was a "Legendary Item," I was now curious about what kind of difference those descriptions referred to.

I looked through the help window and found a section on "MVP special reward ranks." I couldn't recall it being there the last time I checked over this general area of help sections, so I could only assume that it had appeared there only recently. If I had to guess, it had probably appeared there after I'd acquired the Miasmaflame Bracers.

As for the content of the help section, it said that UBMs and the MVP special rewards received upon defeating them had several ranks. Those ranks were primarily decided based on the UBM's strength and threat level, and from lowest to highest, they went like so: Epic, Legendary, Ancient Legendary, Mythical, and Superior.

Though I'd gotten stronger since my battle with the demon, I still felt that Gouz-Maise had been more challenging than Gardranda. However, the rank on the Miasmaflame Bracers was above that of the new special reward.

The stat bonuses reflected that, as well. While the Grudge-soaked Greaves increased my AGI by 30%, Miasmaflame Bracers increased my STR by 100%. Clearly, Gardranda had been above Gouz-Maise.

I felt that she herself might know something about this. After all, she'd called herself "a power left unused" and "the life and mind that the demon failed to birth."

With that in mind, I tried talking to the Miasmaflame Bracers on my hands, but I didn't get any sort of response.

That dream had been more than enough for me to confirm that her mind was still intact, but apparently, she had no means of talking to me in reality.

Suddenly, I was hit with the terrifying idea that Gouz-Maise, too, still had its mind. However, after a moment of consideration, I concluded that the greaves were completely devoid of any sort of consciousness. Though the assumption was based entirely on intuition alone, for one reason or another, I didn't feel that it was the least bit wrong.

If I had to add reasoning to this, I'd simply say that the boots simply lacked the grudge that had permeated every inch of everything relating to the creature known as Gouz-Maise.

With that settled, I began examining the two skills on the Greaves of Grudge.

The first was Grudge Conversion, which was a downgraded version of the grudge power that had fueled Gouz-Maise. It absorbed the grudge from the surroundings, stored it, and turned it into either SP or MP. Though I assumed it had been part of the monster's functionality, the skill didn't come with the Automatic Restoration ability.

...Upon further thought, I realized that having my lost limbs regrow would be downright freaky, so I was kinda glad it wasn't there.

The second skill — Rider and Horse, As One — was clearly based on the fact that Gouz-Maise had been a horse-man. It increased the Horse Riding skill level by one.

Wait...

Increased the Horse Riding skill level by one.

"I can finally ride Silver!" Overcome with emotion, I shouted out my joy.

This is great, I thought.

It was exactly what I needed to no longer have to ride Silver like I was performing some circus act.

The skill also increased AGI while riding a horse by 10% for every Horse Riding skill level. That was pretty good, too... in fact, that was probably the primary effect of the skill. However, since I hadn't even been able to begin to ride, I appreciated the bonus effect far more.

With that, I got on Silver and began following the road which Hugo and Cyco had used to get to Gideon. I rode the mechanical horse as its hooves rhythmically hit the ground, and I couldn't help but be moved by the fact that I wasn't falling off.

Feeling exceedingly comfortable, I relaxed and head towards Gideon as I let Silver canter as he pleased.

I hope I can run into Hugo along the way, I thought.

More than an hour after equipping the Grudge-soaked Greaves, Silver and I were still on a mountain road.

"Are we there yet...?" I asked no one in particular.

During this time, my Horse Riding skill had already increased by one, and I'd gotten a message saying that the quest "Rescue Roddie Lancarse" was complete. It seemed safe to believe that Hugo had arrived at Gideon and handed the children over to the quest giver girl and the parents. I, too, wished I was in Gideon with them.

"I honestly think we should be close by now," I said. The uncertainty in my tone was due to the fact that I wasn't sure if the road I was following was the correct one.

When going from Gideon to the Gouz-Maise hideout, we had used a Magingear, and — to avoid getting spotted — traversed a path where we wouldn't meet any people. Now, however, I was following a mountain road that was well-maintained enough to not have a single blade of grass growing out of it. When taking my and Silver's comfort into consideration, this path was far better than the former, but it wasn't without its problems, either.

The Cruella Mountain Belt was a net of many roads of various sizes.

According to the area's description in the help window, while some of them had been made on the kingdom's or Gideon's orders, many had been randomly created by the local gangs.

With all the magic in this fantasy world, road-related public works weren't a hard task. There were even spells that allowed the caster to make vegetation simply move away, so it might've even been easier than using heavy machinery.

Due to that, there were countless roads, which made it difficult for me — a person with no knowledge of the lay of the land — to find my way back. Since I hadn't gotten to the hideout by taking these mountain paths, my map didn't display which one led to Gideon, and thus didn't help with the pathfinding all that much.

However, since I knew the approximate location of the city, I could make good use of the map window's cardinal directions. With that as my compass, I was able to make my way to where I thought Gideon was.

Considering our speed and the amount of time that had passed, the city should've — at very least — been in sight by now...

"Oh." Just as I thought that, I noticed Gideon's outline peeking through the spaces between the trees.

Since we were still on the mountain, I got to look down at it from a particularly high point. Though it was already turning dark, the city was emitting lots of light, making it obvious that its people were still full of energy.

"Hm?" I murmured.

A certain sound reached my ears. It was the sound of hooves hitting the ground beneath — something I'd grown familiar with throughout today. Except this time, there were many such sounds, and their sources all seemed to be in one group. Not only that — they seemed to be getting closer to me.

"What?"

As I imagined the unlikely and, frankly, silly scenario in which I was being chased by a group of horse-men Liches, the sound suddenly mixed with the sound of metal armor fittings scraping against each other. Soon enough, I saw a group of horses being ridden by people in full plate armor.

It was a highly familiar group — Liliana's Knights of the Royal Guard.

"Hello, Liliana," I said. "We sure see each other a lot to—"

"Ray!" she exclaimed before I could finish. "Are you all right?!"

"...day?" Okay now, why is she looking at me so intensely? I thought. And why are her knights turning all alert and battle-ready? Might I get an explanation?

"Where is the giant undead?!" she continued. "Were you able to escape it?! Or is it still nearby?!"

...Oh, okay, I get it now.

I first explained Liliana that there was no need to worry, and went on to have an exchange of information with her. She gave me a detailed explanation of what had happened on her end.

After we'd split up at the sweets café, Liliana had gone on to continue her search for the second princess, but come evening, she had received a grim piece of information. One of her people had told her that "The second princess seems to have been kidnapped by a suspicious individual."

Liliana had been aware of the vile deeds committed by the Gouz-Maise Gang, and had concluded that it was entirely possible that the second princess had become another one of their victims.

However, Gouz-Maise Gang's hideout had been in the mountain belt that acted as the border between the kingdom and Caldina. Moving out with larger groups of soldiers could've been seen as an act of war.

That was why Liliana had formed a party comprised only of the best of the best of the Royal Guard, and planned a raid rescue mission to the Gouz-Maise Gang's hideout.

The moment they had prepared themselves and began heading out, two carriages had entered Gideon.

Due to it being late, the speed at which they'd entered had made them stand out. Once Liliana had asked them to state their identity and business, the coachman, a Master, had told them something that was nothing short of surprising.

He had said, "I am a Master who accepted the request of one of this city's citizens to rescue a kidnapped boy. We exterminated the gang and brought back all the children that were still alive. However, as we did that, some strange sorcery made the corpses of the gang merge into a giant undead UBM. We were able to escape using the carriages, but my fellow Master is still holding the beast off somewhere in the mountain belt."

The story had been so absurd that some knights simply hadn't believed it. However, a knight with the Truth Discernment skill had concluded that the Master wasn't lying. Not to mention that the requester — who'd been waiting for them by the gates — had confirmed that it was all true.

The shift from a kidnapping event to a UBM assault had made their situation turn quite chaotic. Also, Liliana had gone on to ask for the name of the Master holding back the UBM, causing her to find out that it was someone she was highly familiar with — me.

She had hastily departed the moment she'd found that out. The knights that had been supposed to join her in the rescue operation had gone after her. Some time after that, they'd run into me, still on edge and ready to face the UBM.

"I see," I said. "So Hugo safely got the children to the city. What a relief."

I'd known it from the message I'd received, but now that I'd been told the circumstances surrounding it, I could be certain that there was no need for worry.

"What do you mean, 'What a relief?!'" Liliana exclaimed. "What happened to the UBM?!"

"I defeated it," I curtly answered.

"Oh, I see, so you... you defeated it?!"

"Here." I showed her my boots and opened their informational window.

"...Ray, if I am not mistaken, you became a Paladin about a week ago and were only level 0 before that, correct?" she asked.

"That seems about right," I said. Time went thrice as fast here, after all.

"Why are you able to defeat an UBM a mere week after starting?! Also, I just realized, but those bracers are...!"

"Oh. Yes. I got these the day before yesterday..." Saying that, I showed her the Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda.

Liliana froze solid.

"The scale of what they're talking about is just ludicrous," muttered one of the knights to the others. "The only person I know who can defeat a UBM by his lonesome is our late commander."

"You need to be kind of insane to even attempt it, honestly," said another.

"This is just off. Our vice commander is forced to act out the 'straight man' type of character," commented the third knight. "I mean, she's normally the ‘natural airhead’ type, isn’t she?”

“Hhaahh...” sighed Liliana. “Truly, common sense does not apply to you Masters.”

“Well, it’s not like I won just because of my own abilities,” I said. “I had my comrades, lady luck, this horse named Silver, and Nemesis with me.”

“Speaking of Nemesis, where is she now?” Lilliana asked.

“She’s currently resting,” I said. “The things she had to do left her completely drained.”

I unequipped the Miasmaflame Bracers and gently rubbed the crest on my left hand, where Nemesis was sleeping.

“Ray... Nemesis...” Liliana spoke again. “I cannot express how valuable your actions are. Because of you, the awful series of kidnappings in Gideon are over and the UBM disaster was prevented. I believe I speak for all the people of the city when I give you my gratitude. Thank you very much.”

“Well...” I had trouble reacting to that. “It just happened to turn out this way, for some reason.”

I had accepted a quest, gone to save a child, gotten mentally overwhelmed by the tragic sight in the dungeon, let my fury drive me into killing the Lich, and gone on to struggle against the Revenant Ox-Horse. Seriously, I was completely confused as to why things had turned out this way.

Thinking back on it, there had been events which got me all choked up. I’d felt both deathly dread and disgust. My heart had burned with a fire strong enough to sear my very being.

However, once I’d found out that the children had all returned to the city, safe and sound, the aftertaste of this whole event had become a bit better.

Once we were done with the information exchange, we grouped up and made our way back to Gideon.

Since there was no need to worry about any UBM attacks, Liliana and her knights decided to accompany me. Apparently, she’d noticed how tired I was and had chosen to see to it that I returned to Gideon safely. I highly appreciated that.

“...Ah.”

Suddenly, a certain question went through my mind.

“By the way, what happened with the search for Her Highness the princess?" I asked. "I appreciate your company, but shouldn't you be focusing on that, instead...?"

My questions made Liliana's expression turn stiff. At the same time, I felt a strong air of nervousness envelop the other knights.

D-Did I say something bad? I thought.

"Based on what you told me, Her Highness was kidnapped by the gang, right?" I continued. "I didn't get a chance to take a look at the faces of the children in the carriages, so..."

"Her Highness wasn't in the carriages." Liliana's voice as she said that seemed somewhat... flat.

"Does that mean that...?" I asked slowly.

Are there actually more gang members? Did they take her to some other area in the mountains...?

"The kidnapping itself was misinformation," she said. "A short while ago, one of our people contacted me via communication magic and told me that she'd returned home, safe and sound."

"That's grea—"

"I was also told that she was carrying a store-bought mask, sweets, a goldfish, and a painting. She looked thoroughly satisfied."

"I... uh..."

"The one thing she said to the people of the place she is staying at was, 'It was most riveting!'"

I was dumbfounded.

...Your Highness, could you please read the mood? I thought. These people spent the entire day searching for you.

Though the way she'd explained the situation to me was highly smooth and matter-of-fact, I could see Lilliana's forehead twitching in anger.

"Eheheheheheheheheh..." she laughed ominously.

"A-Ahahahahahahah..." I reluctantly joined her.

"Eheheheheheheheheh... Let us change the subject."

"Good idea."

Both the mood of the situation and my very instincts told me that delving into this was a bad idea.

We switched to doing some idle chatter and continued following the road towards Gideon.

◇

When we finally reached the city, I couldn't help but notice that its atmosphere was exactly the same as it had been back when I'd entered it for the first time. One of Liliana's fellow knights used a communication magic skill to inform the guards about the defeat of the Epic-rank UBM — Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise — causing them to no longer stand on alert.

Once we passed the gates, I looked around, but Hugo and Cyco were nowhere in sight.

"Liliana, there's something I'd like to ask you," I spoke up. "Have you seen Hugo...? He's my comrade. The guy who brought the carriages with the children here."

"Do forgive me," she said. "I ran out the second he told me of the situation. Give me a moment to ask about him."

After saying that, Liliana began speaking to the guards stationed around the gates.

A moment later, one of them took a step forward. "After explaining the situation and handing the children over to us, the person in question said, 'I must return to the other side' and vanished."

Vanished? I asked myself. What did he mean by "other side"? Dryfe? No...

"So he logged out, huh?" I said. He'd probably done it to avoid getting questions he wasn't allowed to answer. The guy hadn't gotten cuffed or anything, so he would have been able to go offline with no problem.

I wonder if I'll meet him again tomorrow, I thought.

"Also, he gave me this," said the guard and handed me a letter.

"Thank you." I opened it and instantly realized that it was a message he'd left for me.

"Dear Ray Starling. I leave this message to you just in case you choose to stay in this world and either return here safe and sound or your death penalty expires.

First of all, I would like to thank you. Without you, I couldn't have brought the children back to their parents or the lady we'd met in that alley.

You will likely be offered many rewards for acts such as defeating the Gouz-Maise Gang, and you can rest assured that it all belongs to you. I have no need for any of it. In fact, I’m incapable of taking any rewards from the kingdom’s public institutions.

It hasn’t been long since we’ve met, but I believe I have a good grasp of what kind of person you are. You will most likely hesitate to accept what you’re offered. However, with you having been the only one capable of doing it, you must be the one to take the rewards.

Also, you can rest easy knowing that I have already received my prize. My rewards were lady Rebecca’s smile and the tears of joy that she shed when I brought her little brother to her.

That was more than enough for me.

If you still feel apprehensive about it, you can pay me back by treating me to lunch the next time we meet.

Please excuse the fact that it’s in written form, but this is my goodbye to you.

Farewell. I hope we meet again. Au revoir. À bientôt.

The machine knight of ice and roses, Hugo Lesseps.”

I was speechless.

In case I choose to stay in this world, huh? I thought. I...

“Umm... Ray?” As I got lost in thought, Liliana looked at me with worry in her eyes.

“Are you sure you are feeling well?” she asked.

“Oh, sorry about that,” I said. “I’m quite fine, thank you.”

“Well, if you say so... Anyway, since you have defeated the Gouz-Maise Gang, please take some time within the next few days to report it to the Adventurers’ Guild and the knight offices. The Adventurers’ Guild is for the bounties, while the knights need to know about the elimination of a criminal organization.”

“I see. Thank you.”

“The day is getting late now, and I believe you are exhausted beyond belief, so please go have some well-deserved rest,” she said.

“I really should,” I agreed. “It’s been a really long day, after all. What will you do, Liliana?”

“I will go back to protecting Her Highness.”

“...Clearly, I’m not the only one here who deserves to be thanked for all their efforts."

"Oh, there's no need, eheheh..."

"All right, I will take my leave now," I said.

"Feel free to," she said. "Let us meet again."

With that, Liliana and I parted ways.

Still logged in, I went on to take a nap in one of Gideon's inns. Once I let myself fall on the bed, all the events of the day flashed through my mind. However, due to how exhausted I was, the sandman took me before I could think about any of it.

This time, I didn't have any dreams.

◇

The next morning, I woke up surprisingly early.

There was no sunlight flowing through the window and the sky outside only looked mildly bright, so it was probably before dawn. I placed my hand on my head and instantly found that the dog ears that had tortured me throughout all of yesterday were gone. With me spending the night in-game, they'd likely gone away due to the time limit.

"Have you awoken, Ray?" a voice asked.

I looked to where I'd heard the voice — the side opposite to the window. There, I saw Nemesis, who was sitting in a chair and looking at me.

"Morning, Nemesis," I greeted her.

"Good morning, Ray," she responded.

After that, we both just wordlessly looked at one another.

Eventually, I broke the silence and invited Nemesis for a walk. I took her to the plains right beyond Gideon's northern gates. With it being my third time here, the area was already becoming familiar to me.

Nemesis and I were speeding through it while riding Silver. I held the reins and controlled the steed while Nemesis sat behind and held onto me by my waist.

"This is truly pleasant," said Nemesis.

"Sure is," I agreed.

As I had such meaningless exchanges with Nemesis, I continued making Silver gallop through the plains. After about thirty minutes had passed, I saw the sun begin to show itself from behind the eastern mountains.

"Will you leave this world?" That was when Nemesis asked me that question.

I said nothing. She was referring to what I had been considering back in the fortress' basement.

If I processed Infinite Dendrogram the same way I did reality, it was questionable whether staying in a world so filled with death would be a good thing for me. The sight of the corpses of children I didn't even know had been enough to make me feel as though my heart had been gouged out. If they were people I was familiar with, like Liliana or Milianne, it would probably hurt me as much as a loss of a friend in reality.

However...

"There's more to this world than just loss," I said.

If I hadn't started Infinite Dendrogram*, I would've never met the sisters, Rook, Marie, Hugo, Cyco and — of course — you, Nemesis. I simply couldn't have come to know any of them if I'd only stayed there, and Nemesis wouldn't even have been born.*

"You are aware that you might go through something painful again, no?" she said.

Of course I am, I thought. You're completely right about that. Events like what we went through yesterday are probably a daily occurrence here. But still...

"If something that would leave a bad taste in my mouth starts happening before me... I'll just stop it," I said.

This time, it had been all over by the time I'd gotten there. However, if I was ever in the right place at the right time, I would do everything I could to prevent such a tragedy. After all, the possibility leading to the desired future was there, as long as you didn't give up.

"I would give my all to grab hold of the possibility," I said.

"I see," Nemesis spoke from behind me. "I feel like you are shouldering far more than you should, but I cannot say that this is unlike you. Yes — you should fight to protect. And while you do that..."

Still behind me, Nemesis gently patted me on the head.

The softness of the hand made me turn around.

"...I will be the one protecting you."

Nemesis, covered in morning light, gave me the most gentle smile.

That expression made me face forward again and swing Silver's reins to make him canter ahead. For some reason, I had become bashful enough that I was unable to look at her face again. Still, I felt that I had to say something back to her.

“Thanks... Nemesis...” That was all that came out.

As she held onto me, I felt as though she smiled once again.

After that, neither of us said anything more.

Still on Silver’s back, we dashed through the fields as we let that gentle morning of smiles embrace us.

Conjunction Episode: The Night Before

The surroundings of the east gate of Gideon, the city of duels

Midnight.

The day when Ray had fought and prevailed against the Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise had reached its end.

The surroundings of the east gate of Gideon — which were completely devoid of people with the exception of the few guards on their night shifts — were suddenly intruded by the appearance of a pair of people emitting a faint light.

One of them was a man clad in a military uniform reminiscent of a pilot suit — Hugo Lesseps, High Pilot of the Dryfe Imperium. Next to him was his Embryo, Cocytus.

After the last event, Hugo had logged out to avoid further questioning from the kingdom, and had now logged back in again after waiting for the right time.

After logging in, the two of them quickly walked away from the gate, entered a small alleyway, and began waiting for something. Less than a minute passed until someone came.

It wasn't a drunkard or some hoodlum.

Instead, it was a person wearing a penguin suit.

It was the very same penguin that had appeared before Ray last morning, pronounced himself "Dr. Flamingo," and gotten rid of Ray's debuffs while also giving him a pair of dog ears.

"Kept ya waiting," said the penguin.

"Not at all," replied Hugo. "I spent most of the waiting time offline."

"You were pretty busy today, weren't ya? Took care of the gang that was troubling this town, eh?"

"You're aware?" Hugo asked.

"Indeed I am," said the penguin. "I was doing some wiretapping on Ray, you see."

"Wiretapping Ray? How?"

"Not telling. I've been listening on him like I would a radio drama, and boy, was it a good one. He's as much of a Maiden's Master as you are, Hugh." The penguin made his body sway and chuckled.

"Well, if you know what he was doing, there's something I'd like you to tell me..." said Hugo.

"Yep, he won," the penguin answered the question before it was even asked. "Victory is his. He actually solo'd a UBM."

"I see. That's good to know." Hugo wasn't lying when he said that. However, that sentiment was followed by thoughts that completely contradicted it.

If the UBM had given him the death penalty, we probably wouldn't have to face each other today. After all, a person so straightforward in nature will surely try to stop the plan. Wait, in the first place, should I really be taking an active part in a plan that Ray would try to stop?

Little by little, hesitation began to envelop Hugo's mind.

"So, Hugh, are you ready for tomorro— no, today's plan?" the penguin asked, as if it was fully aware of Hugo's inner struggle.

Hugo quickly held back the hesitation, and reported something. "The Marshall II was destroyed."

"I see," said the penguin. "Here's a Garage with a spare one, then. It's Marshall II Revised — an improved version of the Marshall II you were using before. Its defense and AGI are 30% higher. The fine-tuning is done, too."

The penguin reached into his inventory and took out a large, rolled up, metallic scroll much like the one Hugo had used in the afternoon.

"Thank you very much," Hugo said gratefully. "Oh, I just remembered this."

Hugo took out a bundle of papers from his inventory. It was the sorcery blueprint that he'd discovered in the hideout of the Gouz-Maise Gang.

"Oh yeah, the sorcery that created that UBM, eh?" said the penguin.

"Well, with the clan already having scrapped the grudge power plan, I think it's probably useless to us," Hugo commented.

"Well, you think right," said the penguin. "After all, we got help from the King of Tartarus for that one, so the sorcery of a high-rank tian is just a bit..."

"Leader?"

The penguin was looking down at the blueprint and silently examining the text. “I see... So just because it’s grudge, it doesn’t have to... This needs to be verified, though...”

After making some conclusions, the penguin put the blueprint into his inventory.

“Back to the matter at hand,” he said. “With that Garage I gave you, you are prepared to be the heart of this plan. Other preparations are just about complete, as well.”

The penguin began counting down his fingers to confirm what was done or not. Since the suit didn’t have any fingers fit for counting, he obviously did it with the human fingers inside.

“The deployment of Castling and the gadgets is done. The arrangements to allow us to influence the device are done. The club, Veldorbell, has been taking root there for a few days now. And of course, my — the diamond’s — preparations are done... or so I’d like to say. But there’s something I still have to do. Well, it’s not like I won’t make it in time for the plan.”

Adding the names of playing card suits here and there, the penguin shared info with Hugo.

Though it seemed like some sort of coding, it was far simpler than that. When creating plans, the penguin simply had a habit of giving the codenames based on card suits to those who had important roles.

“The only real cause of worry here is whether the imperator’s joker is actually gonna do her job or not, but it all depends on luck,” said the penguin. “Still, she’ll probably act as long as our sources are correct and the first princess actually comes.”

“Umm, what’s this plan’s spade?” Hugo realized that that suit hadn’t been mentioned, and decided to ask about it.

That was because, whenever using suits as codenames, the penguin always gave spade to either the trump card or the most destructive role in his plan.

The penguin’s answer was simple. “Ah, well... I don’t have one. No spade this time.”

It seemed as though he was hiding something, but Hugo didn’t bother to doubt him.

“But man, am I glad. The event is actually happening.” As if to change to subject, the penguin nodded and continued talking. “Seriously, I can’t be more glad. I have no clue what retard was responsible for it, but the blockade caused by the PK happening almost ruined the event and our plan with it."

The PK happening. That was the event in which three player-killing clans and the Superior Killer had created a blockade in the four newbie hunting grounds around the capital. Though the kingdom's four Superiors had taken care of the problem, it had already affected the kingdom's overall power.

On the internet, it was rumored that it had been done by the imperium, which was on the verge of war with the kingdom. However, the penguin knew better than everyone that it wasn't true.

"Who do you think was responsible for that?" asked Hugo.

"No clue," curtly answered the penguin. "They went about it so well that they didn't leave any proof behind. Though the PKs were rewarded with pretty nice sums of money. And besides our country, there weren't many groups that relied on using coinage like that."

"Caldina, then?" asked Hugo.

Caldina, the commercial city-state union.

It was a mercantile country that covered the entire desert in the center of the continent and claimed that the presence or lack of money was everything.

Its national characteristic was that people there could get special products from all the other countries — albeit for large sums of money. Due to that, many high-end players had moved there, causing it to become the strongest country in terms of the amount of Masters.

"For what purpose did they do it?" asked Hugo.

"Well, I think there's more to it than just sullying the imperium's reputation," answered the penguin. "That place has both tians and Superiors that really know how to use their heads. They could have just used Sefirot — their pride and joy — yet instead they messed around with these indirect methods. What a pain."

Sefirot was the name of the top clan in the commercial city-state union of Caldina. Though it was only a mere ten members strong, a whole nine of them were Superiors.

Among those nine were The Earth AKA the "Magically Strongest," King of Termination AKA the "Seven Death Transformation," God Hunter

AKA the “Multifariously Invincible,” and Ace AKA the “Blue Sky Songstress,” all of whom were famous for their battle prowess.

Because of that, Sefirot was considered to be the strongest clan in all of Infinite Dendrogram.

“What is the likelihood of Sefirot showing up while the plan is commencing?” asked Hugo.

“I’m pretty sure they’re unaware of it,” said the penguin. “After all, if the plan is successful, it’s likely that the kingdom will give up before the war even happens. It’s like the imperium’s decisive blow. If they knew about it, they would’ve already done something.”

After saying that, the penguin began to consider.

“However, there’s a chance that one or few of them came to see the event... The Clash of Superiors. If that happens, I’ll just have to wreck their shit with the spade.”

The penguin’s words made Hugo begin to ponder.

Upon seeing that, the penguin talked to him with a gentle tone. “No need to overthink it, Hugo. If this goes well, the war will end with only minimal casualties.”

“Minimal?” asked Hugo.

“Indeed. His Excellency the General(lel) wants an all-out war, but that would be a waste of all kinds of resources. Such things are best handled in ways that are both smart and exciting.” Saying that, the penguin removed his suit. At the same time, he reached into his inventory, took out a lab coat, and put it on.

The result was a lean, spectacled man clad in a lab coat. He extended his hands to the sides and made a sonorous declaration.

“Tomorrow, we — The Triangle of Wisdom — will put a decisive end to the war between the imperium and the kingdom.”

To be continued next episode...

Afterword

Bear: “Heyo! Time fur another afterword! (Been awhile since the last one.)”

Cat: “And so, volume 2 was able come out without any probleems.”

Bear: “This is all thanks to the readers who bought volume 1, the stores that sold it...”

Cat: “...the editors, and Taiki and all the wonderful illustrations he drew!”

Bear: “Now, you might be aware of this, but a lot has happened between the releases of volume 1 and volume 2.”

Cat: “First, there was the great Dendro festival on Twitterr!”

Bear: “It had all this unbearably good Dendro art drawn by a whole fifty illustrators!”

Cat: “You can go and check it out in the gallery of the official Dendro siite!”

Bear: “Also, it was announced that Dendro is getting a manga adaptation.”

Cat: “The one working on it is none other than Kami Imai of Needless faame.”

Cat: “Though that still wasn’t revealed at the time this afterword was written.”

Cat: “However, when volume 2 comes out, the first chapter should already be ouut.”

Bear: “It’s highly recommended that readers of these novels get their paws on that!”

Cat: “Search for it on Comic Firee!”

Bear: “Now, a word from our author.”

Hello, this is Sakon Kaidou.

First of all, I would like to thank you getting your hands on Infinite Dendrogram volume 2.

Because of everyone involved and the audience, volume 1 sold well and we were able to release volume 2 into the world without much trouble, and I couldn’t be more grateful for that.

Now, as you might be aware, the first volume had some typos and mistakes (in the Japanese release) which — unlike with webnovel uploads — couldn’t be fixed after they were done. That made me painfully aware of my own lack of experience.

Releasing books into the world and having an audience buy them involved a level of responsibility completely unlike that of a webnovel author. I will try to become familiar with it and continue publishing Infinite Dendrogram to the best of my ability.

With that settled, it's planned that in the upcoming volumes 3 and 4, you'll be presented with the climax of the first part of Infinite Dendrogram.

New characters, a great event in the city of duels, Superiors making their moves, and the first clash between Ray and a certain person who's been involved with him since the very beginning.

I would be a very happy author if you, the readers of volume 2, became reasonably excited for what's to come.

Thank you once again, and I hope this continues.

Sakon Kaidou

Cat: "...I suuure hope volume 2 doesn't have any typos."

Bear: "Well, according to head editor K, 'typos happen.'"

Cat: "And with that, it's time to end volume 2's afterwoord."

Bear: "It was brought to you by Brother Bear the bear..."

Cat: "...and Cheshire the caat!"

Bear: "Volume 3 is set to come out this year, so bear with us until then!"

Cat: "...It would be pretty surprising if it doesn't come out in 2017, right?"

Bear: "I-I'm sure it'll come out just fine."

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 3 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 2
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2017 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2017 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2017 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2017 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: August 2017

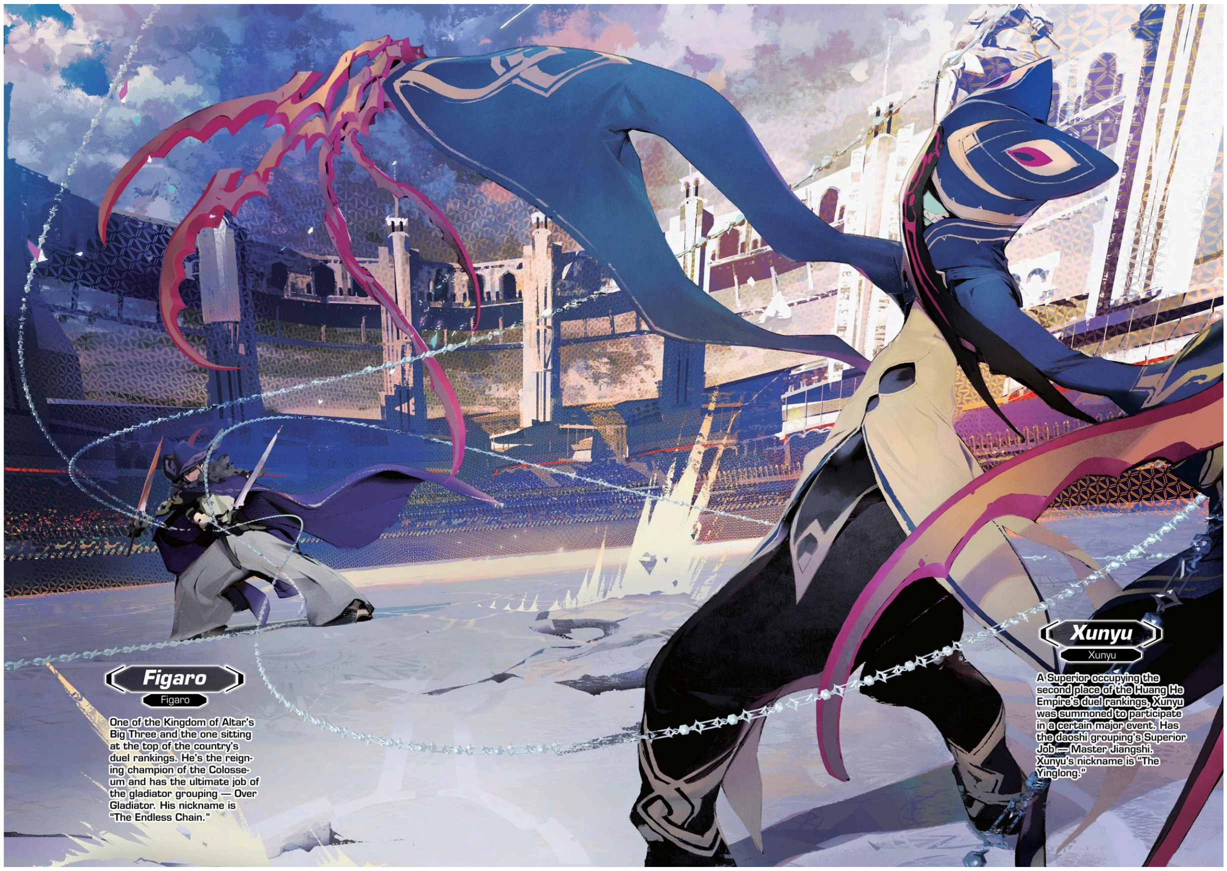
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
3. Clash of the Superiors

Infinite Dendrogram

3. Clash of the Superiors

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



Figaro

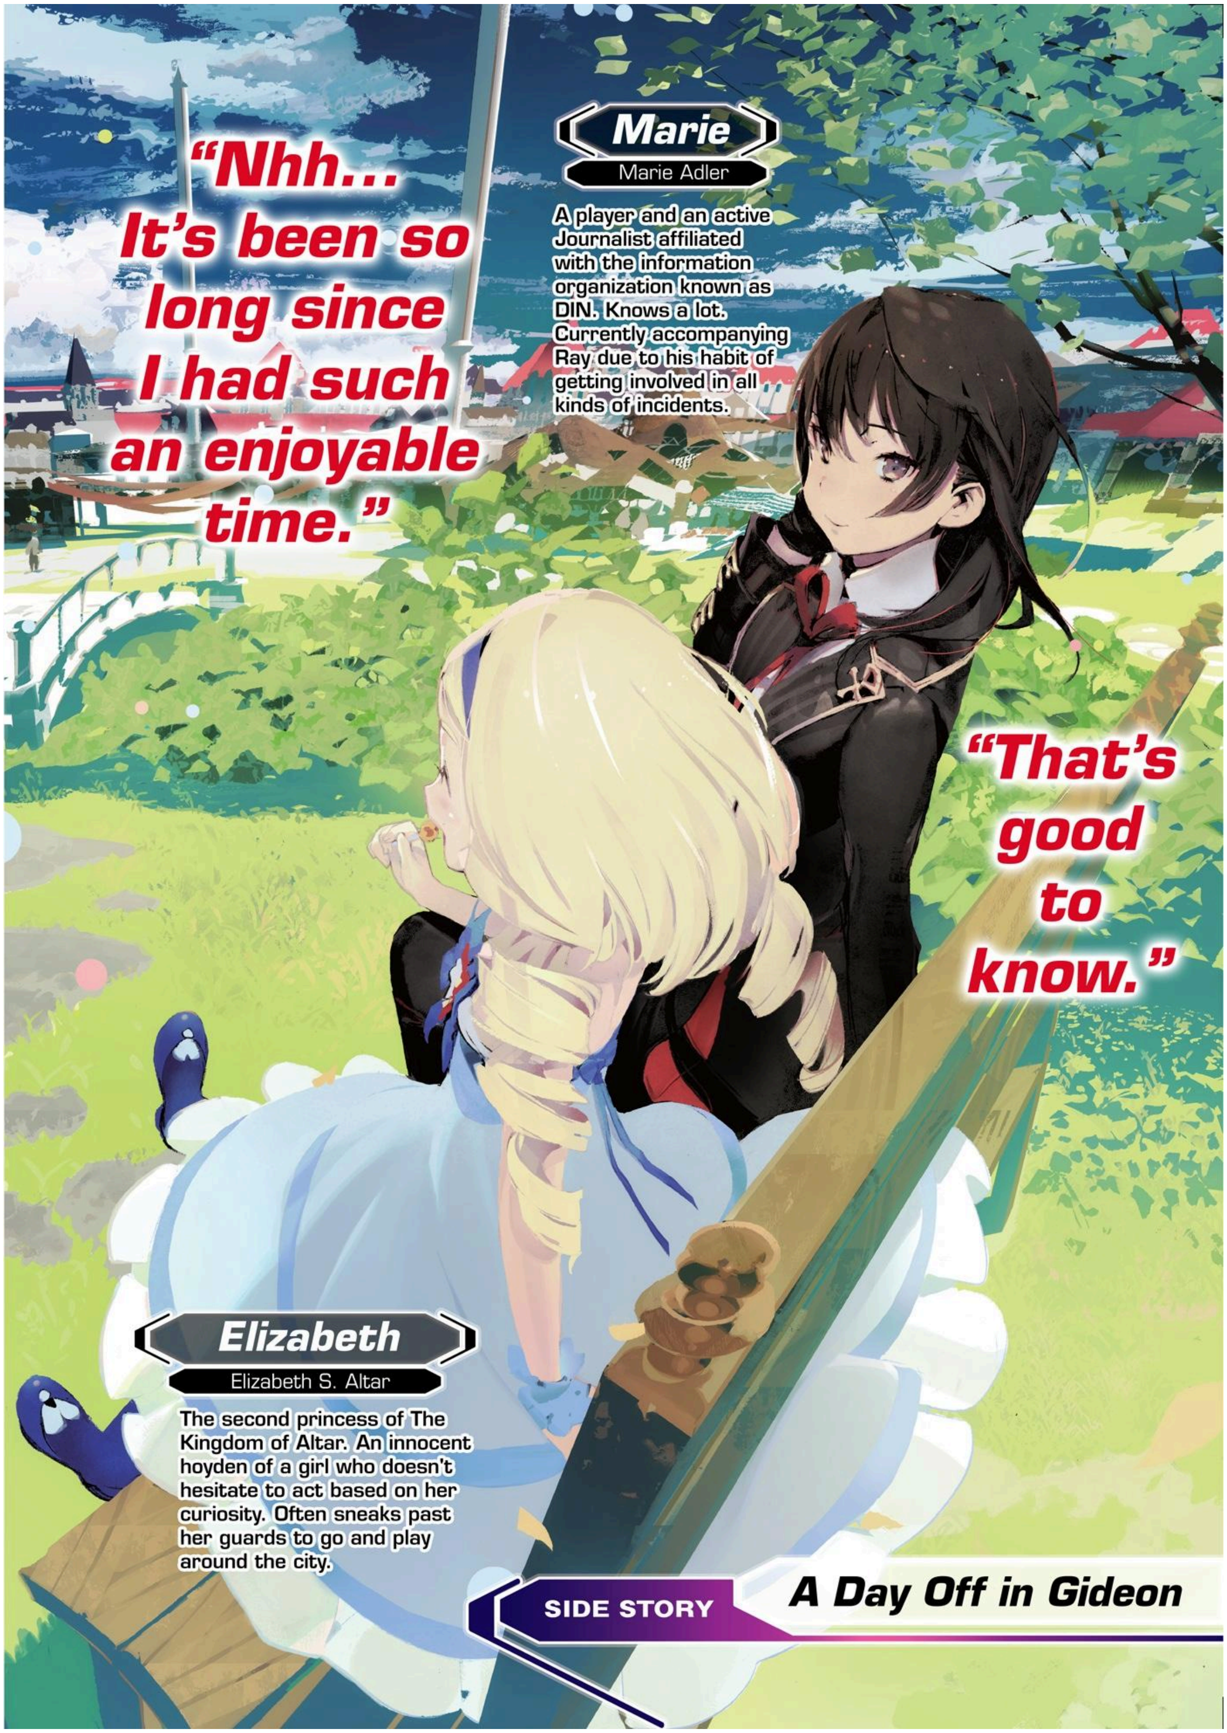
Figaro

One of the Kingdom of Altar's Big Three and the one sitting at the top of the country's duel rankings. He's the reigning champion of the Colosseum and has the ultimate job of the gladiator grouping — Over Gladiator. His nickname is "The Endless Chain."

Xunyu

Xunyu

A Superior occupying the second place of the Huang He Empire's duel rankings, Xunyu was summoned to participate in a certain major event. Has the daoshi grouping's Superior Job — Master Jiangshi. Xunyu's nickname is "The Yinglong."



"Nhh… It's been so long since I had such an enjoyable time."
"That's good to know."

Marie

Marie Adler

A player and an active Journalist affiliated with the information organization known as DIN. Knows a lot. Currently accompanying Ray due to his habit of getting involved in all kinds of incidents.

Elizabeth

Elizabeth S. Altar

The second princess of The Kingdom of Altar. An innocent hoyden of a girl who doesn't hesitate to act based on her curiosity. Often sneaks past her guards to go and play around the city.

SIDE STORY

A Day Off in Gideon

Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Prologue: One of the East’s Mightiest

Chapter One: Lectures and Reunions

Chapter Two: Catching up

Interlude: Before the Festival

Chapter Three: Xunyu the Yinglong

Chapter Four: The Clash of the Superiors

Conjunction Episode: The End of the Match, the Beginning of Madness

Midword

Side Story: The Case of the Untamable Slime

Side Story: A Day Off in Gideon — Noon

Side Story: A Day Off in Gideon — Night

Afterword
About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Prologue: One of the East’s Mightiest

Western Caldina, Valeira Desert — an area bordering the Kingdom of Altar

Before the break of dawn, a wind was blowing through a dimly-lit desert, gently shifting its sands. It was an east-bound sea breeze that came all the way from the western ocean, crossing the entire Kingdom of Altar in the process.

Caldina was a country of sands. 99% of it was desolate wastelands, while the remaining 1% contained oases.

A land so lacking — if not downright deadly — wasn’t a good environment for any country to thrive, but Caldina was located in the middle of the continent. It prospered due to being in the center of all transactions between the two eastern countries (Huang He and Tenchi) and the three western countries (the kingdom, the imperium, and the fairyland). But it was also abundant in underground resources, ores, and ruins full of various magic items. Any food problems it might’ve had due to lack of fertile land were easily fixed by trading such riches.

Caldina could be summed up with the words “sand,” “wealth,” and “trade.” The deserts that comprised its territory became a road that connected the east and the west, creating an immense flow of riches.

It was similar to what people of Earth had once called the “Silk Road.”

On one such road, there was a row of about ten sizeable dragon carriages, so called because they were drawn by Demi-Dragons.

From their design, it was obvious that the carriages had come from Huang He rather than Caldina. Though it was uncommon for the eastern country to make deliveries to the west without stopping in the desert country, it definitely wasn’t unheard of. However, there were two things about the carriages which many would find odd.

The first was the fact that each and every single one of them was flying the flag of Huang He. While some merchant dragon carriages bore patterns that indicated what country they belonged to, none of them ever hoisted a flag.

The second oddity wasn't with the carriages, but with the person sitting on the roof of the one carriage at the very back. The person was looking at the trails the wheels left on the road and the predawn desert scenery passing by. Enjoying the scenery, the person blew into the tobacco pipe-looking item at the edge of what passed for a mouth and continuously released soap bubbles into the wind.

If that had been the only notable thing, many would have passed off the person as merely "eccentric" rather than "odd." However, it wasn't any conduct that warranted such a description, but a matter of overall appearance.

The person's limbs were far too long. Though the long, daoshi-like clothing did a good job covering them, it did nothing to conceal their abnormal length.

The eccentric's total height was above four metels, and the legs made up more than half of it. They were reminiscent of the classic stilt-walkers you might see at a circus. However, the person's arms were inappropriately long, as well. There was more than length to them, though — the five "fingers" grasping the pipe looked more like thin, sword-like blades than anything else.

The arms were far too long and had to be bent in a peculiar way just to let the person keep the pipe in the mouth and blow into it as they enjoyed the passing scenery.

The state of the person's face was quite bizarre, as well. The hat they wore had a talisman attached to it, which hung downwards and hid the eccentric's visage. When combined with the daoshi clothes, it made the person look like a jiangshi from Chinese movies.

The palpably strange appearance made this person stand out from the rest of the world. At the same time, the person emitted a shapeless aura of intimidation that had nothing to do with what you could see with the naked eye, yet was definitely there for those who could feel it.

This eccentric was both abnormal and awe-inspiring enough to appear like a threat to the world just by the virtue of existing. Despite being so menacing, however, the person did nothing but silently enjoy the desert scenery and the bubbles floating in the wind.

"Master Xunyu!" Soon enough, someone called out to the jiangshi-like character by using that name.

The source of the voice was a boy who looked about ten years old. He was trying to get on the same roof Xunyu was sitting on. Since the dragon carriage had no ladder, the youngling found it to be a particularly hard task.

In fact, with the vehicle moving, him falling off was a perfectly plausible scenario.

Noticing that, Xunyu used one of those long arms to take the boy by the nape and pull him to the roof. And thus, the child got safely onto the same platform as the eccentric jiangshi. Though the fingers that held the boy were like blades, neither the boy's luxurious-looking clothing nor his frail skin were damaged in any way.

"Ah! Thank you very much, Master Xunyu!" he said.

"You sure are eaRly, Cang," the jiangshi replied.

Though Xunyu's intonation was peculiar, the boy referred to as "Cang" didn't seem to care about it and spoke his response with a smile. "Not as early as you, Master Xunyu."

"...Ya know, having you call me 'master' makes me feel pretty uncoMFOrtable."

The boy looked at the jiangshi with gleaming eyes, which made Xunyu exhale a heavy sigh and blow some more bubbles.

Cang's real name was "Canglong" — meaning "Azure Dragon." In the Huang He Empire, the only people allowed to bear names with references to the sort of dragons that Masters would refer to as "oriental" were the direct male descendants of the emperor, meaning that this Cang boy was of imperial blood. Specifically, he was the third child of the current emperor.

Indeed — the reason why these dragon carriages were so unlike those belonging to traders was because they were a mission escorting the empire's royalty to the kingdom.

"We're about to reach the boRDer," said Xunyu.

"Indeed we are, Master Xunyu!" said the boy with glee. "Speaking of which, have you visited the Kingdom of Altar before?"

"Can't say that I haVe, but the guy in the alien costu— the 'Spirit Turtle' or 'Linggui' or whatever he wants to be called — said that he's been there onCe."

"Master Gray α Centauri? What did he say about it?"

"...Apparently, and I quote, 'There was an interesting costume there.'"

“Costume?” The boy looked reasonably confused.

As they were having such exchanges, the row of dragon carriages eventually reached the border of the Kingdom of Altar.

The kingdom’s officials went through the necessary formalities to allow their entry into the country. They looked seriously tense through the entirety of it, while the two people on the roof seemed completely unaffected. The tenseness was present even among the empire’s own officials and chamberlains. It was obvious that they wanted to say something, but their reverence for Cang’s royal status and Xunyu in general made them hesitate.

Cang was an upfront boy brimming with curiosity. Due to that nature of his, he often addressed non-royalty in a highly nonchalant manner. However, not many of them replied the way Xunyu did. Most would turn humble and abase themselves, and considering the boy’s status, they were completely right to do so. Xunyu, however, was special — even among Masters — and thus was allowed to respond differently.

About an hour had passed since they had crossed the border between Caldina and Altar and begun traversing the Cruella Mountain Belt.

The kingdom’s people had already told them about the Gouz-Maise Gang that had their hideout in this area. They’d said that the group was led by a powerful undead-gladiator duo, and that — though they focused primarily on kidnappings — the possibility of them attacking dragon carriages wasn’t zero and suggested that they be on their guard.

The problem clearly wasn’t something that could be ignored just by upping their alertness, but the kingdom’s officials had said nothing more. Still, it hadn’t been negligence on their part. They simply hadn’t said anything more because “being on their guard” was more than enough for this group of carriages.

“...Something reeKs.” Xunyu suddenly spoke up while sniffing. “It’s not undead stench, thoUgh Cang, get down for a biT.”

“All right!” The boy listened to the jiangshi’s words and slid down prone on the carriage’s roof. A moment later, Xunyu’s long arm released a flash.

Two seconds after that, they both heard the sound of something sinking into the damp ground nearby.

Those with the appropriate knowledge would instantly know that the object was a rifle bullet.

Not saying a word, Xunyu glared through the talisman covering the visage that passed for a face and observed the rocky area several hundreds of metels away from them.

◆◆◆

Caldina was a land connecting the east and the west, creating an immense traffic of gold and other riches.

Also, with the encroaching possibility of the Kingdom of Altar's demise, many wealthy merchants had begun abandoning the country for the eastern nations and Caldina itself. Whether they were heading towards or out of the desert country, those going through the border always had treasure on them.

Due to that, many hungry wolves with a taste for wealth would bare their fangs at those passing the area.

"First bullet failed to land on the target. I'm sorry. It seems I missed."

In the rocky area Xunyu was looking at, a woman was lying down with a large, scoped rifle in her hands.

She wasn't alone, for over twenty other people were hiding in the rocks around her. Each had their weapons at the ready as they fixed their eyes on the dragon carriages several hundreds of metels ahead.

They were outlaws. That alone didn't make them special by any means, but this particular group all shared a certain feature.

On the backs of each of their left hands were unique crests. They marked the people as Masters — players of the game known as Infinite Dendrogram and immortal beings commanding special powers known as "Embryos."

The group's name was Goblin Street. It was the very same PK clan that had taken part in the blockade surrounding the Kingdom of Altar's royal capital, attacking anyone trying to go through the Wez Sea Route leading to the harbor town to the west of the city. That incident had been caused by someone who'd hired three PK clans and one solo player killer to do it. Though the four — Goblin Street, K&R, Mad Castle, and the Superior Killer — all focused on player killing, their motives were different.

Mad Castle's goal was to rob and exert dominance over other players while role-playing as villains.

K&R's goal was to hunt other players.

The Superior Killer acted as a hired hit man who gave players the death penalty according to people's requests.

And finally, Goblin Street was a band of bandits that attacked and robbed anyone.

During the blockade incident, the only one of the four areas where tians were harmed, robbed, and killed was the Wez Sea Route — the one handled by Goblin Street. Due to that, the clan was the only one of the four guilty entities that had gotten on the kingdom's wanted list.

In Infinite Dendrogram, murder and robbery between players wasn't considered a crime. That was because tian laws had no power over Master disputes.

However, the same couldn't be said about cases where Masters committed crimes against tians.

Just like criminal NPCs, such players were put on the country's wanted list, or — provided the crimes were severe enough — the wanted list of every country in the game.

If a Master's respawn points were all in countries that had them on the wanted lists, getting a death penalty would cause the player to respawn at the save point in the gaol.

That was the reason why Goblin Street's activities now took place near a border.

Once they had become unable to use the kingdom's save points due to being on the wanted list, one of the kingdom's Superiors — Lei-Lei the Prodigal of Feasts — had given the death penalty to everyone who was online at the time. Though some went on to respawn in other countries, many didn't have save points outside the kingdom and got sent to the gaol, causing about half of the clan's members to leave.

Obviously, the damage the group sustained was severe, and it wouldn't have been strange for it to have ceased its activities or split up altogether. In fact, that was exactly what happened to another clan that had taken part in the blockade: Mad Castle. Despite not being on the wanted list, the group had split up after they'd been annihilated by Figaro.

Goblin Street, on the other hand, had simply moved their save points to Caldina and still continued their hunt in the kingdom. They'd sneaked through the eastern border of the country and begun their activities once again. Due to how close the area was to Caldina, it was far more convenient than the Wez Sea Route from last time. In fact, the Cruella Mountain Belt was so good for bandits that even the infamous tian group, the Gouz-Maise Gang, had had their hideout here. Truly, finding a more bandit-friendly environment would be no small task.

Of course, with Goblin Street being a band of player killers and criminals, there was the possibility of them getting hunted down by adventurers or attacked by other nearby gangs such as the aforementioned Gouz-Maise Gang. However, Goblin Street wasn't the type of group to be afraid of such scenarios.

"Hey, what the hell?" one of them said. "Didn't you say that switching your job to Sharpshooter turned your effective range into 1,000 meters?"

"I seem to have miscalculated the carriage's movement speed," the woman replied. They were talking about the sniping that she'd attempted on the person on the dragon carriage. Everyone — including herself — thought that she'd missed.

No — not everyone. There was one exception.

"You're wrong there, Neeala. You didn't miss. The bullet just got deflected."

"What do you mean, boss?" she asked.

The man who had spoken up was young and had red hair. The upper half of his body was covered by a similarly-colored jacket that had lion mane trimming on it. However, while the red of his hair seemed natural, the crimson on his jacket made it seem as though it was merely showered in something of such a sanguine color.

"You shot a bullet, and that freak deflected it," he said. "There's nothing more to that."

"But that's impossible," replied the girl. "The bullet was faster than sound."

"I can do it, you know? And it just so happens that there's someone else who can," the red man said in a nonchalant manner.

His words caused a stir among those surrounding him. It wasn't caused by the claim that the boss himself could do it, but by the assertion that the opponent was capable of it, as well.

They believed and were well aware that their leader could deflect bullets. He was King of Burglary, Eldridge. Having the throne of the burglar grouping's Superior Job as his own, he was considered to be one of the kingdom's strongest player killers.

When his clan had been purged by the Superior, he had happened to be offline. Due to that, he'd survived the event completely unharmed. However, the members of Goblin Street were absolutely certain that not even a Superior could defeat their leader, and that things would've turned out differently if he'd been online back then.

In fact, Eldridge's strength was the sole reason why the clan still continued to function, despite being forced to change hunting grounds. The members were confident that Goblin Street would remain alive and well as long as they had him.

Eldridge looked at the group of dragon carriages hundreds of metels ahead.

"That freak probably has one of Huang He's Superior Jobs," he said. "We're not letting that stop us, though. I can handle that one by myself. You guys attack all the weaklings that come out once I'm done. That'll be enough."

He then opened his hands and extended them behind him. Soon enough, his palms were filled with power and murderous intent, making it seem as though he was drawing a bowstring to the absolute limit.

His muscles creaked as he closed and opened his hands. It was a subconscious, habitual action that was nothing but a show of his innate desire to grasp and rob his targets' belongings.

"Greater Pickpocket... Greater Takeover... set!" he shouted.

The King of Burglary had three unique skills, all of which used his hands.

In his right hand, he set a skill that robbed people of their items: Greater Pickpocket. It allowed him to pick any transferable items within the effective range, a radius of 100 metels, and forcefully store them in his own inventory. Even a dragon carriage was a viable choice, making it a particularly fearsome skill.

In his left hand, he set a skill that robbed people of their lives: Greater Takeover. As long as they were within the effective range, he could use it to remove his opponents' body parts. Anything that fit into his hand could be plucked from a distance and end up in his possession.

I've gotta aim for the dragon carriage with that long freak sitting on it, Eldridge thought. Due to his maxed-out Identification skill, he could easily tell that that particular dragon carriage was special. It's a mobile save point.

The Huang He Empire was highly advanced when it came to the creation of magic items, but this vehicle stood out even when that was considered. For Eldridge, who had lost his save points in the kingdom, it was something that he was simply compelled to rob.

The dragon carriage was about three hundred metels away. From its speed, he calculated that it would take between one and two minutes for it to get into his effective range.

Eldridge planned to take the dragon carriage the "long freak" was sitting on, forcefully ruining the tall eccentric's posture and giving him a window of opportunity to take the head.

He was confident that it would be over with just that.

It had to be noted that Eldridge's calculations weren't off the mark.

If the conditions had been as he'd set them to be, things probably would've gone exactly as planned. However, there was a certain condition he'd gotten wrong.

He'd assumed that Xunyu was merely an owner of a Superior Job from Huang He.

Alas, there was a decisive difference between his assumption and the reality.

"The freak got off...?" he said, raising an eyebrow.

Just as he'd said, Xunyu was no longer sitting on the dragon carriage.

The jiangshi's limbs appeared to be even longer than they had seemed back when Xunyu had just been sitting.

From a distance, the overall impression the eccentric gave off was closer to "utility pole" than "person."

"Are we about to get attacked?" one of the bandits cried.

"Did the first attack give off our position?!" another yelled.

"Be on your guard! The jobs you can take in the east of the continent are different than those in the west! You don't know what to expect!"

As his clan began making a fuss about the change in situation, Eldridge silently observed Xunyu.

...This might be bad, he thought, and not without reason. Whether it was caused by the Danger Sense skill he'd acquired or the instincts he'd been born with, he felt that he was in peril.

However, he'd felt the same way about many a boss monster, Master, or tian he'd encountered during his entire playtime, and on countless such occasions, he'd come out on top.

Even with the danger considered, Eldridge — owner of the Superior Job known as "King of Burglary" — didn't think that the eccentric could emerge victorious.

Now that the freak is off the carriage, it's safe to expect an attack, he thought. Still, I just have to wait until the shithead enters my effective range and take their head before anything happens.

With that in mind, he instantly switched the skill on his right hand to Greater Takeover.

Due to the jiangshi's long clothes, Eldridge couldn't tell how the body looked under them, but he figured that Xunyu would die the moment he removed the head.

There was nothing wrong with that line of thinking. Losing their vitals meant death to just about anyone. Having killed countless people like this, Eldridge knew that better than most.

And so did Xunyu.

"The freak's not mov— Ghuh... Ah?"

Eldridge began to speak his confusion about the lack of activity from the jiangshi. But before he could finish his sentence, his voice was replaced by a powerful flow of blood.

In fact, the sanguine liquid began to flow out of every orifice on his head — mouth, nostrils, ears, and eyes.

The blood trailing down from the seven holes painted his face crimson.

"U-UAAAHHH!" one of his underlings screamed. "B-BOSS?!"

"Hey! Where's our healer?! Wait, no, someone get him an Elixir!"

As his clan members began to panic, Eldridge was surrounded by a mysterious silence. He could barely make out even the most loudest of sounds anymore. Tilting his head to the side, he touched his chest.

...Oh, I see, he thought as he shifted his gaze to Xunyu. In the jiangshi's right hand — which was more like a menacing, metallic claw — there was a dark red object.

It looked very much like a heart.

...I've been robbed.

A moment after he realized what it was, the man known for being one of the Kingdom of Altar's greatest player killers was reduced to particles of light, and vanished.

"B-BOOOOOSS!"

"Wha...? E-eh?!"

The sudden and mysterious death of the man they so relied on made the remaining members panic and scream.

"Too slOw."

Before they could even finish doing that, however, Xunyu — who had been about three hundred metels away just a moment ago — suddenly stood in the center of their group.

A woman hastily tried to aim her rifle, a man quickly brandished his sword, and others hurriedly tried to use their Embryo skills, but the jiangshi acted faster than anyone present.

The action was a simple spin. Xunyu bent that tall frame and spun those long arms. A second later, the people surrounding the jiangshi were sliced into fine discs and fell to the ground like tinned chunks of pineapple.

Some of them were wearing accessories that prevented fatal damage, but Xunyu made sure to slice them so thoroughly that it meant nothing.

The immense damage quickly killed them, and the severe destruction of their bodies left no time for resurrection, almost instantly making them vanish.

With them gone, all that was left was the sound of trees dancing in the wind and the ridiculously long shadow made by Xunyu standing in the morning light.

That was how the PK clan known as Goblin Street experienced their second annihilation.

All of it happened in less than two minutes after Xunyu got off the dragon carriage.

"Man, that was boRing," said the jiangshi while taking the familiar pipe out of the inventory and putting it in the mouth again. "Is this the par for the kingdom's SupeRior Jobs?"

Blowing bubbles and sighing, Xunyu used those sharp claws, the Superior Embryo that had just sliced over twenty people, to skillfully scratch their head. "This makes me wonder if I should expect much from the country's SuperiOrs."

Yet again sighing from boredom, Xunyu, the Huang He Empire's Superior, returned to the dragon carriage.

◇◆◇

“Well done, Master Xunyu!” said Cang.

“What a splendid display!” said one of the chamberlains. “A Geomancer said that the bandits were a group of dozens of Masters, and yet you were able to take care of them all by your lonesome!”

“I would expect nothing less from one of the Huang He Si Ling — the empire’s greatest four!” added one of the country’s officials. “Truly, only Master Xunyu is deserving of the nicknames ‘Landmine,’ ‘Divine Speed,’ and ‘Yinglong.’”

Upon returning to the dragon carriage, Xunyu was showered in such praise. Despite the positive appraisals, however, everyone besides Cang seemed to be somewhat afraid of the jiangshi.

“It ain’t muCh,” said Xunyu. “Still, though, a job’s a job, and with it being so early, it made me pretty sleEpy.” Those words made the chamberlains and the officials hastily leave Xunyu’s dragon carriage. Cang, too, lightly bowed and excused himself.

Left alone, Xunyu sat down on the custom-made, long sofa and sighed yet again. “With Cang being so genuine, the way he flatters has a certain chaRm to it, but the shameless brown-nosing from the adults is just unSightly.”

However, no one could really fault them for their behavior. They were delivering royal blood — Cang — to the Kingdom of Altar for a mission so important that not even Xunyu had been told about it. They had expected the journey to be filled with many attacks such as the one that had just happened, and the jiangshi’s protection was invaluable.

However, Xunyu was a Master — one of the wielders of unique powers due to which their very existence in this world was fickle. If Xunyu happened to leave this realm — to “log out” — for a long period of time, they could never complete their task. Not to mention that their heads would roll the moment something bad happened to Prince Cang.

Originally, the role of protecting this mission hadn’t been anywhere in Xunyu’s schedule, and the eccentric would’ve surely left them to their own devices. The only reason why the jiangshi had accepted the role was the fact that the mission had headed out for the kingdom’s royal capital at the same time Xunyu had some unrelated business in the same country. Of course, it would've been a lie to say that the jiangshi didn't find the reward — this custom-made dragon carriage — to be attractive, as well.

"HmPh." Still lying on the sofa, Xunyu reached for the inventory and took out two pieces of paper.

The first was a written request directed to Xunyu, while the other was a leaflet.

The written request had come through the adventurers' guild in Huang He, and displayed a reward good enough to make the journey to the kingdom worth it.

It asked Xunyu to have a match in the arena of the duel city known as Gideon. The requester was Count Gideon — the ruler of the city.

It wasn't hard for Xunyu to understand why the man had requested that. The jiangshi had the second place in Huang He's duel rankings and was a Superior, a wielder of a Superior Embryo.

According to the information Xunyu had gathered, the situation in Gideon wasn't the best, so the count was probably trying to dispel the gloomy atmosphere with a grand show fit for a duel city.

That was displayed on the other piece of paper — the event leaflet with the words "Clash of the Superiors" written on it. It informed people of the duel between Figaro — one of the Kingdom of Altar's Superiors and the so-called king of the duel city — and Xunyu, another Superior.

A match between two Superiors. It was an unprecedented event that had yet to happen in any duel city in any country, giving it lots of attention from both in and out of the kingdom.

Count Gideon is probably thinking of having the local hero, Figaro, win and heighten the spirits of his people... Sadly for him, my loss isn't part of the request, thought Xunyu as a grin spread across that terrifying face.

Though the talisman hanging down from the hat and covering what passed for a face made it hard to see, the grin was brimming with ferocity.

I don't know whether he just didn't think this through or if he simply trusts Figaro's strength, but I'll do the same thing regardless — fight with all I am, enjoy it for all it's worth, and beat him with all I've got. Still covered by the talisman, Xunyu laughed in a menacing manner.

"Khahahahah. Here's hoping you can entertAin me, Altar's SuperiOr."

That was how the dragon carriages carrying one of the east's mightiest and the Empire's prince crossed the border and entered the Kingdom of Altar.

The Clash of the Superiors — Figaro and Xunyu — was just a few days away.

Unknown to most, however, the battle would act as a trigger to an even greater happening.

Chapter One: Lectures and Reunions

Paladin, Ray Starling

It was the morning after the hellish day during which I'd fought the Gouz-Maise Gang and the Revenant Ox-Horse.

Before dawn broke, Nemesis and I were dashing through the Nex Fields on Silver's back while talking about what we would do from now on and hunting the local monsters.

Defeating Gouz-Maise had made me level up to level 39, and this hunting had increased that number to 40. My HP now crossed the 5,000 mark.

Becoming able to ride Silver increased my speed and hunting effectiveness with him. What I found particularly effective was firing Purgatorial Flames at groups of monsters as I passed them by.

"A red-black man on horseback releases a stream of fire without as much as a 'hello' and leaves, just like that," said Nemesis. "No matter how you look at it, that seems like a description of a real villain."

"I'm aware," I said.

Still, I feel that killing a large number of normal monsters is a better way to level up than going through the hassle of killing a single boss monster, but whatever, I thought.

Momentarily satisfied with my level, I stopped the hunt and decided to do some tests. Specifically, I wanted to see what Silver and the Grudge-soaked Greaves, Gouz-Maise could do. The stats bonuses on the Greaves were exactly what the item said they were, while the energy gathering caused by Grudge Conversion seemed to work just as intended.

Also, I noticed that it wasn't necessary for the grudge to come from the dead. The negative emotions released by the living were significantly weaker than those of the deceased, but they could still be converted to MP and SP.

That meant that keeping the enemy alive and torturing them was a good way to stock up on both of those stats. As useful as that seemed, however, the idea of actually doing it just freaked me out.

The other skill on the greaves — Rider and Horse, As One — had proven to work just fine yesterday, when I'd begun using its Horse Riding skill bonus to ride Silver. Thus, it was time to test Silver's own skills.

There were a total of three — Running, Wind Hoof, and one unknown skill that showed up as only "???" on there. The Miasmaflame Bracers also had an unknown skill on them, so I could only assume that unknown skills weren't that rare.

First up was Running, which — as it said in the name — was a skill that allowed Silver to run while someone was riding him. The speed and quality of the running was dependent on the rider's Horse Riding skill level. How horse-like, I thought.

Then there was the other skill, Wind Hoof. It could only be used when the rider's Horse Riding skill level was above 3 or Riding skill level was above 6. The description said that it "Allows air-travel by compressing the air under the hooves" and "Uses the rider's MP to create a barrier of compressed air."

The difference between Horse Riding and Riding was the fact that the former was exclusive to horses and thus allowed better use of them for less levels, while Riding could be used with anything ridable in exchange for needing more levels.

With all the riding I'd done while going back from the Mountain Belt to Gideon and the dashing we did since predawn today, my Horse Riding had reached level 2. The +1 bonus from Rider and Horse, As One made it level 3, allowing me to use Wind Hoof.

I tried it out and... sure enough, we flew. Though it was less like "flying" more like "running on invisible platforms in the air."

"Whoa." I couldn't help but be moved.

"What a view." Nemesis shared my sentiment. It was something that I could never have experienced in real life.

As great as the experience was, however, the act's similarity to riding a horse over glass made me feel a bit anxious and scared. Still, I got somewhat used to it after about an hour or so. Thankfully, Silver himself covered the cost of this air-running ability, leaving my MP completely untouched.

However, the skill could be used in a way that did drain my MP.

It was the barrier of compressed air. According to the skill's description, I could use it to protect myself from attacks.

There happened to be a Goblin Archer right below me, so I used it to see how well it worked.

"Go on, shoot!" I shouted. The result was simple — the arrow broke through the barrier as if it wasn't even there and sunk into me.

Slightly panicking, I used Purgatorial Flames to burn the Goblin Archer below.

Man, I know I'm the one doing it, but hanging in the air and raining fire on those on the ground is pretty messed up, I thought.

The Goblin tried fighting back, but all its arrows got burned before they could reach me.

Once I overcame this unexpected predicament, I began to analyze what had just happened. The problem was obvious — Wind Hoof's barrier was just way too weak.

I began thinking about why it was like this, and it didn't take too long for me to find the root of the problem.

I simply hadn't used enough MP. With my maximum MP being so low, I had subconsciously used it sparingly and — naturally — hadn't gotten the results I'd wanted.

When trying it again, I used all of my MP. My next opponent was a Goblin Warrior.

"Bring it on!" I shouted.

The result was simple — its ax broke through the barrier as if it wasn't even there. I'd expected there to be a wall-like patch of air, but the ax had cut through it like it would paper.

By a hair's breadth, I avoided getting split in half and began fighting the Goblin Warrior. Naturally, I emerged victorious, but not having any MP made it a harder battle than it should've been.

"It's no good," I said.

"No good, indeed," agreed Nemesis.

Wind Hoof's air-running effect was great and all, but with my meager amount of MP, the barrier aspect seemed completely useless.

"The efficacy seems quite poor, if you ask me," she added.

Yeah, seriously, I thought. Miasmaflame Bracers — a special reward — allowed the use of powerful skills such as Purgatorial Flames and Hellish

Miasma for far less MP than Wind Hoof. I could only assume that it was a testament to just how great special rewards were, and...

"Ah," I said as an idea came to my head. I had a certain combo available to me.

So I tried it. And the result was simple — a great success. Not only did the barrier stay intact, it increased my defensive ability so much it was immense.

The only problem was an unexpected side effect that got me all covered in mud.

Also, there was something I had to keep in mind.

"I can't use this in the city," I said.

"It's a quick way to get on the wanted list, no doubt about it," commented Nemesis.

This new way of using the skill was so dangerous that we decided not to touch it unless the situation called for it.

◇

After we were done with the testing, we went back to the city, I took a shower at the inn, and then I made my way to Gideon's knight offices. I went there because Liliana had told me to report the destruction of the Gouz-Maise Gang to them.

I entered the offices in Gideon's first district and saw many Knight-like people busily running around. They seemed about five times busier than high schoolers getting ready for a school festival.

It appeared like there was some event coming up soon, and they were hard at work preparing for it.

Trying not to get in their way, I went through the less crowded hallways and made my way to the office Liliana had told me about.

However, before I could get there...

"Ah."

...I ran into a white armor-clad knight whose face I recognized — the one that Liliana had referred to as "Sir Lindos." From the way he stopped and stared at me, it was fair to say that he recognized me, as well.

"Hello," I greeted him. However, all I got in response was silence.

Well, I already know that he doesn't think too highly of us Masters, so whatever, I thought.

Not minding his attitude too much, I began heading to the office again.

"I hear that you defeated the Gouz-Maise Gang," said Sir Lindos before I could walk away.

"Yes," I replied. "I can't say that I did it alone, though."

In response, he silently closed his eyes. "Thank you."

Then he left after saying just that.

"Huh?"

What am I supposed to make of that? I thought.

"Maybe he just wanted to express his gratitude?" said Nemesis.

"But why him, of all people?"

"I'm not one to know."

Slightly confused at what had just happened, I went towards the office again.

◇

Gideon's knight offices had a free-to-enter area dedicated to the citizenry's appeals and the like. Naturally, there were lots of secretive areas where civilians weren't allowed to enter, but the office I was looking for was in the open area. There were guides to help people get around, so I had no trouble getting to my destination, where I quickly began going through the relevant procedures.

During the process, I was told something about merit or whatever, but I didn't remember most of it. Almost the whole of my visit consisted of me looking at and signing some documents.

Most of them looked fine, and I didn't hesitate to put my signature on them, but I refused to sign the one that gave me "The Right to Acquire the Treasure Plundered by the Gouz-Maise Gang."

There was no denying that I had monetary troubles. Sure, with me getting the Grudge-soaked Greaves, I no longer had to buy an Amulet of the Equestrian Tribe to get the Horse Riding skill, but the thinness of my wallet was a problem nonetheless. However, I was highly averse to the idea of possessing money the scumbags hoarded by preying upon children. That was why I asked the office to donate that money to charities that helped children.

With Hugo also having a right to those dirty riches, my only regret was the fact that I'd decided this without consulting him. Sure, his letter had said that he needed no reward, but it still didn't feel right to not get his input on this. If he didn't agree with this decision, I was fully intent on giving him the reward I'd get from the guild.

However, I felt that this would never happen. Hugo and I hadn't known each other for long, but I was certain that he'd have done the same thing as me if our positions had been reversed.

We were alike, and not just because we were both Maidens' Masters.

Once I was done signing the papers, I was told that I was probably going to be contacted sooner or later, so I gave them the address of the inn I was staying at here in Gideon. With that, the procedures were done, and we began making our way out of the offices.

Before we left, however, one of the workers there stood up.

Facing me, he bowed and said one thing: "Thank you for avenging my little boy."

◇

I didn't know what to say in response to that.

I'd had such gratitude directed at me back when I saved Milianne and protected Alejandro's people against Gardranda, but the situation was completely different this time.

Specifically, there were two main differences.

The first was the fact that I had only taken part in this incident's end. I had only seen the conclusion of the tragedies surrounding the Gouz-Maise Gang. I hadn't seen anything but the results of what they'd done, and the final end Hugo and I had delivered upon them.

To the people living in this city, the tragedy had been a process that had constantly tortured them. Since they hadn't been able to do anything about it, that suffering had probably extended to the country's knights, as well. In fact, that might've been the reason why Sir Lindos had thanked me. However, I knew nothing about this painful process these people had been involved with.

The other difference was the fact that I wasn't being thanked for saving anyone. I had been thanked for avenging the son the worker had lost. The tragedy had already happened, and many children kidnapped by the Gouz-Maise Gang had lost their lives.

Though we'd successfully saved the boy that our quest had indicated, and a number of other children along with him, the number of undead I'd burned in the dungeon had been at least ten times greater.

Far too many children would never return home. Thinking of that made my heart ache.

I felt unreasonably guilty about all that was lost and the fact that I had been too late to do anything about it. I couldn't forgive myself for that, and felt that I had to make up for it somehow.

But...

"What can I even do about this?" I murmured.

"I certainly don't know," Nemesis responded, with a wry smile on her face. "I can see that you're seriously troubled about this, but there isn't much I can say to you as you are now. If I have to, however, I'll merely suggest that beating yourself up over a tragedy that already occurred and wondering whether it could have been prevented or not is best left to protagonists of time loop stories. It's better to be troubled by what has yet to come. After all, you don't have the power to go back in time. You are only human... and my only Master."

"'What has yet to come,' eh?" I asked.

"Things will probably be the same as they always were," she said. "You'll happen upon an incident, and if you feel like letting it happen will give you a bad aftertaste, you'll intervene and help those you feel should be helped. I am fully certain that this will keep happening to you."

After a moment of thought, I realized that I'd been doing primarily that ever since I'd entered Dendro. No, in fact, such events had been with me ever since I was a child.

"That makes me seem like a highly haphazard individual," I said.

I didn't have a plan most of the time, and I often let the flow lead me to all sorts of trouble, which I'd often dive into headfirst. It never came to me when the incidents actually happened, but when I looked back, it often seemed like I'd gone straight for them of my own accord.

My words made Nemesis smile.

"There's a number of things I like about you, and that's one of them," she said.

"'That,' as in...?" I raised an eyebrow.

"You don't run away when you feel like you have to save someone."

"You like me for being foolhardy?"

"No, I like you for not hiding your courage, no matter how fearsome your opponent is. That part of you makes you very cool, if you ask me."

I was silent.

Well... You're gonna make me blush, I thought.

"However, even if it's par for the course for you to face opponents far greater than you, it would be far better if you were the stronger one," Nemesis said. "So, if you feel like you must do something, you should start by raising your base power."

"Base power, eh?" I said.

It was obvious that I'd become stronger than before, but I was still among the weaklings of this world. Even with my trump cards Vengeance is Mine, Like a Flag Flying the Reversal, and my special rewards, I'd still needed lots of luck to emerge victorious against all the formidable foes I'd fought so far. After all, the PK, the Superior Killer, had ended me as if I was nothing.

"However, if you want to talk about becoming stronger in that regard, you have a far better person to turn to than myself," said Nemesis. "Look, you have a friend that's far more experienced than us. If we ever want to give the Superior Killer what's coming to him, we should ask her for advice."

Nemesis pointed at the café where our group agreed to meet. The "her" she was referring to was the woman sitting in the café's open terrace as she waved at us — Marie.

"So you want to become stronger. I see, I see," Marie said as she nodded in a pondering manner.

While I was telling the Journalist about what was troubling me, Nemesis got herself a pile of sandwiches for breakfast and dug into them.

Well, there goes the money I made during this morning's hunt, I thought.

"Indeed we do!" said Nemesis. "We need your advice if we ever want to give the Superior Killer what's coming to him."

"...Right," Marie said. She covered her face for some reason.

"Since you've played Dendro far longer than me, I imagine you're pretty knowledgeable about it," I said.

"Oh, believe me, I am," she said. "I'm unemployed, and I've been doing this for more than a year now. Been going hardcore, so to speak."

...Is your life all right? I thought.

"Anyway, you want to know what you must do to become strong enough to win against the Superior Killer, correct?" Marie asked. "Hmmm." She put her hand against her mouth and pondered something before speaking. "What do you think are your weak points?"

"Weak points?" I asked.

I feel that I'm still weak in many ways, but if I have to converge on something specific, then...

"My range is too short, and also everything goes to hell if I mess up Nemesis's skills," I said.

"Indeed, that's more or less right," nodded Marie. "Can you explain why?"

The problem with my range was obvious. Vengeance, my trump card, was limited by the reach of my greatsword, and though my Purgatorial Flames went a bit farther, the distance still wasn't particularly notable.

Given that, it would be hard for me to do anything about those who used guns or magic and attacked from hundreds of meters away. Sure, I could defend myself against such opponents by using Counter Absorption, but the skill's maximum stock was very limited. The tough enemies I'd defeated so far — Demi-Dragon Worm, Gardranda, and Gouz-Maise — had all been close-range fighters, just like myself.

Meanwhile, the Superior Killer, who stood at a distance and shot monstrous bullets at me, had killed me without getting as much as a scratch on him. If that wasn't a weak point, I had no idea what was.

There was also the lingering possibility of me failing to use my skills properly. That included scenarios where I used Counter Absorption against the weakest of attacks — basically wasting it — or where the enemy stopped the damage conduction from Vengeance is Mine by removing the part of the body I'd landed it on, which was something I'd thought about during the Gouz-Maise fight.

If my enemies were aware of these possibilities, they could easily nullify Nemesis's unique skills. It wouldn't usually be a problem on the first fight, but that would change the moment they figured out how my skills worked.

"Yes, you seem to know why those are big problems," said Marie.

“However, you forgot another weak point.”

“Which is?” I raised an eyebrow.

“The lack of speed or toughness.”

Yeah, I’m gonna need an elaboration, I thought.

“All right, Ray,” she said. “You want to get stronger, so I’ll tell you what you must do from the game’s perspective,” she continued. “‘Raise your AGI or END.’ That’s it.”

...What?

“Now wait just a second,” I said. “That can’t be all there is to it, is it?”

“Of course,” Marie nodded. “There are job and skill builds to consider, not to mention their synergy with your Embryo. However, when looking at the way the game works, you simply must raise either of those stats.”

“‘Must’?” That word seemed kinda off in this context.

“Now, Ray,” she spoke up again. “Have you ever felt that the surroundings slowed down when you were fighting?”

“...Yeah, actually,” I answered. That sensation was especially palpable when I was strengthened by Reversal. The world seemed to be in slow-motion, making it far easier for me to evade the enemy’s attacks.

“That happens because of the greatness in difference between AGI in normal situations and battles,” she explained.

“‘Difference’?” I repeated.

“Yes. First of all, when you don’t have a job, you’re much like a standard person on Earth. You know how your stats were at about 10 or 20 back then?”

“Yeah, I remember them being around that range.”

“So, as you already know, when you raise your job levels, that number can go to 100, 200, or even break the 1,000 mark if you pick a high-rank job with a focused stat growth. Those numbers become ten times greater when they’re about HP, MP, or SP.”

“I’m aware.”

By the time I maxed out my Paladin job, my HP would likely be far above the 10,000 mark. But it wasn’t like this job was focused only on HP, and from what I could tell by looking at Liliana’s stats, standard Paladins didn’t get that much of it, so my stat growth was probably greatly influenced by Nemesis. It was fair to assume that other Masters could easily get to those numbers with their own Embryo bonuses.

"All right, so," Marie continued. "The amount of time experienced by a person with 10 AGI is different to that experienced by a person with 100."

"Hm?" I raised an eyebrow.

"Right now, when we're not doing any fighting, we're experiencing time the same way someone with normal AGI does," she said. "However, when you enter a battle or merely make a conscious decision to switch it, that stat instantly changes. Why not try it?"

"Hm..."

With the bonus from the Grudge-soaked Greaves, my AGI was about 100. Just like Marie suggested, I consciously changed my stats. In that state, I looked down the street and, sure enough, the people there were walking at a slightly slower pace.

It was the first time I'd experienced it outside of battle, and the results slightly impressed me.

"It's not like the time perceived scales directly with AGI," Marie added. "However, this function is a part of the game's system, and no Master, tian, or monster is an exception. I think it works like this because a constant slowing down would affect people's day-to-day lives."

"So AGI affects the amount of time experienced during battle, huh?" I said as I pondered.

By now, it made sense why Marie had suggested that it was a "must." Experiencing more time gave those with greater AGI a huge advantage in battle.

"It doesn't matter all that much to rear guard roles," she continued. "Vanguard roles, however, must have enough AGI to allow them to act faster than their opponents or enough END to survive their attacks. Those focusing on the latter also need to find ways to fight back."

With me being a Paladin, my build was leaning towards END. However, it still wasn't high enough for me to survive attacks from those more powerful than myself. Also, Paladin was my very first job, so I didn't have the stats that most people would normally have after maxing out low-rank jobs such as Knight.

Clearly, my situation wasn't the best.

"By the way, riding fast mounts and the like has no effect on the time you experience," Marie added.

I was fully aware of that. Riding Silver had increased my movement speed, but I didn't feel like there was much of a change in the time I'd perceived.

I said, "But man, I'm surprised I was able to win such tough fights without being aware of this difference, and..."

Suddenly, I realized that the tough enemies I'd fought against so far hadn't had that much AGI. The Demi-Dragon Worm, Gardranda, and Gouz-Maise had all excelled in endurance rather than agility.

"Remember that you can take six low-rank jobs and two high-rank jobs," Marie spoke up again. "Your overall power is greatly affected by how many of them you have."

"So, with me being on my first job and my level not being all that great, I still have a long way to go, huh?"

"Yes," she nodded. "Oh, just so you know, AGI-focused Superior Jobs can get their AGI to five digits."

"Five?!" Superior Jobs seem to have a serious stat inflation problem, I thought.

"People with such jobs can move at supersonic speeds and even block or catch bullets mid-flight," Marie continued. "Also, this is merely something that I happened to hear through gossip, but they say that the so-called Superior Killer has an AGI-focused Superior Job, so you should really raise your AGI or END if you want to stand a chance against him."

Well, if that guy's an AGI build, getting my stats up is pretty much a necessity, I thought. Wait, speaking of stats...

"What if I focus on STR?" I asked. Increasing offensive ability seemed like a very simple, reliable way of becoming powerful.

"STR build?" she asked. "You'll die."

D-Die?!

"Focusing on STR would have you sacrifice AGI and END, after all. No matter how hard you hit, you won't be able to dodge or bear many attacks, leading you to dying pretty quickly. The fate of all glass cannons."

"So that's how it works..."

"There are some well-balanced builds that merely happen to have high STR, and there are people such as the King of Beasts — the 'Physically Strongest' — whose every stat is so high, it's stupid. However, your average STR builds are just fodder."

I see, I thought. Also, if I recall correctly, the King of Beasts is one of the imperium's Superiors. I didn't know he had "Physically Strongest" as a nickname.

"That just about settles the talk about the basic power relations in fights," said Marie as she took a cup into her hand. "Now, let me tell you about player skills."

After gulping down some of her tea, Marie took a breath and began talking again.

"There's so much to player skills that I'm not sure where to begin. Well, for example, if you're good at martial arts in reality, you can use those techniques in Dendro just fine. Or if you can draw, you can do it here without getting the skill for it."

"Martial arts, huh?" I said.

Naturally, with him being a person who had won Un-kra, the one that came to mind was my brother. However, instead of applying those skills to his Dendro fighting, he used a minigun and even rode a tank.

Can he even do any martial arts in that suit, though? I wondered. It sure didn't look that comfortable to move in. And hell, bears are usually the targets of martial artists, not the other way around.

"Well, the subject of real skills involves too many person-to-person differences, so let's leave it aside for now," said Marie. "In battle — especially against other people — there are three main things one must always consider."

"Which are?" I asked.

"One: you must know the conditions in which your opponent is strongest; two: you must know the conditions in which you are weakest; and three: you have to be able to predict your opponent's ultimate attack."

"Hm..." I could understand the first one. Basically, I had to avoid being where the enemy wanted me to be. The thing that came to mind was my fight against the Demi-Dragon Worm. Though I'd emerged victorious, there had been the lingering possibility of me getting pulled underground, like my brother was. Even with Nemesis with me, the chances of me winning while fighting in absolute darkness — their natural habitat, at that — would have been extremely slim.

The second one made sense, too. It reminded me of the time I'd gotten killed by the Superior Killer. While being outside my attack range, he'd attacked me with countless bullets against which I'd been able to do absolutely nothing. With my only defensive option having limited uses and my offense being exclusively melee, it was only natural that I'd died back then.

By now, I could move far better than before and my range was slightly greater. However, it would be hard to say that I'd stand a chance against a long-range fighter such as him.

All that said, I didn't know what she meant with the third point.

"'Ultimate attack'?" I raised an eyebrow.

"Just about every strong battle-oriented creature has one," said Marie. "Masters, tians, bosses such as UBMs... They all have some trump card which they have absolute confidence in. Enough to think that the battle would be over the moment they use it."

The term "trump card" reminded me of my and Nemesis's Vengeance is Mine skill.

"So, it's basically a strong skill?" I asked.

"It could be a skill, a weapon, or maybe even a tactic. The stronger the creature, the more of these they have. Embryos even have skills that are actually called 'ultimate skills.'"

"'Ultimate skills'?" I repeated.

"Oh?" Nemesis' eyes lit up, and she momentarily stopped eating sandwiches to join our conversation. Apparently, the subject of ultimate skills had caught her curiosity.

"Ultimate skills are the greatest, strongest skills of an Embryo, and they're always named after the Embryo itself," continued Marie. "All of them — without exception — have a powerful effect that strongly expresses the Embryo's dominant characteristic."

Well, that sure makes them sound intriguing, I thought.

"Actually, you saw one in one of the videos I showed you — the one where Figaro fought against the leader of Mad Castle," she added. "It was the last skill that the leader used."

Yeah, I remember that, I thought. It had been a rush of attacks that the leader had done after momentarily binding Figaro in place. In the end, Figaro had evaded it, but the skill had left a giant crater where he'd stood.

"Hmm... So my ultimate skill would be called 'Nemesis,' correct?" asked Nemesis.

"Yes, that's exactly how it would be," nodded Marie.

“Nemesis” worked pretty nice as a skill name.

“But I feel like some Embryo names wouldn’t really work as skill names,” I said. “For example, ‘Momotaro.’”

“Oh yes, such cases definitely aren’t unheard of,” said Marie. “For example, one of Granvaloa’s Superiors, ‘The Great Seven Embryos of Granvaloa,’ has an Embryo called ‘Abura-Sumashi.’”

“A-Abura-Sumashi...” I repeated the name and, sure enough, I didn’t feel a hint of power behind it. If I recalled correctly, it was just the name of a yokai with a big head.

“Oh, the name probably makes you think it’s weak, but just so you know, Abura-Sumashi is actually among the top ten strongest Embryos I know,” said Marie.

“Are you serious?” I asked.

“Very,” she nodded. “After all, it turns any liquids it touches into explosive material. Seawater, bodily fluids — you name it and it can turn it into an explosive that makes nitroglycerin pale in comparison. There was a time when the Master used it to turn all the seawater in a radius of 500 meters into explosives and blew a horde of monsters to bits.”

That’s just freaky, I thought.

“Also, I’ve heard that back when he had a dispute with a certain pirate clan, he fought one of its members, changed the pirate’s bodily fluids into explosives, let the pirate run away, and then used him to blow the clan’s hideout to bits.”

Savage.

“Due to that, Abura-Sumashi’s Master got the nickname ‘Human Bomb’...”

Sounds like trauma material, I thought. I feel like I won’t be comfortable looking at abura-sumashi illustrations ever again.

“Well, just keep in mind that a name has no relation to strength,” concluded Marie.

Yeah, you don’t need to tell me twice.

“Anyhow, I’m really looking forward to the time I get my own ultimate skill,” said Nemesis.

“As you should,” said Marie. “However, at the earliest, you would get it after becoming high-rank, so it might take a while.”

“I imagine it will,” I nodded. “Wait. Marie, you said you’ve been playing Dendro for more than a year, right? That's three years in this world, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"If you've been at it for that long, you should have your ultimate skill already, right?"

"Hm? Now that you mention it, I've yet to see Marie's Embryo," said Nemesis.

Marie's reply to that was silence. Though she was smiling in the same way she always did, for one reason or another, a great amount of sweat was running down her face.

I guess wearing a suit in this spring-like weather made her heat up a bit, I thought.

"Uhh... I, umm... my Embryo is... it's called uh… Arc-en-Ciel and, uh..."

"French for 'Rainbow,' huh?" I said. "That's pretty cool."

So Embryo names aren't limited to myths and fairy tales, huh? I thought. Of course, rainbows are common in legends, so maybe it's not actually an exception.

"As for what kind of Embryo it is, well... uh..." muttered Marie, for some reason showing hesitation about saying it.

"Hello! Sorry we took so long!" Rook cried.

"I'm sooo hungry! Let's have some food, Rook!" Babi added. At that moment, the other people we were waiting for arrived at the café.

"Now, wheeere aaare they?" asked Babi while looking around.

"Oh!" exclaimed Marie. "If it isn't Rookie and Babi! Good morning! Are you hungry?! You are?! Let me get you something, then! The sandwiches here are really good! I'll go and order some right now!"

After saying all that in one breath, Marie stood up and ran to the café's counter.

"Ah ha ha! Looks like Marie is in high spirits today," said Rook.

"She was nowhere near like that until just a second ago..." I commented.

Well, it's not like being in a good mood is a bad thing, I thought.

Marie, still in that weird state, came back with even more sandwiches than Nemesis had eaten, and we all had to do our part to make sure the food didn't go to waste. However, the exchange of information continued even as we ate, and I ended up telling them about what had happened yesterday.

"Eh? Ray, you can use the Purifying Silverlight?" Marie cried.

“Well... yeah?”

Marie looked absolutely puzzled. Rook heard me, as well, but with him not being the type to eat all that much, the sandwiches he’d forced himself to consume had made him drop his head on the table and thus not take part in the conversation. Nemesis and Babi were merely too focused on eating.

Anyway, the current subject was the Purifying Silverlight. It was the skill I’d learned when I’d cremated the undead children in that underground hallway.

Purifying Silverlight was an anti-undead skill, and a ridiculously good one, at that. It had been simply invaluable in the grueling battles I’d won yesterday. After all, it had not only made my attacks do holy damage, which worked even on spirits, it had also multiplied all damage done to undead by 10.

Again — 10 times greater damage on undead.

Though it hadn’t worked with Vengeance due to its damage being fixed, it was still an insanely good buff for my standard attacks. And that wasn’t the end of it, either. If an undead was hit by Purifying Silverlight, the wound could never be healed.

Though Gouz-Maise — the affront to sanity that it was — had been able to heal by removing the entire injured part, all the other undead had vanished before they could even exhibit the toughness unique to their kind.

Yesterday’s battles wouldn’t have gone nearly as well if I hadn’t had Purifying Silverlight at my disposal. As useful as Vengeance and Purgatorial Flames were, it was doubtful if they would have been enough for me to even live long enough to face Gouz-Maise.

Marie silently stared at me. That reaction weirded me out. She looked seriously surprised about something.

“How did you become able to use Silverlight?” she asked.

“Well, I got a message saying ‘Eliminate 100 appropriate monsters...’” I answered.

“Can you show me your counter?” she asked.

“My counter?”

...Of what? I thought.

“Open your menu window, go to the battle history screen, and you’ll find the creature type kill counters among the extras.”

“Oh, this, right?” I opened it and, sure enough, there were creature types such as undead, beast, avian, dragon, devil, elemental, demon, human, etc. with appropriate numbers beside them. My greatest one was undead: 158. It was followed by beasts and demons.

"So, are these the total numbers of monsters I've defeated?" I asked.

"Yes," Marie nodded. "Supposedly, the condition is 'defeat a certain amount'... but this number seems way too small."

As she muttered things like that, I shifted my gaze back to my kill counters. "There's one for humans, too, huh?"

On the window, my human kill count was 0. Apparently, though originally being human, the Lich Maise had counted as undead.

"What kind of creatures does the human counter cover, anyway?" I asked.

"A human is any creature that can have a job," answered Marie. "So if you see someone with a job, it's a human. Or 'humanoid,' as they're technically called."

"Then why didn't the Lich I killed count as human?"

"Oh, that's because the job comes with the effect of turning the human that takes it into undead, so he stopped being human the very moment he became a Lich. It's one of the very few exceptions."

That made me assume that there were scenarios where unfortunate humans that merely happened to look like monsters got attacked for that very reason, and I didn't know how to feel about that.

"Oh, but it's not like a Lich is completely like your usual, monster undead," added Marie. "You know how monsters have their names hanging above their heads? Well, with them originally being human, that doesn't apply to Liches."

Oh yeah, I totally forgot about that, I thought. Guess those scenarios are pretty rare, then.

"But man, it actually keeps track of the number of humans you kill," I said.

"Just so you're aware, it includes the kills made within the barriers of duel cities such as this one," Marie explained. "So a high human kill count doesn't always suggest that the person is a murderer. After all, once the duel is over, things go back to being the same way they were before."

"Oh, I see," I nodded.

"So many of those who frequent this city have probably killed hundreds of people," she added.

Well, that sure is a grim way to put it, I thought.

"I have a question." Rook raised his head and joined our conversation. "How do kill counters for tamed monsters work?"

"When they're used under the minion capacity, their kills are counted as the owner's kills," answered Marie. "When they're used as party members, however, their kills are counted as their own. You can see it for yourself by looking at their stat windows. Oh, also, kills done by autonomous Embryos such as Guardians are automatically counted as the Master's kills."

"Then what happens when a Charmed creature kills something?" Rook asked again.

"Umm... Those count as the Charmed creature's kills. The kill count of the one who did the Charming stays the same. Also, in scenarios where someone Poisons the opponent, escapes the battle, and merely waits for the Poisoned enemy to die, it still counts as the poisoner's kill." Apparently, it was dependent on who landed the finishing blow. Tamed monsters within the minion capacity were considered to be like the limbs of the owner, so their kills went to him. While in a party, however, their kills went to their own kill counters.

With status effects such as Poison, the kill went to the one who was directly responsible for the poisoning. Indirect kills, such as the ones done by Charmed opponents, went to those who had done the killing, rather than the Charmer.

"So, if I want to, like Ray, fulfill a condition that has me defeat a certain number of something, I have to avoid using Charm or party slots and instead fight with my own strength or with those that fit in my capacity, right?"

I see why he was curious, I thought. I recalled that Guardians used 0 minion capacity, so he would have been able to use Babi to increase his kill counts even if she hadn't been his Embryo.

"This is so strange," muttered Marie after a while of serious pondering.

"What's strange?" I asked.

"This is the first time I've seen a Master with Purifying Silverlight."

"...What?"

"The skill's existence itself is quite well-known due to tians, especially the famous users such as the previous knight commander or the current vice-commander. However, there hasn't been a single case of a Master getting it. Which is really strange. It's right next to Grand Cross as one of Paladin's greatest skills, and there have been tons of people who've tried to get it, due to its great effects."

"Huh? But you only have to kill 100 undead," I said. That's what the message said, anyway, I thought. It definitely wasn't a hard condition for your average Paladin to achieve.

"That's true," nodded Marie. "Tians were asked about it and said that it was unlocked by the undead kill count. However, there are Paladins who have killed over 5,000 undead, yet still don't have it. They even finished leveling all their low-rank jobs before they got the skill and... huh?"

Realizing something, Marie put her hand on her chin and slightly tilted her head.

"Ray, what's your Paladin level?" she asked.

"41," I answered. I'd leveled up during the testing I'd done in the morning.

"And your total level?"

"41, as well." I didn't have any other jobs.

"That's probably the answer. This is only an assumption, but I think the condition only counts undead of the same level range as yourself. Total level range, to be precise."

"Level range, huh?" I murmured.

Now that I think about it, there was also a message saying something about the requirement being "Undead of the appropriate total level," I thought.

"It likely goes by 50, based on low-rank and high-rank," Marie continued. "Meaning that, if your total level 50 or less, the condition's target is low-rank monsters — those under and including level 50. And if you're in the 51-100 total level range, that changes to high-rank monsters — those who are also in the 51-100 range."

"I see," I nodded, fully understanding why I'd been able to learn the skill. After all, my total level was below 50. However, that condition didn't seem like it was unachievable by other people.

I mean, they simply have to max out Knight, switch to Paladin, and fight against undead over level 51 and, uh...

"...Huh?" Something didn't seem right about that thought of mine. The person's total level would be 51, but it was questionable whether they could put up a fight against high-rank undead while their Paladin level was so low. The High-End Skeleton Warriors that had popped out of the hallway while I was fighting the Lich had probably been among such high-rank undead, but I felt that I would've had no chance against them if I hadn't had Silverlight and Silver. I'd completely crushed them exactly because I did.

"This is pretty awful," said Marie. "To get Purifying Silverlight, you basically have to throw away everything else."

"It's that bad?" I asked.

"Normally, high-rank jobs have you max out one, sometimes even two or three low-rank jobs. Paladin is a prime example of a difficult-to-acquire high-rank job."

"You might be right," I nodded. Not only did it require you to have the gold for it, you also needed to do a certain amount of damage to a Demi-Dragon class boss monster. I'd been told that a Demi-Dragon's power was equivalent to a full party of people with low-rank jobs.

There was also the recommendation you had to get from a member of a knight order. Anyone trying to clear these job conditions in a normal manner would probably max out more than one low-rank job in the process.

"And by the time the person is a Paladin, fulfilling the conditions for Purifying Silverlight would be difficult... no... impossible, actually," said Marie.

"Is there something about monsters with a level above 100?" I asked.

"100 is actually the maximum level for all normal monsters — including bosses," she said. "The only ones that go beyond that are SUBMs, Superior Unique Boss Monsters, such as the Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria... but that's irrelevant to the subject at hand. The fact is that the level problem makes acquiring the skill completely impossible."

"Wait, wouldn't it be impossible to the tians, too, then?" I asked.

"The tians that become Paladins are most often the sons and daughters of influential people. They have no money problems to speak of, are well-trusted, and get tons of support when going out to defeat the boss."

"I see," I said.

A high-level person would act as a tank and keep the boss busy while the one wanting to get the Paladin job — perhaps assisted by support magic — would slowly chip away at its HP until it died. Clearly, it wasn't impossible. If luck was on their side, they could probably fulfill the Paladin job conditions before maxing out Knight.

"But wait," I said. "Can't Masters get such help, too?"

"It's very hard for us to gain the trust of the knight order's top people," answered Marie. "They're really picky about who they let in. Most who get accepted have really long lists of favorable deeds under their belts."

Deeds during which they reached a total level that was too high to let them acquire the skill, eh? I thought. Man, I don't even know what to make of all the luck that was involved in me getting Paladin and the Purifying Silverlight.

With its conditions being so strict, I could totally understand why it was so powerful.

"Playing normally makes it impossible to acquire the skill, but there's a way that would allow you to get it pretty easily," said Marie.

"Which is...?" I asked.

"Resetting every job besides Paladin."

My brother had told me about job resetting back when I was choosing my first job. Just as it said in the name, it was a function that allowed people to reset the jobs they didn't like or need.

Marie was right — it was a very easy way to get the skill. After becoming a Paladin, a person could reset all the other jobs to cause their total level to drop. Then they could spend some time killing low-rank undead in the Tomb Labyrinth to acquire the Purifying Silverlight. In fact, that might even be the reason why Paladins were allowed to enter there without the need for a Permit. However...

"Resetting the jobs means losing all their stats and skills, right?" I asked.

"Oh, yes," nodded Marie. "It would even include Knight — a job from the same grouping."

Daaamn, I thought, summarizing my reaction quite perfectly.

"I'll put this info on the wiki, but I can only wonder if anyone will be willing to go through with it," she said. "Considering how long they will have spent leveling those jobs, the risk involved is just too great."

Though Silverlight was unmatched in usefulness when fighting undead, it was pretty meaningless in just about every other scenario. Also, though we knew that this info was true, the people on the wiki wouldn't, and a scenario in which they dropped all their other jobs for nothing would probably leave them crying. When that risk was considered, it was obvious that there wouldn't be all that many people who would go through with it.

On a related note, I later asked Liliana about how she'd gotten Silverlight, to which she replied, "I reset all my jobs besides Paladin, acquired Purifying Silverlight, and then raised my other jobs — such as Knight — from square one."

When I considered the fact that tians weren't exactly in a position to reset their jobs so willy-nilly, I was quite impressed by her resolution.

"I must say, though," Marie spoke up again. "The path you're walking is quite something, Ray. People who go through the things you do are few and far between. Yesterday was quite a day for you, wasn't it?"

"Seriously. I thought I was gonna die," I said. "The whole thing was worse on my nerves than the time I got the death penalty in Noz Forest."

Though, unlike that time, I'd actually come out alive.

Speaking of which, I wonder what the Superior Killer was doing after escaping the King of Destruction? I thought.

"'Thought I was gonna die,' you say?" Marie repeated my words. "Well, you are a Maiden's Master, after all."

"From the way you're saying that, I assume you know about our common characteristic," I said. "Maidens' Masters..."

"'Maidens' Masters don't think of this place as a game,' correct?"

Yeah, that, I thought.

"Weird, isn't it?" I said. "In my head, I'm fully aware that this is a game, but..."

...my heart just doesn't agree.

"I wouldn't call it 'weird,'" said Marie. "Many long-time players share that sentiment, after all."

"Really?"

I would never have expected there to be enough for someone to use the word "many."

"After all, though this place has countless things that don't exist in reality, the five senses work in the exact same way," Marie continued. "Not to mention all the tians living here."

That was true. Aside from pain, the bodily sensations experienced here were the same as in reality. In fact, it was possible to turn pain on by going into the options window, so even that could become real.

There were also interactions with tians, something that no player could avoid. It was only natural for there to be people who had been in the world and watched its inhabitants for so long that they'd stopped thinking that it was just a game.

"At the same time, there are people who treat this place as a game all the way to the end," said Marie.

"Well, of course there are," I nodded.

It's sold as a game, after all, I thought.

"Stances on tians, their civilizations, and even Infinite Dendrogram itself differ based on who you ask, but there are quite a lot of people who take its status as another reality, or as merely a game, for granted."

"I see," I said.

"The ones who see it as another reality are 'worlders,' while those who see it as just a game are 'ludos.' To the former, the latter are inhumane, while to the latter, the former are just cringy."

So that's how it is, I thought. As I was now, I could somewhat relate to both sides.

"What other kinds of people are there?" I asked.

"Well, there are tons of those who just aren't certain about which side they're on," answered Marie. "Oh, and let's not forget those who try Infinite Dendrogram and then quit it for one reason or another."

"Like?" I asked.

"Well, many think that it's just not worth the trouble. Dendro encourages players to interact with people, move their avatar as if it were their own body, and make some serious decisions, all of which can be pretty taxing. It makes them feel like, 'This isn't what a game is supposed to be.'"

That seemed like a perfectly reasonable stance. Regardless of whether it was a world or a game, taking part in Infinite Dendrogram was a radically different experience from playing with a controller while looking at a screen.

"There are also those who quit after being emotionally scarred by some painful event," said Marie.

I was silent.

"Those two are the primary reasons why people who've been in Dendro for longer decide to quit, but some people stop right after starting. Specifically, right after their first battle. After all, fighting other living beings can be really scary and stressful. There are many of those early quitters among those who didn't chose anime or CG as their visual setting."

"Well, I can see their point," I said. My first fight against the Demi-Dragon Worm had been a terrifying experience, and I already knew what it was like to die in this world. There was nothing strange about there being people who distanced themselves from Infinite Dendrogram after getting to know the fear of being eaten or murdered.

Some of those who'd stayed regardless might quit after experiencing something painful. And those who continued their existence here after going through such filters would all look at this world in their own way.

"I wonder if the Superior Killer is a worlder or a ludo," I said. With him being the player killer responsible for my only death so far, I couldn't help but be curious about his stance on this world.

"Who knows?" Marie shrugged. "If you don't know, it's best to think that he's somewhere in between."

"That's true."

I knew far too little about him. He'd killed all the newbies, including me, in Noz Forest. Then he'd gone on to help me out in the Gardranda fight when things had gotten dire.

I didn't know what motivated him to act the way he did. In fact, due to the mist that had been covering him back then, I didn't even know what he looked like. His personality, height, and even the age of his avatar were all a mystery to me.

I was silent.

"Hm?" Suddenly, I realized that Rook was staring at Marie for some reason. His gaze was reminiscent of the one my brother would adopt when solving a crossword puzzle.

Thinking about it, I wonder why the crossword was in Arabic, I thought.

"Oh, I just remembered," Marie spoke up again. "I have something to give you two."

Marie reached into her inventory, took out two tickets, and handed them over to me and Rook. On them, there were flashy letters saying "Clash of the Superiors," along with some numbers and a precise date. The day was today, and the time was tonight.

"And these are...?" I asked.

"Well, you know how I asked you to leave the use of the remaining money from the Gardranda reward to me, right?” said Marie. “This is the result — box seat tickets to today’s event in the central arena.”

“Event?” I asked. “Is something happening?”

“...Oh? You’re unaware?”

“Yeah.” Way too many things had happened since I’d arrived at Gideon. Although I would’ve been lying if I’d said that I hadn’t seen any leaflets with the same title as on the tickets here and there.

“I see,” Marie nodded. “Just so you know, this is not something you’d regret seeing. After all — it’s a match between Superiors.”

“Superiors?” I asked.

“Yes. Though battles between Superiors aren’t a new thing, this is actually the first public match ever.”

“Who’s fighting?” I asked.

“Naturally, one of them is the king of the duel city — Super Gladiator Figaro — while his opponent is the one with the second place in Huang He’s duel rankings, Shi Jie Xian. Or as he’s better known: Xunyu, the Master Jiangshi.”

A match involving Figaro, eh? Now I’m intrigued, I thought. I’d yet to go to him and say hello due to all that had happened after I’d arrived at Gideon. I felt kinda obliged to thank him for taking care of the player killers that were blocking the way here.

“This is where most of the pooled reward money went to. Are you two okay with this?” asked Marie.

“Of course,” I said. “I’m sure it will be worth it.”

A clash between Superiors — the greatest of players — was surely something I wouldn’t regret seeing.

I was sure that just seeing it would have little effect on my overall strength. And it would help me gauge just how powerful we — Masters — could become.

“I am okay with this, as well,” Rook approved of Marie’s decision. “I’ve wanted to learn more about battles against people.”

“Good to know,” said Marie. “Make sure to be there when the time comes.”

“All right,” he said.

And so, we split up. We would be doing our own stuff until the event started, at which point we would meet up again.

I still had to go to the adventurers' guild and report to them that the Gouz-Maise Gang had been eliminated.

Apparently, Rook had something he wanted to talk about with Marie. I tried asking what it was, but all I got was, "It's a secret." He then whispered something into Marie's ear, making her face turn stiff as she muttered something along the lines of "How did you know?" Naturally, I was curious, but a secret was a secret, and I didn't want to pry.

By the way, about 90% of the vast number of sandwiches bought by Marie had ended up in Nemesis's stomach. The blatant increase in the amount she could eat in a single sitting made a chill go down my spine.

◇

"What do we do with this?" I wondered.

"What, indeed," Nemesis agreed.

Nemesis and I were sitting at a table in the adventurers' guild's bar. Our faces were close as we discussed something, making it obvious that we were troubled. With all that had happened since yesterday, I was becoming quite familiar with trouble. However, one would think that a person would get a break every now and then.

"This is just way too much..."

"But we can't just refuse it, can we...?"

The thing troubling us this time was the window I had opened.

It was my item screen, but the important thing about it wasn't an item. It was the field displaying the money in my possession. The amount displayed there was a whopping 80,000,000 lir.

Needless to say, it was a real fortune. In fact, it was equivalent to 800,000,000 yen. As to why I'd come to receive such a great amount of money...

It had happened when I'd arrived at the adventurers' guild to report the elimination of the Gouz-Maise Gang.

Unlike how it had gone in the knight offices, showing the special reward wasn't enough. I'd also had to answer a few questions and explain how it all went, making the whole process seem strangely long and thorough. Though I'd found it to be more annoying than the basic marking and signing I'd had to do with the knights, I didn't hesitate to give them the answers they'd wanted. Sure, I'd hid the fact that my comrade in this event, Hugo, had been a Master belonging to Dryfe, the enemy of Altar, but I'd said nothing but the truth.

As a result, I was recognized as the one who'd eliminated the Gouz-Maise Gang and received the reward. Before I'd gotten the money, I'd thought something along the lines of, I should find Hugo and split it. With me getting the special reward, his portion should be bigger and...

However, such thoughts were completely overshadowed by the 80,000,000 lir that'd been placed in front of me.

Excuse me? 80,000,000 lir? Not 800,000 or 8,000,000? Eighty times more than we got for Gardranda?

80,000,000L

As confusion overwhelmed my brain, the person at reception began explaining why the reward was so great.

Originally, the reward the adventurers' guild had set for the Gouz-Maise Gang's two leaders had been 1,000,000 each, while its normal members had gone for 10,000 each, making the total about 3,000,000 lir.

However, each and every person that had gone to eliminate the gang had gotten killed. Due to that, it had become known as a highly fearsome group that couldn't be underestimated.

There was also the fact that each and every failure to defeat them resulted in the death of the kidnapped children, so the risks had been too great for any party to attempt it again.

Naturally, there had been many people who were unsatisfied with that state of the situation. That included the families of the kidnapped children and even Count Gideon himself — the ruler of the city.

With Gideon being so prosperous, many of the kidnapped children's families were wealthy. A number of them had paid the ransom, but only received their children's corpses. Driven by grief and anger, many such people had wished for revenge and added money to the adventurers' guild's reward.

Due to the Gouz-Maise Gang's many crimes in his domain, Count Gideon himself had grown to hate the group with a passion and had wished to eliminate them by using the local army. However, with them having their hideout at the eastern border, he wouldn't have been able to go through with it because using the army might have been considered an act of war against Caldina.

Thoroughly upset with the state of the situation and hoping for a strong party to defeat the scoundrels, Count Gideon had used his own riches to increase the reward. Due to such reasons, the money had reached the great amount of 80,000,000 lir.

"It's surprising that nobody did anything until now," I said.

A fortune such as this would've attracted many people to this quest. Especially Masters, since there were few risks for us in getting involved in such perilous business.

"Any failures would reduce the chances of the children returning home, so the guild decided not to show any wanted posters for the gang and instead chose to hand-pick the people that looked like they could certainly do it," said the receptionist. "Specifically, the Superiors."

Ah, so they kept it a secret to not make the situation worse, I thought.

I wasn't completely sure if that decision had been a good one.

"The guild expected the great event happening in the central arena today to attract lots of powerful people from all across the land, so we were aiming to use it as a chance to find our person..."

...and have them do the quest, huh? I thought. From what I'd heard the Lich say, the gang had seen that coming and planned to leave yesterday.

"That is why we were quite confused to find out that the Gouz-Maise Gang was eliminated before we found someone to do it..." she added.

They'd been watching, waiting for an opportunity, and then Hugo and I had come out of nowhere, saying we'd already taken care of the problem. I could see why it was hard for them to believe.

In the end, the fact that I wasn't lying was proved by my Grudge-soaked Greaves, Gouz-Maise. Anyway, that was how I'd ended up with a reward that was way too big for my pockets.

"I have to meet up with Hugo," I said.

"Indeed," nodded Nemesis.

Though he'd said in his letter that the money was mine for the taking, I couldn't let myself accept these riches without consulting him. I also wanted to talk to him about the decisions I'd made back in the knight office. However, I had no means of contacting him and had neglected to put him on my friends list, so I didn't even know if he was online.

"Whatever the case, I'll decide where the money goes after I meet him," I decided.

Sure, I have monetary issues, but still, I thought.

"They said that the reward for the horse undead was 1,000,000 lir," said Nemesis. "Why not let yourself use that much, at least?"

"...You have a point."

That was completely reasonable. 1,000,000 lir was the same amount we'd gotten for defeating Gardranda, and it was more than enough for shopping done by a newbie such as myself.

However, I wasn't quite sure about what to buy. Due to level restrictions, it was far too early for me to get new equipment.

My only real shopping options are accessories and... weaponry, I guess, I thought.

“Are you thinking of cheating on me?” demanded Nemesis.

“No, damn it,” I answered. “Remember what Hugo said? About how Maidens can get skills after fighting in their human form?”

“That he did say, yes.”

“So yeah, I’m thinking of getting a weapon for you and for me when you’re in your human form.”

“Well, that certainly sounds like something we need,” Nemesis nodded, fully understanding my point. “All right, if you’re to wield a weapon that isn’t me, I’ll have to make sure that it’s fully worthy!”

...Well, someone’s excited, I thought. Oh right, if we’re gonna go to Alejandro’s shop, I should also—

“Surely you’re not about to think that you should pull the gacha again, are you, Ray?” demanded Nemesis.

“Ha ha ha, whatever do you mean, Nemesis? Do I look like someone who doesn’t learn from his mistakes?”

“Oh, I don’t know. Let me take a better look at you by looking you in the eye when we talk.”

“...I’m sorry.”

But come on, I know that it’s possible that I’ll draw another Permit or an item that’s worth less than I put in, but wouldn’t it be great to land something as great as Silver or Rook’s Touch of the Silencer? I mean—

“Huh?”

As I was making my way towards the shop, I saw a familiar silhouette standing in the plaza before the central arena. At first, I thought that my eyes were deceiving me, but once I got close, I became fully aware that they weren’t.

Black fur covering the whole body, a stature greater than that of the average person, a fat waist and limbs that were relatively short. It was a bear suit, surrounded by a large group of children.

“Ohh! This popularity is so great it’s almost unbearable! I feel like a star! Ursaa!”

The one wearing it, obviously, was my brother.

I said nothing.

Again, the one in the bear suit was my very own brother.

Likely due to being in the plaza, he had probably gotten mistaken for some performance artist or a mascot, causing him to be surrounded and jostled by many children.

"I don't even have anywhere to stand! Ah! Climbing on me is fine and all, just make sure not to fall!"

"...Bro, what the hell are you doing?" I asked as he became overwhelmed by children and was about to evolve into a walking adventure playground.

"Hm? Who is it fur whom I am a brother dearest...? Oh! It's Ray!" He greeted me by raising his arms, but his appearance made me feel like I was being menaced by a wild beast.

"Brother dearest" was quite an exaggeration. I had no recollection of ever having that much respect for him, and that included the days before his Un-kra fight.

"I feel like I haven't seen you for a while, Brother Bear," said Nemesis.

"A beary good afternoon to you, too, Nemesis," my brother greeted her as he slowly waved his arm. The reason for the slowness were the children hanging on to it.

"But man, you're as popular as always," I said. "You were in a similar state when I met you back in the capital."

"Costumes like these are beary rare, after all," he said.

"They are?"

"No one wants to wear them because they're terrible as equipment."

"Really?"

"Wearing these things takes up all the slots except the ones fur weapons and accessories," he explained.

Okay, the lack of popularity instantly makes sense, I thought.

"Suits that make up for that huge minus are unbearably rare," he continued. "I don't even know five Masters who wear them on a regular basis."

"...So you're saying that you know four?" I said. With my brother Shu included, that number became five.

Sounds like a wacky hero group, I thought. ...Oh yeah, he was actually a part of one once.

"What do you mean?" Nemesis asked telepathically.

It's no big deal. He just had a role as a member of a hero group in a certain tokusatsu show.

"I can't say that I am knowledgeable about that world, but based on the common sense I received from you, isn't that quite impressive? Wait, wasn't he a martial artist?" she asked.

Oh yes, he was during his middle school and high school days. In his elementary school days, however, he was a child actor and a singer. That was when he got the role as an extra — the sixth — in a certain hero group. But that ended before I could even think properly, so I don't know the details.

"Just what is he?" she demanded.

My big brother. Currently unemployed.

"So, bro, did you come to Gideon to observe the Clash of the Superiors?" I asked.

"Bearily, yes. I came to see my buddy Figgy fight."

Figgy? As in, Figaro? I thought. I didn't know they were friends.

"Well, I'm planning on watching it, too, so maybe we'll meet there?" I said.

"Eh? You bear a ticket?" he asked.

"Yeah. A friend of mine got me one," I answered as I reached into my inventory and showed it to him.

"Oh, it's for a box seat, too. I'm impressed you... Hm?" After glancing at it, he focused his eyes — the eye parts on the suit, anyway — on a certain part of my ticket.

"What?" I asked.

"Look here," he said as he took out his own ticket.

I looked at it and noticed that it said "L-001."

The L referred to the box itself, while the 001 was the number of the seat inside the box.

It was relevant because my own ticket was L-004.

"We're in the same box?" I asked.

Different seats, obviously, but we were still next to each other.

"A pawsitively amazing coincidence," my brother declared. "We'll be watching it together!"

"I didn't even think this could happen."

"Your friend probably bought it from the same scalper as me," he said.

That seemed entirely plausible.

"But oh, the fact that you've already made some friends here in Dendro makes me oh-so-beary happy," he said as he took out a handkerchief and pretended to cry while putting it against his suit's eye parts.

...I'm quite sure that no tears are coming out of there, I thought.

"Also, by looking at your gear, I see that you've already been on some big adventures," he added while looking at my bracers and boots — the Miasmaflame Bracers and the Grudge-soaked Greaves.

"Well, things happened, all right," I said. "I kinda want to talk about it, but this doesn't seem like the situation for long chats."

Shu had been surrounded and jostled by children for the entirety of our conversation so far.

"Good point," he said. "All right, children! This bear has to go now! Here's something to help you bear this farewell!"

He reached into his inventory, took out a huge amount of candy, and began tossing it around and at the surrounding children. Naturally, the kids were overjoyed, expressed their thanks, and went away from him, one by one.

"You did this back in the capital, too," I commented.

"Heh, it's a bare necessity when wearing this suit."

I was about to suggest that he take it off, but then I remembered that he couldn't. The face under it was his real face, after all.

"Why aren't you wearing some sort of mask or a disguise instead?" I asked.

"I don't want to look like a weirdo."

...Do you really think that wearing a bear suit isn't weird? I thought.

"Then why not do what you're good at and use the appearance of a hero, instead?" I asked.

"There's a clan focused entirely on that, so things could get beary annoying."

"...There's actually a hero group clan?"

"And a masked hero clan, too."

"Well, Dendro sure doesn't seem to lack freedom," I muttered.

Soon enough, Shu finished distributing the candy, and there were no longer any children around. Indeed, the children had left, but...

"Isn't there something on your head?" I asked.

"Well, I'll be. There actually is," he said.

Something was holding on to the top of his head. It definitely wasn't a human child. Though caricaturistically distorted, it looked somewhat like a hedgehog or porcupine.

The way it clung to Shu made it look like some sort of mascot, but I was fully aware that my brother didn't come with any such extras. It had appeared seemingly out of nowhere.

There's no name above its head, so it's clearly not a monster. Is it an Embryo, then? I thought.

"Oh, sorry about that," I heard someone say.

I turned to the direction of the voice and saw a woman. She looked like she was in her early twenties. Her clothing, despite fitting the fantasy setting, gave her the appearance of a secretary. The crest on the back of her left hand was proof that she was a Master.

"Apologies. My Behemot seems to have troubled you," she said.

"Behem...? Oh, this thing," my brother said.

"Behemot" was one way to refer to Behemoth — a creature from the Old Testament. That meant that it was an Embryo and that the lady here was its Master.

"Go on now, little lady. Big lady's here to pick you up," said Shu as he took the hedgehog, Behemot, and tried to remove it. But it didn't show any signs of letting go.

"Little lady?" It's a girl? I thought.

"xD!" Behemot emitted a strangely irritating chitter of joy and grabbed hold even harder. Apparently, she had taken a liking to Shu's head.

"Behemot, get off the bear's head," said the lady. "We have to go or we won't make it. We're in the standing area, so we have to hurry up."

Behemot complied, jumping off my brother's head and into her Master's chest.

"Now, if you'll excuse us, we will take our leave," the woman said and began walking away.

"Oh, wait a second," said Shu before reaching into his inventory, taking out some candy, and giving it to them.

"I bear gifts for all!" he exclaimed. "Enjoy it to your heart's content, you two."

"...Thank you very much."

"thx!"

With that, Behemot and her Master walked away from us. From the mention of a "standing area," it was fair to assume that she was going to see the event in the central arena.

"So it's not just children, eh? You seem to be popular with small animals, too," I said.

My words made Shu tilt his head for some reason. Though it wasn't too noticeable, with him not being a real bear and all.

"Well, I guess you can just say that I'm beary popular among the little ones," he said. "Everyone loves bears!"

"Whatever you say, bro." Though he'd said that he'd started wearing it because it was necessary, he seemed to enjoy it quite a lot.

"In fact, this bear suit is so popular that I don't really feel up fur wearing any other suit," he added.

"You have other ones?!"

"You don't have enough fingers to count the number of suits I have, and that's just for special rewards."

"That many?!"

I didn't know what was more surprising — the fact that he had that many special rewards or the fact that they were all suits.

Man, my brother is quite the barrel of laughs, I thought.

"Let's go and have a nice chat somewhere," he said.

"Sure. Let's go, Nemes— Wait, what's with that face?"

For some reason, she was just standing there. I suddenly noticed that she hadn't spoken a word for a while. I didn't know why, but she was looking at the direction where Behemot and her Master had gone.

"What's wrong?" I asked.

"Oh, it's nothing," she said. "I'm probably just imagining things. She has an Embryo, after all..."

I couldn't make out what she was so concerned about.

"Hey! Why are you just standing there?! Don't make me wait fur you!" exclaimed Shu.

"Oh, he's right. Let's go, Ray."

"Yeah."

We caught up with my brother, and we all decided to go to a café. He let us choose the place, so — by Nemesis's suggestion — we ended up go to the same sweet-focused café as yesterday.

I dread to imagine how much she'll eat, I thought.

◇◆◇

“Well then, Behemot. Are you quite satisfied?” she asked.

“lol...”

“Excellent. You did say that you found the bear cute and wished to hug him. Though I found it a bit improper, it’s good to see that you had your fill. Now, let’s hope that you can also get what you want from today’s fight, as well.”

“yeye.”

“Truly, I hope the Superiors in this nation are powerful… It would be great news indeed.”

“git hype.”

Chapter Two: Catching up

Paladin, Ray Starling

"Gardranda and Gouz-Maise, huh?" said Shu. "Looks like you've been through some beary strange things, Ray."

"You think so?" I asked.

At the familiar sweets parlor, my brother and I were having a little talk about what had happened so far. Since I was still full from the sandwiches from before, the only thing I ordered for this chat was tea.

Nemesis, on the other hand, was eating as she always did.

What the hell is up with your stomach? I thought.

"Encountering UBMs is rare, and even Epic ones are damn tough," he said. "It's not every day you get someone who fights and kills them not too long after entering Infinite Dendrogram."

Shu put some honey-covered pancakes into his mouth. Of course, he didn't neglect to use a fork. I was impressed that he could do it with those bear hands of his, but then I figured that it was probably easier than using a gatling gun.

Also, the overall image of a bear sitting on a chair and eating honey-covered pancakes was quite lavish. It seemed kinda cute, as well. At least, to anyone who didn't know that the person inside the suit was a man in his late twenties.

"Well, I'm probably not the one to talk, considering I killed my first UBM when I was on my first low-rank job," he continued.

"Huh?"

"It was also the time I met Figgy," he said. "We happened to get lost in a certain field and had to fight two UBMs..."

"TWO?!"

I instantly began imagining myself fighting both Gardranda and Gouz-Maise at the same time.

Nope, it'd be hopeless, I thought. Even as I was now, they'd kill me easily.

“So you and Figaro went two-on-two against them?” I asked.

“Nope,” he answered.

“Oh, so Figaro wasn’t the only who helped, then.”

“Wrong again. We both went against them one-on-one.”

Excuse me?

“Separating them was a real pain, and I really had to use my head to beat mine...”

“Wait. You said you were still on your first low-rank job, right?” I asked.

“Yeah.”

“What about Figaro?”

“He, too, was on his first job — Gladiator. Not even level 50, either.”

“...What about your Embryos?”

“Both were in their third forms. And no, neither of them had any giant-killing abilities like your Nemesis does.”

I was stunned into silence. I’m probably not in a position to think this, but how the hell did they do it? I mean, they didn’t even have the support I did. Also, he says it happened when he — one of the first players — was on his first job. Doesn’t that mean that they were among the first Masters to have beaten UBMs?

“Anyway, going any deeper into this would mean revealing Figgy’s Embryo’s abilities,” he said. “I’m beary averse to the idea of giving this info away myself, so I’ll only explain it to you after you more or less understand it yourself.”

“Well, then I guess I won’t push it,” I shrugged.

This duel city was Figaro’s hometown, and with him being the local king of the arenas, the people here had lots of info about him.

However, there was a decisive lack of knowledge about his Embryo. Its powers, shape, and even category were all a great mystery to everyone. The other two in the Kingdom of Altar’s Big Three weren’t like this in that regard. The King of Destruction’s Embryo was assumed to be a battleship, while the High Priestess’s was widely known to be the moonlit night. However, there was absolutely nothing known about the Embryo of the Over Gladiator.

I had seen Figaro fight the player killers in the video that Marie had shown me, but even then, I hadn’t seen a hint of his Embryo’s abilities.

If the event Shu was referring to was linked to the truth behind it, I could totally understand why he didn't want to talk about it.

"But you do know it, huh, bro?" I asked.

"Figgy and I have been acquainted fur a long time, after all," he answered. "A whole four years by Dendro standards."

"I see. So I guess you also know why he's so fixated on going solo?"

"I do, but going into that would mean compromising his privacy, so I won't explain it," he said.

"All right. I won't push it, then."

It was probably the core of the reason why Figaro had said he wasn't "interested in sloppy battles" and refused to participate in the war. I wanted to know, but if it was something private, I couldn't really delve any deeper.

"I must say, you seem to be quite well-connected, Brother Bear," commented Nemesis.

"Well, it happens kinda naturally when you've been a long-time player," he shrugged.

"This has been bothering me for a while... How many hours a day do you spend here, anyway?" I asked.

Being the unfairly rich neo-NEET that he was, Shu had all the time in the world, so I couldn't help but wonder.

"I know what you're thinking, but no, I'm leading a beary healthy life," he said.

"'Healthy,' as in...?" I prompted.

"I never neglect to have three meals a day, take a bath, go to the bathroom, and spend an hour training to keep myself muscular and aesthetic."

"You're basically saying that you spend the rest of your time here!"

That's not too different from a basement-dwelling sweaty tryhard! I thought.

"Well, I don't really have anything I want to do outside of here, so whatever," he said.

"With the time and money you have, you could easily get into a relationship."

Mom probably wants to become a grandmother by now, I thought. I was a high school student until recently, so it was too early for me. As for my elder sister... well... uhh... Anyway, Shu is the closest one to getting married... but from the looks of it, that won't happen for a while.

An hour passed by as we were talking about this and that.

"Anyway, I have somewhere to go to, so I'll be leaving now," Shu said at last.

"Well, all right," I replied. "See you at the show."

"Yeah. I'm beary excited to meet your friends."

And with that, he left.

On the table, there was a considerably large sum of money. Considering the huge reward I'd gotten, I'd planned to be the one to pay for us both, but he'd wanted to show off and had ended up doing it before I'd even gotten the chance. I gladly accepted his generosity.

Also, about 90% of the money we owed was due to Nemesis's eating. It was quite troubling how the amount she ate seemed to gradually increase. For someone named after a goddess of divine punishment, she sure enjoyed indulging in the deadly sin of gluttony.

"Oh, but you're wrong there, Ray," she read my thoughts and said.

"How?" I asked.

"Gluttony refers to the wasting of food through reckless consumption. I, however, savor and enjoy every bite before it becomes a part of my flesh. Thus, I am not a glutton, but a gourmet!"

"All right, that's fine, then," I said. "However, let me ask you one thing."

"Do go ahead."

"Just how much weight would you gain if it all actually became part of your flesh?"

Talking to girls about their weight isn't the nicest thing I can do, but seeing your eating habits is kinda troubling.

"Heh, there's no need to worry," she said. "I am an Embryo, remember? My shape and weight do not change easily."

"Riiiight. Ain't that greaaat."

"What's with the sarcasm?!"

Your shape and weight change a lot when you go into your other forms, though.

"So, wait, are all Embryos big eaters or what?" I asked.

"Wrong," said a voice coming from my side. "Being an Embryo has nothing to do with being a big eater. I'm not one, after all. Nemesis being gluttonous is her own problem. Which is good, since I really wouldn't like having such a monstrous stomach as part of my base stats."

"I see," I murmured. Now that I think about it, despite liking things ridiculously spicy, the Embryo Babi eats normal amounts of food. In all honesty, her blasphemous tastes seem a bit more normal than Nemesis's big eating —

"...Wait, what?!" I burst out, startled.

"Hm?!" Nemesis added.

"Hellooo," said the fully white girl now sitting at my side. She was Hugo's Embryo, Cyco. "The number of plates stacked next to Nemesis is terrifying. I don't think I could handle even 5% of it," she said before biting into a pure white no-bake cheesecake.

Her tone was as monotonous and disinterested as the last time I'd heard her speak. It seemed as though she'd been in this establishment for a while now, but despite her appearance standing out so much, I hadn't noticed her at all.

Was I really that preoccupied with my meal with Shu and Nemesis? I thought.

"You seem confused," she said. "The secret to this is the fact that I have the Presence Manipulation skill. To a certain extent, I can prevent myself from standing out."

"Why did you do that, though?" I asked.

"I surprised you, didn't I?"

"Well, yeah."

My answer made her put on the most smug and self-satisfied smile before she bit into her cake again.

...Huh? Did she really only want to surprise us?

"As hard to read as always, this girl," commented Nemesis.

Seriously. Though she was a friend who'd helped in the elimination of the Gouz-Maise Gang, I still had little grasp of what kind of person she was.

"Cyco," I addressed her. "Is Hugo not with you?"

"He should be here soon," she answered. "We split up for the search, but I just telepathically told him where we are, so just wait."

As I was about to ask what they were searching for, I heard the door open and the shop's bell ring. The one who entered the establishment was a familiar man wearing a militaristic rider suit.

“Greetings, Ray,” he said. “I believe I should thank God for meeting you again, safe and sound.” It was Hugo, acting as exaggerated, affected, and pompous as always.

Man, I’m sure meeting a lot of familiar people today, I thought.

The shop had entered its peak hours, and the more packed it became, the more Masters and foreign-looking people I saw.

“It’s delicious! The wiki was right! The sweets here are great!” a young girl squealed from behind me.

“...I-Io, y-you’re too loud...” one of her friends said.

“Peach tart, 80 points. Shortcake, 76 points. No-bake cheesecake... 95 points.”

Those young girls were getting noisy at the table behind me.

To the left of me, an Arabian-looking man, wearing a turban and everything, was noting something down. “Oh, there’s take-out here. I believe I found my souvenirs for Yumeji and Carl. Though perishable, they will last just fine in an inventory with good preservation ability. As for Albert... I should get him something other than food.”

Then there was a crude-looking group with beastly leather armor and a bunch of macho men in bandanas surrounding a girl in a pirate hat. Clearly, the customers were far more varied today than they had been yesterday. I could only assume that they’d all gathered to watch tonight’s event. And with this shop being in the same city as the arena, even those who didn’t fit in among its usual customers had come to enjoy some sweets.

“This is a pretty popular place, isn’t it?” I said.

“Indeed it is,” nodded Hugo. “Tians and Masters alike recognize it as a great sweets shop.”

“No-bake cheesecake, yogurt mousse, soft serve ice cream... Delicious,” agreed Cyco.

They both seemed quite satisfied with this establishment. Even though it looks like Cyco is only eating white things, for some reason.

Anyway, since Hugo and I had happened to meet up again, I told him about the reward.

“I never would’ve expected the bounty to be that great,” he said. “Truly surprising.”

His reaction was only natural. 80,000,000 was an astonishing amount of money.

“Now, about the split...” I said.

“Like I wrote in my letter, I intend to refuse it... but it doesn’t seem like you will agree to that, will you?”

“Hell no,” I said. Keeping such vast riches for myself was too much for me to handle. “Let’s split it in half.”

“No, I’ll be fine with just a quarter,” Hugo said. “I already refused it once, after all. And even then, it feels too much for me.”

“Really?” I asked. When it came to the Gouz-Maise Gang bounty, all I really deserved was the part for Maise, so I really wanted him to take more.

“You’re selfless and honest to a fault, aren’t you?” said Hugo. “You could’ve chosen to not inform me and keep the money for yourself.”

“Why would I lie to a friend like that?” I asked.

For some reason, my question made Hugo avert his gaze.

What’s wrong? I thought.

“Oh, also, this is something that happened at the knight offices...” I told him that I’d asked the knights to use the treasures the gang had left behind for charity.

“That’s fine by me,” he said. “I would’ve probably done the same.”

Well, that’s a relief, I thought. Just as I figured, he and I share a way of thinking.

“Indeed,” agreed Nemesis. “You two are quite alike.”

We’re both Maiden’s Masters, after all.

With that, the conversation about the bounty was over, and I gave Hugo his share of money.

Good thing none of it got stolen by a Thief or something... I really hope there are none of them in the shop... I thought.

“There, I now have my part of the bounty,” said Hugo. “Thank you. It will make up for the destroyed Marshall II.”

“Oh...? How much are those things, anyway?” I asked.

“10,000,000 lir.”

“T-TEN?!” I yelped.

I had no idea it was so luxurious!

“With special tuning and extras, it can easily go over 20,000,000 lir,” Hugo added. He pointed at the inventory where he’d just put the 20,000,000 lir I’d given him, his eyes still insisting that the Magingear’s destruction wasn’t going into the necessary expenses and that he didn’t actually need any more of the bounty.

"Still, it's quite an expensive piece of equipment," said Hugo. "Also, that is the original pricing, exclusive to us clan members of the Triangle of Wisdom. On Dryfe's standard marketplace, their price is twice as great. That number is doubled or tripled yet again when we're talking about the machines that have gotten leaked to Caldina." I had no idea whether I should be more surprised by the immense original pricing or by just how much greater it could grow.

"The pricing is the biggest problem with a Marshall II, and humanoid Magingears in general," he added. "The machines are generally as strong as Demi-Dragons, yet actual tamed Demi-Dragon monsters cost only about 3,000,000. A striking difference."

So that's how much Demi-Dragons cost, eh? I thought. Maybe I should buy one along with a carriage? Then again, I have Silver, so maybe I don't need it.

"Still, Magingears are not without their advantages," said Hugo. "For example, they don't use any minion capacity and can be mass-produced as long as there are materials and funds."

Anything "Demi-Dragon" was considered to be equivalent to a full party of people with low-rank jobs. Being able to create such things was quite a big deal. I could totally see why they were so costly.

"Yeah," I nodded. "Monsters are living creatures, and you sure as hell can't produce them just by having the materials and money."

"...True," he nodded.

"Also, you said something about Caldina selling them, as well. Can you elaborate?"

"Sure," he said. "Caldina imports and sells special items from all countries, even if they aren't actually exporting them. Dryfe's Magingears, Granvaloa's ships, Altar's Tomb Labyrinth drops, Tenchi's weaponry, Huang He's and Legendaria's magic items, etc. Caldina's main selling point is that, as long as you have the money, you can buy goods from every country. Even your social standing is dependent on how much you're offering."

"Money is Everything: the Country," huh? I thought.

"Due to that, many high-end players with fat wallets move over there... which has resulted in them having the most Superiors out of any country," Hugo muttered, clearly troubled by what he'd just said.

"'Most,' as in...?" I prompted.

"Nine Superiors," he answered. "The strongest force at any country's disposal."

"...Damn, that's a lot." The Kingdom of Altar had four, and nine was more than double that number. Thinking about that, I added, "Oh yeah, in the war, Dryfe—"

"Overwhelmed Altar, but was soon invaded by Caldina," he cut me off and explained. "Dryfe's Superiors had to leave the front lines to defend against those attacks, allowing Altar to prevail."

And that was why the kingdom had continued to exist even after a war in which none of its Superiors had participated. Sure, Altar didn't have enough power to retake the land taken by Dryfe, but still.

"Before the war, there was a large feast in Dryfe to celebrate the inevitable victory, yet the result was so inadequate that the one in charge of the country's domestic affairs — Prime Minister Vigoma — was at his wits' end," said Hugo. "Oh, by the way, Dryfe only has enough funds to buy the help of Masters just one more time. Anything beyond that would cause the economy to crash."

"You sure you can say that to me?" I asked.

"That's inside info that's readily available to Masters as lowly as myself. You see it quite often on online message boards, too. Me revealing it to you doesn't mean much."

"Oh, I see..."

"Anyway, to win this war, Dryfe has to either occupy the Kingdom of Altar before Caldina intervenes or merge with the country through peaceful methods."

Well, the latter case isn't impossible, considering that the kingdom has been weakened and is certainly not in a good shape to participate in a long-lasting war, I thought.

For better or for worse, Caldina had acted as a stopping force to prevent Dryfe from doing whatever they wanted.

...Still, I wasn't too fond of them, considering their involvement with the Gouz-Maise Gang.

"Oh, by the way," Hugo spoke up again. "Caldina was also the reason why Legendaria — Altar's ally — didn't participate in the war. Being south of Altar, the country is far from Dryfe while being extremely close to Caldina, which covers the entire desert area in the center of the continent. If Legendaria had sent its Superiors or tians with Superior Jobs to help in the war, Caldina would've used the opportunity to take it over. The reason why Caldina interfered in the war was to prevent Dryfe from merging with Altar, thereby stopping our country from gaining the momentum it needed to conquer the entire continent. However, Caldina itself is planning the exact same thing."

So there are two countries vying for world domination? These sure are turbulent times.

"The reason why Caldina only invades countries that show an opening is because it's in the middle of the continent," said Hugo.

Basic geopolitics. Besides Granvaloa, which was on the ocean, the countries of the world could be vertically split into three parts, like a French or an Italian flag. To the left were the three western countries: the Dryfe Imperium in the north, the Kingdom of Altar to the south of it, and Legendaria even further down. In the middle, there was the City-State Union of Caldina. And off to the right, there was the Huang He Empire and Tenchi — the island nation that was relatively close to the continent.

The central country, Caldina, shared a border with every nation except the far-east land of Tenchi.

"Dryfe, Altar, and Legendaria to the west and Huang He to the east, not to mention the sea-based nation of Granvaloa," said Hugo. "It's surrounded. If Caldina focused on attacking something, the other countries would use the opportunity to take its land. They have plenty reasons to do so, after all."

"A bit of a deadlock there, huh?" I said. And the only real way for the situation to move out of this stalemate would be the war between Altar and Dryfe.

"...This might be a bit belated, but why are you so casual about looking like that?" I added.

"Like what?" Hugo asked.

"Isn't that Dryfe's military uniform or something?" I asked.

Hugo was wearing the exact same clothing as yesterday — the ones that looked like a military uniform mixed with a rider suit. Considering Hugo's affiliations, it needn't be said what military the uniform belonged to. Thus, wearing it in this country didn't seem like a good idea.

"No, this isn't Dryfe's official equipment," he said. "It's the suit from GodFrame Grand Marshall."

"GodFrame Gra... what?"

"GodFrame Grand Marshall."

Well, if that doesn't sound like a name for a mecha show...

"When did this anime air?" I asked. Assuming that Hugo was French, it might've been a western cartoon...

"It's not an anime," he answered. "It's a manga drawn by a Painter belonging to the Triangle of Wisdom."

"Drawn... here?"

"In this world, yes."

Hugo began explaining how the manga had come to be.

After troubles too many to count, the Triangle of Wisdom had finally finished its first battle-ready robot Magingear, the Marshall II. Being a group of people who'd gathered for the very purpose of creating a robot straight out of a mecha anime, they'd gone absolutely nuts about it.

While most had gotten fired up to continue improving their robots, some had become motivated to do other things. One of the clan members had used the skills from his Painter job to draw a cool-looking Marshall II design.

From that, another member began had begun drawing a manga.

Those who couldn't draw had begun writing novels or creating models, while some had gone as far as composing opening themes and soundtracks.

With the ever-growing number of clan members, this chain reaction had continued until it had become a considerably large production.

The Triangle of Wisdom was pretty much a gathering of mecha anime fans. Having a Marshall II as reference had strengthened their inner fires and urged them to create various creative works. It had gotten to the point where they now dedicated an entire area of their headquarters just for such production. And among the things they produced was the clothing based on the suit of a pilot from the manga — the very same thing Hugo was wearing right now.

"So you're constantly cosplaying, huh?" I asked.

"It was actually made by a skilled crafter, so the stats are good, too," he said. "It's considered to be the uniform of Pilots belonging to the Triangle of Wisdom. Still, that's not well-known outside of our inner circle, so I can wear it in this country with no problem.”

“The stats are good?” I asked.

“Not nearly as good as those on special rewards, but it’s no doubt among the best things I can wear at my level.”

I could only imagine the amount of passion that had gone into the costume. Nothing could really stop a person when they got absorbed in something they liked.

“What about you?” I asked. “Did you join the Triangle of Wisdom because you’re a mecha fan?”

“No.” He shook his head. “I joined the clan because I know the leader. In fact, I started Infinite Dendrogram because he invited me.”

Well now, doesn’t that sound familiar? I thought. I started in the Kingdom of Altar because my brother told me to.

“All right, I have some things I want to know, as well,” said Hugo. “I’m especially curious about the details of the Gouz-Maise fight.”

“Sure, I’ll tell you,” I nodded. “After you and Cyco escaped with the children, Nemesis and I...”

After that, Hugo and I continued exchanging information or just chatting pointlessly for awhile.

“Oh, it’s time,” I said. Before I’d realized it, barely over an hour was left until the event began. I no longer had the time to go shopping at Alejandro’s, so I rescheduled to tomorrow.

“Is something happening?” asked Hugo.

“Yeah, I got my hands on a ticket for the event,” I said. “In the central arena, there’s gonna be a match between Figaro and Huang He’s Xunyu — two Superiors. Do you know about it?”

“I do. In fact, it’s probably what every Master in this city is here for.”

“Are you gonna see it, too?” I asked.

“...You could say that, yes.”

“Oh, we might meet in the arena, then.”

Hugo said nothing. He seemed to be pondering something.

Did I say something strange? I wondered.

“Ray, there’s something I want you to keep in the corner of your mind,” he said before taking a deep breath and continuing. “It’s west.”

“‘It,’ as in...?” I raised an eyebrow, not understanding what he meant.

“It’s nothing important,” he said. “You know how the fighters in the great arena’s matches enter from the east and west? Well, today’s main deal, the Over Gladiator, Figaro, will go in from the west side.”

“Is that how it works? I’ve never watched a match before, so I didn’t know,” I said, unable to shake the feeling that Hugo was hiding something. “Anyway, I’m going to the arena now.”

“I see,” said Hugo. “Cyco and I will wait a bit longer.”

“All right, then. Guess this is goodbye for now. Oh, should we add each other to our friends lists?” I asked. If we ever had business with each other, knowing whether the other person was online or not could be a great help.

“Not now,” he answered. “Let’s do it next time we meet... or the time after that.”

“Hmm. Well, that’s fine by me.” We seemed to have some sort of bond, so I didn’t doubt that we would meet again.

“Until then, Ray,” he said.

“See you again, Nemesis,” Cyco added.

“Yeah, later, Hugo,” I said.

“Until our paths cross once more, Cyco,” Nemesis added.

◇◆◇

“Hey, Hugo. Was it really okay to tell him that?” Cyco asked.

I said nothing.

“Isn’t that what they call ‘leaking information’?” she prodded.

“It might be,” I admitted.

“You don’t want the plan?” she asked.

“...Maybe, maybe not,” I said. “In all honesty, I’m not sure myself.”

“You’re not?”

I shook my head. “I certainly want to help fulfill his desires. If I didn’t, my very existence as Hugo would be meaningless. However, I also cannot ignore women in distress.”

“What an antinomy.”

“Antinomy... that’s a good word for it. I gave Ray the information, but that’s the whole extent of what I did. Whether he acts on it or processes it as idle chatter is of no matter to me. As a piece in the plan, I will only do what I must.”

"Then I will help you do whatever it is you do," Cyco said.

"Thank you." I nodded.

Interlude: Before the Festival

Royal capital Altea, State Guest House

In a certain part of the royal capital's noble district, there was a building meant to accommodate honored guests from foreign lands. One of its rooms currently had three people in it.

The first of them was a bedridden young boy with a mask covering the lower part of his face. The ice pack on his forehead and the occasional coughing made it obvious that he had a condition similar to a cold or flu.

The second person was a young woman standing by the boy's bed, looking obviously worried. Her thick glasses implied that she was nearsighted, and they made her appear like a fainthearted kind of person.

The third person was abnormally tall, to the point of making someone question whether that individual was actually a person.

The bedroom's ceiling was high — perhaps surpassing four metels — and yet the creature's head was almost touching it. Naturally, it was a weird sight, but the other two people didn't seem to be bothered by it.

The first person was Canglong, third prince of the Huang He Empire. The second was Lan Meihai, Huang He Ambassador. And the third was Master Jiangshi Xunyu, one of Huang He's Superiors.

Canglong coughed and coughed. "I'm sorry, Master Xunyu," he managed at last. "I wanted to watch the match and cheer for you, but I'm clearly not in the state for it..."

"It's fiNe. You just rest till you're healthy aGain," said Xunyu in response. "But man, seeing you bedriddEn is just..." The jiangshi heaved a sigh so heavy that the talisman covering the face did nothing to hide it.

"Yes. I find it quite curious, as well..." murmured the prince. "But at the very least, I can be glad that you didn't get ill, as well."

Soon after the long trip from Huang He to the Kingdom's royal capital, Canglong had become part of an Epidemic.

"Epidemic" was a term used to describe any sudden diseases that spread among the weak and strong alike. Masters saw it as an unpatterned, irregular, widespread Infinite Dendrogram event. There were many various Epidemics that covered many large areas, creating sufferers among both Masters and tians. Though some went away with the passage of time, some required special healing methods such as vaccines or healing magic available only to Superior Jobs.

Epidemics completely ignored all stats and resistances. Even high-level Masters would become bedridden or simply log out until the disease went away. They were considered to be natural disasters above human knowledge.

Needless to say, it was quite fortuitous that the current Epidemic was more like the common cold or flu than anything else. However, it was an illness nonetheless. Originally, Canglong had been meant to accompany Xunyu to the Clash of the Superiors and observe the battle, but it was clear that he was in no state to do that. The same applied to the first princess of the kingdom, who'd also succumbed to the Epidemic.

"Oh dear... umm... Your Highness, should I change the ice pack?" asked the woman fretfully. "Or would you like an apple?"

Meihai's worry about her country's prince's condition was needlessly excessive.

"Ambassador, you've changed the ice pack five times in the past hour. And I just peeled an apPle for him," said Xunyu. "Oh yeAh, this country's queen is sick, too, rigHt? That's the reason why Cang's business got postpoNed, isn't it?"

"M-Master Xunyu!" the ambassador protested. "She's not the queen, but the first princess!"

"...Whatever. She's acting as a queen, anYway."

"She isn't! There are many differences in a diplomatic setting! First of all...!" Meihai began arguing with — or merely lecturing — Xunyu. Though it made her seem quite childish, she was a member a distinguished family and had a lot of diplomatic skill that made her stand out as an ambassador.

Some might have argued that such behavior didn't belong in the presence of her country's prince; however...

"Hee hee. You never change, Mei," said Canglong before coughing again, clearly not minding her inappropriate behavior.

Though he spoke to her in a highly casual manner, Meihai definitely wasn’t in a respectable enough position to have the prince treat her like that. The reason he did was because Meihai’s mother was Cang’s foster mother, making them foster siblings. That meant that the only ones in the room were those who were close to Cang. The other chamberlains and officials were in a different part of the guest house.

“Master Xunyu,” said Cang and coughed. “Shouldn’t you go to Gideon now...?”

He was looking at the clock hanging in the room. The event would begin in about three hours. Normally, that amount of time was far too small to cover the distance to Gideon, which usually took a whole day and night. However, everyone in the room knew that it wouldn’t be a problem.

“You gonna be saFe?” asked Xunyu.

“You’ve no need to worry,” said Cang. “It’s true that I’m not at my best, but I’m sure I can manage.”

“Don’t be stuPid. You’d be overdoiNg it... Give me your hAnd.”

Cang did as he was told and Xunyu gave him a gem — a Jewel, to be precise.

“Master Xunyu?” he asked.

“It’s a spare Jewel. One of the ones I don’t plan to use in this match.”

“Are you sure you won’t?” the prince asked.

“Duels only allow you to use ones that don’t exceed your caPacity. Take iT,” said Xunyu and made Cang close his hand around the Jewel. Though it was done by the jiangshi’s blade-like claws, the action was strangely gentle, and didn’t put a single scratch on the prince.

“Then I shall take it, Master Xunyu,” said Cang.

“GoOd,” the eccentric nodded in response.

Following that exchange, Xunyu went to the window. After skillfully opening it with those blade-like claws, the jiangshi made them clash.

The resulting high-pitched, metallic sound made one of Cang’s chamberlains hastily run into the room.

“Your Highness! Master Xunyu! What is the matter?!” asked one of them.

“After we leaVe, close the winDow.”

“Excuse me?”

Ignoring the puzzled chamberlain, Xunyu extended one arm to the side — making it reach more than five metels in length — and made the metallic claw wrap around Meihai.

“Eh?” she sounded a voice of confusion.

“Well, ambassAdor, we’re goiNg to Gideon,” said the jiangshi. “Don’t bite your tongue on thE way.”

Then, Xunyu’s body bent...

“Umm, Master Xunyu! I-I’m not quite ready yet, so—AAAAAAaaaaahhhh!”

...and they both disappeared beyond the window, leaving behind only the echo of Meihai’s scream.

A few seconds later, they were on the walls of the noble district, so far from Cang’s room that they looked like ants.

“Goodbye, Master Xunyu and Mei,” the boy said as he raised up his upper body from the bed and waved at them.

The chamberlain had no words for what had just happened, so she did as she was told and simply closed the window.

Thus, the Master Jiangshi Xunyu left the capital and went towards Gideon.

◇◆◇

Gideon, City of Duels, ???

The city of Gideon was full of excitement.

With it being the most prosperous town in the Kingdom of Altar, such a mood wasn’t a new thing here. However, the enthusiasm that had enveloped it this evening was on a different level than usual.

The reason for that was the fact that the event happening in the central arena was simply that big.

It was a duel between Superiors — something that had never happened in any duel city anywhere.

People gathered from in and outside of the city and even other countries, and everyone was full of enthusiasm and expectations for the event. It seemed as though all of Gideon was lapsing into delirium with excitement.

However, the town also included someone who shared none of that sentiment.

That person was looking down at Gideon with cold eyes, and that was no exaggeration. After all, he was wearing an Adélie penguin suit. Those cold, man-made eyes made it hard to guess what the person inside was thinking.

However, from the way the person was groaning and holding his head in his right hand, it was clear that he wasn't in an optimal state of mind.

"Ohh boy... Ohhh man... Ohhhhhhhhh crap..."

After a moment of writhing, he used the Portable Communication Magic Device in his other hand to contact someone.

Two or so minutes passed before that someone answered.

"Ayy there, Your Excellency," the penguin idly complained to the person on the other side. "There's been a change of plans. One of my boys in the royal capital contacted me and, well... he said that the first princess won't be coming."

The information he was nonchalantly complaining about was a secret that was supposedly only available to a select few officials.

"And when I told it to His Majesty's people... well, just her, actually, since she's his contact and all... she actually went, 'Then we will simply enjoy the fight and the sights here,'" he went on. "Ohhhh man..."

The penguin and the person who'd answered the call had a certain plan. That plan was based on the participation of the first princess and the help of another person.

"Well, yeah, with her being the Imperium's strongest, her presence changes a lot. Now we're left without a joker."

The penguin spoke his complaints in a blatantly sad manner. Sad as his tone was, however, he was still smiling.

"Well, it won't be a problem. She was a bit too much for this plan, anyway. Even if I don't have all five of my cards, the other four are more than enough for the job."

He went on:

"From my clan, there's me, Veldorbell, and my favorite. Then there are the betrayers... Yes, the ones that want to switch sides to Dryfe. Sure, they don't want to go to the gaol, so they'll probably fight only Masters, but that's more than enough, honestly. Tians without Superior Jobs aren't a threat... Oh no, I'm definitely not belittling the Imperium's forces. Still, what we have is good enough for a 90% chance of success."

The person on the other side seemed to agree with the penguin's words. However...

"You want the chances of success if there's a Superior that's aware of the plan? 50%." The penguin answered the person's question without a moment of hesitation.

"Ha ha ha! 'Won't it become lower?' you ask?" The person inside the suit then put on a faint smile...

"Have you forgotten who you're talking to?"

He spoke with a menacing voice thick with madness and even bloodlust.

"So yeah, the plan's target will have to be changed, and I'll have to do some other tweaks, but I'm still going through with it. You just sit there and pray for my success."

With that, he ended the call.

"No stops from our sponsor, then. Guess the financial situation ain't the best, so he probably wants it to be over quickly. This means that the plan's failure would likely lead to us doing it the field marshal's way..." The man inside the penguin suit chuckled. "Come what may, I say. Though I have no idea how things would proceed if someone tough showed up. What should I try then? How far should I go?"

As he imagined what would happen next, the suited man's expression changed. It was reminiscent of both an innocent child pouring water or inserting firecrackers into an ant colony, and a cool-headed, calculating adult considering how things could unfold. However, he soon remembered something and reassessed the situation.

Oh, but anyone tough would probably lose to him before I even got the chance to intervene. The penguin remembered the Master he'd brought to the city. It was a person that he knew very well, and a rookie who'd started Infinite Dendrogram no more than a month ago. Though being a Maiden's Master made him quite special, he was still far from a veteran.

His Embryo is a joker card in its own right. Anyone who's tough and has a relevant history is at a disadvantage. Honestly, if the situation is right...

"...I wouldn't be surprised if he killed every Master in Gideon all by himself," the penguin said.

Despite that Master being a rookie, the penguin had unwavering trust in his powers, and in the results he would bring.

Chapter Three: Xunyu the Yinglong

Paladin, Ray Starling

Opera halls and the like had a thing called "boxes" or "loges." Half-open, half-closed and fixed to the walls, they were luxury seats which gave the best view of the stage.

Our box in the central arena was much like one of those, but not completely. It was closed off, but the wall facing the stage was all glass, giving us an unbroken view of the fight.

The normal seats in the arena were like those in a soccer stadium. The paths linking those with the viewer benches were all made of a stony material, while those of us in the box seats had a carpet under our feet and some fancy, antique-looking chairs — antique-looking by the standard of this world, anyway.

There was quite a bit of space between them, too, giving each of us the option to ignore the rough duels beneath and just relax. And with the fully-functional air-conditioning, the comfort here was nothing short of perfect.

Man, is this fancy, I thought. I can totally see why it cost a whole 100,000 lir. Of course, this is actually the equivalent of spending 1,000,000 yen to watch real life sports, which is something I'd definitely never do.

"For someone with a fortune of 60,000,000 lir in his pocket, you sure are frugal," said Nemesis.

Having money doesn't mean I have to be inconsiderate about how I spend it.

"Gacha."

"Guahh..." I groaned, unable to say anything back to her.

...B-But gacha has a charm that I can't resist, and...

"Ray, won't you watch the match?" asked Marie, who was sitting next to me.

"Oh, yeah, I will," I replied and shifted my attention to the stage.

Before that, though, I took one last look around our box. The ones in here were me, Nemesis, Rook, Babi, and Marie.

Due to Nemesis and Babi being Embryos, the two had gotten in here for free. However, I hadn't known that beforehand, so I'd tried to get in after returning Nemesis to the crest.

"This is not something I like saying, but I felt like a dog about to be carried in one of those portable crates," she said.

What kind of comparison is that? I thought.

"Oh, right. You're the dog here," she went on.

"Could you not dig up a memory I want to forget?!"

The dog ears disappeared this morning, and I want them gone from my head, too!

"They looked quite good on you, though," she said.

...Yeah, whatever.

Anyway, we five were the only people here. My brother, the last person in our box, still hadn't arrived yet.

Did he stop by a shop or something? I thought. Oh, well. I'll just wait for him while watching the match.

There was a semi-event going on in the battlefield below. It was a perfect chance for me to reassess how duels work.

First, once the people stood on the stage, they set and agreed to the battle conditions. Then, they activate a special duel city barrier and begin fighting.

Inside the barrier, any injuries received, including fatal ones and player death penalties, disappeared after the battle was over. That allowed for deadly-yet-safe fighting.

The safety of the spectators was accounted for, as well. Multiple layers of barriers separated the audience and the duelists, letting through only sound, light, and the fighters' enthusiasm.

Of course, dangerous light like lasers or dangerous sound like destructive sonic explosions were blocked, too. Though apparently, players under level 50 — like me — could pass through the barrier unhindered, which was the reason why I couldn't participate in duels yet.

Also, the box we were in had come equipped with various devices. For example, there were monitors imbued with farsight magic, letting us observe the battle from numerous angles. The battle's sounds reached us, as well, including the words of the participants and the names of the skills they used. All of it made for a highly simple and convenient viewing experience.

These boxes were used by wealthy tian nobles, traders, and Masters who wanted to analyze the fighters on the stage.

"But many are just enjoying the duel, right?" I said to myself.

Due to no one's life being in danger, there were a lot of people who participated in duels. It was a popular activity among Masters and tian fighters alike. However, the main attraction of the arenas was the duels between Masters, and after seeing the fight before me, I could totally understand why. It was simply on a different level.

"Hhaahhhh!" shouted one of the Masters in the fight before me.

She was a black longsword-wielding, gothic-looking girl with black wings reminiscent of fallen angels sprouting from her back, and she freely flew around the space inside the barrier while leaving black feathers all around her.

"Blackwing Orchestra!"

Each and every one of the innumerable scattered feathers released jet-black wind blades. They formed a dark lattice which rent the air as it surrounded the enemy, fully intent on slicing her apart.

However, the opponent, a girl wearing a pirate hat and swinging around a giant golden ax as if it was no big deal, tightly gripped her weapon and forced it into the stage's stony floor. "World Reversal Waterfall!"

A moment later, the seemingly-empty stage's surface released a great flow of water with a force far more immense than a flash flood's.

The jet surrounding the girl was much like the skill's name: a reverse waterfall. It made the surrounding black wind blades completely vanish.

However, at that moment, the black-winged girl broke through an opening in the waterfall caused by the clashing between the water and the feathers, and slashed straight at the pirate girl, who still had her ax stuck in the stage.

The pirate girl used her left bracer to block the attack, but it wasn't enough. It broke through the material and damaged her regardless. But at the same time, the gothic girl bent her body due to injury.

Right as the pirate girl raised her left hand to protect herself, she used a blind spot created by the enemy's attack to launch an offensive skill with her right hand, creating a ball of water which hit the gothic girl right in her abdomen.

The winged girl instantly jumped backwards, and the pirate girl's ax cut through the air where she'd just stood. She'd probably been aiming to make use of the gothic girl's loss of posture, but it hadn't worked.

The two spread out, creating some distance between them, then stared at each other, predicted their opponent's moves, and clashed once again.

"Damn, they're good," I said. I was a bunch of tiers beneath them, not just in terms of basic stats, but playing skill, as well. "But I can still see them."

Which was strange, since Marie had told me that high AGI would make people immensely fast.

"Oh, that's because the flow of time is set to slow down inside the barrier," she said. "From the fighters' perspective, they're moving at their actual battle speed, while we in the audience see it in a speed that allows us to properly observe what's going on. There's a limit to this, though."

"Well, that's convenient," I said.

"Truly," she agreed. "That's how it works from a player's perspective. But according to the setting, this is lost technology from an old civilization."

So the arena itself is the same kind of thing as Silver, huh? I thought.

"I'd say it's necessary, though," she added. "If they fought at their normal speed, not even a tenth of the spectators could see what's going on."

Well, that sure says a lot about just how fast they're fighting.

"They're Juliet the 'Black Raven' and Chelsea the 'Vagrant Golden Sea.' Both are highly experienced Masters with sixth form Embryos. They're also on Altar's duel rankings. The former is fourth, while the latter is eighth."

That made sense, considering how well they were fighting.

"I think I saw the one in the pirate hat when we were eating sweets," said Nemesis.

Now that you mention it, yeah, she might've been there, I thought.

Nemesis turned to Marie. "Are 'Black Raven' and 'Vagrant Golden Sea' their nicknames?"

"Yes," she nodded. "As for jobs, well, the former is a Fallen Knight — a Superior Job derived from the dark knight subgroup of the knight grouping — while the latter is a Great Pirate — a high-rank job from the pirate grouping."

Oh, Black Raven is in the knight grouping? I thought. I'm not sure whether it makes me feel any affinity for her. I mean, her equipment is a bit scary-looking...

"I sincerely doubt the girl would like to hear that from you, of all people," commented Nemesis.

What's that supposed to mean?

"By the way, are Superior Jobs common?" I asked.

"Not when you look at the whole picture," Marie answered. "Still, there are far more of them than Superiors, Masters with Superior Embryos. If I had to guess, I'd say that people with Superior Jobs are in the quadruple digits. Even tians can get those jobs, after all."

That was a greater number than I'd expected.

"Strong Masters stuck with high-rank Embryos often go for those jobs," she added.

"But despite being strong, this 'Vagrant Golden Sea' lady doesn't have a Superior Job, right?" asked Rook.

"Oh, Chelsea is one of those who've yet to discover a Superior Job she could take," said Marie. "There are tons of jobs with unknown conditions, after all."

Well, her status makes sense now, I thought.

"Having your Superior Job get occupied before you even know its conditions must be tragic," I commented.

"Oh, that happens a lot," said Marie. "Some Superior Jobs have similar conditions, after all. There are even people who have taken two of them."

"What an unfair world... Ah!"

As I listened to Marie's explanation, something big began happening in the match. The wings of the Fallen Knight, Juliet, disappeared, and a moment later, countless black feathers gathered around her hands. Soon, they all began whirling around her arms, accelerating to speeds so great it became hard to differentiate them.

The Great Pirate, Chelsea, swung her ax and made its wide middle part face her opponent. Then the golden ax part vanished, leaving behind a hole which released a powerful flow of golden seawater.

Using all their magic and technique, the two reached the limits of their power and unleashed their ultimate attacks.

"Corpse-Eating Bird — Hræsvelgr!"

"Golden Bull Tsunami — Poseidon!"

The stage became overwhelmed by the clash between a dark whirlwind and a golden tsunami.

Even with all the layers of barriers separating us, the visual pressure and the sound waves reaching us were still overwhelming.

The struggle between a tornado and a tidal wave — likely the results of their trump cards — made for a sight that felt completely otherworldly.

Their Embryos were in their sixth forms, making them four tiers above Nemesis. Naturally, their destructive power was immense. It wouldn't have surprised me if both of those attacks were doing enough damage to instantly pulverize Gardranda.

However, there was more than just power to them. The entire battle that had led to this moment was a show of just how skilled they really were.

"So, is it safe to assume that these attacks are the 'ultimate skills' you told us about, and that their Embryo names are Hræsvelgr and Poseidon?" asked Nemesis.

"Yes," she said. "These attacks are their Embryos' ultimate skills, each named after the Embryo itself. They express the Embryo's dominant characteristics, which is why Hræsvelgr is a dark-wind mixed-element magic attack, while Poseidon is a liquid-summoning skill."

"Is there a difference between liquid-summoning and the water element?" I asked.

"In the simplest of terms, liquid-summoning is physical, while elements, including water, are magic. By the way, the liquid from Poseidon's ultimate skill is basically standard-temperature molten gold, and is far heavier than normal water. It can easily flatten fortresses."

"How luxurious," I said. "Damn freaky, too."

"Well, it all disappears after the attack is over."

That made sense. A person that could constantly spawn gold wouldn't be good for the game's market price.

"But man, I've gotta say, you're pretty knowledgeable about them, aren't you?" I asked.

"They're frequent duelists, after all," she replied. "There's lots of info about them."

That was the thing about duels. Masters who participated in Gideon's duels would receive rewards regardless of whether they won or lost — though, naturally, the victor got more. For those who fought in this arena's main events, the reward could easily reach 5,000,000 lir. With today's event being so special, that number was multiplied tenfold. Naturally, those are some high returns, but they came at a high risk of giving information about yourself to the spectators — other players included.

Marie had demonstrated this cost quite well. Being part of DIN, she knew everything from the two girls' jobs to the details of their Embryos' ultimate skills.

"Still, there are frequent duelists about whom we know absolutely nothing," she added.

I was silent.

"That's why I'm very excited about the next match."

The battle on the stage reached its end, and Juliet the Black Raven proclaimed her victory.

With that, it was time for the main event.

It was a match which would involve Gideon's ultimate king of duels, number one on the Kingdom of Altar's duel rankings: Over Gladiator, Figaro. His opponent was number two on the Huang He Empire's duel rankings: Master Jiangshi, Xunyu.

The curtains were about to rise for the Clash of the Superiors.

◇

The Kingdom of Altar had four Masters with Superior Embryos.

I'd seen them battle — no, completely annihilate — the PK clans surrounding the capital, so I was more than aware that their power was stupidly immense.

According to Marie, low-rank, high-rank, and Superior Embryos were all on completely different levels.

"To compare, low-rank are like dogs, high-rank are like tigers, and Superior-rank are like dragons," she said.

Naturally, this made for a difference so great, it left no room for hope for the lower creature. No normal players could match Superiors and their absolute power, so it was inevitable that they researched and gathered as much info on them as they could.

Therefore, because both dueling Masters were Superiors, most of these curious folks were focusing on their Superior Embryos.

There was so little info on the Kingdom of Altar's Superior Embryos that not even DIN knew much about them. Even the names of three of them were a complete mystery, while their abilities didn't even leave the realm of speculation.

The one Embryo that was known was High Priestess Tsukuyo Fuso's, but that certainly couldn't be said about the other three. Previously, Marie had suggested that the King of Destruction's Embryo was a battleship, but again, that was nothing but speculation. People merely assumed that based on the glimpses of a large shape lingering around the complete and utter destruction he left in his wake.

Due to this desperate lack of info, players were still eagerly searching for hints about their abilities. And, of course, a match involving Figaro was nothing short of a perfect opportunity.

"So that's what's been keeping you busy, huh?" I asked Marie.

"Yeah."

After the semi-event was done, there was a thirty minute interval until the main event began. It was used for maintenance of the stage and the barrier. Marie spent a lot of this time taking out various equipment from her inventory and setting it up. She was going to record the fight for her Journalist work.

Rook and Babi, seemingly tired from something they'd done in the afternoon, were spread out on their chairs and sleeping.

Better wake them up when the match begins, I thought.

Nemesis, as was standard with her, was emptying food she'd bought at one of the stands here.

After watching my party members, I began looking around the arena, when...

"...Huh?" I said.

"Hm?" she added.

Nemesis and I noticed something.

We saw a black shape disappear into the hallway below, and it was highly reminiscent of the black bear suit that my brother wore.

"What do you think?" asked Nemesis.

"Shu isn't the only one in this world to wear a suit, but it looked very similar to his."

However, assuming it was him, I could only wonder why he was there and not here in our box.

"I'll go check," I said and stood up.

"I'll come with you," said Nemesis.

After telling Marie that I'd be back before the event started, I went to search for my brother.

The arena's inner hallways were stony and had a design similar to the one used in real life sports stadiums.

Sure, there weren't any vending machines, but there were people selling light food and drinks. With the main event getting closer, many people were rushing to stock up on snacks or to answer mother nature's call, causing the hallways to be pretty crowded.

Though it didn't matter to the players — who logged out and did their business in reality — this world had flushable toilets. They were based on magic and were quite common in middle and upper class households.

Baths existed here, as well. However, they weren't too common in commoner residences, so most people opted for public bathhouses. I was even told that one of the twelve districts here in Gideon was known as the bath district.

First a Colosseum, then bathhouses... this city is strangely similar to ancient Rome, I thought.

"I don't see Brother Bear anywhere," said Nemesis.

"Strange, considering how much he stands out," I commented.

I didn't know for sure whether it had been him or not, but I had little doubt that I'd seen a bear suit...

"Hm? Doesn't this look suspicious to you?" she asked, pausing outside a corridor.

"It says 'Staff Only,' though," I said.

"We can just pretend that we got lost. I can even act out a good lost child."

"...Might I ask how?"

"Meow meow mew meow, meow meow mew meow."

"That's just the mewing kitten from that children's song!"

"I really don't like how it ends with the kitten still being lost."

Well, it asked a crow and a sparrow for directions, so it's to be expected that it didn't find its way.

Now, back to the matter at hand...

Nemesis and I entered the staff-only hallway. I expected to get confronted instantly, but it seemed that the arena staff were too busy preparing for the event in other places, leaving the hallway empty.

After going a bit further, I heard a familiar voice from behind the corner. Stealthily, I took a peek at the two speakers.

"We have two among the spectators. One's the guy from Caldina, and... Dryfe's King of Beasts, I think."

"I see. I'm sure getting some attention, aren't I?"

"Well, it's the first time you've been in an arena battle against another Superior. They're probably thinking that they can finally get info on you."

"I'm not really hiding it or anything, though."

"Yeah, it's just that your Embryo's effects are simple and not flashy at all."

"You might be right."

"Also... overall, the city's enthusiastic, but I'm smelling something really fishy. I saw some shady-looking kingdom people. They might be planning something, so you should be on your guard. I'm warning you because you're usually dense about stuff like this."

"All right... Am I really that dense, though?"

"You're a calm yet hot-blooded idiot, Figgy my boy."

"Really? I'm not sure if I agree."

"What do you do if you see a weird silhouette in the dungeon?"

"Launch a Crimson Dead Keeper from mid-range."

"What do you do if a PK group occupies an area?"

"Kill all the members, face the leader, and demand that they leave."

"What do you do if there's a horde of monsters and all you have is a club?"

"Charge at them."

"Yeah, you're hot-blooded."

"...You might be right."

Behind the corner, a black bear suit was talking to a golden lion suit.

"Why are you so stiff? What did you s—PFFT...?!" The sight made Nemesis burst into laughter, which attracted the two's attention.

"Ayy, haven't seen you fur... however long has passed since teatime," said the black bear. As expected, he was my brother.

"Well, if it isn't Ray and Nemesis," added the golden lion. "I see you made it to this city."

The golden lion talked to me in Figaro's voice. In fact, it was Figaro.

"Umm..."

All right, Figaro's pretty weird, too, I thought. That makes three, so it's safe to conclude that suits are a sign of a weirdo.

The four of us moved from the hallway to Figaro's waiting room.

"So, why are you in a lion suit?" I asked.

"I'm quite famous in this city," he said. "Walking around like normal can get pretty troublesome."

Oh, so it's like the hat and sunglasses combo that celebrities use.

"It's just a piece of joke equipment I bought at the bazaar, though," he added. "I wouldn't mind having a UBM special reward suit like Shu's, but MVPs only get what they really need."

True. My Miasmaflame Bracers and Grudge-soaked Greaves had been exactly what I'd needed.

"I've defeated many UBMs, and I've yet to get a single suit," he said and faced my brother. "How do you even get them, Shu?"

"Listen, Figgy boy, you wouldn't like it if all the UBM rewards you got except for one were suits, now, would you?" said Shu. "You can't equip more than one of them, after all."

I'm really curious about that exception. I thought. What could he have a gotten that's not a suit? A portable signboard?

"Unlike me, getting special reward equipment doesn't mean all that much to you," said Figaro. "The system probably thinks that it's best to just give you another suit."

"Damn you, Humpty... You're unbearable!" Shu complained.

"Are control AIs actually responsible for that?" Figaro asked.

"I care not!" snapped Shu.

There's this and the thing with his first login... Is Shu actually hated by the control AIs? I thought.

"I must say, you two sure get along well," said Nemesis. "Brother Bear already told us that you're friends, but still."

"Friends... well, yes we are," said Figaro in response. "You probably know this by now, but Shu and I are this country's Su—"

"'Super Splendid and Merry Suit Club' members!" Shu broke in. "There are only two people in it fur now."

...Just you two? Also, it's pretty blatant that only Figaro got dragged into it.

“U-Umm...” Figaro hesitantly spoke up. “Oh, speaking of special rewards, your bracers and boots seem like fine pieces of equipment.”

“Oh, yes,” I responded. “I’ve defeated two UBMs so far.”

“Oho... Hmm... ‘Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda’ and ‘Grudge-soaked Greaves, Gouz-Maise.’ Oh, so you were the one who defeated the gang that everyone was talking about.”

“Yes,” I said.

In all honesty, I wished to have a word with him. If Figaro had done something about the Gouz-Maise Gang, they would’ve been defeated much earlier and there would’ve been far fewer victims.

However, I was aware that there was no use in saying it at this point. Figaro had probably had his own reasons for not going. Also, the idea of demanding that a person should do something simply because they were capable of doing it seemed pretty unreasonable.

“After all, you yourself are the type to attempt something regardless of whether you actually have the power to do it,” said Nemesis.

You might be right, I thought.

The various things that had happened during that quest were now a part of me. Considering what could’ve been if someone else had gone instead of me was a mistake.

“Both of them have good skills... and your own feelings,” said Figaro. “Make sure to treasure them.”

“I will,” I nodded. But man, he just identified my equipment as if it’s no big deal.

“When identifying people’s equipment, the information you get is often beary limited, but Figgy’s Identification skill is almost maxed, so the details aren’t hidden to him,” said Shu. “Still, it doesn’t work on stuff like special rewards with a concealment effect on them.”

“Like this thing,” said Figaro as he pointed at Shu’s suit.

It dawned on me for the first time that my brother’s suit, being Ancient Legendary, was a far bigger deal than I’d thought it was. No one could really fault me for that, though. It looked like a mere piece of joke equipment. But now, I knew that it was a piece of joke equipment with ridiculously good stats.

“By the way, why were you in a staff-only hallway?” asked Shu.

I explained that I'd seen him from the box and had come to look for him.

"Why didn't you come to the box?" I asked. "You have a ticket, don't you?"

"Oh, I just had some beary unimportant business to attend to. Been walking around here and there."

"I see," I nodded. "Still, I'd like it if you got there before the match. I want to introduce you to my party."

"Yeah, I'll be there in a minute. Oh, right, I forgot to give this to you during our teatime." Shu dug through his inventory and took out something resembling ear cuffs.

"What's this?" I asked.

"Telepathy Cuffs," he answered. "It bears a power that allows you to telepathically talk to friends who also have this equipped."

"For real?" I took it from him and put it on my ear, filling up one of my accessory slots.

[Can you hear me?] Shu's voice rang out in my head.

I was used to telepathy with Nemesis, but the way I heard this was different.

[Yeah, I can,] I answered.

[Then the test went fine.]

Damn fine, actually, I thought.

From what I could see, his bear ears didn't have any Cuffs on them. Well, obviously they wouldn't work unless he had them on his actual ears. He's probably wearing them inside the suit.

"This item's pretty useful," I said.

"Beary useful, yes, but there's a range limit. It should cover all of Gideon and its surroundings, though," explained Shu. "I was actually planning on giving this to you when we split up in the capital."

"I see. I'd say that now is the better time, though. If you'd given me this when I started, I feel like I would've relied on you more than I should've."

"Nice to see such enthusiasm for self-reliance. Still, do call me when you're sure you can't handle something by yourself."

"Yeah. Help me out when I really need it."

"I will," he said as he puffed out his chest. There was pride in that action, but his appearance made it seem somewhat humorous, as well.

“Oh, it’s almost time,” said Figaro.

I looked at the clock and, sure enough, the main event was a mere 15 minutes away. Figaro probably had some preparations to make, so it was time for us to leave.

“Figaro, do your best in the duel,” I said.

“We’re acquaintances at this point, so we’re cheering for you!” added Nemesis.

“Thank you,” he responded. “Oh, by the way, the reception should still be open, so you could go there and bet on me.”

Figaro used some skill or something to instantly switch from his lion suit to the equipment he’d worn when I’d met him in the Tomb Labyrinth. Then, he put on a gentle, yet strong, smile.

“I’ll win, so you will surely make a profit.”

He said that as if it were already a fact.

I felt as though those words carried the pride of an unmatched king and the weight of the entire history that led him to becoming the duel city’s strongest.

“All right,” I said.

If he says it with such confidence, I have no reason to not do it, I thought.

“I’ll come after talking to Figgy a bit more,” my brother said. “Wait fur me in the box.”

“Well, okay,” I said.

With that, Nemesis and I left the waiting room.

◇◇◇

“By the way, what is this ‘Splendid and Merry Suit Club,’ Shu?” Figaro asked.

“That was the only thing that came to mind at that point.”

“Have you actually not told him who you are yet?”

“Leave that aside fur now,” said Shu. “What’s important right now is the upcoming event.”

“True.”

“You pretty much just said that you’re certain you’ll win, but the opponent isn’t that easy, right? If you ask me, your chances are 50%, if not lower.”

“That’s about how I see it, too. I’m facing one of the Huang He Si Ling — the country’s four strongest.”

“And you’re the Kingdom of Altar’s toughest solo player — Figaro the Endless Chain.”

“I probably shouldn’t say this myself, but both sides sure are something,” Figaro said. “I wouldn’t mind watching this fight.”

“Okay, now wait just a second here.”

“Don’t worry. Battles such as these, ones that set my life ablaze, are the very reason why I’m here in Infinite Dendrogram. That’s why... I’ll win with all that I am.”

◇◇◇

The arena’s reception counter was split into two — one for battle entries and one for gambling. The window for entries was already closed for the day. Also, with most people already having placed their bets and the match starting in but a few minutes, the hallway was almost completely empty.

The board above the counters — which looked much like an electric one due to the magic it used — displayed the odds for the main event. It said “1.2x” next to Figaro and “5.6x” next to his opponent. The difference was considerably great, but that was a testament to just how much people trusted Figaro’s power.

I spoke to the receptionist and went through the betting process.

“How much are you betting?” asked Nemesis.

“Well, it’s just 1.2x, so I won’t win all that much if I don’t put lots of money into it,” I said. “So let’s go with this.”

I bet 60,000,000 lir on Figaro.

“YOU IMBECILE!” howled Nemesis as she hit me with a dropkick and launched me across the hallway.

“Wh-What are you doing?!” I exclaimed.

“No, what are you doing?! Why are you throwing all the riches you’ve been blessed with into a gamble?!”

“Because I believe what Figaro told me.”

“Be honest,” she snarled.

“...I wanted to have an authentic gambling manga experience.”

“All right, sit down right there. I’ll thoroughly teach you about the importance of money!” Nemesis then commenced to scold me right in front of the reception...

“Too bAd, guy. All of that’s going down the dRain.”

I heard a strange mutter and felt someone grab my shoulder. I gasped and hastily turned around, but I didn’t see anyone before me.

Actually, I did, but the person was standing ten meters ahead. It was impossible to grab anyone’s shoulder from such a distance, and indeed, nothing was touching mine anymore.

For a moment, I thought that I only imagined someone touching my shoulder because I heard the voice, but concluded that it couldn’t be true, for the sensation was still there.

The touch was colder than ice, making me feel as though it had grabbed not just my shoulder, but my very heart under my ribcage.

“So Figaro’s just 1.2x, eH?” the creature spoke. “I know I’m the ‘away’ fighter hEre and all, but damn, thEy’re seriously underestimaTing me.”

Even when filtered through Infinite Dendrogram’s excellent translation function, the words still came with a strange intonation.

The creature walked while releasing an abnormal aura. As it approached, the people that were still in the hallway backed away or outright ran for it.

The receptionist lady, too, fell out of her chair and sank to the floor, looking like she was about to cry. No one could really fault her.

I had no idea what made the creature seem so unamused, so full of ire, but it was emitting immense amounts of bloodlust all around it.

I silently watched the creature. At the core, we humans were nothing but animals, and my base instincts were warning me that I was facing death itself. However, I kept looking at it regardless. And as I did, I realized that the creature’s very form was as abnormal as its aura.

Also, it was more than ten meters away from me. The reason why I’d thought it was closer was its unnatural height, which seemed to surpass four meters.

Though the hallway had been built with tall Demi-Humans in mind, it was still just barely large enough for it.

The creature was wearing a hat with a talisman hanging at the front, making it reminiscent of jiangshi from Chinese movies. Its body was covered in loose clothing that seemed too big for it, only giving slight peeks of its limbs. However, the very fact that those limbs could peek from under those two meter-long sleeves was more than daunting.

Its legs and arms were ridiculously long. The nails were metallic, sharp, and intimidating enough to make me absolutely certain that they had been used to kill thousands.

Naturally, the creature was frightening.

“Gh...!” Becoming aware of my fear made my legs shiver.

The Demi-Dragon Worm, Gardranda, Gouz-Maise... not a single one of the mighty creatures I’d faced had ever made me lose my fighting spirit, but the thing before me almost made it shatter. My instincts were telling me that this tall creature was on an entirely different level than anything I’d fought and that my only real option was to run away.

However, before I could do that, I noticed that it was holding a woman as if she was piece of baggage.

“Ah!”

The pained expression on her face rendered me incapable of ignoring them and running away.

“Nemesis!” I shouted.

“Got it!” she replied and instantly merged with me, taking her greatsword form.

Feeling my partner’s palpitations in my right hand instantly revived my will to fight.

“WhAt? You wanNa go?” the creature responded as I pointed my greatsword at it.

The creature raised its right hand in a bored manner while still holding the girl in its left.

The motion was followed by an unamused sigh, after which the right hand bent in a bizarre manner, taking a sickle-like shape.

At the same time, the bloodlust it was releasing into the surroundings was suddenly focused on me, which was a sign of an attack.

“Coun—”

“Too slOw.”

I momentarily envisioned Nemesis breaking and my head soaring through the air.

“STOOOOP! PAWS THIS!” a voice shouted.

However, that future didn’t come. “HuH?” The creature’s bloodlust disappeared as if it had never been there. No — it didn't disappear — it was simply directed at someone else instead. That someone was the one who'd shouted and intervened.

"The hell are yOu?" the creature asked.

"Just a bear passing by!" answered the new target of its hostility — my brother, Shu.

No longer being the creature's target made me heave a sigh of relief. It was all but certain that, if Shu hadn't come, I would've been given my second death penalty.

"A beaR? Hmm, you seem pRetty tough," said the creature.

"Oh no, I'm just someone who's beary enthusiastic about suits."

"HahAh, now ain't that somEthing."

Less than a moment after the creature laughed, a plosive sound, a metallic scraping sound, a crashing sound, and a crushing sound reached my ears, all at the same time. It was bewildering beyond words. I'd heard the sounds, but I couldn't see what had caused them.

Before I'd realized it, Shu's right arm was positioned in a way that made it seem like it had deflected something, while the creature's right hand was aimed at him. One of the nearby pillars had been shattered, and my brother's suit's right arm had released white smoke — a sign of recent friction.

I hadn't seen a thing, but it was obvious that they'd just gone through an exchange of blows. It had simply been too fast for me to see with my naked eye.

Remembering what Marie had told me, I realized that I'd just born witness to supernatural movements caused by ridiculously broken stats — a fight that had happened beyond the sound barrier.

"Kh, he, hahAhah! You sure are somEthing, bear! Is it you, tHen? Are yoU Figaro?" the jiangshi asked.

"Bearily not!" my brother declared.

“Yeah, fiGured! You’re not whAt I saw on the phOto, and I doubt the kingdom’s king of dUels would waLk around looking so wEird!”

...He did, though, I thought.

“SeriouSly, you’re somEthing! You deflected my attacks dEspite being way slOwer than me!”

He did?

“Altar’s dying and all, so I unDerestimated it, but it loOks like coming here wAs worth it, after all! Even if the Figaro guY’s no good, I think it’d be fuN to fight you, iNstead!”

“Yeah. I won’t say no to a brawl with you if Figaro loses,” said Shu. “But that won’t be happening. I mean, he’s gonna beat you.”

“Heh, hehEheheHe! Guy must bE a big deaL to have you beliEve in him so much! Guess I now hAve two maiN dishes in sTore for me!” With those words as its last, the lanky creature passed us by and went further into the hallway.

“...Wait!” I shouted before it left.

“HuUh?” the creature turned to me and tilted its head, clearly bothered out of its mind. The murderous intent aimed at me filled me with fear again, but I couldn’t back down.

“What do you intend to do with her?” I asked.

At this point, I was more than aware that I had no chance against this creature. But I couldn’t turn a blind eye to what was happening. It would’ve left a bad taste in my mouth.

“‘Her’? Oh, you meAn this?” said the creature and put the woman it was holding on the ground.

She groaned in pain.

“She’s witH me. The waY we got here wAs a bit rough, so she becAme a bit nauseOus and groggy,” said the creature and heaved a heavy sigh.

“Eh?” I asked in confusion.

They’re together? Seriously? I thought. Oh.... now that I look at her, she seems a bit pale and her expression isn’t too good, but there’s not a single injury on her.

“HmM? Wait, did yoU actually staNd up to me bEcause you thought I was a kidNapper or something?” the creature demanded.

“...Sorry.”

Seriously, I apologize. I jumped to conclusions.

I probably just hadn't been rational in the face of all that pressure, but that didn't change the fact that it would've been a really stupid death if Shu hadn't intervened.

Damn, is this embarrassing.

"Kh, heH, khaHahahahAhahahah!" My response made the creature burst out laughing. "You're quite somEthing, too, aren't yOu? You actuAlly tried to fight me whEn I was releasing bloodlust all aroUnd me! First thE bear, now you — therE sure are a lot of fUnny guys among this cOuntry's Masters!" it said and placed its long, metallic claws on my head.

Before I could even see it move, it brought its talisman-hidden face to my ear...

"I like you, sweetcheeks. Let's play together sometime."

...and said that with a voice that wasn't filtered by the talisman's magic.

...Eh? Wait, that voice is...

"HahahAh! See ya laTer!" said the creature before turning around and dragging the woman on the floor to the other end of the hallway.

As it distanced itself from us, I could still hear it say, "Hey, ambasSador, wake up alreAdy. You have woRk to do."

To that, the woman groaned and weakly said, "Please, no more supersonic air travel..."

After they left, the mood around us instantly cooled down.

"Yo, that was damn close, wasn't it?" said Shu.

"...Thanks, bro." I probably would've died if he hadn't helped me out. The creature had had both the power and the killing intent to do it.

"It's pretty cool to be able to brandish your sword against a thing like that, but you should bear in mind to use your courage where it actually counts," he added. "It's too early for you to be battling Superiors."

"Superiors... So that's..."

"Yeah, that's Figaro's opponent. One of the four greatest that the land of hermits has to offer — a part of the Huang He Si Ling."

Xunyu the Yinglong. I shivered.

◇

"We're back," I said.

"Pawrdon the intrusion," my brother added.

By the time Nemesis, Shu, and I returned to the box, Marie had finished setting up her equipment. Rook and Babi were awake, and they all stared at my brother, visibly confused.

Well, the sudden appearance of an unfamiliar guy in a bear suit makes for a very strange scenario, I thought. Wait... Is it just me, or is Marie more shocked than confused?

"Umm... R-Ray? Wh-Who is this... bear... man...?" she asked with a stiff expression on her face.

I guess the suit's freaking her out.

"This is my brother," I answered. "We happened to be in the same box."

"Well, that's quite an interesting coincidence," commented Rook. "Oh? What's wrong, Marie?"

"I-It's not... It's nothing, really."

Though she said that, it certainly didn't seem like nothing. Her facial expression was visibly constrained. Also, she was muttering something along the lines of "They're so, so alike... It's a suit, not fur, but the texture is the same... The voice is similar, too... And it's a bear..."

"Marie," I spoke up. "You're..."

"Eh?!" she exclaimed. "I-I'm what?"

The agitation in her voice made me absolutely certain that Marie was...

"You're afraid of bears, aren't you?" I asked.

For a moment, my question left her completely dumbfounded. Then, she nodded in a slightly exaggerated manner.

"Y-Y-Y-Y-Yes! Th-That's exactly it! I'm just not good with bears! Yes, it's definitely not that I'm afraid of the Kin— I-I mean, your brother!"

For some reason, she wasn't nearly as articulate as usual.

I guess bears scare her more than I thought.

"I guess I shouldn't look like this, then," said Shu. "Bear with me for a second." Suddenly, the bear disappeared and — for some reason — was replaced by a bipedal whale.

But then, it's a question whether a bipedal whale is actually a whale, I thought.

"If you can't handle bears, then perhaps this is fine? Whale?" asked Shu.

"Did you just replace 'well' with 'whale'? Holy crap, what a stretch!" I said.

"Whale, you got any better whale puns for me, wise guy?!"

"No, I don't!"

Seriously, I don't recall ever seeing a whale character that emphasizes his whaleness with whale puns, I thought.

"U-Umm," Marie spoke up. "It's fine. I've calmed down. You can return to being a bear."

"Really? Very whale, then," said my brother before getting engulfed in light and becoming a bear again.

Man, now that I have something to compare it to, his bear appearance seems so calming. I thought. Really, there's a certain sense of security about it.

Of course, there was the big question of whether it was really a good idea to feel safe around a guy in his late twenties wearing a bear suit and talking with bear puns, but I felt it would be best to leave that for later.

"All right," I said. "Let me introduce you again. The person inside this suit is my big brother."

"Bearliest of greetings to you all. I'm Ray's brother IRL, Shu."

What kind of greetings are "bearly," anyway? I thought. Oh, whatever.

"And these are my party members..."

"I'm Rook, and this is my Embryo, Babi."

"Heyyy, I'm Babi!"

"I-I'm Marie Adler. Pleased to meet you."

"Marie Adler?" Shu repeated her name and tilted his head to the side.

That movement made Marie shake a bit.

Are you sure you're not afraid of the bear suit? I thought.

"Is your job 'Journalist'?" my brother asked.

"Y-Yes it is," she answered.

How did he get her job right just by hearing her name? Is it because of all the equipment here?

"I've read that manga, too," he said.

"Which manga?" I asked.

"Into The Shadow. 'Marie Adler' is the name of its protagonist, and she works as a journalist."

"I see," I said. "You like that manga, Marie?"

"Yes, I do," she admitted. "It's the reason why I chose this name and job."

Well, it certainly wasn't uncommon for MMO players to take the names and appearances of characters they liked.

"Is it also the reason for the way you talk?" asked Shu.

"Of course. It's just roleplay," she answered. "None of my peers talk this casually when they're over twenty."

She's sure dedicated, I thought. Also, this was the first time I'd learned that she was older than me.

"Into The Shadow, was it?" I said. "Maybe I should read it, too."

"Just so you know, it was discontinued by its magazine," said my brother. "The first part of its story finished and its serialization stopped, just like that."

Well, damn...

"It was pretty popular, though," he added. "I liked it a lot, too, and I'd love it if it restarted sometime."

"Thank you. I appreciate that," said Marie. It seemed she was a big fan.

I should really buy it when I get the chance, I decided. If they think it's a good read, I might enjoy it, too.

"Ladies and gentlemen! The wait is over! Today's main event — The Clash of the Superiors — is about to begin!" a voice called, announcing the start of the match. It rang out throughout the arena, accompanied by music.

I'd been told that, just like the toilets in this world, announcements were done by magic.

"Oh, the fight's about to begin," said Shu. "Best get mentally prepared fur it."

"True," agreed Marie. "I have to record it, too."

We all sat down and began preparing for the event.

Man, now that I think about it, an event called the "Clash of the Superiors" is exactly what it says on the tin, I thought. Figaro and Xunyu — two Superiors bearing Superior Jobs — were about to clash.

This would likely be a battle unlike any I'd seen so far. After all, the ones fighting were some of the most high-end, top class beings in Infinite Dendrogram.

"First, the eastern gate! The entrance of our venerable guest!" the announcer called.

A spotlight focused on one of the entrances.

"A Superior hailing from the land of Huang He! The great martial artist bearing the nickname of 'Yinglong'! The beast from the east! The Master Jiangshi! XUN... YUUUUUUUUUU!”

There was a boom, a crescendo of music, and even a release of smoke. A moment later, the creature broke the thick veil and showed itself.

Its frame surpassed four meters in length, causing many spectators to scream from shock. A single glance at its abnormally long limbs was enough to send chills down the spine.

To the eyes of those living in this country, which had a Western setting, even the creature’s clothes seemed like they belonged in the realm of madness.

Spreading fear and shock with every step, the Master Jiangshi, Xunyu, entered the stage. The creature raised its arms and released a war cry, which was followed by explosions on both sides of the entrance.

That performance caused the audience to either cheer or scream.

“They really know how entertainment works,” I said.

“Gideon is beary much a showbiz city,” Shu explained. “Also, Masters gave the tians advice on how to set up these presentations.”

Just as I thought. It looked exactly like something from a fighting event on TV.

However, I felt that the announcers on TV were better. The one in this arena didn’t seem too used to it.

“By the way, Xunyu’s number two in Huang He’s duel rankings,” Shu added. “You get used to this if you duel that much.”

Number two? So there’s someone else at the top, huh?

“By the way, what kind of job is ‘Master Jiangshi,’ anyway?” asked Rook.

“Huang He has a job called ‘Daoshi,’ and I hear it’s a Superior Job from that grouping,” answered Marie. “Its counterpart in this part of the world would be... Mage, surely.”

“The main characteristic of Daoshi is that they produce and use certain consumable items — talismans known as ‘Fu,’” added Shu. “Their main advantage is that they allow quick and consecutive spellcasting, while the demerit is the production cost.”

“And don’t forget that greater skills require you to spend time positioning the Fus,” added Marie.

Shu nodded. “I’ve also heard that, while being in the daoshi grouping, Master Jiangshi is a direct upgrade to the job known as ‘Jiangshi,’ which is focused on endurance. With that in mind, it's safe to expect that Xunyu's fighting style is not purely magical, but involves melee, as well."

"Oh, that's true. After all, the daoshi grouping is the type that unlocks different Superior Jobs depending on which jobs you combine it with. In fact, it might be more correct to consider Master Jiangshi to be a Superior Job from the jiangshi grouping."

It seemed we had two people doing the explaining. And with Rook being the one listening to them, I basically became part of the background. Not that I minded it.

"Wait, the job is also called 'Shi Jie Xian,' right?" I asked. "That doesn't really mean 'jiangshi,' does it? So why do we read it as 'Master Jiangshi'?"

"Well, not every job translates as neatly as 'King of Destruction,' fur example," answered Shu.

"Superior Job names can be really something," added Marie. "Imagine meeting the 'Death Shadow.'"

I guess their uniqueness comes with unique naming senses, I thought.

"Then how does this player actually fight?" asked Rook.

I was curious about that, as well. I'd had a confrontation with Xunyu at the reception and seen the jiangshi fight Shu, but I hadn't been able to understand a bit of what was going on back there.

"The nickname 'Yinglong' might make you think otherwise, but that's not the name of Xunyu's Embryo," said Marie. "Also, Xunyu sometimes gets called the 'Landmine' or 'Divine Speed,' too."

Those two nicknames gave off completely different impressions. The former was about waiting in place, while the latter was about moving around a lot. Naturally, it made me curious about which one of these applied to this mysterious fighter.

"And in the western gate! We have the pride of Gideon! The unwavering champion of our city!" the announcer called.

The music changed and the spotlight was redirected to the gate at the opposite side.

"The king! The lone explorer! The one bearing the nickname 'Endless Chain' and the title of 'Over Gladiator'! The strongest man of all! FIIIIIIGAAAAAROOOOOOOOOOOO!"

As introduced, the one that walked out of the western gate was none other than Figaro. While he had a gentle smile on his face, his eyes seemed to emit immeasurable pressure, and they didn't give away a single hint about what was going on in his mind.

Naturally, he wasn't wearing the lion suit. Instead, he was clad in the same curious equipment as before.

Figaro's appearance made cheers ring out throughout the arena.

"FI-GA-RO! FI-GA-RO!" the audience chanted as he slowly made his way towards the stage. Just as I'd been told, he was extremely popular around these parts.

Well, I can see why he needs to wear that suit, I thought.

"All right! Let's prepare for the fight of the century!" the announcer called.

Now that the participants were both on the stage, they opened up a settings window. I'd seen one of those at the semi-event, too. The windows were used to configure the barrier. Like in the semi-event, both sides looked through the rules displayed and confirmed if they were okay with them before starting the match.

Most duels here in Gideon were 1v1 and didn't have many rules. All attacks and tactics were allowed. What wasn't allowed were accessories that prevented instant death damage — such as the Lifesaving Brooch and the Dragonscale Ward I was familiar with — and consumable healing items. Healing from equipment skills was perfectly fine, and I was still too much of a noob to see any reasons why they were treated differently.

"Figgy would've had a serious advantage if they were allowed to use accessories like that," said Shu.

"Eh? But the rules are the same for both fighters, so would it really make that much of a difference?" I asked.

"Trust me. With Figgy, it would."

So Figaro has something that greatly benefits from those accessories? I thought.

"Both duelists are done checking the rules! Now, let's activate the barrier and... oh?" The announcer was about to signal the start of the battle, but stopped when he saw Xunyu raise one of those long arms.

Were the rules unsatisfactory or something?

"One one, teSting. You people heAr me?" said Xunyu, the voice resounding throughout the arena.

"So yeah, I'm about to duEl this Figaro gUy, but let me juSt say something to make the fight mOre interesting."

Well, that definitely sounded intriguing. I readied myself for the words...

"I won't move a siNgle step until Figaro falls to his knEes."

Xunyu's words were something that no amount of readiness could've prepared me for.

For a moment, everyone in the arena was completely dumbfounded. It seemed as though every single member of the audience became of one mind, thinking nothing but What did I just hear?

"Did any of yoU even hear me? I'm saying that I won't move a siNgle step, and I'll make this Figaro gUy fall to his kneEs."

After another moment of silence, the spectators realized that Xunyu's words were a provocative insult towards Figaro — and the duel city of Gideon, which hailed him as their champion. Suddenly, the whole arena was drowned out in anger and booing.

However, it only made Xunyu laugh. "Great! Now I'm a pRoper bAdDie! Oh, the laUghs I'll have WheN I beat you in tHis situation!"

Instead of responding, Figaro just silently looked at his opponent. I couldn't tell whether his silence came from confidence or due to some other reason.

However, I was almost completely certain that the scenario Xunyu described wasn't impossible. At the very least, if I were in Figaro's position, I'd definitely get killed before the jiangshi moved even a single step. That exact situation had almost happened a few minutes ago. Still, I had a feeling that Xunyu's words weren't just a provocation.

"Those certainly are some abrasive words," said Nemesis. "Do you think there's any meaning to them?"

"If you're asking whether I think that was just a meaningless provocation or a meaningful preparation for something... it's definitely the latter," I answered.

Facing Xunyu once was enough for me to know just how murderous and relentless the jiangshi was. That certainly wasn't all, though. There was more to this Superior than met the eye.

From the incident at the reception and entrance and the words just now, I could easily tell that Xunyu was clever enough to calculate and manipulate people's impressions. The jiangshi's battle tactics and preparation covered even the very mood of the surroundings.

“We will now turn on the barrier!” said the announcer.

The booing towards Xunyu subsided and the barrier became active, setting the stage for the match.

“And so! Let the main event, The Clash of the Superiors... COMMENCE!”

A split-second later, a booming sound rang out as something golden flashed across the stage. It was merely a moment. However, it was a moment during which way too many things had happened.

At least, I assumed it to be so. After all, I could only see the results.

Before I knew it, Figaro was wielding two swords and had deployed four chains, three of which were already broken.

He was swinging his dual blades at an immense speed, using them to deflect “something.” The “something” seemed to cover the whole stage at this point.

When it became spread out like that, I could finally see it with my eyes.

It was extremely long and moved at a speed so great, it was reduced to nothing but a blur. I probably couldn’t have even known it was there if it weren’t for its length. The very tip of the “something” was completely invisible to me. By following its long trails, however, I realized that it was connected to Xunyu’s sleeves.

At first, I thought that the “something” were chains, like the ones Figaro used. It only took a moment to realize I was wrong. Xunyu’s sleeves didn’t hide any hands that could hold such things.

There was only one “something” attached to those sleeves — Xunyu’s arms.

Reaching speeds my eyes couldn’t follow, the arms reached for and attacked Figaro like a duo of serpentine dragons.

“It’s too fast,” I muttered.

“They put the wrong setting on the barrier,” Nemesis spoke to me telepathically. “The time inside is slowed down, but their speed is so great that it means nothing.”

She’d said exactly what I was thinking. I looked at my brother sitting next to me, and wondered if he could see it.

Suddenly, the last of Figaro’s chains flew straight towards Xunyu. Its speed was immense, but before it could even reach its target, it was sliced into five pieces in less than a blink of an eye.

The chains that had almost killed me back in the Tomb Labyrinth were just too slow in comparison to Xunyu's arms.

"Supersonic, extension-based attacks... They're faster than..."

Those were probably Marie's words, but I wasn't certain.

A bit belatedly, I finally realized that the booming sound that had rung out at the beginning of the battle was an actual sonic boom. Also, I came to see that, despite the ludicrous speed, the jiangshi's arms were properly controlled.

While realizing just how well-deserved Xunyu's title of "Divine Speed" was, I couldn't help but notice that the extending arms were much like the snake-like dragons from Chinese myth.

It made me more than certain that, if our fight in the reception had continued, I'd have been killed before I could even use Counter Absorption. Even in the off chance scenario of my being successful, Xunyu would've probably killed me by moving one of those arms around the barrier and simply lopping my head off.

While I could make out the trails of the extended arms, their very ends — the hands — were completely invisible to me. The fact that this was their speed after they were slowed down by the barrier made chills go down my spine.

However, Figaro was impressive, as well. Though he was exposed to a barrage of those supersonic attacks, it didn't look like a single one of them had landed on him yet. He saw, dodged, and deflected them all.

Also, little by little, it became harder and harder for me to see his movements, too.

"A certain old manga had a term for how I'm feeling right now," I muttered. I think it was called "Yamcha Vision," I thought.

Nemesis, Rook, and Babi seemed to be in the same state as me. But that didn't seem to be the case with Shu and Marie. From his demeanor and from the movements of her eyes, I could tell that they could see and follow Xunyu's arms.

"You two can actually see them?" I asked to confirm.

"To an extent," answered Shu. "I'm not an AGI build, so sometimes I can, sometimes I can't."

High AGI allows you to see this stuff? I thought.

From the battle at the reception and the fact that he was on the rankings, I was pretty certain by now that Shu's level was pretty high. However, it didn't make sense that Marie could see it, too.

"I can follow the movements because we Journalists have a passive skill that improves our sight," she answered my question before I could even ask it.

I see. So there are non-battle jobs with such skills, huh?

"This is barely visible at all to me," I said. It was my first exposure to a battle between two top players, and my first glimpse into the speeds they could reach. I wasn't even sure I could really say that, in fact, considering that they were slowed down by the barrier.

"We will now slow down the battle speed inside the barrier even further!" said the announcer, and — sure enough — the two fighters' movements lost a lot of speed.

And yet, they're still faster than the semi-event fighters, I thought.

"So they set the slowdown to max, huh?" said Shu. "Well, way too many spectators couldn't have seen what was going on if they didn't."

"Yeah. I'm one of them, to be honest," I said.

Now, I could somehow see the details of the battle. A golden right hand was going for Figaro's head from his left side. He evaded it by bending backwards.

The hand that passed him made a U-turn and attacked his head yet again. This time, Figaro deflected the attack with the sword in his right hand.

The battle that had been completely invisible was now sufficiently slowed for my inexperienced eyes, and yet it still made me feel like I was watching a video on fast-forward.

Seriously, just how fast are these two fighting?

"You can't even land a hit if you can't keep up with this speed, huh?" I asked.

"Well, you could try surprise attacks while they're not in battle-mode," said Marie. "That's impossible in duels, though."

Of course. Duels began when both sides agreed to a set of rules and were ready to fight. There was no room for surprise attacks. They were 1v1s where both sides fought with everything they had until the stronger one emerged victorious.

Figaro was the one sitting at the apex of Gideon, the city of duels. That meant that he was the greatest 1v1 fighter the kingdom had to offer. And yet, Xunyu was fast enough to force him onto the defensive.

I was about to assume that Master Jiangshi was a Superior Job focused on AGI, but then I remembered what Marie had said about it: Its counterpart in this part of the world would be... Mage, surely.

"Wait, magic!" I burst out. "Xunyu still isn't going all out!"

A moment later, the stage was overwhelmed by thunderous roars and a crimson light that dominated the entire area behind the barrier.

I looked and saw that the extended arms were releasing countless crimson heat rays. They were boisterously dancing as they burned the air and scorched the stony floor of the stage.

The origin of the heat rays were the pieces of paper covering Xunyu's arms whole.

"Are those...?"

"Daoshi's Fu," said Shu.

"Xunyu covered the arms in Fu enchanted with offensive magic and is now using them to cover the stage in heat rays," explained Marie.

"That's nuts," I muttered.

Naturally, with there being so many heat rays, some of them hit Xunyu's long arms. But the arms seemed to be extremely tough, not taking any damage whatsoever. The rays did make some of the Fus get detached and slowly drop down to the stage, but the arms continued their relentless attack.

Just how tough are they? I wondered.

"If they weren't tough, our slit-eyed friend would've severed them by now," said Nemesis.

Arms that were unaffected by heat rays and possessed a hardness that even Figaro had trouble breaking through. From the fact that Xunyu could fight at supersonic speeds while being the Master Jiangshi, a primarily magic-oriented job, I could only assume that...

"...those arms are Xunyu's Superior Embryo," I said.

Prosthetic limbs that emitted a golden gleam and attacked the opponents at speeds that broke the sound barrier. This Embryo's characteristic abilities could be described as "strong arms that reach far at great velocity." Though that sounded basic, seeing it in action in the display before me awed and scared me.

Strength, speed, range — it had the whole package. It was simple, but that was exactly what made it nigh impossible to counter.

"If there's any power that can counter it, though..."

"...it must be something simple, as well," Nemesis finished for me.

As Nemesis' words entered my ears, something else entered my vision.

Crimson light and countless freed Fus danced all around as Figaro broke through the hell of supersonic destruction and came out of it completely unscathed.

He didn't do anything special. Figaro simply dodged, deflected, and dashed.

Avoiding the heat rays and parrying the arms, he gradually closed the distance between him and his opponent.

The battle itself was simple, but the level at which it was happening made it seem beyond abnormal.

"Amazing," I said, lacking any better words to describe the battle I was seeing.

At first, I thought that Figaro was completely on the defensive, but I was wrong. He was closing in on Xunyu, growing faster with every passing moment, and dodging every single one of the jiangshi's attacks.

It was only a matter of time until Xunyu would be within his attack range. That made it pretty obvious that the odds were right, and that Figaro was going to win.

However, I suddenly noticed something. Not about the two fighters, but about two of the people sitting next to me — Shu and Marie.

The aura about them was different.

It wasn't the first time I'd been exposed to such an aura. I'd felt it when I'd fought the Demi-Dragon Worm, gotten killed by the Superior Killer, and faced Gardranda and Gouz-Maise. Looking at them made me feel as tense as I'd been during those deathly encounters.

Soon, I realized that both their gazes were directed at the same thing.

It wasn't anything on the stage, but one of the monitors installed in our box — specifically, the one showing a close-up of Xunyu's face.

The visage was still hidden by a jiangshi-like talisman. However, there was an instant in which it was raised by the battle winds, revealing an indomitable grin.

"Call — Baolei!"

Right after the jiangshi spoke that word — meaning "raging lightning" — there was a new development. The back of Xunyu's hand suddenly burst open, revealing a Jewel used to store monsters. From it came a creature that seemed to be wrought of lightning.

Released at nearly point-blank distance from Figaro, it instantly bared its electric fangs at him.

"An elemental," said Shu. "A rare kind, too."

"Seems like a type of Lightning Elemental that's focused on speed and offensive ability," added Marie. "It's just a fancy distraction, though."

Before I could even ask what she meant by that, Figaro swung the swords in his hands in the shape of a cross and sliced the monster apart.

It happened in but an instant. Just as Marie said, the elemental ended being nothing but a momentary distraction. However, that moment was enough for Xunyu to safely retract one of those golden arms.

It returned to its original size, and between its index and middle fingers, there was a single Fu. It was detailed and elaborate, making it reminiscent of a painting, but rather than finding it beautiful, I felt mostly fear.

Then, the hundreds... no, thousands... of Fus that had fallen on the stage during the fight began emitting a crimson light.

The main characteristic of Daoshi is that they produce and use certain consumable items — talismans known as "Fu," I thought, remembering what Shu and Marie had said. And don't forget that greater skills require you to spend time positioning the Fus.

"Zhenhuo Zhendeng — Baolongba!" Xunyu called.

Those words — meaning "True Flame True Light, Explosive Dragon Dominance" — caused most of the duel field to be engulfed in a pillar of fire.

The scene made me remember one of the jiangshi's other nicknames: "Landmine."

The pillar of fire had no trouble breaking through the upper part of the barrier separating the fighters and the spectators.

In fact, it went high enough to make it seem as though it would scorch the very heavens themselves. Though not great enough to cause damage, the pillar's heat reached us and just about everyone else in the audience, causing many to scream in fear.

The panic might've made it seem otherwise, but no harm came to any of them. If anyone was hurt by it, it would be the two fighters on the stage.

But the pillar didn't extend to its caster, Xunyu. Before I'd even realized it, the jiangshi's right arm was retracted back to its original length, just like the left one, sparing it from the flame.

The same couldn't be said for Figaro. Dealing with the elemental had rendered him unable to evade the attack, and it obviously wasn't something that could be deflected with mere swords.

Just about everyone in the audience held their breaths as the pillar of fire faded and allowed them to see what was happening on the burning stage.

What we saw was Figaro, completely surrounded by a searing hot heat haze and a spherical barrier that shielded him from all harm.

"He survived it completely unharmed?!" Marie voiced her shock, and I couldn't agree more.

"Is that one of Figaro's Embryo's skills?" I asked. "Or is it an Over Gladiator ability?"

"Neither," answered Shu. "It's an item skill. That longcoat he's wearing is a special reward. Its active skill allows him to prevent all and any outside influence for a short time."

So it's a special reward skill. Like the ones on my Miasmaflame Bracers and Grudge-soaked Greaves, I thought.

"Oh, but it has a cooldown of 10 minutes," Shu added. "Meaning that the attack cost him his ultimate means of defense."

"I think that Xunyu is also out of viable moves, though," Marie said. "The elemental can't fight anymore, and I don't believe it's easy to recast a spell that costs so many Fus, which means that the same trick can't be repeated, and that..."

"...Figaro will win!" I cried with certainty.

"All that's left is to figure out the effects of the last skill that Xunyu used," Rook said.

Nemesis and I, and even Babi, didn't understand what he was talking about.

Shu — clearly noticing something — was looking at Xunyu. A bit belatedly, Marie joined him in that.

"What do you mean by 'last skill,' Rook?" asked Babi.

"Xunyu used a skill besides the one that created the flame pillar, no?" Rook asked.

"Well, I... Really?" I asked. I hadn't seen that happen.

"Figaro's defensive skill's about to end," said Shu, and sure enough, the shield protecting Figaro from outside influence disappeared.

I fully expected the duelists to start clashing at supersonic speeds again, but what actually happened was the complete opposite of that.

Neither Xunyu — the one used the fearsome skill — nor Figaro — the one who negated it — were moving a muscle.

Naturally, that was strange, for it was clearly time for the former to get into a proper stance and for the latter to charge. Despite it all, however, Xunyu was still grinning.

"'Arms and Legs Reach for the Horizon — Tenaga Ashinaga,'" Rook broke the silence.

"Rook?" I asked.

"That's what Xunyu said right after creating those flames," he said.

I didn't hear anything like that, I thought. The soundscape had been dominated by the fiery roaring, and Xunyu didn't have a mic or anything of the sort.

"How do you know that?" I asked.

"I saw his lips move," he answered. "The mouth movement for proper nouns here is the same as it is in reality."

He was lip reading? When did he get this skill? Or wait, is it like Marie's drawing? Did he bring it over from reality? More importantly, is "Tenaga Ashinaga" the name of Xunyu's Superior Embryo?

The name referred to a certain type of yokai from Japanese myth — one that would be a perfect fit for the jiangshi's abnormal frame.

A skill bearing such a name could only mean that...

"...Xunyu used the Embryo's ultimate skill — the one named after the Embryo itself!" I cried.

Suddenly, the jiangshi raised the right leg, which was hidden by cloth. The one which hadn't moved an inch since the battle had started.

Just like the arms, the leg was a golden, prosthetic limb — a Superior Embryo.

Its toes were as sharp as the fingers on the arms, and there was something between them. Unlike the Fu from before, its shape was indistinct.

The same could be said for its color. It looked white, pink, and red at the same time, which — combined with its apparent softness — made it look much like a human organ.

“I missEd your heaRt,” said Xunyu. “This iS a damn luNg.”

A moment later, blood splattered from Figaro’s mouth as he dropped to his knees.

Chapter Four: The Clash of the Superiors

Paladin, Ray Starling

“Arms, Guardian, Chariot, Castle, Territory. Those are the five base categories in Embryo evolution. Which, do you think, is the most common?” asked Shu.

It had happened on my first night in Infinite Dendrogram — specifically, at the welcoming party. I’d forgotten most of what we’d talked about after he’d told me about the war, but this part had stuck with me.

“Arms, I think?” I answered his question, not having much basis for it.

Nemesis was both a Maiden and an Arms type, while my brother’s Baldr was a gatling gun. I didn’t know any Masters besides myself and him, so my answer was just a guess based entirely on the fact that both our Embryos were Arms.

“That’s right,” Shu nodded. “Arms is the most common category in Infinite Dendrogram.”

And my guess ended up being correct.

“It’s also the most varied one,” he added.

“What do you mean?”

“The Arms category covers all sorts of Embryos. It’s not just weaponry like your greatsword or my gun — there are utensils like pots or lamps, and even artificial eyes and limbs that replace parts of the body.”

“So there’s lots of strangeness in this category, huh?” I asked.

“Yeah, there certainly is.” He momentarily turned silent, then seemed to remember something. “Still, I don’t think that any Arms is stranger than his.”

Back then, I’d had no means of knowing what he was referring to.

Gideon’s central arena was shrouded in silence.

Not a single member of the audience seemed to understand what had happened.

The only people who did were probably the ones on the stage, Figaro and Xunyu.

"So this is the result of all of Xunyu's groundwork," Shu said.

No — my brother seemed to understand it, too.

"First, there was the 'I won't move a single step' declaration," he said. "It was actually meant only to make it not seem weird that Xunyu wasn't using the legs."

One of those legs was now grasping one of Figaro's lungs.

"Then, there was the long-ranged barrage of supersonic attacks. It was meant to make it seem like the declaration was based entirely on confidence, nothing else. Figgy probably knew that it was just a bluff, though."

However, he still hadn't been able to avoid it.

"The Fu magic attacks were just used to position the Fus needed for the great spell that followed. That 'Baolei' elemental was just a momentary distraction. As for the great spell itself..."

The skill that had used the hundreds of Fus littered all over the stage and created a pillar of fire strong enough to break the barrier.

"'Zhenhuo Zhendeng Baolongba,' was it?" Shu continued. "From its power, it's pretty clear that it's among the strongest Master Jiangshi skills — probably the ultimate one. However, Xunyu used it to do nothing more but keep Figaro in place."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"The spell had both immense power and range. It would've damaged Figgy a lot, but he couldn't escape to safety due to the presence of Xunyu's arms. The rules prevent them from using accessories that negate instadeath damage, and that's why he had to use an omni-directional defensive skill."

So it would've been over for him if he hadn't used the special reward's skill, I thought.

"However, that was exactly what Xunyu wanted him to do," said Shu.

"What?" I asked.

"Most powerful omni-directional defensive skills prevent the users from moving or using any other skills. That leaves them stiff and open to attacks, and Xunyu simply took advantage of that... just like planned."

So the jiangshi was waiting for that moment from before the fight even began... I can see where the nickname "Landmine" comes from.

"But wait," interjected Marie. "If the special reward's skill's effects are like you described, no attacks should've reached him, right?"

I could see her point. After all, it was supposedly a barrier that protected from every direction.

"Yeah," Shu replied to Marie. "Attacks from the outside, at least."

Apparently, that was enough for Marie to understand everything.

"So you've already figured what that ultimate skill does?" Rook asked my brother.

"Yeah," nodded Shu. "You seem to have guessed, too, Rook."

"It's based on circumstantial evidence, though," Rook said.

Apparently, I was the only player here who was still lost about this.

"Brother Bear, might you tell us what kind of attack could've given Figaro such a grave injury?" asked Nemesis, clearly as confused as I was.

"It's pretty simple when you observe," said Shu. "Look. Figgy lost an organ and is hurt enough to spit blood, but there's not a single scratch on his skin."

Though covered in blood that had escaped his mouth, Figaro's equipment was completely intact, too.

An attack that gouged out a lung would normally leave a hole in both apparel and the flesh.

"Also, an ultimate skill is the culmination of an Embryo's main trait," he added. "You can figure it out from here, right?"

"Oh, I see!" I cried.

Ultimate skills were the greatest show of an Embryo's dominant characteristic. It was safe to call them the crystallization of an Embryo's and its Master's power. Due to that, they were extremely varied, causing them to include oddities such as tornadoes of darkness and tsunamis of gold.

With that in mind, I had to figure out what the culmination of Xunyu's Embryo would be, an Embryo that had speed and range as its main traits.

Its velocity had already broken the sound barrier, so it might've been safe to assume that the ultimate skill approached or surpassed the speed of light. However, superluminal velocity was an insurmountable barrier for anything that had the least bit amount of mass, so there was a limit to how great the speed could grow. But if such limits meant nothing for the Embryo, the culmination of speed and range would be something that was found in science fiction.

“Warping,” said Shu.

That was the only answer — a superluminal, super long-distance, ultradimensional movement ability.

“Xunyu warped the right leg directly into Figaro’s body and tore out the lung,” he explained.

Figaro’s equipment had prevented all outside influence from every direction. However, it had been able to do nothing against Xunyu’s ultimate skill. It was like a scenario in which a piece of paper had two points on it — A and B. Even if there was a circular barrier around A that prevented B from getting to it, one could simply bend the paper to make B touch A directly. Walls and barriers meant absolutely nothing.

“If that’s how it is, wouldn’t it have been more effective to place a Fu in the body and blow it up?” asked Rook. “Also, instead of taking just one, couldn’t Xunyu have torn all the organs apart?”

You have some freaky ideas, man, I thought.

“The skill probably has limits that prevent such things,” said Shu. “Maybe it can only warp the Superior Embryo itself? Or perhaps the time during which it’s connected to the other side is very severe?”

“I see,” nodded Rook.

One of the duelists on stage, Figaro, finally began to talk.

“A forced teleportation attack that goes straight into the body, eh? A true ultimate skill if I ever saw one.” The words leaving his bloody mouth made it obvious that he, too, understood the nature of Xunyu’s attack.

“I’ve been waitiNg for you to stop in plAce,” said the jiangshi. “Though, hOnestly, it would’ve been better if you’d just leT my insult go to your hEad and chosen not to move. I’ve actUally fought some iDiots who lost like that! GheaHahAhah!” Xunyu’s laugh echoed throughout the silent arena.

“It’s normally a super long-distance skill, isn’t it?” asked Figaro. “You sure went through a lot of trouble to make it viable in a duel.”

“Well, tHat’s just how I rOll.” Just as Shu had said, Xunyu had been waiting for the right moment to use the ultimate skill.

However, I was pretty certain that the jiangshi had intended to kill Figaro with every move that’d come before it. The supersonic nail attacks, Fu magic, Baolei, Baolongba — each and every single one of those would've instantly killed most lesser creatures.

The ultimate skill was but a trump card Xunyu kept for anyone who was capable of withstanding it all. And its effects were obvious. Figaro — though still alive — was greatly hurt.

"Can he heal that injury?" asked Nemesis.

"This isn't just an external wound or a broken bone — he lost an entire organ," answered Marie. "That lowers a person's maximum HP, limits their movements, and continuously damages them... Not even magic would have an easy time healing that."

"I know that duels don't allow them, but would an Elixir work?" I asked.

"Elixirs don't do much about injury-based status effects. To fix organ loss quickly, you would need a healing skill from a Superior Job. However, if normal healing is your only option, fixing it would take a long while. You might as well get the death penalty. Mind you, they're fighting in the barrier, so that won't be necessary."

From Marie's words, it was safe to assume that Figaro wouldn't be healed for the duration of the battle.

"Wait. Why are they still not moving?" asked Rook, bringing that fact to my attention.

Figaro's lack of movement was likely caused by the injury, but I didn't see a reason for Xunyu to become immobile, as well.

"Is it a side-effect of the skill?" asked Nemesis.

"No," answered Shu. "Xunyu's just being cautious."

"But why?" I asked.

Figaro is completely cornered and... Oh, I see, I thought.

"Xunyu's being careful about the thing that Figaro has never yet shown in any of his many matches — his Superior Embryo," said Marie. "He's yet to use it in this duel, too."

Hearing those words, I nodded. Figaro still hadn't used his Embryo, and if he did, he'd probably have a chance at victory.

"But Figaro is using his Embryo," said Shu.

"Huh?" Nemesis, Marie, and I simultaneously expressed our confusion.

"He is? Since when?" I asked.

"Ever since the duel started," Shu answered. "Hell, he probably used it in all his other matches, too. Guy's not one to hold back all that much."

That was probably a fact that no one in the audience was aware of. Figaro's Superior Embryo's name and details were a complete mystery to everyone. And yet, he was always using it.

"So, is he wearing it?" I asked.

"That can't be," said Marie. "I'm constantly checking him with Identification, and I can assure you that everything he's wearing and wielding is an item."

That made sense. Identification skills had no effect on Embryos, after all. If there was something that couldn't be Identified, it would obviously be that, but Marie had said that there was no such item on him. Thus, it was safe to conclude that his Embryo wasn't a piece of equipment. But in that case...

"Then what is his Embry—"

Before I could finish my question, the audience became astir.

I hastily looked to the stage and noticed that something strange was happening with Figaro.

He was still on his knees, but his apparel was changing.

First, his coat was engulfed in light and vanished. Next was his light armor and the shirt underneath. Then disappeared the ten rings on all his fingers and even the hat that stayed on his head even as he fought at supersonic speed.

All that was left were the leg armor reminiscent of a hakama, his greaves, and the swords in each of his hands.

For a second, I thought that Xunyu was responsible for this, but the jiangshi seemed as puzzled as everyone else.

Wait a second, isn't that the same light that covered him when he changed in his waiting room? I asked myself.

"Instant Wear," said Marie. "It's a skill that does exactly what it says — allows instant switching of armor."

I remembered the skill I had, but hadn't used yet: Instant Equip. It allowed the user to instantly equip weaponry from the inventory, and I could only assume that Instant Wear worked the same way.

"But..." I said.

Figaro had used it to simply take the items off, instead of switching them for something else. Switching to better equipment would've made sense, but as things were, it looked like he'd only made it worse for himself.

As just about everyone in the arena became confused, Figaro stood up. With his upper clothing gone, his toned chest was completely exposed. His skin and pectoral muscles did little to hide the fact that he'd lost his lung. The area had become unnaturally dark due to all the internal bleeding.

"Was it tHat hard to bReathe?" Xunyu asked — not mockingly, but with genuine curiosity.

Instead of responding, however, Figaro merely grinned.

"GuesS this duel's over, tHen," Xunyu muttered before launching the supersonic arms again.

However, again, Figaro deflected it with one of the swords in his hands.

It was just like the start of a battle before Xunyu had used his ultimate skill. Yet again, Figaro was on the defensive.

"Hm...?" I murmured.

The sight made me puzzled. After all, it barely made any sense. The result of Xunyu's attacks simply couldn't be the same.

Figaro had lost a lung.

Sure enough, his movements were a bit duller, causing him to get a few scratches here and there.

But in what world did it make sense for a person who'd lost a lung to just become a bit slower? It needn't be said that it was a fatal injury. Though Masters were superhuman and could survive through it, it should've taken a huge toll on his mobility.

Thus, I could only question why the injury had such a light effect on Figaro.

"ShgHh!" Xunyu attacked with both arms at once while increasing their speed, causing them to become a blur, even with the barrier acting at its maximum.

"■■!" Figaro released an inhuman sound as I noticed that his expression changed.

He was now making the same berserker-like expression I'd seen him make in the crystal.

"Physical Berserk," said Marie. "That skill gives an immense bonus to physical stats while rendering the body uncontrollable and preventing the use of any other active skills. Is this really a good situation to use it?"

"He nullifies the uncontrollability with another passive skill," answered

Shu. "The mad expression and the bloodlust might make you think otherwise, but he controls himself just fine. Also, he simply chose to focus on increasing his stats rather than using some tricks."

Indeed, Figaro was even faster than before.

"Not a baD face you're mAking, Figaro!" shouted Xunyu while launching those golden arms behind the Over Gladiator.

Figaro momentarily looked behind him, then dodged one of the arms and charged at the other one. He didn't deflect it this time — he actually hit it head-on.

As a result, both Figaro's sword and one of the Superior Embryo's golden nails shattered into many pieces.

As Xunyu became overcome with shock, Figaro used Instant Equip to take out another sword. What followed was another clash, and the result was the same as before.

No — this time, both of Xunyu's arms lost a metallic nail each.

"WhaT did you dO?"

I couldn't help but relate to Xunyu's confusion. It was very clear that the question wasn't directed at the results of the Physical Berserk skill.

What puzzled the jiangshi and me was the fact that, despite being weakened by the loss of a lung, Figaro had been able to damage Xunyu's Superior Embryo, which he'd only been able to dodge and deflect before.

I didn't know how strong the skill was, but I couldn't believe that a single power-up skill could turn the tides like this. Also, even before using the skill, he hadn't really seemed to be behaving like he was severely injured. Which was made even stranger by the fact that he'd been weakened due to removing most of his equipment.

Was he really weakened, though? I thought. "Hmm."

Does he have a skill that strengthens him when he unequips his items? No, he would've done it at the start, then. Still, it should be something that relates to the act of equipping stuff and...

"Is something wrong, Ray?" asked Nemesis.

"Hey, Nemesis," I said. "Remind me how many equipment slots there are in Infinite Dendrogram."

"Equipment slots? Well, there's headwear, upper and lower armor, innerwear... no, it doesn't count. Then there's the cloak, armwear, boots, five accessories, and weapons for each hand... That makes 13. No, special equipment like Silver makes it 14."

"What about Figaro?" I asked.

"Our slit-eyed friend has skills that give him more slots. He had accessories on every finger and can clearly equip six weapons at once. There might be more, but I'd assume it's somewhere around 25."

At this moment, however, he only had his lower armor, greaves, and a weapon in each hand, making for a total of 4.

"Bro," I said.

"Do you address me bearing questions?" he replied.

"What are the effects of the hakama and the greaves Figaro's wearing?"

"The hakama is called 'War Might Cloth (lower),' and it gives a bonus to STR, AGI, and DEX, while the greaves are a special reward called 'Unbound Sabatons, Unchain' and they give a large bonus to AGI and a resistance to movement limitations."

Equipment that strengthened him. A reduced amount of equipment. Increased fighting ability. An Embryo he'd been using from the start.

And the thing Shu and Figaro had been talking about in the hallway. When all of that was considered...

"...Oh, so that's how it is," I muttered. If I was wrong about this, him taking off his clothes would've been completely meaningless.

"Bro."

"I'm listening."

I voiced my guess. "Figaro's Embryo's trait is 'strengthening equipment worn inversely proportional to the number of items equipped,' right?"

My words made everyone except Shu look at me in surprise.

"Why do you think that?" he asked.

"Normally, you're stronger the more items you have equipped, so if someone becomes stronger after taking them off, I can only assume that it's a skill like that."

That said, the fact that he hadn't taken them off right at start was proof that it wasn't just a skill that made him stronger the less he wore. I assumed it was a skill that split a 100% total bonus among all the items he had equipped. When using 25 items, that bonus would be 4% on each, while equipping just 4 items would make it 25%.

He'd taken off the unnecessary equipment to make his power more focused.

“Is that all the proof you have?” asked Shu.

“No, there’s more,” I said. “Figaro goes through the Tomb Labyrinth solo, but that’s not exactly doable, is it?”

“You’re saying you don’t think it’s pawssible for anyone with Superior Embryos?” my brother asked.

“If it were, other Superiors would do it, too. But Figaro is the only one who’s famed for being a solo explorer. That has to be because he has something others don’t.”

“Which is?”

“Utility and countermeasures.”

“Hoh.”

The equipment Figaro usually had on him was probably a utility-focused combination that strengthened his body, increased defense, gave resistances to status effects, and helped him with healing. However, no matter how strong Figaro was, such equipment made him nothing more but a jack of all trades, yet master of none.

It might work fine against normal monsters, but it was clear that it would be difficult for him to fight bosses that way. That went doubly for UBMs, like the ones I’d beaten, which often had highly specific, unique abilities.

When fighting Gardranda and Gouz-Maise, I’d miraculously emerged victorious because I’d had powers that fit the situation. Though I’d gotten into those fights by chance, I’d been equipped with the right countermeasures.

That was the keyword here — countermeasures.

This was merely an assumption, but I believed that Figaro fought and beat his enemies by adjusting and improving his equipment based on his opponent. For example, when facing an ice monster that was weak against fire, he’d use only a fire-based weapon and equipment that increased his frost resistance.

That was exactly what he had done to that player killer in Sauda Mountain Pass. He’d reduced the number of chains he used to strengthen the “resistance to movement limitations” effect on his greaves, allowing him to break free of the binding and emerge victorious.

And now, he’d concluded that defense and resistance to debuffs were useless against Xunyu, leading him to focus exclusively on equipment that increased his speed and damage.

He fought in full gear to safely see what kind of enemy he was dealing with, then switched to wearing only the equipment he really needed. That was Figaro's battle style.

"You're half right," said Shu.

So there's more to this, huh? I thought.

"Just so you know, when he's fully geared, all his equipment's starting numbers are multiplied by two."

"Multiplied by... BY TWO?!"

That meant that now, when he was wearing less than a fifth of his total equipment, that number ought to surpassed ten. Clearly, that was more than enough to cover for the loss of a lung.

Wait... 'starting numbers?' I thought.

"...Bro."

"What?"

"You said I was half right because...?"

"You know how you were talking about the total bonus?" Shu said and then went silent for a moment before continuing. "It increases in proportion to battle time."

Cheers echoed throughout the arena. Figaro's slash had broken another one of Xunyu's metallic nails. This time, however, his sword didn't break.

"He becAme even stRonger!" panicked Xunyu.

If we were to assume that the equipment strengthening increased by 1% every second, the difference that would cause when in full gear would be negligible. But, as Figaro was demonstrating, the same couldn't be said for when he was using only a few items.

Figaro grew stronger with every passing second and with each exchange of blows. He had already surpassed Xunyu's supersonic speed and dealt enough damage to break Superior Embryos.

The constant growth in his power became all the more obvious now that I knew how it worked.

Strengthening proportional to battle time.

Strengthening inversely proportional to the number of equipped items.

Those two were the main traits of Figaro's Superior Embryo.

They were qualities that could only shine in a long battle. Thus, now that the battle had gone on for quite some time, Figaro was in top shape even after having lost one of his lungs.

A man who grew endlessly stronger the more he fought — Figaro the Endless Chain.

“That’s nuts,” was all I could really say about it.

Nemesis, sitting next to me as she’d read my mind, nodded in agreement.

So that nickname wasn’t actually referring to the chains, huh? I thought.

From the fact that it also covered the true nature of Figaro’s Superior Embryo, I could only assume that Shu, who’d known the truth about it, was the one who’d thought of the nickname and made it popular.

“Still...” I murmured.

There was something I found strange. Even though I’d had hints from my brother, I’d been able to figure out the nature of Figaro’s Superior Embryo just by watching him fight once. And yet, all this time, it’d been considered to be a great mystery.

It didn’t take too much thought to figure out why. Figaro — being exclusively a solo player — did all his explorations by himself. He was alone in his boss battles, and most of them happened in the Tomb Labyrinth. Obviously, no one ever saw him fight after removing his equipment.

As for duels... Well, the large audiences had never noticed his abilities because each and every single one of his opponents so far simply hadn’t been strong enough to force him into focusing his gear.

Perhaps he had powered up by removing one or a few of his accessories, but he’d never had to take off so much of his equipment that the spectators would’ve found it weird. Today was the first time that had ever happened in a duel. Figaro had had to go all out because his opponent was the strongest he’d ever faced in a duel.

Xunyu was truly strong.

“Hah! You surE are somethiNg, Figaro!” shouted the jiangshi as his left arm was completely severed.

If that wasn’t a show of just how strong Figaro had become, nothing was. Even with a critical injury, he surpassed Xunyu at just about every front.

The tables had turned.

Figaro evaded the nails with little effort as the jiangshi’s legs distanced the body from him. Xunyu attacked even while backing away, but none of it seemed to work.

Though both were fighting at supersonic speeds, there was now a clear difference in velocity between them.

And, of course, that difference only kept growing.

“Damn, I mesSed up!” said Xunyu. “I shouLd’ve aimed for thE head, even if the riSk of you dodgiNg would’ve been biGger!”

Though cornered, Xunyu showed no signs of using the ultimate skill again. It probably had a cooldown or a limited number of uses.

Xunyu was strong and had certainly had a chance at victory. However, that chance had disappeared the moment the jiangshi had failed to grab hold of Figaro’s heart.

“■■” Figaro voiced another inhuman sound as I noticed that he now held only one weapon instead of two.

It would probably be categorized as a broadsword. But it was definitely not just a sword.

It was hard for me to say what made it so different from the other weapons he’d used. Its presence was simply unmatched. I felt as though merely looking at it for too long would reduce me to nothing.

“That sword... Figaro’s going for the finishing blow!” said Shu.

“You know what that weapon is?” asked Marie.

“You can’t Identify it?”

“I can’t. Using Identification doesn’t even give me its name.”

I understand not being able to Identify stats, but not even seeing the name? I thought.

“The Zenith Dragon’s Brilliant Fang, Gloria α.”

“Ah?! So that’s...?!” Marie became shocked, and yet I didn’t know why.

The intimidating air about it made it obvious that it was a special reward. However...

“It’s on a completely different level,” said Nemesis, and I couldn’t help but nod.

It was above any and all equipment I’d seen so far. I wouldn’t have been surprised if it was a greater weapon than Xunyu’s Superior Embryo.

“That’s a cooL toy you hAve, Figaro! GheAhahaHahahahhah!”

And yet, the jiangshi was still laughing. Despite it all — despite being the very target of that menacing blade, Xunyu was still laughing.

The two duelists were no longer fighting, allowing the laugh to freely echo throughout the arena, which had turned silent with anticipation. And once the echoes subsided...

“Then I’m goNna use tHis!” Reaching into a sleeve, Xunyu took out a dagger and gripped it with the right prosthetic arm.

A second later, a menacing air came from the jiangshi. Specifically, from the dragon fang-like dagger.

“Yinglong’s Fang, Suling Yi. It’s just like youRs — a Superior Item. I got it wheN we dealt with the SUBM thAt attacked our Huang He.”

SUBMs and Superior Items.

When I’d checked the help window, I’d learned that was the highest tier of special rewards. The two duelists were owners of Superior Jobs and Superior Embryos. And now, they wielded Superior weaponry, as well.

“Still, it’s nOt like I can surpaSs you when you’re so bUffed,” Xunyu said.

Of course, Xunyu was aware. It was something that I’d been able to figure out. There was no way that an experienced Superior facing Figaro couldn’t realize the nature of his Embryo.

“Don’t worrY, though. My Yinglong’s Fang deals moRe damage the more MP and SP I giVe it,” Xunyu said while baring the fang at Figaro. “I’ll give mY all to this one attack. Next time’s goNna be the laSt.”

That declaration was followed by more silence, which created a thick air of tension.

Figaro’s Superior Embryo was sending more and more power into Gloria α.

Xunyu the Master Jiangshi, a Superior Job with immense MP and SP, was giving it all to Yinglong’s Fang.

The air became so tense that it felt as though the very space around them would crack.

Nemesis, Shu, Marie, Rook, Babi, I, and just about everyone else in the audience looked at the menacing duelists while holding our breaths in anticipation.

Now that the tension had reached its apex, I was so immersed in the scene that I didn’t even notice that I’d pushed off the glass that was on the table. Right before it shattered, I heard the high-pitched sound caused by it touching the stony floor echo within our box.

At that moment, the Over Gladiator charged, while the Master Jiangshi launched his right arm.

Both their speeds surpassed and went far above supersonic. Even though they were slowed down by the barrier running at full capacity, I still couldn't see what had happened. All that entered my vision were the results.

Figaro's left arm and Xunyu's right arm — still holding Yinglong's Fang — had been severed from their bodies and were now airborne.

Still holding Gloria α in his right, Figaro dashed to Xunyu's side, to which the jiangshi responded by instantly launching the left arm, the one with a hand that had lost its metallic nails, towards the Over Gladiator.

At that particular moment, Xunyu was faster than the opponent and quickly forced the golden nail into Figaro's chest.

"Got ya nOw!"

Before I'd realized it, one of the very same golden nails that had been broken and dropped to the stage was affixed to the hand once again.

Xunyu's claim about giving it all to Yinglong's Fang had been merely but a setup for this surprise attack.

The jiangshi had predicted that Figaro would focus on speed in exchange for defense and took advantage of that.

Xunyu the Yinglong was both the Landmine and Divine Speed.

And still, the Over Gladiator came out ahead.

I could see shock on Xunyu's partially concealed expression. It was caused by the fact that the golden nail hadn't pierced through Figaro's body.

The golden nails were supposed to break through the skin, tear the pectoral muscle, rip the heart, shatter the ribcage, and come out on the other side. However, something had stopped it right after it tore the pectoral muscle.

It was an object capable of withstanding an attack from a Superior Embryo.

It was...

"...a heart," I muttered.

An Embryo that no one could see, despite Figaro always using it.

An object that Xunyu had failed to grab with the ultimate skill and couldn't pierce with this surprise attack.

They were the same thing.

A heart-shaped Superior Embryo.

“Thank you,” said Figaro. “You were a wonderful opponent.”

He’d taken off the Physical Berserk and sent his praises to his fellow duelist...

“Fang of Gloria!”

...and then split Xunyu in two from the top of the head.

“GHH!” the jiangshi groaned, and then struggled to try to do something.

“OVERDRIVE!”

Figaro swung Gloria α back upwards while making it release a pillar-shaped burst of light that greatly surpassed Baolongba in terms of heat.

The light was blinding enough to cause a whiteout. Though we couldn’t see anything, it was easy to tell that it was silently evaporating everything within the barrier. And once the light faded, all that was left was Figaro, while Xunyu had vanished without a trace.

I heard a belated announcement of Figaro’s victory.

Once the audience realized what happened, the arena was engulfed in applause.

Nemesis and I and everyone else in our box were cheering, as well.

The Clash of the Superiors — a duel that would be sung for a long time to come — had ended with Figaro’s victory.

Conjunction Episode: The End of the Match, the Beginning of Madness

Central Arena, audience seating

The moment Figaro won, ovation roared throughout the building.

"What a great duel..." A certain young spectator seated in the west side couldn't hold his honest opinion about the battle he'd just witnessed. The spectators around him were standing up as they sent cheers and applause to Figaro — no, the spectacular battle itself — and he was no exception.

"Truly a wonderful fight," he said, clearly moved.

"Yeah!" agreed a middle-aged man standing next to him. "I've seen many arena battles in my life, but a duel this good is a first!"

"Really?"

"You'd better believe it! The best match before was the one between Figaro and Tom Cat, the previous champion, but this was above that one!"

"I suppose I am quite lucky, then. This makes the journey through the desert all the more worth it."

The middle-aged man then noticed that the youth next to him was wearing a turban and loose, skin-concealing clothing that was popular in Caldina.

"You came here all the way from Caldina?!" he exclaimed. "Wasn't it hard?"

"Oh yes, it was," nodded the youth. "But again, it was worth it. I now have a good story to tell my friends back there."

After forming a satisfied smile, he then tilted his head in confusion.

"Oh?"

Gradually, more and more people in the audience became as puzzled as he was.

"What's wrong, lad?" asked the middle-aged man.

"Umm, Mr. Figaro is..." He told the man of the oddity that he had noticed.

Eventually, the confusion spread all across the arena.

"What a joke," said a woman in the eastern part of the audience. Obviously, she wasn't as ecstatic about the battle as everyone else in the audience.

Though what she'd said were pure fighting words to all the duel enthusiasts around her, they were drowned out by the cheering and failed to reach anyone's ears.

It there was anything that could hear her voice, it would be the porcupine sitting on her lap.

The woman was deeply unsatisfied with the battle she'd just witnessed.

A battle between two Superiors. I would be lying if I said that I wasn't expecting anything. However, both of them ended up being complete eyesores. It made me wonder if they are really Superiors. Nothing but trickery and gimmicks. How trifling. The only worthwhile thing was at the end. Are they that useless because they're based on such shoddy things as hearts and limbs? And yet you're supposed to be the same as...?

Her expression turned stern as the woman's irritation became even denser.

Right when it was about to turn into murderous intent and be unleashed upon her surroundings...

"know your place, and shut your mouth" the porcupine on her lap suddenly said.

The woman knew exactly what it meant.

"My apologies," she said. "Pardon my abusive thoughts. I almost let them out, but I'll hold them back now."

"k"

After apologizing, the woman petted the porcupine.

Then, she looked at the stage with a bored expression on her face.

"Oh, its begun," she said. "Well, with the first princess not being here, it has nothing to do with us."

"spec"

"Very well. Let us spectate. This might be good entertainment."

◇◆◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

Something was very off.

Figaro was stuck in the very same position he'd been in after finishing Xunyu off with that upwards swing. Also, despite the match being over, Xunyu showed no signs of reviving.

The inside of the barrier was completely still in every sense of the word.

"What's going on?" I asked. "Hey, br—"

Before I could call out to Shu, I cut my words short. That was because of what I felt when I looked at him.

Even though he was clad in a full bear suit, I could easily tell that he was extremely pissed.

The others here — Nemesis, Rook, Babi, and Marie — seemed to feel it, too, causing them to back away a bit.

That was completely understandable. After all, at that moment, Shu was actually a bit scary.

"Bro, what's up?" I asked, feeling that I had to be the one to do it.

That was enough for the air of intimidation to disperse.

"Hm," he said. "Looks like someone went and did something unnecessary."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Well, the reason why Figaro is immobile is because the time inside the barrier got stopped."

"The time is stopped?"

"Yeah, the barriers here have that function, but it's rarely used. There's just no reason to, unless maybe if some show monsters went a bit too crazy," he said. "During the match, the time inside the barrier was slowed down to the very limit, but time stopping is a different thing entirely. Just like with slow playback and pause on videos."

"If time is stopped, what about their consciousness?" I asked.

"I've never been through that myself, but I think they're conscious. Tian and monster thoughts would probably stop, but just like with mental status effects, the player preservation function keeps every Master's mind active. Otherwise, players couldn't log out when they really needed to. However, the light and air movement is stopped, too, so they likely don't see or feel anything. Though, honestly with the evaporation that happened, I can't even imagine the state that Xunyu's in."

That's certainly not something I like to picture, but the two fighters are experiencing it right now, I thought.

“This timing...” said Marie. “Was it set up to stop the very moment the duel ended?”

“Most likely,” nodded Shu. “Now we just have to figure out what kind of asshole is responsible for—”

He cut his words short.

A thing had appeared on the top of the barrier, gathering everyone’s attention.

“That’s...” I said.

It was a single silhouette. It had the shape of a costume, and it was one I was very familiar with — an Adélie penguin costume.

“Ayy! Good evening, ladies and gents! What a great fight! Hella hype, wasn’t it?” Once everyone’s attention had focused on him, the penguin began speaking. As he gestured to everyone in the arena, the voice he spoke in was that of...

“...the announcer?” I asked.

It was the very same voice that had done the announcing for today’s battle. It was different than the voice he’d had yesterday.

He didn’t seem used to announcing, so can I assume he infiltrated and stole that role? I thought.

Though he clearly had no intention of answering my question, he touched something on his neck and changed his voice back to the familiar one.

“Aaall right! With the hype fight done, it’s probs time for the Count and Princess to bore you with some speeches and directions,” he said. “But let’s skip that crap and do something fun, instead!”

The penguin followed those words with a spin. Though he was in a suit, it was easy to tell that he was laughing.

And no, it wasn’t because I was used to my brother and his bear costume. Anyone who’d heard the penguin’s soft voice would tell you that it was thick with wickedness and malice.

“Name yourself, you cur!” said a voice from one of the boxes.

The box was significantly larger than most — clearly meant for the guests of honor. I knew the identity of the one who’d said that. It was the person I’d seen when the event began: Count Aschbarray Gideon.

“Why are you besmirching this event?!” the count yelled.

His rage was not without reason. After all, the penguin was making a mockery of a such masterful duel and the very successful event. Even I had a thing or two to say to him.

“HA HA HA! I just said it, didn’t I? I want to do something fun!” After some loud laughter, the penguin put his hands on the back of the suit’s head. “But yeah, I haven’t revealed who I am yet! Allow me to do so!”

Then he took off the penguin suit.

“Get a load of this handsome mug! Ain’t I charming?”

The one inside the suit was a thin man with an Embryo crest on his left hand. He was now wearing glasses and a lab coat, but nothing else really stood out — at least not as much as the penguin suit. Sure, his face was good, but with Masters being able to customize their appearances, it wasn’t anything special.

However, the only ones with such lukewarm thoughts about him were people like me and Rook. The rest of the audience seemed to be extremely shocked.

“You... YOU...!” Count Gideon knew the man, as well, and his presence seemed to rid him of words.

“Oh boy, oh boy! Look at all these people that know who I am!” Despite it being dark, the former penguin purposely put his right hand above his eyes to protect them from sunlight and looked around. He was clearly enjoying the reactions his face reveal had caused. They were a testament to just how well-known his identity was.

“Identity...” I murmured.

When I’d met him yesterday, he’d pronounced himself as “Dr. Flamingo.” It had been clear back then — and now more than ever — that he was just fooling around. That wasn’t his name. It was...

“Why are you here... Franklin?!” Count Gideon demanded.

“BIIINNNNGOOOOOOOOOOOO!” Franklin yelled.

Fireworks began exploding in the air not far from the arena.

Though they were a beautiful sight that made Gideon’s night sky more vibrant, few in the arena could enjoy them. It wasn’t just tians, either. I saw some Masters who looked like they couldn’t even stomach the man’s presence.

It was only obvious. No one here could feel good with Franklin nearby.

Despite being a newbie, even I knew what his name meant to this country’s people.

“Yeah, it’s ya boy! The same guy who fed your king and a bunch of other nobodies to monsters! The Dryfe Imperium’s Superior! The forefront of robotics and monster synthesis! Better check yourselves before you wreck yourselves. Because it’s me, Giga Professor Franklin!”

It was safe to call him the kingdom’s greatest enemy.

To Be Continued in the Next Episode…

Midword

Bear: “I bear good news: it’s time for the midword!”

Cat: “Yaay! Something neew!”

Bear: “In Volume 3, the main story stops with Figgy’s and Xunyu’s battle.”

Cat: “Now, it’s time for some side stories that take place during Volume 2!”

Bear: “They’re about Ray’s beary merry party members — Rook and the shaded journo.”

Cat: “These stories are told from perspectives other than Ray’s.”

Cat: “You might come to see things that you cannot see through Ray’s eyes.”

Bear: “They’re also strongly linked to the events in Volume 4.”

Bear: “Now, it pawsitively saddens me, but we must say goodbye! Until the afterword!”

Side Story: The Case of the Untamable Slime

Pimp, Rook Holmes

"Lucius, you've already learned the English patterns?"

"Yes! I'm also halfway done with Japanese and German, as well!"

"Amazing. Not even I could do that when I was your age."

"I'm doing my best, Father! After all, I'm your and Mother's..."

◇

"It's morning," I muttered as I woke up at my usual time at the break of dawn, on my first day after our arrival at Gideon.

A night of sleep here in Infinite Dendrogram made me feel as if I'd actually slept that much, which was quite curious, since the tripled flow of time here meant that I'd only slept a third of that time in reality.

"Good morning, Marilyn," I said. She was already awake in the jewel. "Let me do something, and then we'll have breakfast."

I got dressed and began going through my daily routine.

It was lip-reading practice. Something I'd been doing for nearly ten years now, ever since I was five years old. It consisted of checking the shape of the mouth when pronouncing various sounds from various languages.

However, in Infinite Dendrogram, things were a bit different.

"It's quite clear by now that any words with a meaning have the exact same shape no matter which language you use... It all gets translated into Infinite Dendrogram's common," I said. "I haven't fully learned it yet, so it might be a while until I'm able to lip-read here."

Whether I used English and said "hand" or Japanese and said "te," the shape of the mouth was exactly the same. It seemed to me that any words were translated into Infinite Dendrogram's common the moment they were given meaning. However, meaningless sounds — such as “h,” “a,” “n,” “d” — came out like they were supposed to.

In real life, I could freely lip-read conversations from several languages. Here, though, I was sent back to square one and now had to spend every day increasing the vocabulary I could read.

“Sorry for the wait, Marilyn,” I said after about an hour’s worth of practice. “Let’s eat.”

“Morning, Rook!” Babi said. “Yay! Food!”

“KIEEH...” Audrey added. (“Man, I’m hungry...”)

Babi and Audrey had awoken, as well, so we all went to eat breakfast.

Once that was done, I returned Marilyn and Audrey to the Jewel and walked through Gideon’s streets.

Marilyn and Audrey had been fighting ever since they woke up.

“MHOOO!” (“You uncouth red chicken!”)

“KIEE! KOOO!” (“You hard-headed turtle bitch! Fuck you!”)

This had been happening ever since Audrey had joined us. It might’ve had something to do with Marilyn being very diligent and Audrey being the delinquent kind of girl, but I’d also heard that land-dragons and avians just naturally didn’t get along too well.

We’re a team, so I’d really like it if they became friends, I thought.

“What do we do today?” asked Babi, causing me to ponder.

According to my friends list, both Ray and Marie were offline. From their vocabularies and the expressions they used, it was safe to assume that they were Japanese, and with it being nighttime over there, they were most likely asleep.

Due to that, it was best for me to take care of business that was entirely my own.

“We’ll first go to the Pimps’ Guild,” I said. “There’s someone I want to see there. After that, we’ll look around the tamed monster market.”

I had to meet a certain person in the Pimps’ Guild and then buy one or two new monsters, which was the reason why I’d come to Gideon in the first place. However, the latter priority had dropped a lot when I’d gotten Audrey to join us.

“MHOO.” (“Master, please do not get another bird.”)

“KIEEE.” (“Turtles either, Boss. We have one too many already.”)

Hearing Marilyn and Audrey say that from inside the Jewel on my right hand, I thought about what I really needed.

"Well," I said. "We have Marilyn for land and Audrey for air, so now we need someone for water. I don't think it'll be a bird, but it might actually be a turtle."

After giving appropriately differing reactions to my words, the two suddenly looked confused. From what I could tell, they had only just realized I could understand what they were saying.

"Who are you going to meet, Rook?" asked Babi.

"A person called Catherine," I answered. "She helped me a lot back at the capital when I became a Pimp. She's the one who told me that I should do some part-time work and get the Identification skill."

"We actually met someone like that?"

"It happened when you were sleeping."

After the Catalog Ray had lent me had told me that my suitable job was Pimp, I'd had trouble finding the capital's Pimps' Guild due to it being in a relatively secretive place and me being a newbie with little knowledge of the area. Catherine, an experienced Pimp, had helped me find it.

She was also the one that'd told me that the headquarters of the Pimps' Guild was here in Gideon. Catherine regularly visited the place, so I didn't see any reason not to drop by and say hi.

After following my map to a back alley in Gideon's eighth district, I arrived at an establishment that seemed to be a mix between a bar and an inn. The sign near the entrance said "Pimps' Guild's Headquarters," so there was little doubt that I had the right building. The Adventurers' Guild doubled as a bar, too, but the fact that this one was also an inn probably meant exactly what most would assume.

"I'll go eat over there!" said Babi before going to a table.

Though she wasn't as much of a big eater as Ray's Nemesis, Babi did eat quite a lot. Of course, the amount she consumed meant little when one noted that she ate solely sweet things turned spicy.

Anyway, likely due to me being a Pimp that was clearly too young, I attracted quite a lot of attention.

"Excuse me," I spoke to the high level-looking man working behind the counter.

"Welcome, boyo," he replied. "Well, aren't you a young'un! Oh no, that won't be a problem! We don't have age restrictions here! Anyone's free to enjoy themselves at any time!”

Though he talked with a fake-looking smile, it didn’t seem like he had any malice towards me. That was probably how he interacted with any average customer.

“Oh, I’m not a customer. I’m a member of the guild,” I said as I showed him my card.

“Well, whaddya know, you really are,” he spoke as he looked at it. “It’s rare for Masters to become Pimps. We have two or three others, but you’re easily the youngest among them.” The fake smile was all but gone as he changed his attitude towards me.

Just as he’d said, Pimp — despite being a useful job — wasn’t too popular among Masters. As far as I was aware, the most popular jobs here in the kingdom were from the knight grouping, and though watching Ray made me understand why, I still wondered why the pimp grouping was so niche in comparison.

“So, you’re lookin’ for someone you can offer your services to?” he asked. “Or do you need some workers?”

The first question referred to guild quests, like the model-searching one I’d taken back at the capital. The second question referred to buying tamed monsters and the like. In Gideon, just like this place, they could be bought in the fourth district.

“The latter, please,” I said. “May I ask something, though?”

“What is it?”

“Is the Master known as ‘Catherine’ here?”

The moment I spoke that name, the guild turned completely silent. Some people dropped their glasses, some went into a fetal position and cowered, while others just quickly paid their bills and hastily walked out.

What am I supposed to make of this reaction? I thought.

“Do you know her?” he asked.

“Yes,” I nodded. “She helped me a lot in the capital’s guild.”

“Well, she is good at taking care of pretty boys,” the bartender said. “Though most of them just avoid her... Anyway, she should be here soon.”

I decided to wait for her. I went and sat at the same table as Babi and let the time pass by while I drank the free tea they gave me.

During that time, I felt that Marilyn and Audrey — still in the Jewel — were fighting about something again. I heard sounds that seemed to refer to my tastes, Catherine, love rivalry, dragon anthropomorphization, and love between birds and people.

What are they talking about? I thought.

After nearly an hour of such waiting, the guild's door opened, and I heard a familiar, high-pitched voice.

"Heeyyy! Good morning to you allll!"

"Ah, she's here," I said.

The owner of the voice was the Catherine I was waiting for.

She came into the guild accompanied by four maids and, upon noticing my presence, walked up to our table.

"Oh my! It's really Rookie!" she said joyously. "I'd heard that the PK blockade had stopped, but I didn't think that you'd have arrived in Gideon already."

"I did, as you can see!" I responded. "I came here with Babi, my party members Ray and Marie, and these girls right here!" I introduced Babi and the two girls inside my Jewel to her.

"Rook, who is this?" asked Babi.

"She's the one I told you about — Catherine Kongou," I answered. "She's a highly skilled Pimp and a very reliable person."

"Oh come, now, Rookie, praise like that will make me blush!" Catherine cried.

A moment later, I noticed that Marilyn and Audrey seemed really shocked, for some reason. It seemed as though they were surprised by Catherine's appearance. Thinking that, I re-examined how she looked.

Long blonde hair bearing the slenderness and glamor of silk.

Eyes of a deep blue color reminiscent of a clear sea.

Custom-made clothing of a lavish design, clearly created from high-quality materials.

Nails covered in simply masterful art that she'd probably done by herself.

A voice as charming and enchanting as a mermaid's.

Over two meters in stature.

Huge biceps, about as thick as a horse's neck.

A slightly exposed chest which revealed pectoral muscles that seemed to rival steel.

A face with a boorish structure and features that clearly belonged on a dominating overlord.

Indeed, it was the exact same Catherine that I'd met back at the capital.

Her appearance was certainly unique, so it wasn't too hard to believe that she'd surprised Marilyn and Audrey.

It's actually pretty interesting that even monsters can be surprised by what we humans wear, I thought. This has been on my mind for a while, but it really does seem that their thoughts are similar to those of humans.

◇

Catherine Kongou was a veteran Pimp. However, rather than being from the pimp grouping, her current main job was Siren — a Superior Job from the harlot grouping bearing conditions such as "Charm a total of 100,000 people or monsters."

Apparently, she was also really high on the kingdom's kill rankings. I knew how effective Charm was in large-scale battles better than most, so I could fully understand why she was up there. Still, it was pretty obvious that her battle style had more to it than just that skill.

Also, Catherine's avatar was a man made to look like a woman, making the popular term "transvestite" to be the most apt description for her. However, I couldn't tell what her gender was in real life. That was something I could normally guess after a while of talking, but the way Catherine mixed masculinity and femininity made it really difficult for me.

Due to her being like that, however, you could safely say that she had both male reliability and female attentiveness, making her fully deserving of respect.

"Did you meet the PK terrorists on your way to Gideon?" I asked Catherine while we had a chat over some tea.

"I flew over here on one of my girls," she answered. "Seems like the meanies couldn't do anything about those in the air."

The words "my girls" made me glance behind her, where I saw the four maids that accompanied her.

"You've already met Rubiella, haven't you?" Catherine asked upon noticing where I was looking.

Indeed. One of the four, the maid with red hair, had been with Catherine back when she'd helped me out in the capital.

“Yes,” I nodded. “She was with you when we met.”

“Well, then let me introduce you to the other girls,” she said. “The blue-haired one is Sappheanne, the green-haired one is Emerada, while the one with the eyepatch is Crystella.”

The maids bowed to us respectfully.

“A pleasure meeting you,” I responded. “I am Rook, Catherine’s junior in this trade.”

“Could you be a dear and show me your girls, too?” Catherine asked.

“Certainly. Oh, but they might break the floor here,” I said. Marilyn was a heavyweight Demi-Dragon, so she could easily break through the wooden boarding beneath us.

“Let’s go somewhere else, then,” she said. “Guildmaster! We’re borrowing the back of the building!”

“Go ahead,” said the man behind the counter. “Also, there’s a job specifically for you, so do come back and take it when you’re done.”

I had a hunch that the bartender was high level, and now I know why — he’s the guildmaster here, I thought.

Behind the guild, I summoned my monsters from my Jewel. “Call — Marilyn, Audrey.”

“My, what a lovely pair,” commented Catherine. “They’d be a match for your usual high-rank Tamer’s monsters.” She then made a friendly smile.

...Why do Marilyn and Audrey look so afraid?

“A Demi-Dragon and a Roc Bird surely take lots of space, but your Jewel looks pretty fancy, so I assume it still has room for more?” she asked.

“It does,” I said. “I’d like to get one that could travel on water. Would I find any in the marketplace?”

“An aquatic monster? Finding one here might be difficult.” According to her, most of the city’s water came from the underground, and there weren’t any lakes or rivers nearby. Due to that, not many traders here dealt in aquatic monsters. The Pimps’ Guild actually didn’t sell a single one of those.

“Oh, but you might get lucky and find one in the market,” she added.

“I see! I’ll go there right now!” I said.

“But the roads there are complicated, and the place isn’t safe, even for us Masters. I’d come along, but I have a job to do... I know, let’s do this.”

Catherine turned to face the maids behind her and beckoned the red-haired one, Rubiella.

"Rubiella, be a dear and guide Rookie through the market."

"As you wish, milady." The maid bowed.

"Is that really okay?" I asked.

"Yes. Don't you worry," said Catherine. "Just tell her to come back to me once your business is done."

"Thank you very much, Catherine!"

Catherine gave me gentle smile and patted me on the head. That action reminded me of my dad — or mom, maybe — and made me feel somewhat happy.

Though, I still don't get why Marilyn and Audrey become so scared whenever Catherine smiles, I thought.

After parting ways with Catherine, Rubiella guided us to and around the market in the fourth district.

"In this market, there's a street-based bazaar and shops set up in buildings," she explained. "You might find bargains in the bazaar, but if you don't have a high enough Identification skill, you could end up purchasing counterfeit or inferior goods, so I cannot recommend it. The wares in shops are far more trustworthy when it comes to quality and authenticity, but that makes their price a bit higher."

"So, first-time shoppers like myself are better off using the shops, right?" I asked.

"Indeed," she confirmed. "Also, you can set up your own stall in the bazaar. The places you can use are managed by the fourth district's manager. For a daily payment, you can sell your products here even if you're not a merchant."

As she told me such things, we entered a small, secretive alleyway.

"Since you wish to purchase an aquatic monster, I will introduce you to a shop that Milady is well-acquainted with. If you don't find what you need there, we will look around the bazaar."

"That sounds good," I said.

As she guided us, Rubiella repeatedly did a strange hand-waving motion. I found it curious, but before I could ask what it meant, we arrived at a shop at the very end of the alleyway.

The secretive establishment had a sign saying "Monster King's Shop, Central Continent Branch.”

That name was strange. After all, Infinite Dendrogram had only one continent, so “Central Continent Branch” didn’t really make sense, since it implied that their main shop was somewhere else. The only places that came to mind were the far-east island nation of Tenchi or the maritime country, Granvaloa.

Or perhaps... No, I still don’t have enough knowledge to theorize about this, I thought.

“Welcome!” the person behind the counter greeted us as we entered. “Oh? Well, if it isn’t Rubiella.”

The person was small in stature — about one head shorter than me. He was notable for the pitch-black robe and the hood hiding his face.

“It’s been a while,” said Rubiella. “Are you the one tending to the shop today, manager?”

“Yeah, I do it every once in a blue moon,” answered the person. “Where’s Catherine?”

“Milady is not here this time. She told me to help out young master Rook.”

“A pleasure to meet you,” I said. “I am Rook, Catherine’s junior in the trade.”

“Well, now that’s rare,” said the shopkeeper. “I assume you’re here to buy monsters, then? What do you have in mind?”

“An aquatic monster, please.”

“Aquatic, eh? There’s little demand for those here, so we don’t have anything particularly rare. We do have a corner for them, though.” He left the counter and began leading us to it.

This shop seemed to deal exclusively in pre-tamed monsters. The shelves had countless Jewels on them, and I could see the monsters they held by simply looking inside.

Oh, there are even Jewels with Tri-Horn Demi-Dragons like Marilyn inside. It’s kinda hard to tell whether this is more of a pet shop or a jewelry shop, I thought as we approached a booth lit by a bluish light.

“This is the aquatic monster corner,” said the shopkeeper. “Do look around.”

“...Wow,” I muttered. Though the keeper had said that they didn’t have anything particularly rare, I could see several jewels with aquatic Demi-

Dragons. It was clear that the selection was good.

"Our varied selection of land-dragons and sky-dragons extends to Pure-Dragons, too," he said. "Not sea-dragons, though."

Still, the wares here in the Monster King's Shop were far above the ones sold at the market we'd passed. They even had tamed Pure-Dragons, which were considered to be a rarity. Despite that, the prices here weren't particularly greater than the ones in the bazaar. One would expect them to have completely sold out by now.

That reminded me that Rubiella had made some strange action before entering the shop, so this might've been one of those establishments that only allowed a select few individuals to browse. I wasn't completely certain about that.

In any case, it was quite obvious that, in this shop, I'd have no trouble finding a new teammate that matched Marilyn and Audrey.

"Since you're a friend of Catherine's, I'll allow you to pay by installments," said the shopkeeper.

"How nostalgic," commented Rubiella. "When Milady and I met here, she also paid by installments."

"Oh, that was a bit over four years ago, wasn't it?" he said. "Time sure flies..."

While the two were conversing, I examined the aquatic monsters on display, but...

"I just don't know," I muttered.

"What's wrong, Rook?" asked Babi.

"Demi-Dragons not good enough?" inquired the keeper.

"No, I wouldn't say so. It's just that..."

I had nothing against Demi-Dragon class monsters. In fact, when taking cooperation with Marilyn and Audrey into consideration, they were actually better than Pure-Dragons. However...

"They just... don't click," I said. "When I met Marilyn and Audrey, the monsters with me right now, I had some strange feeling drawing me to them. Here, however, I'm not getting it at all."

When I'd chosen Marilyn as my reward from Grantzian and when I'd faced Audrey in that battle, I'd had a sensation drawing me to them. I didn't get it when looking at any of the monsters here in the shop, and that included the Pure-Dragons, which were supposedly stronger than both Marilyn and Audrey. It was a really vague feeling that I found hard to describe.

"Oh, I see." The shopkeeper nodded as if he could understand me completely, and Rubiella seemed to share his sentiment, as well.

"'Rook,' was it?" he said. "I can see that Pimp is your vocation, but you seem to have the makings of a Tamer, as well. Not many people are equipped with intuition like yours."

"Really?" I raised an eyebrow.

"Yes. And because of that, I don't think you should limit yourself to aquatic monsters. Take a look at every Jewel in my shop and search for the one that clicks."

"All right. I'll see if I find anything," I said before walking away from the aquatic monster corner and looking at other Jewels in the shop.

"A natural, non-sense skill Beast Judgment, eh?" said the shop owner as I walked away. "With Catherine and that other person, that's a total of three now." Those words stuck with me, for some reason.

After that, I spent about two hours looking at the Jewels here, but the results weren't great. No matter how many thousands of them I examined, I didn't find a single monster that "clicked."

"Well, that's a shame," said the shopkeeper.

"Sorry for wasting your time," I apologized.

"No need for that. A business wouldn't function if we didn't allow our customers to examine our wares as long as they liked. Though, now you'll have to look around the bazaar..."

"Indeed," agreed Rubiella. "However, using Beast Judgment in the bazaar is quite..."

"Oh, right. Even a Master would be in trouble if they found out."

They were talking about something, but I didn't know what "Beast Judgment" entailed, so I couldn't really follow the conversation.

"...Huh?" I asked.

Suddenly, I noticed something.

On one end of the shop, there was a metallic pot, large enough to fit a child. The lid was off and lying at the base of the pot. For some reason, it was surrounded by a chain bearing a warning coloration, as if to say that the pot was off-limits.

It stands out so much, so how didn't I notice it before? I asked myself before curiosity took over. I approached the pot and pointed my left hand at it.

"Shopkeeper, this pot is..."

"Pot? Ah...?! GET AWAY FROM IT!"

His shout startled me into quickly backing away. A moment later, something silver passed the space where my index finger was. I looked and noticed that the warning chain was severed. The cut was so clean and flat that it almost felt as though it could be fixed if you simply put the pieces back together. My finger was slightly damaged, as well, but a bit of rubbing was enough for the cut to close and leave only a small mark. It seemed like I was cut by an extremely sharp blade moving at an immense speed.

However, that was quite far from the truth.

What had cut me wasn't a blade, but a liquid. I saw some of it hang on the edge of the pot before returning inside. The liquid was silver and had a mysterious glossiness. The sight was bizarre, and I simply couldn't look away from this monster.

"Sorry about that," said the shopkeeper. "This one's dangerous, so I had an isolation barrier around it. Seems like it got broken."

"I'm quite fine," I replied. "What is this, though?"

"It's a Mithril Arms Slime," answered the shop owner as he cast some spell and fixed the chain. "A rarity among the already-rare metal slimes. They have bodies made of liquid mithril and attack by quickly turning themselves into weapons."

Mithril Arms Slime, I repeated the monster name in my head.

"I got it in an auction, but it wasn't tamed, you see," he continued. "I was planning to ask a Tamer I was acquainted with to tame it, but before I could do that, I accidentally unsealed it, and now it's in this state."

"'This state,' as in...?" I asked.

"Constantly on alert and prepared for battle. Thing's now completely volatile, cutting any living creature that comes close. It's also more difficult to tame it now, and moving it from there is really tricky, so I couldn't really do much besides creating a barrier around it. Slimes don't even get tired, so waiting it out isn't an option, either. Sure, killing it would take care of this mess, but I don't want to see the money I've spent go down the drain."

"How much did you spend on it?" I asked.

"10,250,000 lir. These slimes aren't the strongest things, but their rarity makes them cost a pretty penny.”

Hearing the price made me freeze for a moment. However...

“Shopkeeper,” I said.

“Yes?”

I gathered my resolve and told him what I wanted. “I’ll tame the slime, so could you sell it to me?”

My words made the shopkeeper, Rubiella, and the monsters inside my Jewel turn silent with surprise. Only Babi had her usual smile on her face.

“Though I’d like to pay by installments, if you don’t mind,” I added.

“I’ve already said that I would allow that,” he said. “Are you sure, though?”

“Yes. I mean... the slime clicked with me,” I responded with a smile, caused by an unwavering belief in my own intuition. “I will tame her.”

Simply because I wanted her, I chose to tame the Mithril Arms Slime — a creature yet to be tamed by anyone.

◇

Mithril Arms Slime.

According to the shop’s owner, they were a rarity even among the already-rare metal slimes.

Not carnivorous, herbivorous, or omnivorous, their diet consisted of water and metal ores, especially mithril.

All slimes had liquid bodies, and these were no exception. However, Mithril Arms Slimes had the special ability to instantly harden and turn parts of themselves into weapons. When attacked, they either turned their bodies into mithril shields or used their slime-like liquid state to maneuver out of harm’s way.

The number of these slimes that humanity had found was still in the double digits, while the amount that had been killed didn’t even break twenty. And so far, not a single one of them had ever been tamed.

Again — the Mithril Arms Slime, as a species, had yet to be tamed.

I was told that some Tamers had gotten them into a tamable state, but had gotten their right hands cut off when they’d tried to form a contract.

Normally, when monsters are in a tamable state, all the person has to do is touch them and form a contract to complete the taming. I’d already gone through that with Audrey, and she hadn't resisted at all.

However, Mithril Arms Slimes were different in that regard. As long as they were in an alert state, they didn't hesitate to attack the Tamers even after they became tamable.

Due to that, they were considered to be even more difficult to tame than Pure-Dragons.

"We've had some customers who wanted to try and tame it, but they've all failed," said the shopkeeper. "There were people with maxed out high-rank tamer grouping jobs, but even they weren't successful."

Basically, it was impossible even to the best of Tamers.

Some would probably laugh at the idea of a newbie such as myself having a go at such a challenging task, but that didn't mean that I couldn't try.

I knew people who wouldn't give up no matter how great was the challenge before them, so I wanted to follow their example.

And follow it I had been... for over four hours now.

Facing the pot with the Mithril Arms Slime inside, I silently extended the thing in my right hand towards it. It was a thin rod less than a meter in length — a mithril wire. Mithril was their staple food, and I figured that trying to feed it wouldn't hurt.

I'd gotten the wire by asking Rubiella to go to the bazaar and buy it.

Now, she was at the counter, talking about something with the shop's owner.

"I've heard that the grandchild of the Luor Company's president got kidnapped by the Gouz-Maise Gang," I heard her say.

"Those scumbags still at it?" responded the shopkeeper. "How many times has this happened now? It's above one hundred, isn't it?"

I'd heard the name "Gouz-Maise Gang" several times while in this city. From what I could tell, they were a vile group that troubled Gideon and its surroundings by kidnapping children.

What kind of person steals children, of all things? I thought, pure disgust welling up within me.

"Ah..."

A moment later, the tip of the wire I'd extended got cut off and fell to the floor. I instantly concluded that she'd attacked in response to either my disgust or the attempt at feeding. Despite both the wire and the slime being made of mithril, the cut was impressively clean, making the tip of the wire as flat and sharp as a mirror.

I slowly brought what remained of the wire closer to her, causing her to repeatedly sever more and more of it. The way it gradually got smaller reminded me of a certain stick-shaped sweet. It didn't take long for the wire to be reduced to nothing but pieces of mithril scattered on the floor.

"This thing cost me 2,000 lir," I sighed before finger-throwing the last bit of it towards the slime. It, too, got split in half the moment it entered her "personal space," so to speak.

"You seem to be having a hard time," said the shop's owner.

"I can't deny that," I replied. "Just as you told me, it becomes really difficult after you get her into a tamable state."

"Hm? You're there already?"

"All slimes are female, after all. Male Temptation works on them just fine, so I didn't have much trouble making her tamable."

Indeed, there had been no problems on that front. However...

"But when I reach for her to form a contract... she cuts me." I looked at the pieces of mithril on the floor and the countless shallow cuts on my hands.

"Among the Tamers who attempted to tame it was one who tried to do it while wearing mithril gauntlets," said the shopkeeper. "He still got his hands cut off." So, not even properly processed armor-tier mithril can withstand these attacks, huh? I thought.

"Armor made from Mythical metal... hihi'irokane... might protect against these cuts, though," he added. "Should we get some?"

"No, thank you," I shook my head. "I doubt my level's high enough to equip such things. Also, I don't think that's the right answer here." Relying on toughness and stats just didn't seem like the right way to go about it. If it had been, the Tamers that'd come before me would've already done it just because they had greater stats and equipment. The correct method of taming Mithril Arms Slimes had nothing to do with such things.

"You seem to be stuck, though," he said.

"So far, I've noticed two things," I responded while pointing at the pot. "First, her alertness. Rather than attacking automatically, she carefully considers each and every single one of her cuts. Over the four hours of doing this, I've noticed that the distance at which she starts attacking has a deviation of a few centimeters, meaning that she's not doing it with machine-like, automatic precision."

I pointed at the mithril pieces on the floor. Though they'd been cut by the same slime, their thickness wasn't consistent, which was proof of what I'd just said.

"I see. What's the second thing, then?" asked the shopkeeper.

"She wants to be tamed," I answered.

"Why do you think that?"

I showed him my open hands, which were covered in countless small cuts that the slime had given me. "All of these wounds are shallow."

"Well, I can see that much."

"Both the wire and my fingers entered her alertness zone. However, while the wire got cut apart, my fingers are still intact."

"Oh!"

She'd severed the mithril wire with ease, yet my hands — which were far weaker — were relatively unharmed.

"They're all little more than scratches, and the worst one among them is the one I got after carelessly pointing at her when I first saw the pot," I said. "As in, the one from before she was in a tamable state."

I raised the index finger of my left hand, and sure enough, the cut on it was the deepest one, if only by a few millimeters. Which was why I could infer that...

"She's holding back against humans. And she's been extra careful with those that have gotten her into a tamable state, reducing her attacks to nothing but warnings. It's clear that she treats us differently than inorganic objects."

"But the Tamers that came before you—"

"Yes, they had their hands completely cut off. I think the same would happen to me if I reached a little farther," I said as I extended my hand towards the slime's alertness radius.

Though her attacks put more small cuts on my fingers, I didn't retract my hand. Naturally, she continued attacking. After confirming that all the wounds were shallow, I took my hand out of her radius.

"See?" I said. "When you consider how differently she treats the mithril wire and my hand, it's clear that there's more to this than just distance. She's probably acting according to some simple rules."

"So you think you'll be able to tame her when you figure them out, eh?" asked the shop's owner.

"Yes, but figuring them out might be troublesome. I need a clue, and..." I stopped talking before I could finish what I was saying.

The shopkeeper looked at me with a puzzled expression, but I couldn't care about that. After all, something that I wanted to be oblivious of had entered the edge of my vision. Next to the pot, there was a small animal — a single mouse.

"Oh, a mouse," said the shopkeeper. "Guess the barrier keeping them out got broken."

The moment I saw it, the mind controlling my body went blank.

The mouse was so weak that it didn't even count as a monster. There was a hole in one of the walls, which was probably where it had come from.

It noticed our presence and ran away, passing by the pot in the process.

All of that entered my vision, and I properly processed it. However, at the same time, my body reflexively screamed. "Mouse mouse mouse mouse mouse MOUUUUUSE!"

I entered a state of absolute panic. As my brain tried to understand the situation, my mind was overwhelmed by memories of a certain event. Training, an old mansion, broken floor, falling into a room with countless mic—

"MOOOUUUUUUUUUSSE!" Losing control of my body, I became even more panicked.

However, before that reached its peak and made me lose consciousness...

"It's okay. Don't be afraid."

...I was embraced by Babi.

"There there, Rook. There's nothing to be afraid of," she said, comforting me and patting my back.

Strange as it was, that was enough for me to slowly regain control of my panicked mind and body. It was just like when my mother had done it to me.

After about five minutes, I had completely calmed down, and the panic was gone as if it was never there.

"Sorry you had to see that," I apologized to the shopkeeper and Rubiella.

I knew that my behavior had been unsightly. Panicked as I was, my mind was still somewhat functional. However, I could almost feel a wave of other thoughts overwhelm me.

Sober as I was now, I concluded that this was how most so-called "traumas" were.

"No need to apologize," said Rubiella.

"Everyone has things they can't handle, after all," added the shopkeeper. "But why do mice make you so... Oh, I won't ask."

He must have noticed how I reacted to the very mention of the creatures and — out of consideration — refrained from asking me for the reasons.

It was good that he did, for I wasn't too sure how I was supposed to answer that. I'd been wanting to get rid of my phobia of rodents ever since I was a child, but it still showed no signs of going away.

All right, that's enough about mice, I thought.

There was something far more important.

"I found out the slime's rules, so I'll tame her now," I said. The thing I'd seen while panicking had given me the final clue I needed. All that was left was to test my theory.

"Really? What's this, all of a sudden?" asked the shop's owner.

"This incident wasn't all bad," I said. "Thanks to it, I figured out why I couldn't tame her."

"...You could do that in that state?"

Well, I've been taught to analyze my surroundings no matter how confused I may be, I thought.

Anyway, testing my theory required some preparation.

"Excuse me, keeper, but can I borrow an empty Jewel?" I asked.

"I don't mind," he said as he took one of the Jewels from the counter. It was the same type as the one I had, only completely empty.

As long as the owner allowed it, it was possible to transfer monsters from one Jewel to another by simply making them touch.

"All right, then..." Taking the empty Jewel in my left hand, I closed it in to the one on my right. And just like that, I transferred Marilyn and Audrey into the empty Jewel.

"KIEEE?!" ("BOSS?! YOU'RE SELLING US?! WHAT THE FUCK!")

"MHOOO!" ("C-C-C-C-Calm down! I-I'm sure he has something in mind!")

Oh... they seem really startled, I thought. Now I feel kinda bad. I should've warned them...

"The Tri-Horn Demi-Dragon is 2,400,000 lir, while the Crimson Roc Bird is 3,200,000," said the shopkeeper.

"KIEEE!" ("Take that, bitch! I'm more expensive!")

"MHOO!" ("Now's not the time to be happy, you birdbrain! Also, the reason you're more expensive is because they already have my kind here!")

Does difference in price really mean all that much to them? Wait, that doesn't matter right now, I thought.

"No, I'm not selling them. I just needed to momentarily move them. Babi, hold on to this for a second," I said as I gave her the Jewel with Marilyn and Audrey inside.

"Okaaay."

"All right, then," I muttered as I began taking off my clothes.

I removed everything that counted as equipment.

"Hmm, that should be enough," I said, clad in only a tank top and underwear, inner clothing that gave no bonuses to stats or anything. "I think I'm ready now."

"Rook, what are you doing?" asked the shopkeeper, and I responded with only a smile, leaving the proper answer to the results of my theory.

While distancing my left hand — which had the Embryo crest on it — away from the slime, I extended my right — the one with the Jewel — towards her.

Unlike before, the way I reached for her had no hesitation. Soon enough, my right hand passed the edge of the danger zone without getting hit by a single warning attack.

I continued moving my hand further, into the area beyond which countless Tamers had theirs cut off. However, my hand went through without getting a single scratch on it, and I reached the edge of the pot.

As I heard the people behind me gasp, I placed the back of my hand on the top of the pot and waited for her.

"Come," I said, not sure if she would understand me.

A few moments later, the Mithril Arms Slime crawled out and touched my palm.

It was hard to tell how long it had taken, but eventually, magic began flowing between us and the taming was complete.

"Your name is Liz... Liz the Mithril Arms Slime," I smiled as I rubbed her shiny, silver body. "Let's get along, Liz."

In response, the Mithril Arms Slime, Liz, shook in a happy manner.

Thus, my theory was proven to be correct.

I turned around to face the store's owner.

"I've tamed her," I said.

"...How did you do that?"

"Exactly as you saw me do it. I momentarily moved Marilyn and Audrey to another Jewel and took off my equipment."

"How does that connect to you becoming able to tame the slime?" he asked.

My explanation was probably a bit lacking, sure, but the truth was actually really simple.

"Liz... or, rather, Mithril Arms Slimes in general... are very cowardly," I said while petting Liz, who was crawling all over my body. "Even if you get them into a tamable state, having them recognize you as worthy, they're still afraid of other things."

"Such as?"

"The other monsters in the right hand extended towards them."

"Ah!"

Anyone who tamed and used monsters kept them in the right hand's Jewel at all times, even while taming a new monster. Also, not a single Tamer wore a Jewel without any monsters inside. Those were the reasons why no Tamers before me had been able to tame Liz.

"Also, she first attacked my left hand," I continued. "That was probably because she was afraid of the crest — the thing that channels the powers of Embryos. And the fact that she attacked mithril gauntlets and wire made it safe to assume that equipment scared her, as well. That's why I tamed her after removing everything she was afraid of."

Those seemingly-simple reasons were why I had removed my equipment and distanced my left hand away from her.

"Isn't that just circumstantial evidence?" asked the shopkeeper.

"Yes. However, I became completely certain of it when I saw th-the mouse," I answered. Merely using the word made me feel unpleasant, but I still continued the explanation. "That mouse was just a mouse — not even a monster. And it didn't get attacked even when it was right next to the pot and passed by it while I lost myself."

Though I'd been panicking, I'd clearly seen how the mouse had acted. Despite being so close to Liz, it hadn't been attacked once. That was because the mouse wasn't even a monster.

"So it came to me that I might be successful if I had nothing on me and didn't scare her. After all, the wounds she gave me were small, making it seem like she was being considerate of me."

Her attacks had been warning shots. But they hadn't been directed at me; they'd been directed at the monsters in my right hand's Jewel and the Embryo crest on my left.

"Did you consider what would've happened if your deduction was wrong?" asked the shopkeeper. "You could've been sliced apart, you know?"

"I had confidence," I said before pausing for a moment. I added honestly, "Also... if I was wrong, it would've been fine for me to die."

My father often told me words that he'd gotten from his own father: "When making deductions that might change other people's lives, always bear responsibility for your words. Bet your life on them and do your best to never be mistaken."

When other people were involved in your deductions, you had to make sure you had the resolve to carry that burden.

Suddenly, I noticed that the shop's owner was looking at me with a shocked expression.

I guess that's to be expected, considering what I just said, I thought.

"Oh, but I'm a Master, so I can't really die here," I said with jest as I finished my explanation.

"..." ("Are you okay?") At that moment, Liz — who was still crawling all over me — worriedly asked me that while looking at the cuts on my hands.

"Yeah, I'm fine, Liz," I replied. "The wounds are shallow, and your cuts were so clean that they don't even hurt. I'm not mad at all."

By default, Infinite Dendrogram had no pain, but I was confident that it wouldn't have hurt even if there had been.

"Rook," the shopkeeper addressed me. "You can talk to slimes?"

"I can understand them by looking," I nodded. "Animals communicate more than just by words, after all." In fact, I found animals to be easier to understand than people.

"Is that a skill?" he asked.

"No," I shook my head and momentarily fell silent. "It's a technique that my parents taught me."

After saying that, I took a moment to run my mind through those memories.

◇

After that, I bought Liz for 5,130,000 lir, paid by installments.

According to the shop's owner, the Mithril Arms Slime taming method I'd discovered was worth more than 10,000,000 lir. Due to that, he'd wanted to give her to me for free, but that didn't sit right with me, so I'd chosen to pay at least half of her original price.

My mom had always told me that "Taking too much free stuff is best left for stealing," and it wasn't like I wanted to steal from the shopkeeper, so I was satisfied with the outcome.

Also, instead of having her join the other monsters in the Jewel, I had Liz use her Camouflage skill — common among slimes — to turn into clothing for me to wear. The clothing's appearance was still metallic, but there already was a piece of equipment known as "Mithril Coat," so I didn't really stand out too much. Also, when people with a low Identification skill level looked at her, they would see nothing but "Mithril Coat (Custom-Made)."

The only problem I had with this coat was the fact that Liz's fear of the crest caused the left arm's sleeve to be a bit shorter than the other, but that wasn't a big deal. She also moved in an unnatural manner every once in a while, but most would simply assume that it was just the wind.

Anyway, we were now gathered outside Gideon's north gate to see off Rubiella.

Apparently, while I had been busy taming Liz, Catherine had returned to the capital, and Rubiella was about to go after her.

"Thank you for your help, Rubiella," I said.

"I am humbled to have you thank me, Master Rook. I, too, am thankful for your giving me an interesting story to tell Milady."

"Speaking of Catherine, I really wish I could've thanked her before she left." After all, it was thanks to her that I'd met Liz.

She really helps me out a lot, I thought.

"I will make sure to pass over your gratitude," she said.

"Thank you."

"Now, then. Master Rook, Babylon, Marilyn, Audrey, and Liz," she said. "I hope we can meet again."

"How will you go the capital? Dragon Carriage?" Babi asked, making Rubiella silently chuckle.

"This body of mine will be more than enough," she said, and a second later, two large wings sprouted from her back.

As soon as I noticed that they were draconic, she flapped them and rose up to the clouds, where her appearance suddenly changed. She was now a large dragon emitting a crimson light that I could easily see from the surface.

Rubiella, the crimson dragon that could use Anthropomorphization, waved goodbye to us by spinning in the air and then flew off towards the capital, looking truly majestic in the process.

"KIEEE!" ("Hey, turtle. I'm gonna try and get Anthropomorphization, too.")

"VAHMOO!" ("What a coincidence. I was thinking the same thing.")

Audrey and Marilyn seemed to be quite impressed by what Rubiella had just shown us.

"Well, what do we do now?" I asked. "The meeting with Marie is the day after tomorrow, Ray doesn't seem to be online yet, and I don't really have any plans."

My only personal business for today had been to say hi to Catherine and get a new tamed monster. Needless to say, I'd already done both of those things, leaving me with nothing to do.

"Then why don't we go and level up?" asked Babi, to which I replied with a nod.

We had yet to fight with Audrey and Liz in the group, so that was a really good idea.

Also, I felt that our party would end up fighting some truly great foes in the future, so I wanted us to be useful when that time came.

"Good idea," I said. "I want to become stronger, so let's go get some levels."

Audrey cried, "KIEE!" ("Boss! I know where to find the prey around these parts!")

Audrey had originally been the mount of Gardranda, a creature that lived around the Nex Plains, so it was only obvious for her to be familiar with the surroundings.

"Can you show us, then, Audrey?" I asked.

"KIEEEE!" ("Sure thing, Boss! Hop on!")

"So, Marilyn, you'll have to go in the Jewel for now," I said. "We're hunting once we get there."

"MHOOO." ("Understood.")

"Will you protect me, Liz?" I asked.

"..." ("Of course. Don't you worry.")

"Babi, are you ready?" I asked.

"Always am!"

And, of course, I was fully prepared, as well.

"Let's go, then."

"Yes, Master!" they all replied in perfect unison as we took off.

[ROOK STORY, END.] To Be Continued in the Next Episode...

Side Story: A Day Off in Gideon — Noon

Journalist, Marie Adler

"Here are your luxury box tickets for tomorrow's event," the tian scalper told me. "100,000 lir each makes 300,000 lir. Instant payment."

"Okey dokey," I replied as I gave him the money. I'd already confirmed the legitimacy of the tickets by using my Truth Discernment and Identification skills.

I paid from the reward money pool the three of us had decided to split as a group yesterday.

"A pleasure doing business," said the scalper. "You're in luck, lady. Those are the last box seat tickets I had."

"Quite a popular event, isn't it?" I commented.

Not every show can get scalpers to sell out while pricing their tickets at three times the original cost, I thought.

"Well, obviously," he nodded. "After all, the thing going on at the central arena tomorrow has never happened before."

"True," I agreed. "It's only to be expected for a battle between Superiors to get this much attention."

The tickets in my hand had the words "The Clash of the Superiors" written on them. That was the name of the main event that was happening at the central arena tomorrow.

The participants were two Superiors.

One was a Superior of the Kingdom of Altar and the undisputed champion of the central arena: Over Gladiator, Figaro.

The other was a Superior from the hermit Empire of Huang He, summoned here to participate in this event: Master Jiangshi, Xunyu.

The idea of seeing a match between such distinguished personalities excited both players and tians alike.

Despite Dendro having hundreds of thousands active players, the total number of Superiors didn't even exceed a hundred. Due to that, opportunities to see two Superiors fight were few and far between. Since none of Altar's Superiors had participated, not even the war with Dryfe had had such a fight. Though Figaro's battles were a common sight at Gideon's arenas, all of his opponents so far had been either tians or non-Superior Masters.

As far as I was aware, Superior fights involving the kingdom's Masters had never gone beyond rumors that the furball (AKA The King of Destruction) had fought Caldina's "Magically Strongest" (The Earth), and one of the Great Seven Embryos of Granvaloa. Those fights were said to have happened in a secluded mountain area and in the middle of the ocean, meaning that there were few people who had seen them. Due to all that, this event was a golden opportunity for people to witness and find out just how intense Superior fights were. It was only natural for the tickets to get sold out. In fact, when they had officially gone up for purchase two weeks ago, they had been snapped up in less than ten minutes.

I silently looked at the ones in my hand and tried imagining what would happen if either of the participants boycotted the event. Count Gideon, the one managing the arena, would surely flip. Of course, considering that I'd spent most of the reward on these tickets, my situation wouldn't be too good, either.

I really hope the event happens without much trouble and that Ray and Rook enjoy it.

"Take care, now!" I said.

"You too," replied the scalper. "Come to me any time you need a ticket for something."

Silently praying that the event would start as intended, I left the scalper.

It was now past three in the afternoon, and I no longer had anything to do.

My job as a Journalist wouldn't start until tomorrow's event, while my other job didn't have any activity at all right now. I checked my friends list and found out that Rook was offline, while Ray was somewhere outside Gideon. I didn't have any other friends here in the kingdom.

Even if I wanted to do some observation and kill time while on a basic party quest, I couldn't get one because they normally rejected all Journalists. The job was of no use in battle, after all. It was a wonder why Ray had even accepted me.

Not having anything to do, I walked around the fourth district's bazaar while eyeing the wares with Identification. Every now and then, you could find some real bargains here, but nothing I saw today really caught my eye.

After a while of such walking, I saw the shop belonging to Alejandro, the man we'd met during yesterday's quest. I considered stopping by and saying hello, but the building seemed to be ridiculously crowded. From what I could hear the people say, the gacha machine there had just dropped an MVP special reward, causing many who were feeling lucky to try and hit another one.

Having only two special rewards in my possession, I could fully understand what drove them.

Yesterday, Ray had happened to become the MVP in a UBM fight when we'd run into Gardranda. But it rarely went as smoothly as that.

Encountering UBMs was rare even if you searched for them, and even the Epic-tier ones were really tough. Masters with high-rank Embryos and jobs would have to form a proper party just to stand a chance, and it was unthinkable to take them on solo without having a Superior Job. Even then, battles against Legendaries and Ancient Legendaries would be truly challenging.

Indeed, getting a special reward was no small task. Soloing UBMs while being like Ray — a high-rank job with a low-rank Embryo — was nearly unheard of, and it happened mostly because of luck and compatibility.

Nemesis's abilities were heavily focused on battle, countering, and giant-killing, making me quite excited to see how they'd grow.

Anyway, with the store being so crowded, going in just to say hi would probably make me nothing but a nuisance, so I decided to leave it for another day.

"I'VE WASTED A MILLION! AAAAHHH!" I heard someone scream as I slowly distanced myself from the shop.

As I aimlessly walked around and began thinking about killing time in some shop popular with cute boys and girls, a certain sound entered my ears.

A young girl was shouting something from behind the corner, in a secluded back alley between the buildings. With my curiosity piqued, I approached the source of the voice, stuck my head out to take a look and was presented with one of the most cliché scenes ever.

Four vulgar-looking men were surrounding a girl who didn't even seem to be ten years old. Though the blonde, coiled, drill-shaped hair made it obvious that she was Western, for one reason or another, her face was covered by a Japanese fox mask.

"Let's take this brat. She looks noble. Selling her off will get us some serious gold," said one of the men as he grabbed her wrist.

"Unhand me, you insolent cur!" the girl shouted as she did her utmost to struggle, but she simply wasn't strong enough to resist.

How cliché, I thought. Truly the most of generic of incidents.

It was even embarrassing to interfere, since that would make it even more cliché. However, that was exactly what I did.

"Now, wait just a moment, fellas," I said as I walked out from behind the corner. "Are you seriously trying to take this helpless loli away? Should I be concerned?"

"The fuck are you?!" one of them shouted.

"Just a passing Journalist," I answered while getting a better look at the men's faces. "Yep, those are the expressions of true criminals. Could you morbid-looking folks leave the loli alone and go home? Or would you like to go straight to jail?"

As I expected, my provocation made one of the men's foreheads twitch as he charged at me with a raised fist.

"A Journalist?! Who do ya think you're talking to?! C'mere and I'll...!"

"Aaand... there." I grabbed the man by the wrist and did a one-armed shoulder throw on him.

Hitting the stony path below instantly made him lose consciousness.

As always, this move is very useful against tians who don't know about judo, I thought. They can never land safely.

Of course, it would probably do little good against those who were aware of martial arts or simply had high stats. But these hoodlums weren't much better than the usual newbie.

"B-But she's a Journalist!" one of them exclaimed. "How can she fight?!"

"Oh come now," I said. "Journalist or not, everyone is capable of throwing people."

Not to mention that I'm... Oh, there's no need to say it, I thought. Then I repeated the same thing with the other three.

As a result, the four hoodlums who had been about to kidnap the girl were all spread out across the alley.

“Heh,” I chuckled. “Once again, I went and threw something worthless.”

“Amazing! You’re so strong!” said the blonde girl as she looked up at me. The blue eyes I could see under her mask seemed to be gleaming. How adorable.

“Y-You bitch! We’re not done yet!” Staggering, the hoodlums stood up and were about to charge at me, but...

“Hey! It’s time to get paid! Stop messing around!” another hoodlum from outside the alley called.

There were more of them? I asked myself. Five hoodlums, huh? Why couldn’t it be five heroes, instead? That would’ve been far better in every possible way. Also, “paid”? Are they the underlings of some mafia or something?

“Crap... We’ll let you off this time! I know your mug now! Remember that!” one of them shouted a particularly stale phrase as they all ran away.

“Do they have some debuff that forces them to keep saying overused phrases?” I said as I casually waved them goodbye. I really didn’t want to see them again. Not only were they awful as characters, but they were far too basic to be useful to me.

“Wow, that crest is the sign of a Master! I know why you’re strong now!” said the girl upon noticing the back of the hand I was waving.

Oh, the purity in her gaze is far too dazzling for a creature like me, I thought.

“Oh no,” I said. “That was just judo. Anyone can learn how to do it. Even you.”

I’d only taken a few real-life classes, for instance. For a while, I had dabbled in a lot of various martial arts for my work. I was now unemployed... and dropping such sports certainly wasn’t good for my weight.

“Truly?! I can learn that?! Could you teach me?!” asked the girl.

“Of course. First, we...” Suddenly, I realized that a stony pavement definitely wasn’t a suitable surface to teach judo.

We should find a patch of grass or get a soft mat and...

“We found her!”

“She’s over here! There’s a suspicious-looking woman with her!”

Before I could finish my thought, a few guards ran into the alley and shouted those things.

How rude! I'm not suspicious-looking! I wore a black men's suit, had a properly-tied necktie, covered my eyes with sunglasses, and always had a grin on my face.

All right, okay, I look suspicious.

"Oh no! We must escape!" said the girl as she grabbed my hand and started running away from the guards.

"And why am I being dragged into this?" I muttered as I realized that things could get really messy if we got caught. But I quickly decided play along with her.

I took the girl into my arms, faced the wall, and jumped upwards, instantly putting us on roof-level. Then I jumped from building to building to get as far away from that alley as was necessary before going down to street-level in a place where no one could see us.

"That was riveting!" said the girl, bright-eyed and looking like she'd just gotten off a roller coaster. "I felt like I became the wind!"

"Oh, it was nothing, really."

"Could you do it because you are a Master or because you are a Journalist?"

"The latter. Journalists are amazing. We can fly, carry buildings, and reverse time by making the Earth spin in the other direction."

"Wow!"

Okay, fine, that's limited to a certain man who is particularly "super," I thought. "By the way, about those guards..."

As I was about to continue, I heard an adorable sound coming from the girl's tummy.

"Shall we eat something?" I asked.

"We shall!"

And so, I decided to help her fill her empty stomach.

Coming out as we were and letting the guards see us wasn't the best idea, so I had to do a little messing around. Using two of my skills, Disguise and Illusion, I changed her appearance, making her look like a plain girl of a normal upbringing. People with Truth Discernment, Reveal, or Mind's Eye skills would be able to see through the disguise, but it wasn't like every guard here had one of those, so it didn't matter too much.

As for me... Saddening as it was, I had to remove my sunglasses. With that, I was no longer a “shady woman in shades.” Truly a shame.

We walked out of the empty alleyway and made our way towards the stalls on the main street. It was a popular place, so, naturally, there were food stalls, as well.

“Do you have anything in mind?” I asked.

“I want something I never get to eat!” she answered, and then noticed something. “There! I want those clouds!”

Clouds...? Oh, the cotton candy, I thought. What an adorable choice.

I went and bought some of the white cotton candy, which looked exactly the same as the ones we had on Earth. The only real difference was that they weren’t covered in wrapping displaying some character.

“Enjoy,” I said.

“Very well! Thank you very much!” she said as she took the cotton candy, took off the mask and began eating. “Such sweetness and fluffiness!”

“Heh heh. Glad you like... it...?” I paused.

Her exposed face was very cute, making it more than obvious that she would be a real beauty someday. But the fact of her adorability meant nothing next to the fact that her face was familiar to me.

I reached into my inventory and took out my Information Notebook, a must-have item for Journalists that allowed the filing and managing of info, and followed the index to a certain part of it. Specifically, the list of this country’s important people and the entry about the second princess, Elizabeth S. Altar.

It had all the information I’d collected about her and displayed her portrait photo, which showed a little lady bearing the exact same facial features as the girl right before my eyes, the one still eating cotton candy.

“Well, this sure smells like trouble,” I muttered as I became fully aware that I’d gotten myself into something both exciting and dangerous.

“Hm? But it smells sweet,” said Elizabeth as she smelled the cotton candy, making me momentarily discard the bad thoughts and merely enjoy the adorable presence of Her Majesty.

A journalist and a princess... Reminds me of a certain movie, I thought.

◇

Anyway, we’d distanced ourselves from the crowds, and it was time for me to take in the situation.

I had been strolling around.

A girl had been about to get kidnapped, so I'd helped her.

She'd gotten attached to me.

I had been about to be caught by the guards.

I'd taken the girl and ran.

The girl was actually the second princess of this country.

And that was the jist of it.

Conclusion: I was now officially a kidnapper of not only a child, but an extremely important person.

Oh, dear.

"In the worst case scenario, I might even get sent to the gaol," I muttered.

"Gaol?" the princess tilted her head to the side.

The gaol was a separate area where players were sent if they committed one too many grave Dendro crimes. Grave crimes in Dendro were primarily those against tians. Player killing and the like didn't count, and for me that was nothing but good news.

Going in and out of the gaol was completely impossible, and so far, not a single player had left it. According to what those who were sent there wrote on discussion boards, the gaol had equipment and dungeons, just like the rest of the game, allowing them to have a proper Dendro experience.

However, leaving simply wasn't an option.

No one knew its location, making many assume that it was the only separate Dendro server besides the worldwide one, but the truth behind it was still unknown.

Anyway, it took more than grave crimes to send a player to the gaol.

When criminals got on a country's wanted list, they could no longer use its save points. Save points were places such as the fountains here in the Kingdom of Altar, and they existed in all the cities, towns, and villages of all the seven countries. After getting a death penalty, players respawned at a save point they'd already "marked."

Getting a death penalty while not having any available save points would have the player respawn at the gaol.

I found that to be completely reasonable.

We Masters could get the death penalty, but besides that, we were completely immortal. The system needed a way to deter players from repeatedly committing crimes every time they respawned.

Mind you, for the wanted lists to work, the tians had to know the offenders' names, faces, and crimes. Also, even if they were put on a wanted list of one country and died there, players could always respawn in any other country, provided they had marked save points there. Such "escaping" was currently being used by Goblin Street — the clan responsible for besieging the west side of the capital, and the only group that had gotten on the wanted list because of it.

From what I'd heard, strong Masters who were criminals in some countries were sometimes kept as potential soldiers in case of a war by the other ones.

Now, some crimes were so grave that they got players on the wanted lists of all the seven countries at once, banning them from all the save points everywhere. Such cases were extremely rare, and few people had to worry about that happening. However, being someone who'd seemingly kidnapped royalty, I was now one of those "few."

Oh, what am I to do? I thought as I looked at the princess as she continued eating the cotton candy.

"Hm? What is it? Why are you staring at me so? Do I have something on my face?" she asked.

"Just a bit of cotton candy," I answered as I took it off her cheek and ate it myself. It really is sweet.

Anyway, for now, she was under the effects of my Disguise and Illusion combo. It wouldn't be easy for people to notice that she was the princess. I could've also used Presence Manipulation to make us stand out less, but that might've had the opposite effect due to stronger people realizing that something was off, so I refrained.

All right, now why did the princess wander about the city all by herself? I thought.

From the fact that the guards were searching for her, it was safe to assume that she had sneaked out for some sightseeing.

Well, that would be another way this situation is similar to the one in Roman Holiday*... I wonder if this city has a Mouth of Truth.* I'd do what they did in the movie, put my right hand inside and...

No. I'm a tremendous liar, so it'd instantly get bitten off.

"You haven't said anything for a while. What are you thinking about?" asked Elizabeth.

"Oh, nothing," I answered. "Just some things that might be slightly comedic to the audience."

"Comedic?"

All right, now back to why the princess is here, I thought. At this point, talking to her seemed like the best way to find out.

"Oh, we've yet to introduce ourselves," I spoke up, being careful not to make it obvious that I knew who she was. "I'm Marie Adler."

"I see! So your name is Marie! I am Elizabeth, the second princess of this country!"

...She actually had no intention of hiding it.

Why the mask, then? Did she just want to wear it?

"Umm, why were you in the streets, princess?"

"I was told that Gideon is an exciting place!" she declared. "However, my attendants did not let me go outside, so I escaped to have a pu-pleasure jaunt!"

And thus, it was confirmed that she really was just sightseeing. Not only that, but she'd done it without even trying to hide her identity, like any normal child just walking out to play.

How bold of her.

"That must've been quite the great escape," I said.

"Indeed! Timing it was hard."

Would the timing really have been enough for her — a princess — to successfully slip through? Should I be worried about this country? I thought. Well, I obviously should, considering it's been on a decline ever since the war....

"Today, I intend to spread my wings! However..."

"What is it?" I asked.

"When you found me, I was actually lost... Thus, I would appreciate it if you guided me around..."

It now made sense why she had been in that back alley.

As for her request...

If I stayed with the princess, they might assume that I'd kidnapped her and arrest me. However, the idea of leaving this adorable, socially-unaware girl all by herself was far more worrying to me than getting arrested. I also felt that there was more to this than it seemed.

“Why, certainly. I’ll guide you around,” I said.

“Really?!” asked the princess.

“Yes. I never lie.”

Apologies. That line itself was a lie.

When asked about what kind of places she wanted to go to, Elizabeth said simply, “Anywhere that’s riveting!”

As was natural for duel city Gideon, the most popular tourist spots here were the arenas, but I was quite apprehensive about bringing a little girl to a place so thick with the reek of blood.

Well, it wasn’t like the arena barriers let any smells reach the audience. Also, no matter how severely damaged the participants were, they would come out completely unharmed once the battle was over.

The barriers sure are useful and convenient, I thought.

According to the setting, the barrier-equipped arenas hadn’t been made by the kingdom’s tians. All thirteen of them had been there since ancient times, and a city had merely happened to be built around them.

A barrier that could make the most critical of wounds simply disappear was extreme tech for both magic and science, and being able to replicate it would cause far too many people to take advantage of it. That was surely the reason why the devs had made it into a lost technology that no one could copy.

The barriers weren’t the only pieces of such tech, either. There were the relics from the pre-ancient civilization and Granvaloa’s underwater ruins, among many other things.

Anyway, with the arena being out of the question, I decided to bring the princess to the nearby plaza.

Just like on the main road, stalls were placed all across the area, but that certainly wasn’t all. I could see street performers such as musicians, artists, and fortune tellers, as well.

“Wow! Is this a festival?!” the princess voiced her excitement.

“Many people with various impressive skills gather here,” I answered.

There were the staples such as jugglers and people balancing on balls, but I could also see Masters entertaining people by using their Embryos.

What I found particularly eye-catching — or, rather, ear-catching — was the musical ensemble. It consisted of four people — no, one person and three creatures. A man wearing a bird-like hat was swinging a conductor's stick, a centaur was playing a violin, a cat sìth was blowing into a flute, and a kobold was hitting a drum. Quite a peculiar band of performers, indeed.

What was even more peculiar, however, was the fact that, despite there being only three creatures playing, the resulting music was like that of a large-scale orchestra. Their act enchanted not only the passersby, but some of the other street performers, as well. Indeed, the music was downright beautiful, especially once you got over the fact that it was an orchestral arrangement of a classic super robot anime opening.

I felt like I was listening to an elementary-to-middle school orchestra contest or a Koshien cheering song.

"Such a powerful melody," said the princess.

"Indeed it is," I agreed. It's Mazinger Z, after all.

"Are those monsters and a horse-man?" she asked.

"No, I believe it's a Type Legion Embryo," I answered.

"'Legion'?" she asked.

Legion was an Embryo type that evolved from the base category of Guardian. Its main feature was the fact that it was basically multiple Guardians in one. That multiplicity was exactly what made the type interesting.

For example, you could have an Embryo that was basically a "We are the Something's Elite Four!"-kinda thing, where they were few, but strong. You could also have an Embryo that was hundred-strong swarm of weaker creatures. They both would be categorized as "Legion." Quality and quantity meant nothing for this type.

This band was definitely focused on quality.

My Embryo — Arc-en-Ciel — was Legion, but I wasn't quite sure what it was focused on. It could go both ways, honestly.

"So that is an Embryo," said the princess.

"Yes," I nodded.

"I always thought that Embryos were only meant for fighting."

"Embryos are based on their Master's minds, so they're not always created with battle in mind," I said. There were actually quite a few Embryos that didn't have a single fighting-related skill.

It wasn't particularly surprising, really. After all, they always reflected people's personalities and experiences. However, with that considered, I couldn't help but grin in self-derision at the fact that my Embryo was so battle-focused and what it implied about my mind.

The band was done performing, so after we gave them their due applause and money, we went to do other activities.

That included eating ice cream and scooping goldfish-like monsters, both of which were common things in the Japanese festivals I was familiar with and didn't seem the least bit special to any common citizen here. And yet, the princess looked like she was having tons of fun, as though these seemingly meaningless activities were a true treasure to her.

"Let's go to the painter next! I want to be drawn!" she squealed.

"Don't you get portraits regularly?" I asked in response.

"I do! But they look too serious! Also, they don't look like me! I'm not that scary!"

Apparently, the little princess had a little trauma going on.

I guess that's how most portraits appear to children, I thought. That Beethoven in the music room is a good example, but let's not get lost in thought again.

"I can draw you, princess," I said. In fact, I was the only one that could. She was under the effects of my Illusion skill, so if we let a random street artist draw her, the person on the result wouldn't even be her.

"Hm? You can draw?" she asked.

"Yes. Not only that, but I'm quite confident that I'm better than the average Painter." That was a non-battle job that had Drawing within its skill repertoire. Its effect was technical support that helped Painters draw lines to form pictures as they desired. However, people who already had the skill in real life didn't need any support from such skills. I was one of them.

Skills such as Drawing and Cooking, ones that players could replace with any technique and flair they had in reality, were called "sense skills."

Another example of this would be the Detective job's "Inferring" skill. It allowed the user to understand the tricks, clues, and evidence surrounding various incidents. But people who were skilled detectives in real life had no need for it.

Not like I was aware of any such players, but still.

"Anyway, you can trust my drawing ability," I said confidently. "I'll make you look very cute!"

"Very well! I shall believe you!" The princess sat down on a bench in the plaza and straightened her back. That bearing made her seem truly princess-like.

"And you are very right to do so," I said as I reached into my inventory to take out a sketchbook and my drawing equipment.

The sketchbook was opened on the page with a shirtless dog-eared Ray sketch.

...The princess must not see this, I thought as I skipped a few pages.

I put a lot of effort into drawing her, so it took me about ten minutes even without coloring, but I was quite satisfied with the result. It had to have her likeness, but since she didn't seem to like proper portraits, I avoided making it too realistic and just used my usual art style.

"Well, what do you think?" I asked as I sat down next to her and showed her the sketch.

"Wow! It's so cute! Is this really me?" she cried.

"Yes."

With the original being so adorable, making the drawing cute was easy, and the result had come out very naturally.

"Marie, you're amazing! You beat scoundrels! Run on walls! And can even draw!"

"Oh no, I'm really not that impressive."

"Are you able to do this because you're a Journalist?"

"Ah, no. My drawing ability has nothing to do with my job."

"Why can you draw, then?"

The reason for my artistic ability? Well...

"I used to be a manga artist on the other side."

◇◇◇

Nagisa Ichimiya

I began drawing manga — or, rather, simple illustrations — when I was in the later years of elementary school. It all started when a friend invited me to join an illustration club.

Naturally, the club had books that described the proper ways to draw manga illustrations, so I began reading them and put the knowledge I received to the test. As I repeated that, I eventually became able to draw manga in a proper format.

At first, I tried drawing a story that was far too grand for a newbie such as myself, and I ended up giving up after about three volumes' worth of pages. Two of those volumes were actually nothing but setting descriptions...

Despite my first work being so shoddy, I didn't give up on drawing manga, and after learning from my mistakes, I began drawing ones that were complete with just single chapters.

The only people who saw them were my friends in the illustration club, which became the manga association when we entered middle school. However, as I continued drawing those shorts, I eventually became good enough to have my friends suggest that I send my works to a contest.

Figuring I had no reason not to, I sent one out, and though it didn't make the cut, I didn't stop sending my contributions.

This continued for about five or six years, until the winter of my second year in high school, when a certain award chose the work I submitted.

It was the first shonen manga I'd ever drawn. My previous works had all been shojo manga heavily focused on love, and this shonen work had merely been something I'd drawn on a whim.

It had gotten put in a certain magazine as a non-serialized story, and, supposedly due to good ratings, the editorial department had approached and invited me to ask whether I'd like to serialize it. At first, considering that I'd drawn it on a whim, I didn't actually think that I could continue it. However, when I gave it a try, the drawing went so smoothly that I felt as though my pencil was moving on its own.

The story continued without a hitch, and by the time I graduated, instead of going into higher education, I decided to become a manga artist.

I was worried whether I'd made the right decision, but my parents were fully supportive of my choice. They told me to live the life I wanted and offered to help me whenever I needed it.

That moment made me cry a bit.

Thus, I became a manga artist with a series in a monthly magazine.

At first, there were a lot of things I wasn't used to, and adjusting to them was quite a challenge. I even had to do research for my work by getting into martial arts and buying airsoft guns. When my parents happened to visit me, they said that I was being very boyish, but that was one of my very dear memories now.

The serialization went smoothly for more than two years. My work was pretty popular, too. Not enough to be the magazine's flagship title, but definitely in the top five. I even had hopes that it could get adapted into an anime after a year or two.

And that was when the magazine's publisher went bankrupt.

The cause was a business failure in divisions besides the one responsible for manga. And yet, the magazine was canceled, forcing my first series to end with its first part.

I was absentminded for a long while after that. There were entire hours... days... when I was just lying around and whispering, "What do I do now?" to myself.

However, there was a silver lining, as I got approached by an editor from a different magazine, offering me to continue my manga there. With the publisher's bankruptcy, other magazines began competing for the newly-unemployed artists and their works, and my manga happened to be among those.

I asked the editor to give me time to think, but definitely not about the answer to the offer. The answer to whether I wished to continue my series was a resounding, "Yes! Of course!" But I had another major problem I had to consider.

It was the fact that I could no longer draw it.

I had simply become unable to continue my manga series.

Right after the forced end of its first part, my vision of the work's protagonist, Marie Adler, had gone completely still. No matter how hard I tried, drawing her just didn't feel the same as before. She seemed to have become completely inanimate. Forcing myself to draw her made me feel as if I was a puppeteer using strings to move a corpse.

I was going through a so-called slump. As though I'd forgotten something I could do as easily as breathing, I became completely unable to continue drawing my manga... Marie's story.

Eventually, this extended to any other stories I attempted, rendering me incapable of completing the simplest of one-shots.

I'd spent my entire life being absolutely serious about manga. I'd drawn my works with all I had. And yet, that had gone away in a flash.

I did everything I could to try and regain my touch. Thinking that it would help me gain a new perspective, I used my money to travel the world and made attempts to gain new skills, like cooking, handicrafts, and koryu. However, all of that failed me, making me more than aware that I could no longer draw stories as I was.

"Oh, God. Please give me a possibility that isn't my own. Let me draw her story... Help me understand her," I prayed.

Almost the moment I began asking for that, I became aware of a certain game.

"Infinite Dendrogram will provide you with a new world and your very own unique possibility!"

A VRMMO that bore the promotional line, and that didn't betray it, Infinite Dendrogram.

I believed... felt... hoped... that a game which provided countless different possibilities and lives would help me find the continuation to my story that I'd seemed to have completely lost.

With that hope in me, I began Infinite Dendrogram.

I made my avatar's name the same as hers — Marie Adler.

I gave my avatar a similar appearance: long black hair, tall, pretty, and always wearing sunglasses.

I even went as far as to talk the same way she did — unique in tone and superficially polite.

I finished it up by matching my behavioral patterns to hers, becoming a proper Marie Adler roleplayer.

I felt like and hoped that doing so might help me notice something that could breathe life into her again.

A year had passed since then, and I'd yet to draw her story's continuation.

However, I could feel her breathing every moment I spent in Infinite Dendrogram.

That alone was enough reason for me to stay here.

◇◇◇

Journalist, Marie Adler

"Nhh..." The princess stretched. "It's been so long since I had such an enjoyable time."

"That's good to know," I said.

After I'd drawn her, she'd continued to enjoy the many activities available in this plaza. Enjoying the food that she was likely unfamiliar with and the activities she never got to do, the girl had obviously had a very good time. Now, she was sitting on a bench while licking a candy that had the shape of a cute animal.

Why are the stalls here so much like the ones in Japanese fairs? I casually wondered.

"Gideon really is a lively city," she said. "Count Brittis was telling the truth."

"Count Brittis?" I asked.

"Yes. He often talks to me about how fun Gideon is."

"Oh?" Shady. "Well, he's not wrong," I said. "As you probably already know — or have heard from him — Gideon is quite a feature-plenty city."

It was a popular center for trade with the nearby nations of Legendaria and Caldina. The western port city was just a few days away on foot. Its arenas also gave it a powerful tourist industry, making a popular resort city for both rich tians and Masters.

Also, when it came to the kingdom's main cities, Gideon was the one that was farthest away from the northern country of Dryfe, so there was little fear of them endangering these parts.

"It's probably the most prosperous city in the kingdom," I concluded.

"Yes," said the princess. "Even the people's faces are more cheerful than in the capital."

Does she manage such escapes in Altea, too? I asked myself.

Seemingly remembering the state of the capital, the princess suddenly looked a bit down.

The people there had to live in constant fear of war, and the recent PK incident that had resulted in the complete immolation of Noz Forest surely hadn't helped at all...

"My heart hurts a bit," I muttered.

"Hm? What's wrong, Marie? Do you feel ill?" she asked.

"No, I'm fine. Also, you seem to be thinking about the capital's people, but I don't believe there's any need to worry. They should cheer up sooner than later. That's what the castle's people are working for, right?"

"...You're right! I'm sure my sister will take care of it all!"

"Indeed she will."

...Not like I believe that, I thought.

A good governing body was enough only when there were no international relationships to consider. When a country had a very clear enemy, not even the greatest ruler could do anything to take care of the people's fears.

I simply didn't have the heart to tell her that the capital's people's woes would continue for a long time. Thus, I told a comforting lie, and considering that it cheered her up, I was confident that I'd done the right thing.

"I will do all I can to help my sister in her work!" she declared.

"Excellent. Do your best, princess," I said.

"Mrrgh."

Oh? Why did she suddenly turn sulky? I thought. "Is anything wrong, princess?"

"That's what's wrong!"

"By 'that,' you mean...?"

"You've been calling me nothing but 'princess' for a while now! It makes you feel de...distant!"

"Distant," huh? I thought. Well, I guess avoiding her name and calling her just by her position wasn't very friendly. Also, the word "distant" was more fitting than she'd ever imagined. After all, I was full of lies.

"Very well. I'll call you 'Ellie.'"

She said nothing.

Oh? Why the silence? Did I close too much distance?

"Ellie," she muttered.

"Don't like it?" I asked.

"No! I love it! From now on, I am Ellie!"

So she likes it. "Good to know, Ellie."

"Heh heh."

My, what an adorable smile. I wanted to take her home, rub my cheeks on hers, and sleep with her.

All right, no no no no. Not only would that be cause for concern, it would also be a kidnapping of an important individual.

Remembering that she was important made me curious about something.

"By the way, Ellie, you said that you escaped the place you were staying at," I said. "Why are you in Gideon, in the first place?"

"To enjoy it, of course!" she answered proudly.

"Sorry. Poor wording on my part. I meant the official business." I was confident that I already knew the answer, but it didn't hurt to confirm.

"Oh, I came here to observe the arena event tomorrow."

Sure enough, it was The Clash of the Superiors. The event was an absolute first, after all. It was only natural for royalty to come in and make it even more prestigious.

"My elder sister should come tomorrow, too," she added.

"...Eh? Elder sister?"

"Indeed."

The elder sister of Ellie — second princess of the Kingdom of Altar. The only person that could be was the first princess and the current acting ruler of the country, Altimia A. Altar.

It didn't make sense. After all, a single member of royalty was more than enough to give an event prestige.

...Is there something more? I thought.

"So you and your sister entered Gideon separately, huh?" I asked.

"I acted as her representative yesterday. I met Count Gideon and we made preparations for tomorrow's banquet. It was very hard!"

I would prefer it if they didn't overwork such a little girl. However, that was probably part being royalty, so I couldn't really say much.

"That's why I'm very glad I got a chance to relax and enjoy myself today!"

"Well, and I'm glad that you enjoyed yourself, Ellie... Oh, I have something to take care of. May we go?"

"We may! I had enough fun here in the plaza."

I took Ellie's hand, helped her stand up, disposed of the stick from her candy, and began walking away. While doing so, I looked at one of the city lights — specifically, the image reflected on its metallic surface.

"We're being followed by... three people," I muttered.

"Did you say something?" Elizabeth asked.

"No, never mind, Ellie." After leaving the plaza, we entered Gideon's DIN office.

DIN, Dendrogram Information Network, was one of the news companies of the continent. Just like Knights got their job from the kingdom's knight orders and like Ninjas or Onmitsu got theirs from Tenchi's shinobi villages, Journalists got their job by becoming associated with one of the many mass media companies all over the world.

The protagonist of my manga, Marie Adler, was a journalist, so it had already been decided that I would take this job.

The news company I decided to join was DIN. It wasn't the biggest in the industry, but it was notable for having offices in every important city of each country. Then there was the fact that it also acted as an information peddler without borders, which I liked because it was very "manga-like."

Naturally, DIN had a branch office here in Gideon, as well. In fact, I had found out about the scalper that sold tickets for tomorrow's event by asking my colleagues here.

By the way, every single Master working for DIN was treated as a special correspondent. After all, we could travel all over the place.

I had started in Tenchi, and I'd already been to Granvaloa, Huang He, and Caldina before ending up here in Altar.

We Masters made great special correspondents because we had the dynamism, fighting ability and — most importantly — the power to survive after getting the required information.

Of course, due to the skill "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword" preventing all combat action, pure Journalists had extremely high death rates.

However, just like Paladin's Aegis, it was the type of skill that only worked while having a main job from that grouping, making it perfectly possible to fight after nullifying it by switching to a job from another grouping.

That was why many Journalist Masters chose to travel after switching to another job, changing back to Journalist to do the relevant work and then switching to a fighting job when traveling again.

The problem with that was the fact that job switching could only be done at save points, which only existed at towns and cities.

Sure, there was also the option of using Job Crystals, which allowed the user to instantly change their main job no matter where they were, but they were both expensive and disappeared after one use.

There were pluses and minuses to both staying a Journalist and constantly switching jobs. That was why I'd chosen neither.

But enough about that.

Once we entered the office, Ellie looked like an elementary schooler that had just gone through an educational field trip. Well, not like anyone could tell, considering that I'd had her wear a mask. Many of my fellow Journalists had skills that allowed them to see through Illusion's visual trickery and Disguise's fake stats, so I did it to make sure no one realized who she was.

"I didn't know news companies were so active," she commented.

"They're really busy with the preparations for tomorrow's event," I said. "Even I got a job."

Once I thanked them for telling me about the scalper, they'd given me many various data devices. They'd wanted me to make the best of my special seat and get the best recordings I could.

Some might think it unnecessary, considering they'd reserved the media seats, but I could fully understand wanting to have shots from many different angles. It was especially important in fighting matches. I used many such photos as references when drawing my manga.

We didn't stay in the office for too long. I merely said hi, asked for two sets of information, and left.

◇

The information I got was everything concerning two noble families.

The first family was the rulers of Gideon: the Gideons. The current head of the family, Count Aschbarray Gideon, was a fifteen-year-old youth.

He'd inherited his position from his late father, who had lost his life to an illness about two months ago. However, his coming-of-age ceremony had been only a month ago, so there was a bit of a lag until he officially inherited the title and became acknowledged as the count.

Speaking of coming-of-age, the Kingdom of Altar had a custom where the ones to be sent to war weren't the current heads of noble families, but their heirs. Many would assume that it should've been the other way around, but apparently, they believed that the ones who lived through such pain and trials were the ones who were truly worthy of becoming the nobles of the next generation.

However, the war had happened half a year ago, when Aschbarray hadn't been of age, so he'd ended up avoiding having to participate in it.

The military officer the Gideon family had sent to represent him had died in the war, so it was safe to say that the Count was quite lucky.

Still, it wasn't a bed of roses for him.

The city of Gideon was still being terrorized by serial kidnappings at the hands of a group known as the "Gouz-Maise Gang." They had been happening since the rule of the previous count, and even after Aschbarray took over, it still didn't seem like it would be taken care of anytime soon.

The continuation of this terror made the people question the young count's ability to manage his lands and keep the peace. Apparently, the more critical nobles were talking about leaving the rule to someone else.

However, the first princess and the nobles who had a say in national politics trusted Gideon's name and had no intention of relieving him of his duties. That might change if the Gouz-Maise Gang continued its activities for longer than they could tolerate, but for all we knew, someone could just pop out of nowhere and simply take care of them.

In any case, the other family was the one bearing the name "Brittis." They ruled the area between Gideon and the port city facing the West Sea. The head of the family was Count Alzar Brittis. Though sixty years of age, he was still in good health.

Alzar had told Ellie about how fun Gideon was, but he had actually been on bad terms with the Gideon family ever since their previous generation.

They simply didn't get along. There were many reasons for that, one of which was the fact that, despite having similar amounts of land, the Gideons were far more influential simply because they had the duel city.

That was enough for me to find the situation suspicious.

It was odd that Count Brittis — who supposedly hated the Gideons — had told Ellie about how fun the city was. Most people wouldn't have anything good to say about those they hated, not to mention that a list of bad things about Gideon could have been pretty lengthy. And yet, Count Brittis had only told her the good things. That was enough reason to believe that he'd intended for her to become interested, walk out, and see for herself. I had my guesses, but I still wasn't confident about why he'd done that.

There was even more interesting info about him.

While getting up there in years, Count Brittis had had his first son. The man was an extremely doting parent and loved his son very dearly. Once his son came of age and became his official heir, he had naturally become excited about what the boy would become in the future.

Indeed, his son had gone through his coming of age ceremony. It had happened before the war half a year ago.

Following the custom, the son went to war to represent his father.

Good father that he was, Count Brittis spared no expense to give him the soldiers he needed to come back in good health. He also did some political maneuvering to have his son's army fight alongside the kingdom's strongest: the Knights of the Royal Guard. All so he would come back to him in good health.

And, after all he did for his son, all that Count Brittis got in return was a right hand with the family's crest on it.

Hell General, Logan Goddhart.

A Master sitting at the top of Dryfe Imperium's rankings, infamous for commanding numerous devils.

During the war, he had focused only on killing the Royal Guard's commander.

Naturally, the Brittis army, positioned near the Royal Guard, had been overwhelmed by the three thousand or so man-eating devils who had left barely any identifiable corpses. Thus, Count Brittis had lost his only heir — his beloved son.

The tragedy didn't end there, for not only had he spent great quantities of funds to gather the soldiers for the war, he also had to pay condolence money for those who'd lost their loved ones. To top it all off, the Brittis County got hit with a plague, causing the count to use the very last of his riches to prevent it from spreading all over the kingdom.

Though his efforts had been successful, they'd come at the cost of his county's bankruptcy. Count Brittis had bowed before the royal family and relinquished his territory to them. When managing a territory became difficult, it was rarely impossible to continue it, but I couldn't deny that the path to recovery would normally be harsh on the people.

Anyway, Count Brittis hadn't gone with that option. That could either have been because he wished to save his people by putting them under the royal family's wing or because — having lost his heir — he simply didn't have any attachment to his lands anymore.

Thus, Count Brittis became a noble without land, and he now worked at the royal palace as a common civil official.

I couldn't help but wonder what was going on in his mind these days.

◇

"I must say, I'm impressed by the detail of their info on these nobles," I muttered to myself.

As expected of a news company. They sure know their bigwigs, I thought.

Anyway, all this info gave me a better grasp of the full picture. Still, if things really were as I assumed them to be, the plan really lacked thoroughness. It required a great bit of luck to produce the results he seemed to want.

"Ellie, what kind of person is Count Brittis?" I asked.

"Count Brittis? He's very diligent," she answered.

Diligent, huh? I thought.

"However, he sometimes seems to be very lonely," she added.

"Lonely?"

"I'm lonely, too, so I can see it," said Ellie. Her face fell, and she looked into the distance... in the direction of the capital.

"I have an elder and a younger sister," she continued.

"Yes, I'm aware."

"They both have it very difficult."

I had heard that her elder sister — first princess Altimia — was overwhelmed by her work as acting ruler, while the younger sister — third princess Theresia — was very sickly and could only live in a certain sterilized environment they had.

"My elder sister is much older than me, while Theresia is always in bed. We've never had a chance to play as sisters, and this past six months... we haven't even spent time as a family." Ellie breathed a silent sigh before continuing. "I always felt so lonely. I was no longer sure if I was even loved."

"Ellie..."

Before meeting her today, I'd believed that the second princess was a selfish little girl. Elizabeth S. Altar was said to be whimsical, excessively vigorous, really insolent, and so full of curiosity that it was troubling.

That wasn’t really wrong. After all, she had escaped the place she was staying at just to go sightseeing around Gideon, completely neglecting to take any retinue with her. However, her actions could have been spurred by the loneliness caused by not having any family time with her sisters anymore.

“Today, however, I was very happy!” she burst out. “I had lots of fun playing with you, Marie! This was my first time partaking in such activities!” Ellie grabbed my hand in both of hers and gave me a smile reminiscent of a Sun peeking out from behind the darkest clouds.

“I’m glad you enjoyed it,” I said.

“I enjoyed it very much! It was a wonderful time! Like from my magic picture books! However...” She cast her eyes down and momentarily fell silent. “However... this magical time is ending.”

Ellie let go of my hand and turned her back to me.

“I think I will go back now.”

“Are you satisfied, Ellie?” I asked.

“Very! Thanks to you helping me cheer up, I will be able to do my duties better.” Still turning away from me, Ellie put her hands together. “Someday, when I become really good at my duties, I will take over for my elder sister and give her some time to rest!” she said before turning around and giving me a full smile. “Then, she and I will walk around Gideon, just like we did today!”

Albeit filled with determination, Ellie’s words displayed nothing but the dream of a little child. Considering her and her sister’s positions, it was really questionable that it could come true. However...

“Great. I’m sure you’ll be able to do that.”

That wasn’t a lie, but my very own desire.

From the very bottom of my heart, I wished for this pure girl’s dream to come true.

That was why I decided to help her.

◆◆◆

???

“The target and the accompanying person are on the move. Likely heading for Count Gideon’s residence in the first district... the place she is staying at.”

“Our Magic Cameras got them on record. We have enough ‘proof’ to frame that Master as the culprit. The time is right.”

“Inform the parties responsible for spreading false information all over the city. Once we gather, we will assassinate the second princess of the Kingdom of Altar — Elizabeth S. Altar.”

Side Story: A Day Off in Gideon — Night

???

Come eventide, the two of us were walking through the dimly-lit streets.

The way we held hands might've made us look like sisters or mother and child, which was quite curious when I considered the fact that my avatar, Marie, was something akin to a daughter of my own.

As we walked, I chose to take us through a relatively empty alleyway. There were two reasons for that. The first was the fact that it would get us to our destination, Count Gideon's residence, about ten-odd minutes earlier, while the second was...

"Stop," I heard someone say, and I turned around.

A moment later, I felt something pass through my neck.

Then — after a momentary shiver — my head, separated from my body, fell to the ground.

◆◆◆

Leader of the professional assassin group "The Reaper's Pinky," Dead Hand, Roux Diene

"Target secured," I said. "The accompanying person is confirmed dead."

Within my vision, I could see the now-headless Master woman turn into particles of light and vanish.

The target, the second princess, had fainted due to the sight before her.

"Hmph," I scoffed. "She's a Master, you know? Not like she'll die."

They were always like that. When driven to death's door, they just vanished and came back three days later as if it was no big deal. If that wasn't bad enough, they also had ridiculous powers, Embryos, in their arsenal. It was really bothersome for us that they had their own networks.

To us, a group that murdered by the request of nobles and other rich people, hunting immortal targets wasn't worth the trouble, causing us to ignore most such requests. However, in this situation, the fact that a Master was accompanying our target was actually convenient.

"You have the 'proof,' right?" I asked.

"We've recorded her walking through the town alongside the target," answered one of my subordinates as he took out a crystal used for visual recording. "After we kill the princess, anonymously giving this 'proof' to the right people will get her accused of kidnapping and killing the princess. That will get her on every country's wanted list."

Truth Discernment could reveal any fabricated evidence as fake, but what we had was completely legitimate, so there was no need for us to worry on that front.

The woman had used Illusion to make the princess look different, but that was a skill that only worked on the minds of living things, having no effect on the inorganic. She had also changed her status display by using Disguise, but that was unrelated to our cameras. Not to mention that I — being a skilled Assassin — had high-level Mind's Eye and Reveal skills, allowing me to see right through such tricks. Mind you, the fact that my low-rank job subordinates hadn't been able to see through it meant that her skills were very high-level.

It was a mystery why a mere Journalist had Illusion and Disguise at her disposal, but since those skills weren't battle-related, it was entirely possible that she'd gotten them from a different job.

"Killing royalty instantly gets you on all the wanted lists," I said. "Even if she revives, she'll be out in the gaol."

She's as good as dead at that point, I thought.

"This is going well," said one of my subordinates.

"Yeah," I agreed. "We only have to deal with a powerless woman and a child, so this is far easier than anything we originally planned."

We'd expected having to fight the Royal Guard or infiltrating the residence to poison her. However, for some reason, she'd gone outside all on her own and even ended up finding us a nice scapegoat. This situation was a windfall if I ever saw one.

"Marquis Borozel will enjoy this news," I muttered.

"Hmmm...? So it wasn't Count Brittis," replied someone who wasn't my subordinate.

A moment later, the subordinate holding the princess screamed as blood burst out of his limbs.

First, I realized that his tendons had been severed.

Then, I saw that the princess was no longer unconscious and that her eyes were wide open.

Finally, I noticed that she was holding a dagger of a sinister design.

Thus, I concluded that she wasn't the princess, but an enemy.

"Kill her!" I commanded my subordinates, who instantly and simultaneously threw poisoned knives at her.

However, the enemy bearing the appearance of the princess jumped backwards, moved behind the subordinate who'd lost his tendons, and used him as a shield. All the knives sunk into him and didn't even give him a moment to scream before he died.

"What a terrible thing to do," she said, still holding the corpse. "However, I say that such deaths are a given for fiends trying to kill an innocent child."

She then threw the body away and revealed herself, looking completely unlike the princess.

No longer bright and blonde, her hair had become as black as midnight itself. She was now clad in one of the so-called "men's suits," sometimes used in places like Dryfe and Caldina. Despite it being sundown, she also wore a pair of sunglasses. Her stature was completely different, as well, for she was now an adult.

The only things that were the same about her were the dagger in her hand and the fox mask she wore on the side of her face.

"I must say, Art of Transformation sure takes a toll on SP when you take the shape of someone with a very different physique," she said.

She now had the visage of the Master that we'd beheaded mere moments ago, and the shining crest on the back of her left hand proved that she was the exact same person.

"You...!"

"Oh? What's wrong? You look like you've seen a ghost."

Why is she alive? I thought stunned. How did she transform? Isn't she a Journalist?

As such questions went through my head, I used Reveal to take a look at her stats.

Marie Adler
Job: Journalist
Level: 32 (Total Level: 33)

Sure enough, I could see it. She was a mere Journalist who barely crossed level 30.

“What is it? It’s rude to stare at people, you know?” she said.

“Did you come back to life using an Embryo skill?” I demanded.

It will all make sense if she did, I thought.

“Why would I need to come back to life if I never died?”

“Where’s the real princess?” I demanded. “When did you replace her?”

“Replace her? But I’ve been here from the start, and—” Before she could finish her sentence, a subordinate positioned in one of the buildings to the side of the alley jumped out, got behind her and swung his blade at her neck. The moment it sunk into her body, she became particles of light and vanished.

At the same time, however, the subordinate who’d attacked her fainted and fell to the ground.

“And there was no one here but me,” her voice reached my ears.

It came from the roof of the building the subordinate had jumped out of.

Looking up, I saw that her appearance had changed yet again. Her body was now shrouded in a dark mist, giving her form a vagueness that made it hard for me to make her out. All I could be certain of was the fact that she wore the fox mask, held a dagger in her left hand, and held a strange pistol in her right.

“...!”

Shock filled me as my Reveal skill — still active — gave me completely different results than before.

■■■■■ ■■■■■
Job: ■■■■■ ■■■■■■
Level: ■■■ (Total Level: ■■■)

I could no longer see her name, her job, or even get a glimpse of her stats.

I’d experienced this when I was training to be an Assassin.

That was how the results looked when my Reveal had a lower skill level than the person’s Disguise.

However, I was an experienced Dead Hand — a high-rank job from the assassin grouping — and my Reveal skill level had already reached the maximum of 10.

Is her Disguise above that? I thought.

“It can’t be,” I muttered, yet I was hardly able to deny what I was seeing.

Another thing of note was the fact that my Reveal still got the right number of characters.

“It can’t be,” I repeated to myself, for it just didn’t seem right to me.

The main job level — not the total level — was in the triple digits.

At the very least, it was obvious that it wasn’t Journalist, for that was a low-rank job with a maximum level of 50.

The job and low stats I’d seen before were merely the result of Disguise or a similar skill, while this was her true form. The triple digits in her job could only mean two things — that she’d also reached the maximum on a high-rank job, or...

“What... What are you?!” I howled.

My question made her form a callous smile, making it seem as though she’d been waiting for it.

“‘I am a shade,’” she spoke, each word thick with emotion. “‘I am the reflection of all the wrongs you’ve committed — the mortal phantasm sent to pull you into the darkness...’”

Her tone didn’t have any of the ridicule from before. It was cold and theatrical in delivery.

“‘Into the Shadow,’” she went on with emphasis and grandeur, spreading her arms to the sides as if she stood before an audience.

“Credit for those words goes to Chapter 1 of Nagisa Ichimiya’s hit man superpower battle manga, Into the Shadow,” she added, making as little sense as before, as her tone did a complete turnaround and returned to normal.

The fact that her stats were still Disguised and that she’d just killed my subordinates didn’t change. Me and the rest of the subordinates still standing were intently observing her every single move.

“U-UWAAHHH!” screamed the new guy in our midst as he dashed towards her, unable to bear the pressure. It was a foolish thing to do, but if his sacrifice gave us an opening, then it would be worth it.

Not saying a word, the woman moved only her hand. With a snap of the wrist, she emptied the chambers on her revolver-like gun and loaded it with white and black bullets before pulling the trigger.

The muzzle was pointed in a completely irrelevant direction, but...

“GERGHGHGHGHGHGH!”

...what came out of it was a black and white, bullet-like creature that sounded a strange voice as it left the gun, changed its trajectory in an impossible manner. It sunk into the new guy’s body.

Without as much as a groan, he collapsed to the ground and became unable to move a finger.

It was as if he’d been completely paralyzed.

Though alive, there was nothing he could do.

The woman had done this with barely any effort — by merely moving her hand.

“What’s wrong?” she asked while looking down on us. “Getting cold feet? Cold sweat? Heartbeat too fast? About to break?” Her eyes were hidden behind both the mist and the sunglasses. “Is that how you become when facing something other than ‘powerless women and children’?”

I could tell that the light in her gaze was still cold.

“I’m probably not one to talk, though,” she said as she sighed. “When attacked by the land-warship, all I could do was run away. It was scary, and even though I was still in Dendro, I felt as though I could actually be killed... Yes, even I’m afraid of strong enemies.”

Even as she spoke of something that had scared her, her expression didn’t show a hint of fear. She was merely looking down on us, her gaze dense with coldness.

“That’s why...” she continued. “...I’m only good at cleaning up ‘powerless assassins’ like you.”

Following that proclamation, she made her move.

We tried to stop whatever she was doing, but the mist shrouding her concealed all her actions. A few of my subordinates threw knives at her again, but they all got deflected. Then, from behind the mist, she threw something in our direction.

It was an orb with a fuse on it — a bomb.

We tried distancing ourselves from it, but the fuse burned up far too quickly, blowing up and covering a part of the alley with an intense burst of... smoke.

It didn't take long for me to realize that it wasn't even a harmful kind.

"Don't panic! It's just a Smokebomb!"

Realizing that she might've used our reduced vision to kill us, we began to look around for her. I noticed her soon enough, but she instantly hid herself within the smoke. Thinking that she was using this smokescreen to get away from us, I got ready to do what I had to. However, a moment later, five silhouettes walked out of the smoke, all looking exactly like the woman.

Naturally, I was overcome with shock.

An Illusion...? No, this is above that! I thought.

"Get rid of the fakes! Throw!" I shouted my orders to my subordinates.

"Throw!" they said as they showered the five figures with throwing weapons.

It didn't matter if they aimed well. The knives would simply pass through the fakes, while the real one would block it. That would help us determine which one we had to focus on.

However, the result was completely unlike what I'd expected. Each and every one of the five figures moved in different ways to deflect all the throwing weapons heading in their direction.

"They... They're all real?!" I couldn't hold my surprise.

"Sadly for you, my Shadow Clone Technique creates corporeal bodies," she said.

Shadow Clone Technique?! I thought, shocked yet again. That was the name of a skill used by a Tenchi-exclusive job — Ninja.

So when she took the form of the princess, she... I see! So she's...!

"Ugaah...!" I heard my subordinates begin to panic, clearly because they couldn't tell which one was real.

The skill had created four clones that had the exact same presence as the original, making it difficult to tell which was the real one. Naturally, my subordinates were afraid of the person capable of this.

However, I was the only one who knew that her level was in the triple digits. If they were to find that out, their fear would become so great, it would hamper their ability to act. If that were to happen, I'd no longer have any chance of winning.

"Don't falter!" I shouted. "We have the numbers! Go two-on-one!"

"Understood!" they shouted as they charged at the clones.

A pair for each of them.

If logic applied, clones were weaker than the original. My subordinates should have a chance if they took advantage of their numbers.

Also, having them occupied like this gave me more options.

Or so I thought...

"Their levels sure are low," said one clone.

"Truly," agreed another.

"They don't require many of our tricks."

"Let's refrain from using Arc-en-Ciel, then, shall we?"

"Roger."

Even while fighting in pairs, they were still at a disadvantage against the clones. In fact, some had already lost their partner. Though supposedly weaker than the original, the clones were surpassing pairs of Assassins with a grasp of the trade's techniques.

Unlike me, they didn't have the high-rank job of Dead Hand, but they were capable Assassins nonetheless. And yet, they were getting disposed of so easily...

"Most people think that the biggest difference an Embryo makes are its unique skills," a clone spoke up. "I believe that to be both right and wrong. After all, even tians can have special skills if they get a UBM special reward."

Another clone picked up from there. "If you ask me, the biggest difference is their bonus to stats... and growth in general."

The third clone said, "The Embryo bonuses are what make Masters level up quickly and give us better stats. We're also immortal, so we can safely push limits tians can't. That creates a world of difference between the efficiencies of our growths."

A fourth one added, "That difference is great enough to have my three years here surpass your whole decades."

Three years? She acquired these monstrous abilities in a mere three years? I thought in disbelief.

"That's like a sick joke," I said. "If that's true, then to you Masters, all our training is nothing but fool's masonry!"

"Fool's masonry... that's an Altarian proverb, isn't it?" one of the clones responded. "It's based on the story of a man who tried to build a sky-reaching tower by hand, and it ends with it collapsing on him."

"But there are people who can build towers by hand, right?" another added. "Just like there are tians who have Superior Jobs."

"However, following that example, we Masters are building towers with heavy machinery," a third clone said.

They had basically said that there was a world of difference between us.

Many people equated Embryos with "talent" and "possibility," and the unfairness of it all made me grit my teeth in frustration. I just couldn't accept it. Ever since I was young, I'd been training with the organization to hone myself as an assassin, and it had taken me decades to become a Dead Hand. Due to that, I simply couldn't accept just how unreasonable Masters were.

A world where that woman was above me was a mistake.

I reached into my inventory and took out my secret weapon: a "Gem — Crimson Sphere." Just as it said in the name, it was a Gem which held the high-rank job of Pyromancer's ultimate spell, Crimson Sphere.

Its range wasn't particularly great, but its power was immense.

As things were, I would have no trouble having it hit that woman.

After all, my subordinates — the fools who had been able to do nothing against the clones even while in pairs — had been able to somehow able to keep them in place.

"Die," I said as I threw the Gem. It exploded right in the middle of the battle between the clones and my subordinates, covering it all in crimson.

There was no sound or explosion. There was only a crimson light and a heat that burned them all to nothing.

The woman, her clones, the subordinates fighting them, and the ones who were no longer capable of fighting all got engulfed in the light. A moment after I saw the shock in those guys' expressions, the skin on their faces became blackened ash, and their bones were soon to follow.

"Look at that... You useless shits were able to be useful, after all," I muttered. The crimson light also took out the woman and her four clones.

"Hmph," I scoffed. "So, just like Masters, clones become light when they die." With that, it was clear what had happened when we'd decapitated her the first time.

I stood around and watched them completely disappear. All that was left was to leave, find the second princess, and eliminate her.

"That woman sure was a pain," I muttered. "Covering the unexpected losses here will cost me a lot. I guess I shouldn't expect less from a Ninja — the eastern mystery high-rank job. Not like it matters now. She's the princess killer and she's going straight to the gaol. Hahahahah."

Entirely pleased with myself, I had my first laugh in a while as I played with the recording crystal containing the "proof."

A second later, I felt something cold sink into my back.

"Ah, wha—?" I voiced my confusion as the crystal fell out of my hands, shattered, and rang out with a high pitch. Looking down, I saw the blade of a dagger piercing out of my chest.

"Caught you off-guard, didn't I?"

I shifted my gaze forward, where I saw the very same five women that had vanished just a moment ago.

"You seem to have been misinformed about Ninjas. Allow me to correct you on two things," said one of them.

"One — Ninja is a low-rank job," a second one said. "The high-rank job would be Greater Ninja."

"First supplemental point: though 'shinobi' covers it all, there are different job groupings for different styles. Specifically, the ninja and onmitsu groupings."

"Second supplemental point: the ninja grouping's Ninja and Greater Ninja are for those who use the flashy ninja arts, like the ones that foreigners imagine them using."

"Third supplemental point: my job is one that grew from the onmitsu grouping, which gets the job done through hiding, sneaking, and confusion."

"And two — I'm not using a high-rank job."

Those last words were whispered to me by a sixth clone.

"Huh...? Gh...?" Bloody bubbles escaped my mouth as I turned around. There, I saw a mist-shrouded woman wearing sunglasses and a fox mask.

"Yes," she said. "I'm the real one. After making the smokescreen, I used Hidden Technique alongside Shadow Clone Technique to nullify my presence. Oh, and though you destroyed all my clones, I can easily make more by using the skill again, as you can clearly see.”

She removed the dagger, causing me to fall to the ground. As I was lying there, the five clones and the woman all looked down at me.

There was a very clear difference between the woman and her clones. I couldn’t feel her presence. Though she was right there before me, my five senses were denying her existence.

She had created several clones that had a physical presence while simultaneously nullifying her own presence.

How is that even possible...? I thought in disbelief.

“I hold the onmitsu grouping’s Superior Job, ‘Death Shadow,’” she said. “But you can call me the Superior Killer. I’m not revealing this as a parting gift, but that’s what I am.”

“A Superior Job... the Superior Killer...?!”

Superior Jobs were the ones above high-rank — the greatest of jobs. And “Superior Killer” was the nickname of the contract killer who, despite not having a Superior Embryo himself, had killed the Superior infamous for being “the greatest tian murderer of all time.” It was the alias of the person who could kill Superiors — the ultimate hitman.

“O-Ooaagh...” I groaned, and not because of the pain. This girl, while being far younger than me, had surpassed me and all my years of assassin training, going far ahead into a realm meant for only a select few.

In terms of jobs and as a professional killer, she stood at a summit I couldn’t hope to reach. That realization filled me with shock and emotion far greater than before.

“How... How can reality be so cruel...?” I muttered as the tears I’d thought had run dry began flowing out of my eyes.

“‘Cruel,’ you say?” she said with a hint of irritation in her voice. “You’re a Dead Hand, right? That’s a job you can only take after killing a certain number of people, isn’t it? You tried to murder Ellie, and even sacrificed your subordinates as if it was nothing. You’ve turned so many people into lifeless corpses, and yet you’re here crying after running into a little wall. That’s really low, if you ask me.” As she looked down at me, I looked up into her eyes. All I saw there was contempt. She wasn’t just looking down on me; she seemed to feel the same scorn she would when looking at the usual problematic city-dweller.

I found that both humiliating and hard to stomach.

But if she just kills me, those feelings will go away, and...

"Anyway, I have to go pick up Ellie," she said while turning around, showing no intention to finish me off. "I put her to sleep and hid her, after all. Can't keep her like that."

"Ki—"

"No, I won't kill you. It would be a silly waste of effort." She made the clones vanish and began walking away.

At first, I didn't understand what she said.

A few moments had to pass until I completely processed her words, and their meaning made me burn with more rage than at any other moment in this encounter.

I won't let her get away.

Carefully, to make sure she didn't notice, I reached into my inventory and took out an item. It was a Gem — Crimson Sphere, just like the one I'd used before.

I bet you weren't expecting me to have two of these, I thought.

I quickly activated the Gem and got ready to throw it, fully intent on reducing her to ash. Then I would search for the second princess and kill her, too, making sure to make her death was as gruesome as possible. That would take care of the request, but I could no longer care about that.

The woman, so far above me, had looked at me with those contemptuous eyes. That made me want to reduce whatever she so wanted to protect to scrap.

I can't wait to see her face when she revives and realizes that the princess is dead, I thought, picturing the most amusing future as I threw the gem, and...

I threw it, and...

"...!"

Shock overcame me as I realized that I couldn't move.

"...?! ..." I tried to talk, but not even my tongue functioned.

How? I wasn't shot like the new guy, I thought.

"Oh, I forgot to say," the woman said calmly without turning around. "Like you saw before, one of the bullet types for my Arc-en-Ciel are paralyzing bullets, but I can actually do a similar thing with this."

Still facing away, she pulled out a dagger and held it so I could see it. That was the very same item that'd pierced me.

“A skill on this dagger allows me to cover the blade with slow-acting paralysis poison,” she explained. “This thing is called ‘Palsy Stingblade, Belspan.’ That skill you’ve been hit with is actually from an Epic special reward, so — even though you’re a high-rank job — its effects might be hard for you to resist.”

Wh... What?

“I did say that killing you would be a waste of effort, but that didn’t mean that I could let you act as you pleased. If you hadn’t done anything stupid, you would’ve just stayed there for a day or two until the authorities found and took you away.” She suddenly changed her tone. “I repeat — if you hadn’t done anything stupid.”

In my hand, I held an already-activated Gem.

“H-hhhhh...!” I tried to scream, but only a whisper leaked from my mouth.

As I watched the woman casually wave goodbye to me — not even bothering to turn around — I was engulfed by my point-blank Crimson Sphere.

◇◇◇

Second princess of the Kingdom of Altar, Elizabeth S. Altar

When I came to, Marie was giving me a piggyback ride. A moment ago, it had been evening, but now, the sun had completely sunk.

“Oh, are you awake?” asked Marie.

“Yes,” I nodded. “Why am I being carried like this?”

“You got tired and fell asleep. It was a hectic day, after all.”

She was probably right. This was the first time I’d ever played this much.

“We’re almost at Count Gideon’s residence,” she said.

“Let me walk on my own feet, then,” I said. “Piggyback rides don’t befit a princess.”

“Very well.”

Though I’d enjoyed the ride, I didn’t hesitate to get off her back and stand by myself. Count Gideon’s residence was already in sight.

“This is far enough,” I told her. “I can walk the rest of the way by myself.”

“That’s good,” Marie smiled. “The guards would probably interrogate me if I got any closer.”

“Marie,” I said while gathering my resolve. “Thank you.”

My memory told me that this was the first time I’d ever used those words. During my life, I had never been given a chance to express such simple gratitude to anyone.

“You’re welcome.” Marie gave me a smile as she took off the fox mask — that she was wearing herself, for reasons unknown — and put it on me. “This day will be one of my good memories in this world. Let’s meet again someday, shall we?”

“Certainly! We... We shall meet again someday!”

And so, my day off in Gideon — a day I will never forget — finally reached its end.

Once I returned to the Count’s residence, I got yelled at by a very, very angry Liliana. However, when I saw the tears in her eyes, the person I was now could easily tell that she was very worried about me.

“I’m sorry,” I said, which made her look strangely surprised.

If today had made me different, that was surely thanks to Marie. I now had a very clear goal — to walk the streets of Gideon alongside my sisters Altimia and Theresia.

To achieve that, I first had to take care of the mountains of duties I'd neglected.

◇◇◇

Kingdom of Altar's Count, Alzar Brittis

In the dead of night, I was doing work in the royal palace's archives.

I've been doing nothing but putting documents and numbers in order ever since I'd relinquished my territory after the war half a year ago. That was my job these days.

Compared to running a territory, the tasks I'd been given were by no means difficult, so despite not having any experience, I had little trouble doing them. However, this day in particular, I seemed to have overworked myself.

The light helping me work so late was made by a magic item that didn't use any fuel, but even if it wasn't a waste to keep it on, it was a good time to end it for the day.

As that thought went through my mind...

"Count Alzar Brittis."

...someone addressed me.

I looked to where the voice came from and saw a woman. She was wearing a black suit and — despite us being indoors — had sunglasses on her face, making her look questionable. Most would've assumed her to be an assassin sent to kill me, but I didn't believe that to be the case.

"I want to talk about Ellie... Her Highness Elizabeth... and what happened in duel city Gideon," she said.

"I'm listening, dear guest," I replied.

Thus, she began telling me about the day's events.

The second princess had run away from where she was staying. She'd encountered street ruffians and then met the woman before me. Together, they'd walked around enjoying whatever Gideon had to offer. And finally, the woman had fought assassins that had been hired by another noble, one who'd probably wanted the rights to Gideon and the surrounding lands.

"So that's what happened..." I said.

What a curious turn of events, I thought.

"At first, I thought that you were the one behind it all," said the woman.

"Everything from her escape to the assassins."

"Why did you come to such a conclusion?" I asked.

"You were the ruler of the Brittis County, and it's well-known that you had a bad relationship with the previous Count Gideon — whose territory is right next to Brittis." she explained. "Also... in the war half a year ago, you lost your heir — your one and only son." Correct. All of that was nothing but the truth.

"Your son was fifteen years old at the time. Being of age, he was sent to the war as one of the kingdom's nobles," she went on.

Indeed. My son had participated in the war and lost his life.

"What went through your mind back then?" she asked. Though she was wearing sunglasses, I could feel her staring directly at me. "Unlike your son, the son of the current Count Gideon didn't participate in the war because he wasn't of age. As a result, the one that died was just the military officer that represented him. And thus, while Count Brittis lost both his heir and territory, Count Gideon continued into the next generation, ruling the most prosperous region in the kingdom. What did you make of this situation?"

She stopped for a moment, then took a breath before continuing.

"'Count Gideon is blessed with a prosperous territory and has a son he can bequeath its future to. I also gave my all for the sake of the kingdom. Why, then? Why am I the only one who lost everything?!'"

As if standing before a theater audience, she spoke those highly familiar words that I had said many times.

"Not many people could blame you for thinking that," she added.

"You talk as though you've seen me say that," I said. "We haven't even met before."

"That phrase is merely the result of the personality picture I've formed based on the information at my disposal."

I see. That's some impressive imagination, I thought.

The words she had spoken were more or less the same as mine. Indeed, there was a time when I'd thought those things and lamented in a similar manner while closed in my personal quarters.

It all made sense. That line of thought was more than enough to conclude that I had been the one behind the plot.

"That's correct," I admitted. "I was angry with everyone. The royal family, especially that foolish king, started the war that took away my dear son. The Royal Guard, despite being right next to him, failed to protect anything. And even though I went through such loss, Gideon still had everything... That made them all targets of my rage.”

That was why I had begun plotting revenge, which consisted of...

“However,” said the woman, “you were aware that those feelings of yours were unreasonable. A part of you thought that it was a mistake to direct your grudge at them.”

Oh, so you can see that much? I thought.

“Am I wrong?” she asked in confirmation.

Out of all the ways I could’ve responded, I chose to be direct about how I felt.

“I was considering revenge against the royal family, the Royal Guard, and Count Gideon,” I admitted. “However, just as you say, I knew that my grudge was misplaced.”

Still, I had felt that I had to do something. My chagrin was far too great to let me stop.

“Thus, I chose to leave it all to the hand of fate,” I continued.

“I can tell. That was why your plot had those intentional holes,” she said as she put up three fingers. “Three main points. First, there was the question if telling Ellie about the greatness of Gideon would really get her to escape and abandon her duties. Second, it was a test to see if the Royal Guard was really incapable of doing what they had to when faced with such incidents. And third, there was the question of whether Count Gideon’s city was safe enough for a girl like Ellie to walk around in all by herself. If they behaved in a way that cleared at least one of these three, they — just like you — would merely have been doing their duties to the best of their ability, which would mean that all the misfortunes you’ve faced were only your own fault. That’s what you were thinking, correct?”

Correct.

I had talked to Her Highness Elizabeth, the most brazen of the three princesses, and given her an idealized image of Gideon.

Then I had intentionally provided the Royal Guard with the wrong documents — ones that would get in the way of their protection duties.

Those two acts had increased the chances of the princess escaping the residence, and that was the extent of what I had done.

“The only problems would’ve occurred if there were failures on all three points,” said the woman. “If Ellie — a part of the royal family — got hurt, it would’ve been the responsibility of both the Royal Guard and Count Gideon, and your revenge would’ve been complete.”

I had let fate show me whether my grudge was misplaced or if there was anything more to it.

“It’s hard to call this a plan, and I don’t quite believe that it would’ve been their fault even if it went through... still, it was quite close,” she said.

“But it didn’t happen, yes?” I asked.

“Indeed. To the royal family, the Royal Guard, Count Gideon... and to Ellie herself, this is merely a case of ‘the whimsical princess ran away and enjoyed a day in Gideon.’ That’s it.”

“Thank you,” I said in gratitude before I even realized it.

“For what?” she asked.

I had said the words without even thinking, so even I didn’t know how to answer that. However, after a bit of consideration, I decided that words of thanks really were the most appropriate here.

“Thanks to you fortunately being there to save Her Highness’s life, I have finally reached a conclusion.” The things that had happened during this incident had given me the ultimate answer. “I... I was merely unlucky.”

The death of my son, the poor state of my lands... it all boiled down to that word.

No one in the kingdom was at fault. The cause of it all didn’t lie with anyone else. I had merely been unlucky.

“I can’t resent anyone for these results. My son went to war and was merely unlucky enough to die, while my lands unfortunately caught a plague. No one is at fault here... and yet, unable to see that, I went and did something truly unjust.”

“Indeed,” said the woman. “I also have a thing or two to say about you using Ellie’s life as a pair of dice.”

And she was right to feel that way, for — though indirectly — I had tried to hurt Her Highness Elizabeth. Brazen as she was, the second princess was a very gentle young lady.

I can’t believe I used her as a touchstone, I thought in self-disgust.

“However, again, this incident is nothing but ‘the princess ran away,’” said the woman.

Thus, no one would be blamed for this. Her Highness Elizabeth would get scolded, but that was the extent of it.

"But then..." I began.

"If you feel guilty," she cut my words short, "work hard enough to make it up to her. Starting with this."

Saying that, the woman gave me three bundles of documents.

"What is this?" I asked.

"I've gathered the proof and records of the injustices committed by Marquis Borozel — the one who sent assassins after Ellie," she answered. "Just say that you found it while organizing your documents or something and get him the punishment he deserves."

Naturally, I was surprised, for the files she'd given me were like the ones found in a noble's most secretive safe. Apparently, after protecting the princess, she had gone straight into Marquis Borozel's territory, taken these documents, and then returned here to the capital.

"Anyway, my job here is done, so I'll take my leave," she said.

"Wait," I called out. "Just who are you?"

My question made her form a smile.

"I'm just a passing Journalist," she answered as she disappeared like mist in the wind or shadow in sunlight.

◇◇◇

Journalist/Death Shadow, Marie Adler

The day after the one I'd spent with Ellie, I was sitting in a terrace seat at one of the more popular cafés here in Gideon.

"...I'm sooo tired," I muttered.

The reason for that was obvious — I was still drained from all that I'd done yesterday.

Ticket acquisition, the date with Ellie, taking care of the assassins sent after her, getting dirt on the main offender, Marquis Borozel, and then talking to Count Brittis... all of that had happened in a single day. The latter three had been after sundown, too.

Sure, I had a Superior Job, and yes, my total level was above 500. Though my stats didn't match those of Superior Jobs focused purely on fighting, they were extremely high nonetheless. My AGI was in the quintuple digits, and I could move at the speed of sound, making me a particularly super woman, if you'll pardon the joke.

However, HP and energy were different things, plus MP and SP had no connection to mental fatigue. I was so sleepy.

However, I couldn't let the Sandman take me, for it was the day of the long-awaited event known only as "The Clash of the Superiors." I had to wait for Ray and Rook, too, which was all the more reason why I couldn't sleep.

"Ray, huh...?" I murmured.

That was the name of the young man I'd met at Noz Forest, where I had been doing my work as a professional killer.

I was a roleplayer taking the role of Marie — the protagonist of my hitman superpower battle manga. To get properly immersed in her as a character, I simply couldn't do without the act of murdering people as a professional killer.

However, tians — just like living people — were intelligent beings. Due to that, I was wholly averse to the idea of killing them. Although ones like the assassins from yesterday were exceptions.

Anyway, that was why I'd chosen to become a professional killer focused solely on Masters — who didn't die even if they were killed. Unlike tians, they revived, and their lives would never be in any real danger. I had no problems killing them for my roleplaying purposes.

With that in mind, I'd spent my time in Tenchi taking and training in jobs from the onmitsu grouping, such as Onmitsu and Shadow. Eventually, I'd gotten the Superior Job of Death Shadow, and become a professional killer focused solely on PK.

I had chosen the onmitsu grouping's jobs because my manga's Marie had a similar fighting style to them, often using transformation and clones in her battles.

My success rate was very high, and the processes I went through to get my targets helped me learn to draw methods of assassination I had never thought of before. Being a professional killer was a valuable experience for both Dendro and my real life.

Once, my target had been the King of Plagues — a Superior who'd gotten on all wanted lists for indiscriminately killing tens of thousands of tians. The battle had been so grueling that I'd thought I was gonna die for real, but I had somehow been able to defeat him and send him to the gaol.

My most recent job had been the newbie PK hunt at Noz Forest.

I didn't know who'd requested it, but I'd been presented with a sizable sum of money for it. Though I'd been averse to the idea of indiscriminately killing almost nothing but newbies, the fact that I hadn't done such assassinations before had greatly intrigued me. Also, I had recalled that Into the Shadow had an event where apprentice assassins of a certain organization were one-sidedly massacred, which had made me think that this might help me revitalize the Marie that was lying dormant inside me.

Thus, I'd accepted the job, entered Noz Forest, and started killing all the Masters there, among which was Ray.

I found him to be quite interesting. Despite being a newbie, he'd been able to survive the first of my Embryo's attacks. Then he'd gone on to block the second one, and had still had the willpower to deflect the third.

In the end, I'd used bullet creatures made from a mix of Black Pursuit and Blue Dispersion to finally give him the death penalty, but what mattered weren't the results.

The important thing here was the expressions and emotions he'd displayed.

While struggling against the death penalty, he was alive.

Well, of course he was. That applied to me, as well, but that wasn't a big deal.

What I meant by that was the fact that he was giving his all to survive here in Infinite Dendrogram.

I didn't know whether he was aware of it or not, but he was actually doing his best to stay alive in this game.

Some players who had played as long as me became like that due to spending lots of time here. There were also people — like the cultists — who didn't think it was a game from the moment they entered here.

However, he was neither. Despite being a beginner — a rookie — he was more serious about living here than most of the countless players I'd encountered.

That fact had greatly intrigued me, making me believe that watching him would help me discover what I was missing and perhaps even revitalize the Marie sleeping within me. Eventually, after I figured he'd most likely revived, I had started looking for him.

In the process, I had gone through a ridiculous encounter with a battleship-riding furball — the King of Destruction — which had resulted in the complete immolation of Noz Forest.

I had survived that predicament, and I'd soon found Ray and his Embryo, Nemesis, talking to another newbie, Rook. Not missing the opportunity, I had pretended to be a passerby and ended up becoming a member of their party.

By the way, my job back then had always been Death Shadow.

The onmitsu grouping had a passive skill known as "Onmitsu Conceal." While having an onmitsu grouping job as my main one, it made the job display remove all the onmitsu grouping jobs and replaced the main job with the non-onmitsu job that had the highest level.

That was why the only jobs that showed up for others were Journalist and one other, while the stats appeared lowered, as well. I could choose to turn it off for my party members, but since I was kinda infiltrating Ray's party, I didn't do it.

Due to that, the Journalist passive skill "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword" gave me a bit of a problem.

Normally, it wouldn't have been a big deal, for it would've activated the moment I switched to being a Journalist. However, switching my job to one outside the onmitsu grouping would've disabled the effect hiding my total level, which was something I definitely didn't want. Thus, I'd stayed a Death Shadow and opted to fake the skill's effect by secretly using items that increased EXP gain for a certain amount of time.

It was hard on my wallet, though — 100,000 lir for every 30 minutes. Still, I believed that I had to bite the bullet and just bear having to make these expenses.

...After all, I'd made quite a lot of money from the newbie hunt.

Looking back, though I felt quite guilty about it and thought that I shouldn't have done it, the fact that I wouldn't have found Ray if I hadn't made it a bit complicated.

As our party had gathered and traveled to Gideon, we'd gotten involved in the battle against the goblin horde and their leader — The Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda.

Gardranda had been a very strong UBM.

UBMs all had something talent-like to them. While Gardranda had a lower level than the two UBMs I'd defeated, I had felt that its latent abilities were not to be trifled with.

Its level might've been low, but it was still a far stronger creature than the newbies Ray and Rook.

Normally, even Epic-tier UBMs required Masters with high-rank Embryos at their disposal, and even then, their chances of victory would be only about 50%. When facing such creatures, incomplete parties of Masters with low-rank Embryos simply had no chance — no possibility.

Victory could've been ours if I'd taken off my disguises and gone all-out, but I'd chosen not to do that. Sure, doing so would've revealed who I was, but that definitely wasn't the primary reason for that. I had wanted to see... to observe how Ray acted in a situation similar to the one in the forest — when faced with a being far stronger than himself.

Thus, I had limited myself only to things that didn't go beyond the capabilities of a Journalist, making sure not to sully the purity of the actions he took.

He had ended up breaking all my predictions and expectations.

He hadn't run away.

He hadn't abandoned people — even if they were tians.

Even when beaten by a power far greater than himself and even when his plans had fallen apart, he had never given up.

Until the very end, he had searched for possibilities and seized the one leading to victory against Gardranda.

Sure, I'd helped him out at the very end, but that was a triviality. Having given his all and used everything at his disposal, Ray had won against Gardranda. The instant I'd seen him stand victorious had actually made my heart throb.

He was as alive in Infinite Dendrogram as he was in the real world.

At that moment, I'd concluded that I wanted to see more of him. As a Journalist, as a manga artist, as Marie, and as myself, I wanted to observe him.

"I'm using the word 'observe,' but it's more that I merely grew fond of him," I said to myself. In all honesty, I wanted to reveal what I was and apologize for killing him. I wished for us to become friends.

However...

"...Ray and Nemesis's current goal is to find and defeat me."

On the way to Gideon and during the party we'd held once we'd arrived, he'd told us of his first death penalty and his intention to win against the one responsible — me. Listening to him had made beads of cold sweat form on my back.

"Revealing myself would probably hamper their determination... and I really don't want their motivation to go down..." Nemesis's reaction when she'd believed that I'd been defeated by the King of Destruction made it obvious that they were quite fired up about the prospect of revenge against me. Also, more importantly, I found that Ray was coolest when he gave his all to break through whatever was happening right before his eyes.

Thus, I chose not to interfere with their immediate goal and decided to wait until they became stronger. Then I would appear before them as a mysterious PK, and — just as they desired — face them with all I had.

As such thoughts raced through my mind, I saw the two I was thinking of approaching.

I waved my hand at the now-familiar Master and his Embryo — the people that had me so enchanted.

[MARIE STORY, END.]

Afterword

Bear: “The part after the midword is done, so now it’s time for the afterword! I’m the beary merry Brother Bear!”

Cat: “And I’m Cheshire — the one who didn’t really have any scenes in volume 3 outside of this corneerr!”

Bear: “Man, time sure flies, doesn’t it? We’re already at volume 3!”

Cat: “Thanks to all the support from our dear readers, the novels are coming out smoothly!”

Bear: “I remember when a certain someone at the first meeting said ‘if it doesn’t do well, I hope we get at least 3 volumes before canceling. That should be enough to cover Part 1.’ How nostalgic.”

Cat: “How they expected to fit all that into just 3 volumes is beyond me. As our dear readers can see, even when we got a bigger page number than usual, we still ended right as the main event began! There's no way Part 1 could've fit into just 3 voluumes!"

Bear: "Not to mention the fact that Ray bearly had a role in this one."

Cat: "He chatted, ate, chatted, ate, and then just watched a fight!"

Bear: "And the one doing most of the eating was Nemesis."

Cat: "I wouldn't have been surprised if the fang on the cover was shiining."

Bear: "Anyway, if this had been canceled after 3 volumes, the readers would've been in fur a beary summary-like experience."

Cat: "They might've had to cut the entire Figaro vs Xunyu battle."

Bear: "Or maybe just end it with the labcoat's appearance and tie it all up with a 'Our battle begins...!'"

Cat: "That's not tying up anything!"

Xun: "Gotta thaNk the readers that it didN'T cOme to that, eh?"

Bear/Cat: "...Who's there?!"

Xun: "Master Jiangshi, Xunyu. Since it's apparently necEssary, I'm joining tHe afterwords from noW on."

Cat: "Oh, I see... So you're saying that I'm about to lose even more of my already-few roles?!"

Xun: "You even got yoUr role cut out oF the manga, diDn't ya?"

Cat: "Don't say that! Don't remind me that I only have a picture of me grinning on the cover!"

Xun: "The manga is beiNg distributed bY Comic Fire, by the wAY."

Cat: "You even took the advertisement I was supposed to do! First Figaro's organs, now people's turns... Just how much of a thief are you?!"

Xun: "Okay, no. The one in chaRge of thieverY in this work is someoNe else, you know?"

Bear: (...Man, Xunyu already seems comfortable here.)

Bear: "You were on stage and in the limelight on this volume's illustrations, and you feel the same way here, eh, Dhalsim?"

Xun: "What diD you just cAll me?"

Bear: "You fight by stretching your limbs, using fire and teleportation. You're beary much Dhalsim, from Street Fi—"

Xun: "I don't do yOga. Also, I'm a womAn."

Cat: "Well, a jiangshi woman brings up images of a certain other fighting game character!"

Bear: “By the way, the author noticed Xunyu’s similarity to Dhalsim a long while after introducing her.”

Cat: “Anyway, it’s time for the familiar serious comment from the author.”

Dearest readers, thank you for your purchase. I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

My work has reached volume 3 and — thanks to your support — will go beyond that, allowing me to continue my writing without any worries. You have my sincere gratitude for that.

Anyway, this volume has two significant points the previous two didn’t have.

First is the fact that there are stories which have people other than the protagonist — Ray Starling — as their main characters. I hope you enjoyed the stories you couldn’t see with just a single perspective and that they gave you a broader look at my work’s world.

The second point is that the current central plot didn’t end with this volume. The Figaro vs Xunyu fight and the two side stories are concluded in this volume, but a certain incident is continuing from this one into the fourth. Though, some might be inclined to say that the hand of fate has been leading to this ever since volume 1.

Infinite Dendrogram part 1’s greatest event will continue in volume 4, so please look forward to it.

Sakon Kaidou

Cat: “All right, it’s time for us to end the afterwoorrd!”

Bear: “Ray’s been a bit dormant in this volume, but that sure won’t be the case in the next one.”

Xun: “...Huh? Wait, I know I mAde fun of Cheshire abOut this, but whAt will I be doiNg in the next voLume?”

Bear: “Looking at how you ended up in this volume... I really have no clue.”

Cat: “You just keep sleeping in the barrier! I won’t give you my turns!”

Bear: “Well, my place is beary much secure (perfect attendance in the original webnovel).”

Cat: “Anyway, the story from this volume continues in vol—”

Xun: “Volume 4, which is sEt to come out in a cOupLE monTHs! Look forWard to it!”

Cat: “She stole it again!”

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 4 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 3
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author’s imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2017 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2017 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2017 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2017 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author’s intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: November 2017

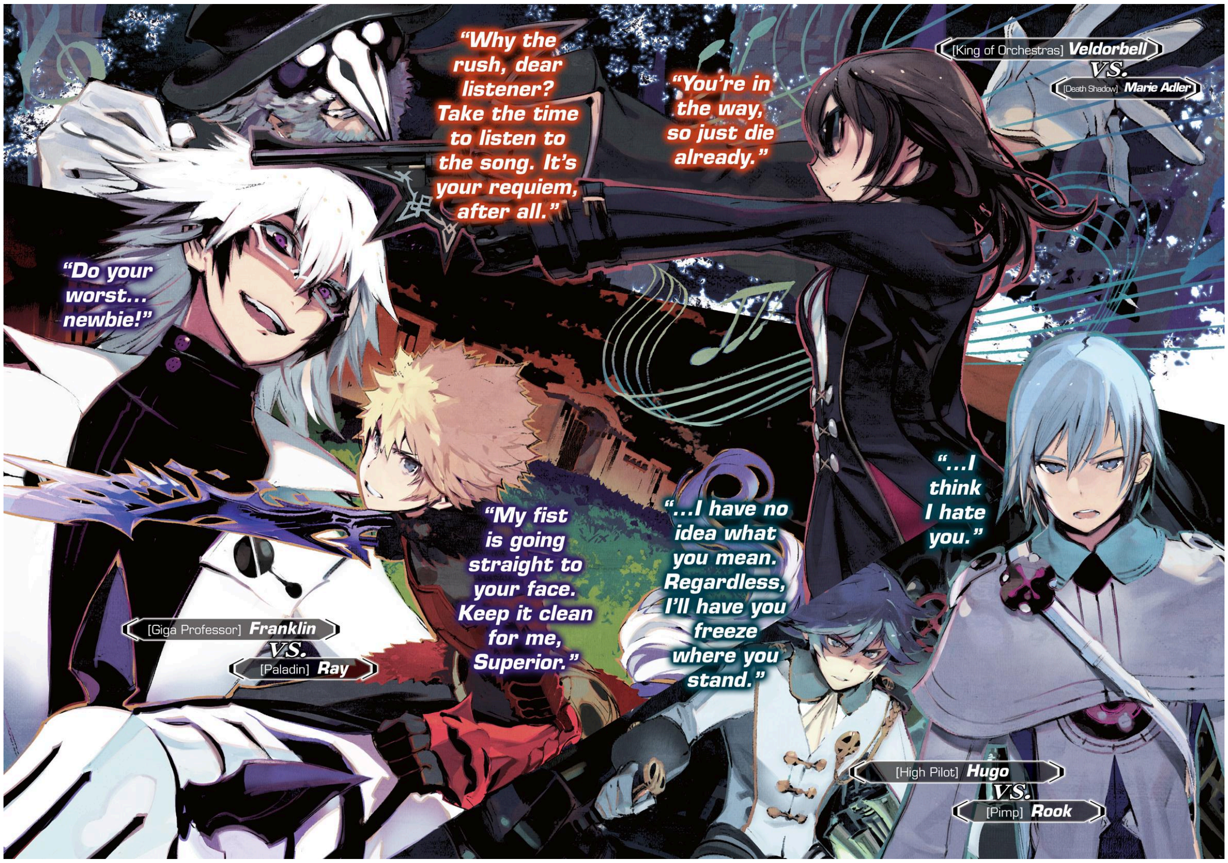
Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
4. Franklin's Game

Infinite Dendrogram

4. Franklin's Game

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



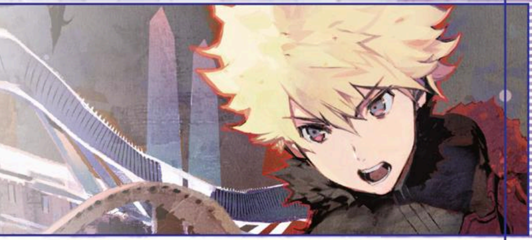
"Why the rush, dear listener? Take the time to listen to the song. It's your requiem, after all."
"You're in the way, so just die already."
[King of Orchestras] Veldorbell
VS.
[Death Shadow] Marie Adler
"Do your worst… newbie!"
"My fist is going straight to your face. Keep it clean for me, Superior."
[Giga Professor] Franklin
VS.
[Paladin] Ray
"…I have no idea what you mean. Regardless, I'll have you freeze where you stand."
"…I think I hate you."
[High Pilot] Hugo
VS.
[Pimp] Rook

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

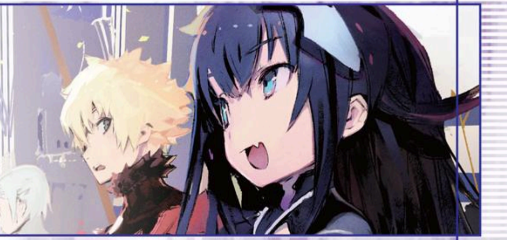
A young man who began playing Infinite Dendrogram. Though generally a calm person, he has a strong will and sense of righteousness that allows him to keep struggling for as long as he needs to.



Nemesis

Nemesis

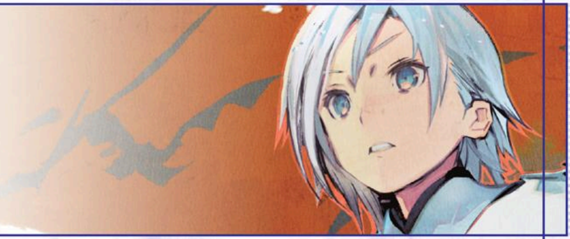
A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. She has the ability to transform into a greatsword or a halberd, and is equipped with skills such as Vengeance is Mine, which damages enemies for twice as much as they damage Ray.



Rook

Rook Holmes

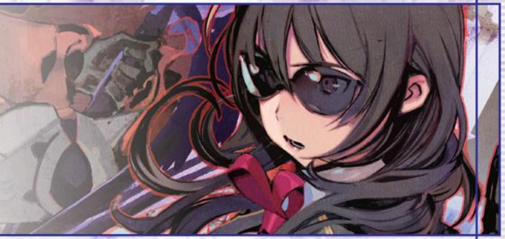
An astonishingly beautiful boy in Ray's party. His job is "Pimp" and he fights using his tamed monsters. His Embryo is the Type Guardian "Depraved Devil, Babylon."



Marie

Marie Adler

A Journalist player working for the information organization called "DIN," giving her access to lots of various info. Having gained an interest in him, she now accompanies Ray, who has a tendency to be at the center of large incidents.



Shu

Shu Starling / Shuichi Mukudori

Ray's brother and the one who invited him to the game. He wears a suit because, during character creation, he accidentally made himself look just like he does in real life.

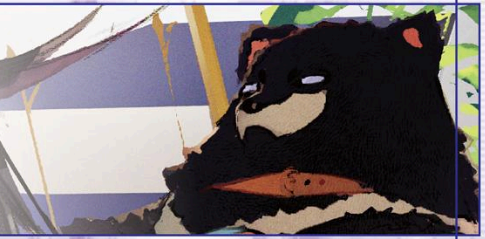


Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Continuation: Inside Their Minds

Chapter One: “The Weakest, The Worst” Superior

Chapter Two: Irregular Newbies

Chapter Three: The Movement on the Board

Chapter Four: Battle of the Artists

Chapter Four-Point-Five: Setting

Chapter Five: Yuri and Hugo

Chapter Six: The Duel in the Frozen Hell

Chapter Seven: The Right Arm of the Victor

Afterword
Bonus Short Stories
About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Continuation: Inside Their Minds

Three hours before The Clash of the Superiors, Count Gideon's residence

Gideon's first district was a gathering of official buildings and institutions. Among them were the knight offices, right next to which was the residence of the local ruler: Count Gideon.

Due to both buildings sharing a similar design focused on steadiness and modesty, most would've assumed that Count Gideon's mansion was nothing but an extension of the offices. This was because the first Count Gideon had believed that the spirit of Gideon lied within its arenas, and that gaudy castles wouldn't fit the city's character.

However, many matches since then had been attended by royalty and other guests of honor, making it necessary for the Gideons to build a luxurious guest house for them to stay in.

Thus, the residence of Count Gideon was a curious structure with a modest main building and a fancy annexe. The main office of said modest building was currently occupied by three people wearing serious facial expressions.

One was the young Count Gideon, Aschbarray Gideon.

One was the Vice Commander of the Knights of the Royal Guard, the Paladin Liliana Grandria.

And the last one was the second princess of the Kingdom of Altar, Elizabeth S. Altar.

They were among the most important tians currently present in the city.

Elizabeth broke the silence. "So my older sister isn't coming?"

"Yes." Count Gideon nodded. "I've been informed that she is currently unwell and could not heal in time to depart for Gideon today. Apparently, there's an Epidemic happening in the capital." He was passing on to them what he'd been told via communication magic from the capital.

Elizabeth had arrived at this city to attend the great event happening this evening — The Clash of the Superiors. But it had originally been planned that her older sister, the current leader of the country, would attend it as well.

"An Epidemic..." sighed Liliana while covering her mouth and making a sour expression.

"Epidemic" was a term used to describe any sudden diseases that spread among the weak and strong alike. Masters saw it as an unpatterned, irregular, widespread Infinite Dendrogram event. There were various Epidemics that covered many large areas, creating sufferers among both Masters and tians. Though some went away with the passage of time, some required special healing methods such as vaccines or healing magic available only to Superior Jobs.

Fortunately, the Epidemic that had spread through the kingdom this time wasn't life-threatening, being more like a common cold than any other disease.

However, Epidemics completely ignored all stats and resistances. Even high-level Masters would become bedridden or simply log out until the disease went away. They were considered to be natural disasters above human knowledge. Indeed, it was quite fortuitous that the damage being done by the current Epidemic was so meager.

Still, Count Gideon, the host of today's event, could barely hide his chagrin about its inconvenient timing, and Liliana shared his sentiment.

There had been trouble caused by Elizabeth sneaking out of the building yesterday, but most of the official business and preparations relating to the event were already done.

Most of it had had to do with the arrival and welcoming of Elizabeth's older sister, first princess Altimia, and now it had all gone to waste. Being an older sister herself, Liliana tried to be considerate of Elizabeth's feelings about this.

"I see! Very well!" Elizabeth said with a voice that made it seem like Liliana's worries had been misplaced. "It's a shame, but we should not dwell on what we can do nothing about! Now, we should be thinking about how to make this event a success! Am I right, Count Gideon?!"

"Indeed you are!" he said heartily.

Elizabeth's words were full of resolve. Though her beloved sister couldn't come, she was determined to do her duty, in the hopes that it would help her sister.

“Your Highness...” muttered Liliana. Though Elizabeth’s current bearing wasn’t completely unlike her, the lady knight felt as if there was something different about her — as if she had become more of an adult.

Perhaps something happened when she sneaked out yesterday? Liliana wondered.

Suddenly, Elizabeth grabbed her hand in both of hers. “Liliana, I want you to protect me!” she declared.

“...Of course! I will keep you safe no matter what happens,” replied Liliana, fully ready to fulfill her duty.

She would protect the girl under any circumstances — no matter what awaited them.

Chapter One: “The Weakest, The Worst” Superior

Journalist/Death Shadow, Marie Adler

I knew about the top three of the Dryfe Imperium’s rankings before the war even happened. Being both a Journalist and a player killer, I had to be fully informed about the strongest Masters.

The tops of Dryfe’s duel, kill, and clan rankings were all cut from different cloths.

The commander of devilish armies was the Hell General, Logan Goddhart, the “Contradictory Equation.”

The one bearing the greatest stats was the King of Beasts, the “Physically Strongest.”

Finally, the leader of the imperium’s top clan was the Triangle of Wisdom, Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin.

The only one out of the three who hadn’t been a Superior at the time of the war was Franklin. Not only that, his only job was a non-battle job, and he had stats that put him below even the average low-rank battle job. Comparing him to King of Beasts the “Physically Strongest” or The Earth the “Magically Strongest” made him seem absolutely meaningless.

Of course, unlike the other rankings, clan rankings were focused on the scopes of the clans.

Though the leader of a top clan lacking power was curious, it had absolutely no impact on the clan’s position.

Most thought that, in war, the person at the top of the clan rankings was supposed to show their ability through the whole clan, rather than as an individual. But to everyone’s surprise, the result had been entirely different. What the war had shown was not the fearsomeness of the Triangle of Wisdom, but of Franklin himself.

Despite not being a Superior at that point in time, he definitely hadn’t been outdone by the other two.

The Superior Job of Giga Professor specialized in monster research, while Franklin's Embryo, Pandemonium, specialized in monster production.

Though focused on the same subject, research and production were completely different things, and Franklin combined them to create monsters with many various qualities.

Some were immune to physical attacks, some reflected magic, some exploded when nearing death, some latched on and assumed control, etcetera, etcetera...

The ones who had faced Franklin's wicked band had been the few kingdom's Masters who'd participated in the war and the kingdom's own army. When both sides clashed, the results had been simply tragic.

The fact that every monster was a wild card with unpredictable abilities had quickly brought disorder into the kingdom's ranks, which had left them open to the specially-made monsters that rivaled Superior Jobs in power. Naturally, they had made short work of the kingdom's Masters and gone on to feast on the king himself.

The price of making this monstrous army had no doubt been astronomical, for the necessary funds to acquire the materials required for monster creation were great. However, for Franklin, who was the top of Dryfe's largest clan and also had the backing of the imperium itself, money was no issue. That allowed him and his clan to participate in the war at full capacity and demonstrate just how fearsome an individual he was.

After the war, I, as a PKer... as the Superior Killer... had received many requests for Franklin's murder.

The ones making the requests had been Masters who'd been pushed into the death penalty by him, or friends and family of the tian soldiers who'd died. I had rejected each and every one of these requests.

Of course, I hadn't neglected to consider them. If he was a foe I could kill, I would just do it. But that simply wasn't the case.

With a single glance, I knew that I could kill him easily, but I couldn't do it because I knew that something bad would happen if I did.

Some time had passed since I'd refused those requests. The people who'd made them weren't the only ones with a grudge against Franklin. Many had tried attacking him themselves, and though most of them had been destroyed by his monsters, one person had actually defeated him.

Considering Franklin's poor stats, it hadn't been exactly unexpected. However, what had happened afterwards was simply off. After returning from his death penalty, Franklin had hunted down the one who'd killed him, fought him, and emerged victorious this time.

Then, he did it again.

And again, and again, and again.

And again, and again, and again, and again, and again, and again...

Franklin had created monsters that the guy had the worst compatibility with and spent a whole month of real-world time relentlessly killing the one who'd defeated him. Eventually, the person had stopped logging in to Infinite Dendrogram.

Though weak, he made the worst monsters.

Though weak, he had the worst disposition.

"The Weakest, The Worst" was my exact evaluation of him, and his most popular nickname.

In all honesty, I was aware of another good contestant for "The Worst," but that was irrelevant here.

Anyway, his sudden appearance meant far more than just that "one of the kingdom's irreconcilable enemies had appeared."

There was no doubt that he was about to do something bad.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

The moment Franklin named himself, countless people in the venue showered him in arrows, bullets, and offensive magic.

With him standing on the top of the barrier, many of the attacks got canceled by it. However, it was still a fearsome barrage of damage. I could even spot a number of high-rank attacks like the ones I'd seen during the matches, some of which might've actually been done by Superior Jobs. The barrier underneath Franklin's feet shook wildly as explosions hit it and covered the top with smoke.

Despite bearing the brunt of the barrage, Franklin came out alive.

"Get a load of you people. Duel City folk. Hot-blooded as they come and always quick to react," he sneered.

His lab coat being scorched here and there was proof that he'd been hit, but for some reason, it hadn't killed him.

"Why is he alive?" I asked.

"There's nothing special about what he's done so far," said Marie.

"Yeah." Shu nodded.

I had no idea what had happened, but they seemed to have full understanding of it.

"He survived the first few critical attacks with warding accessories and equipment skills," Marie continued.

"Then, he used Castling to shelter himself from the rest," added Shu.

"What's 'Castling'?" asked Rook.

"It's a skill that lets the user change places with one of his monsters, Rook," explained Marie. "It's a high-rank skill, but its effective range is so small that it's rare for it to be used as a teleport skill. Still, merely being among the few teleport skills is enough to make it noteworthy."

I see, I thought. So he'd survived the first attacks using the same things I'd used against the Demi-Dragon and the rest by simply disappearing away from here.

"Oh, but do be careful not to attack me anymore! Don't wanna end up in the gaol, now, do we?" Franklin mocked.

The gaol?

Confused by his words, I focused my gaze on him. As I watched, a single songbird appeared in his arms.

"Because that's exactly where you're going if you accidentally hit this little lady," said Franklin, and a moment later, the bird got replaced by something else — a girl, to be precise.

"Ellie!" Marie burst out, with a voice full of shock.

It was Elizabeth S. Altar — the person from the photo I'd seen yesterday and in the noble seats today. I hastily looked to the guest of honor seating and, sure enough, she wasn't there.

"So... this guy actually made a monster that can do Castling with third parties," said Shu.

What? Is it even possible to create something like that? I asked myself, but the answer was obvious with a single glance at the results — the second princess was out of her seat and in Franklin's hands.

Seemingly unconscious, the girl didn't even struggle.

"Have I made myself clear, you dumbasses?" Franklin smirked.

"Royalty killers go straight to the gaol, you know? Careful not to do that... Not like I'm one to talk! Ayyyyy... HAHAHAHAHAH!"

The man who'd killed the father of the girl in his hands laughed as though he'd just said the funniest joke in the world.

"Aaaaall righty, then," he continued. "With your hands all tied up now, allow me to make a sug—"

Before Franklin could finish, someone in the audience launched offensive magic that exploded right next to him.

"Huh?!" I exclaimed and looked to the spell's source, where I saw a Master doing a fist pump.

"Is he an idiot?!" Marie shouted my thoughts before I could.

The guy has the princess right next to him! You can't be so careless about this!

"Ooookaaaayyy," Franklin said as he appeared out of the smoke caused by the explosion. Both he and the princess were unharmed, meaning that he'd done something to prevent the effects of that attack.

"Do you fail to grasp the situation?" he asked the attacker. "I have taken the princess as a hostage. I am also talking... trying to talk... And then there's youuuu! Why did you attack me?! Why? I just can't understand it! Are you an idiot? Or a hothead? Or perhaps both?"

Franklin roughly scratched his head, clearly none too pleased with the situation.

"Hotheaded idiots like you should just cool off," he said, causing a blue liquid to gush out beneath the Master that had attacked him.

The blue liquid, the Slime, instantly surrounded the Master. "Hhh ————————"

It created a scene that was downright hellish.

A moment after he got consumed, both his skin and equipment melted, becoming indistinguishable from each other. He screamed, but the blue Slime's body reduced his voice to bubbles that didn't even make it outside. If that had been the extent of it, this Slime would've been much like the carnivorous slime from that one horror movie. However, it had other qualities.

Specifically, its surroundings were freezing.

Not only did it melt anything inside it — it also spread damaging frost to its surroundings.

“Say hello to my little Oxygen Slime, working title: Destroyer,” said Franklin. “Handmade by yours truly, he’s among the better ones I’ve created recently, if I say so myself.”

The tone he had while presenting the Oxygen Slime was much like that of someone submitting a cake to a cookery contest. Yet, naturally, it was nothing that hearty. The Oxygen Slime was consuming, melting, and freezing the spectators unfortunate enough to be around it. Soon enough, one of them released a surge of fire towards it.

“Good job, dum-dum,” muttered Franklin as the blaze hit the Slime and caused a large explosion.

First frost, now flame — a sizeable part of the audience seating was engulfed in a blue inferno.

“Come on now. I know that the go-to response to Slimes is fire, but I didn’t expect to see some brainlets here actually go with that. Were you even listening to me? I called it an ‘Oxygen Slime.’ Do you even know what ‘oxygen’ is? I hope for everyone’s safety that your stupid, liquid oxygen-lighting ass is forbidden from participating in experiments during science class.”

Liquid oxygen — a substance acquired by condensing oxygen gas in the extremely low temperature of minus 182.96 Celsius. It was a highly hazardous, volatile substance that had a great enough oxidation potential to see it used as rocket fuel.

“All of that blue is actually liquid oxygen...” I muttered.

“I remember having to mess with it in a chemistry class,” said Shu.

I had similar recollections. We had done experiments where we had to cool plastic bags full of oxygen using liquid nitrogen.

“By the way, there’s no point in lighting him even when you’re prepared for the explosion,” added Franklin. “Blow him up, and my boy Destroyer instantly regenerates using the oxygen in the air.” Sure enough, at the center of the explosion, there was the Oxygen Slime, quickly restoring itself until it regained its original size.

A creature that’s corrosive, indestructible, and explosive... Likely among the worst monsters you could face, I thought as I noticed something.

The Masters that had died because of it had become particles and vanished. There were no corpses to be seen within the reach of the explosion.

No tians got caught up in it, it seems. What a silver lining.

"Anyway, this brainlet interference derailed us a bit, but I think I'm free to speak my demands now, yeah? Unless anyone else wants to try and play hero," he said while standing on the barrier, looking fully confident that no one would get in his way.

"Let's play a game!" he shouted as he procured a strange switch and held it in his hand.

"BEEP," he said as he pressed it, making another Oxygen Slime pop out in another part of the audience.

Thankfully, unlike the first time, no one got caught up in it, but its appearance alone was enough to make the spectators there panic and start running away from it.

"That might've been enough for you to understand, but this switch is linked to the gadgets I set. As for what they do... they release the monsters I've prepared, like my Destroyers here. One press releases one monster at random," he said, making most of the audience hastily get up and try to leave, but his words didn't end there. "By the way, even if I don't press it, all of them will be released in about an hour, and I have these gadgets placed all over Gideon."

"What?!" I heard Count Gideon sound his shock from his noble seating. It was only natural, for the town he ruled had become a target for monster terrorism.

Not only that, given his willingness to terrify the audience to the point of madness and to do such terrorism, it was quite obvious that Franklin didn't care about any potential tian casualties.

"There are two ways to stop this," Franklin said with an extremely pleased smile on his face. "Either destroy this switch or give me the death penalty. That would stop the gadgets and make all the released monsters disappear. Simple, isn't it?"

Defeating him here and now would end it all, but...

"...Strange," I muttered. "Why is he...?"

Before I could voice my question...

"Oh yeah, this has nothing to do with the monsters, but I'm taking your little princess, okay? Thanks." Franklin took the unconscious princess into his hands. "Stop the monsters and save the princess!" he shouted. "Basic enough, is it not? Do your best, O Masters of the kingdom! That would be all, then! Adieu!”

Then Franklin once again used Castling to disappear somewhere, princess in hand.

A moment later, the venue was mired in chaos and enraged roars.

Some panicked, others screamed, others moved aimlessly in confusion. I could see some Masters dashing out of the arena in an attempt to hunt down Franklin, while some went to get rid of the two Oxygen Slimes here.

The ones who took to action shared a single sentiment — rage against Franklin, who’d started this incident and ruined tonight’s event. I was no different in that regard.

“This goddamn son of a...!” I sputtered.

In Franklin’s eyes, this was probably nothing but a game. Well, yes, Infinite Dendrogram was exactly that — a game.

However, even here, there were lines that shouldn’t be crossed, and he was getting really close to doing it.

“Yeah, I know exactly what you mean,” said Shu while nodding. “Riddle me this, though: why does he see it necessary to announce this little game of his?”

That was the same thing I was wondering about. He claimed to have set gadgets with Oxygen Slimes and other monsters all over the arena and the rest of the city.

That meant that his act of terrorism was 100% prepared and that he could start it any time he wanted, and yet...

“Terrorism and kidnappings are usually done without any prior notice,” said Shu. “Yet he went out of his way to announce it to this giant audience. Do you know what that means?”

“Well...” I said. From his mannerisms, it was obvious that Franklin was enjoying this. However, I felt that something was off... that there was more to it than it seemed.

His announcement seemed to be much like the one Xunyu had made before the start of The Clash of the Superiors. It appeared to have a hidden intention, but I couldn’t quite put my finger on what it was.

“This is just my conjecture.” Rook joined our conversation. “But I think the goal behind his announcement is to make it seem like it’s possible to prevent it and then have us fail.”

“But why?” I asked.

“It’s likely that he—”

Before Rook could finish his words, we heard sounds of confusion coming not from the audience, but from outside our box — from the lobby. Listening carefully, I could make out some people saying something about a “barrier” and that they “couldn’t leave.”

“Let’s go to the lobby,” said Shu.

“...Yeah!” I nodded. Rook, Nemesis, Babi, and I all left our box. That was when I realized that Marie, who had been with us just a moment ago, had disappeared somewhere.

In the lobby, we saw nearly a hundred Masters trying to get outside the arena. They certainly weren’t the main issue here, for there was a barrier that separated the arena and the city, preventing any of them from leaving.

“Isn’t that just like the barrier used in the arena?” I asked. “Did he actually...?”

“It appears that he did,” nodded Nemesis.

So, besides the one that shrouded only the stage, there was also a barrier that covered the entire arena.

Franklin had taken control of it, and he had used it to prevent us, the Masters, from leaving the arena and getting in the way of his game.

“Damn it! What the hell?!” someone shouted.

“Why is a single player able to mess with the system?!” someone else yelled.

“Let us out!”

The Masters gathered here tried to leave, but alas, their efforts were in vain.

“I had a bad feeling when he shut out Figaro and Xunyu, but it looks like Franklin got total control over the barriers here,” said Shu.

Can a player really...? Oh, wait, I realized.

“The barrier system is run by nothing but some ancient technology, after all,” Shu continued. “It always has to be activated manually, too. That makes it possible for even us Masters to influence it and force it to do things like this, it seems.”

“It appears so,” said Rook. “And he started this game exactly because he’s capable of this. It makes his victory absolute and the defeat of the kingdom’s Masters unavoidable.”

If we didn’t stop the terrorism he had so loudly announced, it would mean that the Masters gathered here in Gideon had lost the game.

...All right, this is really bad, I thought.

"Let's use brute force!" shouted one of the Masters. "Lots of focused high-rank skills should be enough to break it!"

Many were quick to join him. He wasn't wrong. After all, both Xunyu and Figaro had been able to open holes in the ceiling of the barrier shrouding their fight. If enough power was applied, it shouldn't have been impossible to break it.

Soon enough, the attacks of several dozens of Masters hit the barrier.

Though it was clearly tougher than the ceiling part broken by Xunyu and Figaro, it became visibly thinner. If these attacks continued, the barrier could momentarily break and allow us to go outside.

As most in the lobby turned hopeful, the sound of an explosion somewhere in the arena reached our ears. Not only that, but there were some destructive sounds coming from certain parts of the city, as well.

When the Masters here became puzzled about what they were hearing, an unpleasant laugh rang out around us.

"AH HA HA! Looks like we have some silly gooses trying to break the barrier!"

Shortly after we looked around and tried to find the source of the voice, we found a permeable Franklin — his hologram.

"Greetings, ladies and gents. Sure hasn't been long, has it?" he said. "Oh, what you're seeing is our clan's latest product. Seems useful, no? It costs 8,000,000 lir. A bit heavy on the wallet, but we're selling these once the war is done. Drop by and get one if you feel like it."

He presented his product and its price in a manner that was both courteous and mocking.

"Anyway, about this barrier... Having you all just get fired up and break it would've annoyed me, so I put a bit of a limit on it. A single attack makes one random gadget release its monster, and if you manage to break it completely, all of them will be released before the time limit. Oh, the same applies for the barrier on the stage, by the way."

His words made the Masters in the lobby freeze in their tracks.

"Oh no, do carry on if you feel like it," he said. "Though I can't begin to care about any casualties that'd cause! Lol!"

"Damn it!" one Master shouted as he released an offensive skill towards the permeable Franklin.

Naturally, with that Franklin being just a hologram, he came out completely unhurt. However, the attack seemed to have broken the device projecting it, making his grinning mug disappear from sight. Still, whether the hologram was here or not, we could no longer rely on brute force, leaving us with nothing we could do.

“This is bad,” said Rook. “At this rate, the kingdom’s Masters will be completely defeated.”

“So what?” asked Babi. “If he wins, he will only brag about it and that’s it, right?”

“No, Babi.” Rook shook his head. “Well, it’s true that, to us Masters, it would be nothing but a meaningless defeat. However, Infinite Dendrogram has other sentient beings, too.”

The tians.

To them, the results of this incident might have a completely different meaning.

“I see how it is,” said Nemesis with a grave tone, clearly understanding exactly what Rook wanted to say. “At this rate, the kingdom will lose before the second war even begins.”

“Yes.” He nodded.

◆◆◆

The City of Duels, Gideon

There was something flying over Gideon, a mere hundred metels above ground. It was a single monster.

Strangely enough, its stomach and sides both seemed to melt into the night sky, making it extremely difficult to spot with the naked eye. However, its back was covered in fur with a texture reminiscent of Persian carpets, and two people were sitting on it.

One of them was Giga Professor Mr. Franklin, the one who’d created the monster and named it “Night Lounge.” The other was the person he’d kidnapped: Elizabeth, the second princess of the Kingdom of Altar.

Having regained her consciousness right after getting put on the Night Lounge, the girl was looking at Franklin. It wasn’t a hateful glare, but a puzzled stare.

“Why did you kidnap me?” she voiced her confusion.

“Oh? Does a person affiliated with the imperium, such as yours truly, really need a reason to kidnap this country’s royalty?” he asked in response.

“That is not what I meant.” Elizabeth shook her head and faced him before asking. “Why are you not killing me, like you did my father?”

“Hmm. For someone who’s so clearly aware of that fact, you certainly are composed.”

“May I have an answer?”

“Oh, right. That’s ’cause I was told not to kill ya. Not like I would’ve done it if I wasn’t. Anyway, I’ll be cordial with you, so do calm down. Want some candy?”

“No.”

“Psh, typical.” Clearly not bothered by her harsh response to his offer, Franklin began wiping his glasses and continued talking. “If our countries peacefully merge, you’ll be able to return to the royal capital, safe and sound. So, again, there’s no need for you to worry.”

“And what if peace doesn’t happen?” she asked.

“You’ll be returning to a flattened wasteland. After all, if peace isn’t an option, we’re having an all-out war,” he said as he put his glasses back on again. “Well, if things go according to that lunatic’s... His Majesty’s plans, you’ll be perfectly fine. I don’t think he wants to be hated by his potential sister-in-law or the one who’d be his empress.”

“What do you mean?” she asked.

“‘What,’ indeed? Well, let’s just say that your father was in the way, while you are not. Leave it at that.” He cut the subject short, showing absolutely no intention to emphasize.

“Then let me ask you something else,” said the princess. “Why are you attacking Gideon?”

Though the empty air around them was silent, screams and sounds of destruction could be heard coming from the ground beneath. Franklin’s pawns and the monsters that had already been released were already causing chaos in the city. She asked merely because she wished to know the reason behind such carnage and despair.

In response, Franklin formed an unpleasant grin.

“This is a side show to celebrate the end of the event we call ‘war’!” he shouted while spinning around the Night Lounge and making exaggerated arm movements. “It’s both a game and an initiation!”

“‘Initiation’?” she repeated.

“The strongest knight, the greatest sage, and the kindly, fatherly king have all died. The people are leaving. Despair is all around. There’s no future to be had here, for the kingdom is already in checkmate — everyone knows this.” Franklin brought his face so close to hers that it seemed as though he was about to touch her eyes with his tongue. “Tell me, then. Why do you think the kingdom hasn’t given up yet?”

Shocked, Elizabeth slightly backed away as Franklin made a pleased grin.

“That’s because you have your Masters.”

He lightly tapped Night Lounge’s back with the tip of his nail.

“Everyone thinks that the kingdom lost the war because most of the people on the rankings didn’t participate.”

Slowly, but surely, the joy in his tone faded until he was speaking with no emotion in his voice.

“That’s not exactly wrong. We won so easily because they weren’t there to stop us.”

He sighed, shook his head, and turned his back to Elizabeth.

“Still, you’ve gotta know when to give up. ‘We’ll win if the Masters participate in the next war,’ they say. ‘The kingdom is still undefeated,’ they proclaim. It’s a real pain in the ass. War isn’t free, you know?”

His voice was now thick with frustration.

“This Clash of the Superiors thing is the ultimate example of this. It’s just a huge ‘We can do it’ done by demonstrating the power of the kingdom’s Superiors! It’s a big old dick-measuring contest and it PISSES! ME! OFF!”

He spouted that while looking at the central arena, which became more distant by the second.

“If, by some freak accident, this country’s Superiors all participate in the next war, it’s entirely possible that the situation will do a complete 180. Hell, we might even end up completely defeated.”

That unpleasant fact turned his expression bitter, but that face was soon replaced by a maddened grin.

“That’s why, before anything troublesome happens, I came here to break this country’s spirit.”

Franklin’s expression was that of a hellish jester, and it seemed to take a toll on the sanity of anyone merely looking at it.

“Tell me, if the kingdom’s Masters just sit around and twiddle their thumbs while a city gets destroyed and a princess gets kidnapped,” he said as his grin became even wider, “would this country’s tians still have any hope left for their Masters? Would they still have the willpower to resist?”

His expression still the same, he covered his face with both of his hands.

“The kingdom’s liveliest city... The city with most of the kingdom’s fighting power... The kingdom’s strongest Over Gladiator...”

Then, as if praising something, he raised his hands to the sky and laughed out loud.

“This is the night of despair! This is when all the myths surrounding this city die!”

The laughter of the one putting Gideon in peril resounded throughout the city’s skies.

“Really?” said a certain little girl with a voice that was easily drowned out by the laughter. “I do not believe you’re right.”

Elizabeth, having solid memories of a Master she’d spent the whole previous day with, was still hopeful.

She said quietly, “I believe that the kingdom’s Masters... are people we can rely on.”

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

“Brother Bear,” spoke Nemesis. “How strong, do you think, are the kingdom’s forces outside of the arena?”

“That would be the Royal Guard tasked with protecting the princess, Gideon’s own knight order, and the weirdo Masters that didn’t come to watch The Clash of the Superiors.”

It wasn’t like the Masters here in the arena were the only ones in the city. The people outside should’ve been able to do something about this, too, but...

“But any self-respecting battle-oriented Master came to see today’s match,” Shu continued. “The only such Masters who didn’t are the ones who couldn’t get tickets. However, that mostly happens due to monetary issues or lack of knowledge of the right people, both of which are solved naturally if you're strong. Meaning that the Masters outside the arena tonight aren't exactly the strongest."

That was likely one of the reasons why Franklin picked this night — the one with The Clash of the Superiors — to seal the kingdom's Masters inside the arena.

"There might be some tough guys who didn't come to see the fight just because, but I bet that Franklin thought of a counter to them, too," Shu added as he used his bear chin to point to the plaza outside the central arena.

I had no idea how long they'd been there, but there was a number of Masters and monsters in the plaza. They clearly had no intention of doing anything about the city's chaos, making it pretty obvious that they were preparing to attack anyone leaving the arena.

"Franklin's people, surely," said Shu. "With those guys there and the monsters messing the city up, getting to and defeating Franklin himself will be no small task."

"Gh..." I grumbled. There was absolutely nothing we could do about this situation. More importantly... with this barrier sealing us here, not even I could do anything. "If only..."

If only we... the Masters here in the arena... could get out and participate in the fight, our chances would go up.

"If this barrier wasn't here, I..."

I slowly extended my hand towards it, holding back the urge to punch it.

With any offense on it being a trigger that released monsters, attacking it wasn't an option. However, unable to contain my frustration, I reached to touch the barrier... and my fingers went right through it.

"...Eh?" I sounded my confusion as the nearly hundred Masters in the lobby started making noise about it.

"He... He went through!"

"What the hell?! I couldn't do it!"

"Did the barrier disappear...? OW! It's still here!"

"H-Hey! Does your Embryo have some barrier-related skills?!"

"N-None that I'm aware of..." I was more confused here than anyone else. There was no way I could answer that.

"Ray," my brother addressed me.

Strangely enough, him speaking made the entire lobby instantly turn completely silent.

I heard someone whisper things like “Oh, it’s that costume guy,” “So kid mountain also came to watch the fight,” and “The bear wasn’t an NPC?” My brother seemed to be strangely famous.

However, none of that mattered right now. What mattered was that, despite him wearing the suit, I could tell that he was looking directly at me.

“What’s your total level?” he asked.

“Total level?” Puzzled, I repeated those words before answering. “It’s 41.” My answer made the Masters in the lobby realize something and talk amongst themselves. Meanwhile, my brother...

“Khah... HAHAHAH!”

...laughed out loud.

“Of course!” he cried. “This is an arena’s barrier, after all! Of course you can pass it!”

“Bro, I’m completely lost here.”

“Oh, it’s really simple. Arena barriers prevent people going in and out of them. Otherwise, they’d be completely meaningless and make spectating duels into a life-threatening activity. However, that means absolutely nothing to people with a total level of 50 or below, who can’t participate in duels because they pass through the barriers.”

“...Oh!”

Yeah, well, I looked it up and found out that you can only participate when your total level is 51 or above.

Those were my own words from yesterday. People with a total level of 50 or below couldn’t participate in duels because they could freely pass through the barriers.

“I see. That means that...!” Rook, me, and the other few low-level Masters here could leave the arena and go help the people outside.

“Search the arena and get the help of all the Masters level 50 or below!” my brother called.

“Supporters with levels 51 and above, hit the newbies with buffs and autoheals! The rest of you, go take care of the monsters messing up the arena!”

“All right! We now have a way to indirectly slap that shitty lab coat!”

Once aware of this opportunity, the veteran Masters were quick to react, becoming battle-ready in but a moment.

"You are aware of what this means, yes?" Rook asked Shu.

"Yeah," Shu nodded. "As one who can control the barrier, Franklin is surely aware of this loophole. However, he didn't say anything along the lines of 'I'll release the monsters if you leave the arena,' meaning that he left this loophole on purpose."

It was pretty obvious that Franklin was a huge bastard and had a high degree of thoroughness in his plans, meaning that this loophole was here for a reason.

Even so...

"Ray."

"...Bro."

Before I'd realized it, he was standing right next to me. He was looking at me with seriousness that was obvious even though he wore a bear suit.

"We have a loophole. However, it's extremely likely that it's one of his traps, and even if it isn't, the things awaiting you are skilled players, an army of monsters, and he himself — a Superior."

"Mh..."

Franklin was a Superior — the same tier as Figaro and Xunyu, both of which had displayed immense power in their duel. That meant that I was about to get into a predicament that would surpass my deadly battles against UBMs, and even the time when the Superior Killer had given me the death penalty. I might be heading straight to my second death penalty. In fact, that would be the natural outcome.

But still, I...

"There's no doubt that you're gonna die... Will you still go?" my brother asked.

"Let me ask you something, instead, bro. Right before my eyes, a girl was kidnapped and a town is being destroyed. Letting it happen would give me the worst aftertaste in my mouth. Do you think I'm a sensible enough individual to give up and do nothing?"

I happened to be someone who didn't know when to quit. I'd keep reaching for the light for as long as I could.

"I knew you'd say that." Shu chuckled and gave me something. It was an item reminiscent of another time — a Dragonscale Ward. "I'm out of Brooches. This is all I can give you... Take it."

“Sure. Thanks.”

“I’ll join you when the barrier’s dealt with,” he said. “You can overdo stuff all you want, but make sure you’re alive by the time I come. And I will come — you can count on that.”

“Yeah. I’ll be relying on you... Shu.”

Not too long after that, the preparations were done. Rook and I were surrounded by other Masters who’d yet to hit level 51. They amounted to a total of twenty-two. Though relatively powerless and aware of it, all of them were Masters who’d volunteered to help end Franklin’s plans. That display of will alone made them seem reliable.

And to the right of me, I had the companion I relied on more than anyone else.

“Let’s go, Ray,” said Nemesis.

“Yeah,” I replied as I took her hand, after which she transformed into the familiar black greatsword.

“Time for a retaliation!”

Then the twenty-four of us newbies all charged towards the board of the game set up by that foul Superior.

Let the quest begin!

Chapter Two: Irregular Newbies

The central arena's lobby, ten minutes before the newbies went out to battle

In the central arena, the veteran Masters were gathering and preparing the newbies that would leave the barrier and go to battle. At the same time, they were using their Embryos and skills to gather information regarding the forces they'd face.

Rook, being one of those who would head to battle, made his own preparations.

"So we're about to fight other players..." he muttered.

"Yep," said Babi.

The battle he was about to partake in wasn't just a sparring match under the protection of the arena barriers.

Failure would mean getting the death penalty and being removed from the ranks of those struggling against the chaos in the city.

If that happened, Rook would be unable to help Ray, which was something he couldn't tolerate.

"At least we have some experience in this," he muttered.

Fighting the player killers outside the arena wouldn't be Rook's first PvP experience. He was fortunate enough to have a sparring match just before this incident began.

Closing his eyes, Rook ran his mind over how it had gone.

◇◇◇

It happened at noon, on the same day that Rook realized Marie's true identity.

"This 'Superior Killer' that Ray often talks about... It's you, isn't it?" he whispered into Marie's ear right after they and Ray went separate ways.

"H-How did you know...?! I-I mean, no no no no! I'm not!" she burst out, the bewilderment in her voice all too apparent. Normally, she would have been able to hide it relatively well, but the surprise factor had made her blurt out the equivalent of "Yes, that's true," making Rook turn absolutely certain of his conjecture.

"O-Oh, come now, I-I'm definitely not the man known as the Superior Killer." Marie still tried to salvage it.

"Then allow me to present you with the circumstantial evidence I've gathered," said Rook.

"Eh?"

Thus, he began listing the reasons why he had come to this conclusion.

First: despite the Superior Killer's age and gender being unknown, Marie often referred to him as a man. To Rook, it seemed like an attempt to give the entity a different image than her own.

Second: her behavior when talking to Ray about the Superior Killer's thoughts tended to be different from usual.

Third: during the battle against Gardranda, Rook had been high above the ground, but still hadn't been able to see a thing of what was happening within the dense miasma below. Yet Marie, who had also been outside it, had stated with absolute certainty that "The Superior Killer shot Gardranda's left shoulder."

Fourth: despite Marie having played for a year in real life, which was three years in here, she had a total level lower than newbies such as Rook and Ray, which led him to believe that she was concealing her true powers.

Fifth: there was a comic with a journalist/professional killer protagonist bearing a great deal of resemblance to Marie, and from what he'd read of it, even their mannerisms were highly alike.

That was when Marie raised her hands, looking absolutely defeated.

"Heh. Heh heh heh," she chuckled in self-derision. "I give up. This is the first time someone has realized it before I revealed it myself."

"You're not exactly the best at concealing your identity, so I'm quite sure I'm not the only one who connected the dots," said Rook.

"Ghh!" Marie's face contorted with pain. She'd had confidence that she was doing a decent job of hiding what she really was, so Rook's words did a good amount of emotional damage to her.

"Also, you use an avatar that has both the name and appearance of a character that's both a journalist and a professional killer, so it's completely obvious to anyone who has read the work," added Rook.

"I'm fully aware of that, but it's part of my identity," she replied. Marie was basing her Infinite Dendrogram character on Marie from her manga, so it was a given for her to be a "Marie Adler" that acted as both a Journalist and a professional killer.

"Anyway, we know your identity now," said Rook. "However, it doesn't look like Ray and Nemesis are aware of it."

"I'd probably feel like dying if they found out," Marie said.

"You're the one who gave them their only death penalty, right? Normally, I'd have a thing or two to say about that, but it doesn't seem like you have any malice towards them right now, so I'm content with being silent about that."

"Thank you."

"That aside, can I make a little request?"

Marie said nothing as she made a mental note of the fact that the flow of the conversation made his question seem much like blackmail.

Rook might actually have a sadistic side to him, she thought.

"A request, you say?" she muttered. "A-Are you about to have me do something inappropriate and—"

"Nothing about that would remotely interest me."

"Okay, kid... No need to cut me that deep... But what do you want of me, then?"

"I want you to have a mock battle against me."

"A mock battle?" she asked.

"As I said before, I want to learn more about battles against people. And I figured that facing a hardened player killer such as yourself would be a good initiation."

"Well, I don't really mind, but why the interest in such battles?" Marie asked.

"That's a secret," he answered with a smile on his face.

His expression was so beautiful it was angelic, but once she considered the conversation so far, Marie found it a bit scary.

And so, the two made their way towards the sixth arena, located in the duel city’s sixth district. Though such places were normally bustling due to various events and betting matches, all the standard arenas were nearly barren today.

During low activity times such as these, it was possible to rent the arenas for barrier-protected mock battles. Unlike in normal matches, it was also possible to make the barriers opaque, and Marie was truly thankful that she wouldn’t have to fight while minding any potential observers.

“You’re still below level 51, right, Rook?” she asked.

“Yes, I’m level 48,” he answered.

“Then don’t go near the barrier. You’ll slip right through.”

The barrier system allowed those of level 50 or below to pass through freely. Though those players benefited from the barrier’s restorative qualities, it didn’t wall them off inside. That was the reason why they couldn’t partake in official arena battles.

“The preparations are done,” said Marie as she set the block they’d rented into opaque mode.

With Babi at his side and Liz taking the form of his equipment, Rook summoned Marilyn and Audrey, making him fully ready for battle.

“We have plans for the evening, so let’s not go above ten matches,” she added. “Also, we might be sparring, but the gap in our power is still an issue, so I won’t be using my special rewards.”

To her mind, fighting while using special rewards like the Palsy Stingblade would cause Rook to lose the ten matches without giving him a chance to learn anything. Marie would use her Embryo, but she would avoid using its ultimate skill for exactly the same reason.

“Compared to many, my Embryo isn’t particularly tricky, so I’m confident it’s good for such practice,” she said. “Are you ready?”

“Yes!” Rook answered with vigor.

“Then let’s begin... Arc-en-Ciel.” Marie summoned a revolver-shaped Embryo into her left hand, and held a blackened dagger in her right. The Embryo was Arc-en-Ciel, Type Legion, while the dagger was named Night Pain.

In response to Marie readying her weapons, Rook sent Marilyn and Audrey after her while Babi vigilantly eyed her for an opportunity to use a skill. Rook himself stood at the rear, protected by Liz, and used the Charm skill.

This was the battle style they'd used many times during the hunting they'd done after Liz had joined.

He was clearly planning to avoid using trickery and go all out on the very first match.

"Very well, then I won't do any tricks, either," said Marie as she swung her right hand, causing the break-action revolver to unload its chambers.

That action made Rook look puzzled. And not without reason, for she had emptied a gun that had yet to shoot a single bullet. However, even though it had the shape of a revolver, Arc-en-Ciel was more Embryo than gun, and what it shot weren't bullets.

"Black Homing, Red Burst, Blue Spread." Marie's words made three types of bullets — no, transparent containers filled with paint — enter the revolving chambers of her Embryo. Once again, she swung her hand again to give it the shape of a gun...

"Fire."

...and pulled the trigger.

"GYAGYAGYAGYAGYAH!"

A moment later, several dozens of bullet creatures escaped Arc-en-Ciel's muzzle. Bending their expected trajectory, all of them rushed to overwhelm Audrey. She flew in an attempt to evade them, but all the creatures followed after her.

There was little difference between Audrey's and the creatures' speeds...

"KIEEEEE?!"

...so, when she soon reached the top of the barrier, they all caught up with her and exploded upon impact.

Reduced to smithereens, Audrey's corpse became particles of light and vanished.

"VRAAAAAGH!"

Right after that attack, Marilyn directed her horns at Marie and charged at her with all she had. In real life, this would be the equivalent of a 10 ton truck going at full speed...

"Too slow."

...but to Marie — whose high AGI allowed her to break the sound barrier — Marilyn was barely even moving.

She dodged the horns right before the impact and unloaded the chambers yet again before wordlessly filling them with two types: Red Burst and Green Piercing. Then — slowly from her own perspective and immensely quickly from Marilyn's — Marie put the muzzle against Marilyn's shell and fired.

The bullet creature imbued with great piercing ability penetrated the tough material with little effort before exploding within Marilyn's insides, quickly killing her and making her become particles of light.

Next up, Babi, Marie thought as she looked around, but she couldn't see the succubus anywhere. A moment later, without even turning around, Marie swung Night Pain behind her.

"...Ah."

That action caused the slashed space to release a gush of blood before becoming Babi, clearly on the verge of death.

Since she was able to use Drain Learning to absorb the skills of other monsters, Babi had received the Optic Camouflage skill from a Lesser Chameleon Basilisk, a creature inhabiting a forest area near Nex Plains. However, the hiding ability of that skill meant nothing to the Death Shadow — the apex of stealth.

Babi disappeared, leaving only Rook and Liz, who was still acting as his equipment.

With Arc-en-Ciel's bullet type still set to "penetrating and bursting," Marie fired at him.

Marie had intended to end the fight with that one shot, but unexpectedly, the bullet creature shifted its trajectory away from Rook and exploded after hitting the barrier.

Upon focusing on him, Marie realized that a part of his coat had become curved.

Rook had already noticed the bullets' penetrative abilities, and he'd chosen to turn them away instead of stopping them.

"I see," she said, astonished that the boy could notice that much from just one shot.

He also seems to know that I need to do the unloading motion to change modes, she realized. Rook's observational ability made chills go down Marie's spine.

"You won't protect against this, though," she said as she unloaded Arc-en-Ciel, loaded it with only Green Piercing, and fired once more.

The piercing bullet creatures that escaped the muzzle had far greater penetrative power than the ones mixed with bursting, allowing them to easily overcome the curved defense, pierce Rook, and kill him.

The primary feature of Marie Adler’s Arc-en-Ciel was the creation and firing of bullet creatures. The qualities of the bullet creatures fired depended on the paint used. There were six types of paint, and the ones she’d used in this battle were black for homing, red for bursts, blue for spread, and green for piercing. Besides these, there were also white for paralysis and silver for flash.

Loading the six chambers with multiple paints gave the bullet creatures more abilities, but lowered the potency of each separate one. That made Arc-en-Ciel an Embryo that had to be used differently depending on the situation.

“And that’s how it works.” Marie ended her explanation.

“And how, exactly, is that ‘not tricky’?” asked Rook. By the end of the first fight, he had been shot to death, Babi had vanished, and Marilyn and Audrey had exploded, but they were now just standing there — all alive and well, because even monsters were protected by the barriers.

“Hey now, I said ‘compared to many,’ and I stand by that,” replied Marie. “As far as sixth form Embryos go, Arc-en-Ciel’s very straightforward. By the time they start getting their ultimate skills, Embryos can become a bit... creative. For example, there’s an Embryo that ‘Turns people within a set boundary into toddlers.’ Then there’s one that ‘Forcibly removes people’s equipment and makes them naked’ and one that ‘Turns people into creatures that they hate.’ Mine’s quite modest in comparison, no? By the way, the ones I just named all belong to Legendaria’s Superiors.”

Masters often described Legendaria as the “Land of Perverts,” and their strongest certainly lived up to that reputation.

After that, Rook and Marie went on to have eight more matches, all of which were won by Marie.

The second and third battles were basically replays of the first. On the fourth, Rook’s movements and actions had gotten better, so Marie started using the Shadow Clone Technique. Come the fifth battle, he was moving in a way to compensate for that, so she took to using Art of Hiding as well.

After that, it was a one-sided show of Marie combining her Embryo and job skills to defeat Rook.

By the latter half, Marie was putting more effort into their fights than she had during yesterday's battle against Elizabeth's would-be assassins, The Reaper's Pinky.

With Marie being a Superior Job wielding an Embryo in its sixth form, the difference in power between her and Rook was great.

The onmitsu grouping's Death Shadow job had high base resistances to debuffs, not to mention that she was equipped with items that increased them further still, rendering Rook's Charm useless and giving him next to no chance of victory. However, there was one thing that greatly astonished her — specifically, Babi.

Optic Camouflage wasn't the only skill she'd gained through Drain Learning. She also had skills such as Monstrous Strength, Petrifying Breath, and even increased resistances to fire and poison.

That certainly gave Rook a wide array of tactics, but alas, it wasn't enough for him to land even a single hit on Marie.

This makes me question if he's actually learning anything, she thought.

Since she'd experienced many PvP battles, this sparring certainly wasn't the first time she'd encountered and prevailed against tactics meant to kill her. The time when she'd gotten attacked by what was most likely the King of Destruction was no exception, for she'd survived that onslaught. That made it quite obvious that lukewarm tactics were ineffective against Marie.

Battles against someone more or less equal to yourself always teach you something new, she thought. However, when fighting opponents significantly stronger than you, it's all or nothing — either you leave without any new knowledge or mature a lot. I wonder which one applies to Rook...

Such worries went through Marie's head as they prepared for their tenth and final match.

"This will be our last battle, right?" asked Rook.

"Yes." Marie nodded. "Are you ready?"

"...Just one more minute, please." Rook was breathing heavily, making it evident that he was drained. The barrier restored all the stats to what they were before the battles, but they had no effect on mental fatigue. It was only natural for someone to get tired after being killed nine times in a row.

“There, I’m okay now,” he said as he summoned his monsters.

Despite his fatigue, Rook was ready to spar for the tenth and last time.

“Very well. Let’s begin,” Marie spoke as she activated both her Shadow Clone and Hiding techniques.

As her five clones appeared and assaulted Rook and his monsters, Marie herself hid and loaded Arc-en-Ciel. Her plan was to use the distraction created by her clones to load her Embryo with the most effective qualities and fire the bullet creatures at her targets. If all went well, that should end the battle, but...

“KIEEEEE!” Audrey sounded a call as she released an intense stream of flame. The fiery tongues reached across the entire area, thoroughly scorching it all. The blazes were vast, immense, and bright enough to obstruct Marie’s vision of the arena.

However, she’d seen this skill used in the previous battles, so she did exactly what she’d done the previous times. Marie slipped through the flames and aimed at the spaces between them, ready to fire bullet creatures in homing mode.

“...?” That was when she felt something was off.

It came not from beyond the fire, but from the base of her feet, as she stood in the place she’d reached after passing the flames. It was as though something was lying and waiting to ambush her here... and that “something” was a silver-colored, human-shaped creature.

“...!” Overwhelmed with questions, Marie was at a loss for words. How did this thing predict that I, the original, would move to this location? Why is it able to wait to ambush me while surrounded by blazing fire? What is “it,” anyway?

In an attempt to find the answers, she ran her mind through those questions. That created a momentary opening in her movements...

“Mithril Strain!” Rook shouted.

...and he and the silver creature took advantage of it with a skill.

Assaulted by a silver slash, Marie was in no state of mind to evade it. Barely being able to bend in a way to avoid the damage, Marie lost her left arm to the slash.

“■■■■■■■■■■ ■■■■■■■ — Arc-en-Ciel!” she shouted.

From point-blank range away from Rook, Marie hit him with her ultimate skill — the one she’d intended not to use.

In but an instant, Rook and his monsters alike were all evaporated.

With that, Marie won all ten of the battles. Besides the loss of her left arm in the last one, the result had been exactly what everyone would've expected. However, that single loss of limb made Marie feel like she was the one who'd lost.

At the start, Rook and his monsters had moved in a way not too different from before, but then he'd gone on to read her movements with terrifying precision and caught her off guard, giving him a chance to take her left arm. It was safe to say that, at that very moment, Rook had cornered Marie — a being far stronger than himself.

"Thank you for the practice matches!" Now that the fight was over, Rook lightly bowed his head, expressing sincere thanks.

"You're welcome," replied Marie. "You and your monsters aren't bad at all... In fact, considering your total playtime, you're nothing short of amazing. The way you use your skills and coordinate with your monsters is simply splendid. I was especially surprised by what you did last. Were you saving that tactic for the final battle, when you more or less understood the way I act?"

"Yes." Rook smiled. "I must say, you're very strong, Marie. Even nine battles weren't enough for me to become able to read your movements well enough. To be honest, I was going for your head with my last attack."

Oh, I see, she thought. He used the first nine battles to get a grasp of my movement patterns and then predict what I'd do in the last one. That aside, that bright smile of his certainly doesn't fit what he's saying. This boy might have the makings of a nonchalant brute. I'm kinda scared of what he'll become.

"Also, losing your arm didn't affect your movements at all," added Rook. "I expected that to create more openings."

"In high-level battles, losing limbs or organs is common, after all. It's something you get used to."

"I'll keep that in mind," he said. "Thank you very much for today."

"Did that help you much?"

"Yes! Very much!"

That makes losing an arm worth it, Marie thought. Still, he pushed me — a Superior Job — this far despite being a non-battle-oriented low-rank job. I'd already established that Ray, a newbie who's already killed two UBMs, was amazing, but Rook certainly isn't far behind him.

Having played for long, Marie knew enough Masters to be certain that these two were simply exceptional. And it wasn't because of their growth as players; they'd deviated from the norm right from the start. Marie was half-excited and half-scared trying to imagine what the two would become.

"I wonder which one of them is stronger," she muttered.

"Come again?" asked Rook.

"Oh, never mind. By the way, in the last battle, you used a skill you haven't used before, right? Oh, and I don't mean Mithril Strain." Discarding the question from her previous mutter, Marie brought up something that had been on her mind ever since the battle ended.

Rook had read her movements to ambush her, then used Liz to attack. Marie could understand that much, but she didn't see the process linking those two points.

She couldn't see why he'd been able to wait for the ambush while surrounded by searing flames. The silver-colored humanoid figure might've been the result of Liz covering his body, but that shouldn't have been enough to protect Rook from the heat. That feat required a considerable amount of fire resistance. Otherwise, he would've died from the flame before Marie even came close enough for the ambush. Due to that, Marie assumed that he'd used a skill that he didn't use before then.

"That was Union Jack!" Babi shouted with pride before Rook could give his answer.

"Union Jack...?" Marie raised an eyebrow.

"Yes." Rook nodded. "It's a unique skill Babi acquired when she reached her third form."

It seemed she'd gained that skill when she'd evolved during yesterday's hunting, and they'd kept it hidden until the tenth battle.

A skill they preserved for the very end... With all the preparation they did for it, it's obvious that it has a powerful effect, but... But Marie was unable to tell what kind of effect it had been. Most Embryo skills were based on the Embryo's ability characteristics. However, unlike that of Ray's Nemesis or Marie's Arc-en-Ciel, Babi's primary characteristic wasn't too clear. Due to that, Marie couldn't see the full picture behind Union Jack.

But, at the very least, she was able to tell that it was as terrifying as Rook's superhuman talents.

◇◆◇

“All right,” Rook said and opened his eyes, having ended the short recollection. At his side was Babi, looking right at him.

“Hey, Rook,” she said. “Were you remembering the practice battles from this afternoon?”

“Yes.” He nodded.

“Why’d you want to do them, anyway?”

“I guess you could say that I wanted to prepare.”

“For what?” she asked.

“This afternoon, Ray told us about his battle against a tian group called the ‘Gouz-Maise Gang,’ and, well, I think it must’ve been pretty hard for him. After all, Ray... he’s a gentle soul.”

“That’s true.” Babi nodded.

“However, he was faced with a situation where he absolutely had to overcome that mental hurdle and fight against people. That made me think that, sooner or later, I would have to do it, as well, so I figured that I needed to prepare a proper mindset for such battles. And, just as I expected, we’re about to fight people, meaning that the practice matches against Marie were absolutely worth it.”

“I don’t really get it, but if you’re gonna kill, then I will do it, too!” Babi declared.

While they were talking, the people around them were finishing up their preparations.

In the lobby, there was Ray, Rook, and a number of other newbies. However, the enemies outside were many, and they surpassed them in terms of both level and stats. Naturally, breaking through the enemies filling the plaza would be no small task.

“Okay,” muttered Rook as he remembered his battles against Marie. “The most important thing to keep in mind while fighting those stronger than you is to take advantage of their openings.”

Then he devised a certain plan and passed it over to his fellow newbies. With it, even they — no, especially they — would be able to take advantage of the enemies’ openings.

They all agreed to the plan and soon headed out of the arena.

◆◆◆

Duel city Gideon's central plaza

The central plaza expanding before the central arena was usually full of stalls, street performers, and hustle and bustle in general, making it one of the city's most popular attractions. Yet, despite it being the night of one of Gideon's greatest events, the stalls were all barren and the performers were absent.

Franklin's game had thrown the city into a state of absolute chaos. Naturally, the common folk had scattered from the plaza like flies, as far away from the core of the chaos, the central arena, as possible. But a certain group was there to replace them.

It was a gathering of about forty Masters and their tamed monsters or slaves. They were all prepared for battle, standing alert about anything that could leave through the entrance of the arena, ready to block the paths of anybody who tried.

The group certainly wasn't there to stop any of the monsters released in the arena from escaping to town. In fact, they were there to eliminate any Masters trying to curb the chaos enveloping Gideon.

The group were Franklin's pawns: the ones he'd referred to as "the betrayers" when having a phone talk with his sponsor, prime minister Vigoma. Just as their name said, they were the kingdom's Masters who wished to defect to the imperium.

Their reason was simple: profit. When wars happened and ended, there was a world of difference between the advantages gained by the victors and those gained by the losers.

Thus, due to the situation in the kingdom becoming worse, many Masters were switching to other countries. Among those were ones who wished to switch after doing something to improve their standing with Dryfe, both to avoid becoming a loser and to curry favor with the winning side.

The people in the plaza were exactly that — a group of Masters from the kingdom that Franklin had enticed with good conditions if they switched to Dryfe. He was having them participate in his plan as player killers.

"Heh heh. Looks like they realized that low level kiddies can get out," said a leather-clad traitor as he watched what was going on in the arena's lobby.

“Oh? And here I was beginning to think that we wouldn’t get to do anything,” replied a woman wearing priestly clothing.

“HYAHAAH! Time to shoot some fish in a barrel!” shouted a man with his hair in a pure-red mohawk and sunglasses over his eyes. Though the sunglasses and hair didn’t seem to fit it, the rest of his apparel made it clear that he was actually a mage of some sort.

The three with the highest levels among those that’d gathered in the central plaza.

Strong Swordsman, Ryzac.

Bishop, Myanna.

Pyromancer, Mohawk Red.

While most of the betrayers were somewhere around level 100, these three were over level 300. Also, perhaps due to them knowing each other for so long, they were acting like the leaders of the entire group.

However, they certainly weren’t the strongest betrayers in the kingdom.

There were two types of treacherous Masters. The first type had considerable power, while the second type wanted to switch because they were relatively weak. The former were tasked with handling the high-rank players that could potentially escape the arena, while the latter, weaker ones were positioned in the plaza to take care of the newbies.

The very fact that these three were here meant that Franklin didn’t consider them to be particularly strong.

“Well, time to do our job,” said Ryzac.

Though they certainly weren’t pleased with his assessment, they still considered themselves lucky. After all, the task they’ve been given was extremely easy. Logic itself dictated that low-rank jobs were weaker than high-rank jobs and that low-rank Embryos were weaker than high-rank ones. Everyone knew that a job where people had to face those weaker than themselves was simple.

“HYAHAAH! Here they come!” guffawed Mohawk Red.

The betrayers could see that the newbies in the lobby were done with their preparations.

There’s just over twenty of them... Yeah, we’ve won, Ryzac thought to himself and grinned.

They were above the newbies in both individual power and numbers, making failure absolutely unthinkable.

"Red, greet them with a little AOE spell," said Ryzac.

"HYAHAAH! Time to take out the trash!" replied Mohawk Red as he prepared an offensive spell, which was ready in just twenty seconds. It needn't be said that it had power no low-rank job could withstand.

They've probably got some buffs from the higher-rank players stuck in there, but that's never going to be enough to bring a low-rank to a high-rank's level, Ryzac thought confidently. Due to that, what was about to begin was going to be less of a battle and more of a one-sided extermination. Ryzac was absolutely certain of that.

And then he was proven wrong.

"What?" he raised an eyebrow. He'd expected the newbies to charge at them at full force. Instead, a mere one of those inside stuck his arm out through the barrier...

"Hellish Miasma, full power."

...and released an intense flow of dark purple smoke.

While the barrier prevented any of it from going into the arena, it spread throughout the entire central plaza, making about a fourth of the traitors lose their postures.

"Huh? Wh-What...?" Ryzac looked at his status summary and noticed that he had a debuff called "Intoxication."

He then looked at the status displays of his party and saw the same Intoxication debuff, along with two others: Poison and Weakness.

"G-Gas that gives three debuffs?!" Ryzac shouted in a panic. Luckily for him, he had accessories that protected him against Poison and Weakness, but that wasn't the main thing to consider in this situation. "Why is a low-rank newbie able to use an item like this?!"

His confusion was perfectly justified. After all, equipment had level limits. Skills that were able to apply three debuffs at once were the realm of high-rank jobs focusing on curses, so low-rank people should never be able to equip items that could do the equivalent. Even Ryzac and his buddies would have trouble getting and using such gear.

However, there was an exception.

When the equipment in question was an MVP special reward, it had properties that took after the UBM it was based on. Furthermore, MVPs could wear and use their special rewards regardless of level.

But of course, normally, low level players never became MVPs.

“Gheeh...”

“Hey! Drink your Elixirs!”

“Huh? B-But that’s such a waste...”

“You retard! If we fight in this state, even low-ranks could give us death penalties!”

The betrayers had lost their pace. With them being just a ragtag group of willing player killers, it wasn’t exactly reasonable to expect much coordination between them, but the unexpected turn of events made it even worse.

While most opted to drink Elixirs themselves, many of those with monsters and slaves under their command were too stingy to share and instead returned them back to the Jewel. Naturally, that reduced their numbers.

“Tch...!” Ryzac clicked his tongue in frustration.

Having more Infinite Dendrogram experience, the three with the highest levels didn’t hesitate to swig the Elixirs and remove the debuffs ailing them.

They sure got us with this one, he thought. I’m guessing those newbies got Elixirs from the high-rank players in there. They’re planning to take advantage of the buffs they got and take care of us while we’re suffering from the debuffs!

But Ryzac had no intention of letting that happen. Turning to Mohawk Red, he saw a giant sphere of fire that looked ready to be released hanging above the mage’s head.

All right! This will crush them the moment they leave! Ryzac thought as he felt something move within the smokescreen — from the direction of the arena’s entrance.

He was quick to realize that many people were leaving the barrier.

Ryzac instantly braced to face the newbies before realizing that something beyond his expectations was there, as well.

Wait... There’s something huge!

And so, breaking through the dark purple smokescreen came a dragon reminiscent of a heavy tank. A Tri-Horn Demi-Dragon, to be precise.

It was a Demi-Dragon class monster that had little in the way of unique skills, but came equipped with particularly high stats. Ryzac had defeated these before, but what mattered here wasn’t that, but the question of...

“Why does a low-rank have one of these?!”

Such a creature’s presence here was thoroughly unexpected.

As Ryzac considered that a high-rank might’ve lent it to some newbie...

“MHOOOOOO!”

...the Tri-Horn Demi-Dragon, buffed and strengthened by the Masters inside, charged with all the force it could muster. In its way were the betrayer Masters who’d yet to cure themselves of their debuffs.

“Red!” shouted Ryzac.

“Crimson Sph—” Following his buddy’s order, Mohawk Red prepared to launch the completed Crimson Sphere, the ultimate Pyromancer spell, towards the Demi-Dragon. However...

“Silence.” That clear voice came from the top of the Demi-Dragon, and was followed by the sound of someone snapping their fingers.

Once it resounded, Mohawk Red’s Crimson Sphere, which had been complete just a moment ago and had been meant to be the Demi-Dragon’s demise, vanished like mist in the wind. Then, with little resistance, the Demi-Dragon trampled the Masters who were too weak to retaliate due to the Intoxication and Weakness debuffs.

“Red! What the hell?!” roared Ryzac.

“That wasn’t me! Some guy canceled my magic just now...!”

After crushing the weakened Masters, the Demi-Dragon continued to ravage their ranks. That wasn’t all, either — a Demi-Dragon-class avian had appeared and joined the Tri-Horn in wreaking havoc. As the chaos and confusion among the betrayers grew, the newbies finally broke through the smokescreen and attacked them.

I misjudged their power and let them have the initiative, but we’re still stronger, and there are more of us! Ryzac thought, and he thought right.

Though they were equipped with unexpected items and had monsters common to relevant high-rank jobs, the difference in total power was far too obvious. When compared, the betrayers had far more than just double or triple the power. With a difference this great, there was little doubt that they would emerge victorious, and Ryzac was absolutely correct to think so.

“The low-rank Masters are here!”

“Gank ’em!”

A woman and a man among the betrayers brandished their weapons in preparation to attack the approaching newbies...

"Eh?"

"Ah?"

...but instead of attacking them, they attacked each other's vital spots.

The man's ax dug into the woman's shoulder, while her arrow pierced his throat.

And so, completely clueless as to what'd happened, they fell to their knees and were defeated by the newbies moments after.

"What the hell's... Huh?!" Ryzac found the answer to his question before he could even finish speaking.

His party's status display showed that they had the "Charm" debuff.

Charmed beings helped their enemies and killed their allies, making it one of the worst mental status effects in existence. And, due to it being mental, rather than disease-based, not even Elixirs could help protect against it.

The two who'd practically killed each other and Ryzac's party members weren't the only ones who were Charmed. Other Masters, their monsters, slaves... The Charm gradually continued to spread until more than half of the betrayers were fighting for the opposing side.

Indeed, it was hard to battle high-ranks while being low-rank. Emerging victorious while being weaker in both quality and quantity was truly difficult. So one simply had to borrow some forces.

From where? Why, from the opposing side, of course.

"Charm... CHARM?! There's no way that's possible!" Ryzac shouted.

His reaction was only natural. He and his people had high-rank jobs and were equipped with decent items. Among those, of course, were accessories that negated the effects of debuffs. For instance, despite not downing an Elixir, Ryzac was unaffected by Poison and Weakness.

However, the number of status effects in Infinite Dendrogram was vast, and it was nigh impossible to be prepared for all of them.

While making equipment selections in preparation for this battle, one of the status effects that had been disregarded first was Charm. After all, skills that applied Charm could only be learned by a handful of non-battle-oriented jobs, such as Pimp or Harlot.

High-ranks would sometimes take the Pimp job to get this skill or Female Monster Strengthening for its synergy with Tamer's Monster Strengthening. However, none of the betrayers had expected to encounter a player that had taken it before getting to total level 50 — as one of their first jobs.

"Huuhh?! The Charm's spreading too fast! There's more than one?!"

"Hell if I know!"

Another unexpected thing was the presence of an Embryo that could apply Charm, just like a Pimp.

In the natural world, monsters that used Charm were powerful, difficult to tame, and cost a lot, making it unlikely for low-rank jobs to have them. However, none of that applied to a Master with a succubus for an Embryo.

Making her way through the openings in the chaos of battle, she was Charming the men, one after another.

"MYANNAAA! Use a spell already! Remove the Charm, damn it!" Ryzac called out to Myanna, his high-level Bishop friend. He believed that her healing magic skills had the potential to remove all the Charm on their side.

However, no one answered to his call.

"Hey, what the hell?! You dead or something?! Myanna!" he called out once more and again got no response.

Since the three were acting as leaders of separate parties of lower-level Masters, Ryzac was unable to find out what became of Myanna. However, the fact that she hadn't responded was enough for him to conclude that she'd died in the chaos.

Why...? Why?! We were supposed to win this, damn it!

Their having gone from having an absolute advantage to being even — no, disadvantaged! — troubled Ryzac to no end. Still, his experience as a player allowed him to easily cut down one of the newbie Masters charging towards him.

Yeah. We're not done yet! he thought. There's still me and Red!

Regaining his composure, Ryzac continued swinging his blade.

Mohawk Red completed preparing another Crimson Sphere. "HYAHAAH! YOU'RE GONNA GET IT THIS TIME! Crimson Sphere!" he shouted, and there was no one to stop him this time.

Mohawk Red's most powerful spell went straight towards a single Master — the one wearing the bracers that covered the plaza in miasma. Red aimed to burn him down and relish the payback factor in the process.

The newbie was caught unawares, and the Crimson Sphere landed right on him.

“HYAHAAH! EAT IT!”

The Master with the bracers got engulfed in flames and became particles of light before he could even leave any ash...

...or so Red thought, but then the Master jumped out of the flames and charged towards him at full speed.

“Hyah?” Red released a weird sound, completely dumbfounded.

Then, right after a broken Dragonscale Ward fell out of the newbie Master’s pocket...

“Vengeance is Mine!”

...he hit Mohawk Red — a Master above level 250 — and instantly made him vanish.

“R-REEEEED!” shouted Ryzac, and not without reason, for what he’d seen was something that simply couldn’t happen. Like himself, Mohawk Red was a high-level Master, especially when compared to most in the plaza, and yet he’d gotten one-shotted by a far weaker newbie.

“Wh-Why is this happening?!” Ryzac shouted.

He could still hold and swing his sword, but his mind was in a state of panic, causing him to mutter his thoughts.

“We were all high-ranks here... Our stats and Embryo forms were higher than theirs... So why... Why are we being overwhelmed... It doesn’t make sense...”

By that point, the forces on his side had been cut down by more than half. About 40% of those still alive were Charmed. And with them having lost Mohawk Red and Myanna — the strongest among them — it was safe to say that the betrayers were defeated.

“...N-Not yet! I still haven’t lost!” Ryzac screamed.

After forcefully encouraging himself, the high-level Strong Swordsman cut down the enemies before him.

I tried to switch to Dryfe so that I could win, he thought. Losing here is the opposite of what I want.

Vehemently, desperately, he defeated any enemies he crossed paths with. He could no longer tell whether they were newbies or ex-allies that had gotten Charmed — he fought any and all people that came to him as enemies.

“Hh...!” That was when he came across someone particularly powerful.

The person wore full body armor of a silver color — no, the results of his Reveal skill said that it was a monster called “Mithril Arms Slime.”

He’s wearing a liquid metal-type slime as armor? Looks kinda tough... however...! Ryzac thought as he put his hand against his sword, a Type Arms Embryo.

“All-Slashing Blade — Durandal!” he roared, declaring that he was using his high-rank Embryo’s ultimate skill.

Durandal’s ultimate skill was different from Hræsvelgr and Poseidon, which were high-rank, as well. While those were the type of skills to unleash a single, powerful attack, Durandal’s ultimate skill was enhancement.

For a minute after activation, Durandal became able to cut anything. No matter how tough the Mithril Arms Slime was, when imbued with this power, Ryzac’s blade could easily cut through it and kill the Master within.

“Let’s do this!” he roared and charged, to which the Mithril Arms Slime responded with a swing from its blade-like tentacles.

Though its speed matched — or surpassed — that of a high-rank vanguard, it wasn’t difficult for Ryzac to see it, as he had become stronger and faster due to the side-effects of his ultimate skill. He swung Durandal twice and — with great ease — cut the tentacles off before charging close enough to cut his enemy. Then Ryzac unleashed a horizontal slash meant to split his opponent at the abdomen.

“You’re done.”

Due to Durandal’s immense sharpness, he didn’t feel any resistance. However, it was clear that it easily broke through the Mithril Arms Slime’s defense and split the person inside in half. The upper and lower half fell to the ground with half of the Slime accompanying them each. Despite that, the upper half of the Mithril Arms Slime moved to stop the blood flowing from the cut.

That’s useless. He’s as good as dea— Huh...? In order to stop the blood, the Slime focused most of its volume on the wound, causing other parts to become uncovered.

Those parts included the Master’s face.

Upon seeing it, Ryzac lost his words, for it was his friend, the Bishop, Myanna.

The Mithril Arms Slime had bound her in a way that prevented all movement and filled her mouth with enough of itself to gag her.

The realization that he'd split his own friend in half made Ryzac's mind go blank.

Taking advantage of his sorry state, the Mithril Arms Slime hastily turned half of itself into a spear and pierced him from his nether region to the top of his head.

"Gh?" Naturally, the damage was critical, making his HP drop to 0. Though his consciousness was still somewhat alive during the resurrection period, the destruction to his vitals was great, making it obvious that he wouldn't last much longer.

"Make them panic and they show their openings. Aim for a critical hit and they die instantly." Before getting the death penalty, Ryzac saw Myanna get freed from the Mithril Arms Slime's bindings and slowly turn into particles of light as the Slime, with its job done, crawled towards some boy.

As beautiful as a winter fairy, he talked to the Mithril Arms Slime in the same clear voice Ryzac had heard at the beginning of the battle.

"Don't miss an opening, and you can kill those stronger than you," he said. "It's just like we learned in the practice matches. Except this time, we were successful, Liz."

Though no doubt beautiful, Ryzac found the smile on the boy's face to be scary beyond words.

Aahh... Damn it... he thought as he vanished. If I'd known we had newbies like this... I wouldn't have done this shit...

Overwhelmed with regret, Ryzac got the death penalty.

◇

Soon after they'd lost their leaders and three strongest, the rest of the traitors gathered in the central plaza were quickly annihilated.

Then, having passed that hurdle, the newbies spread out to help fight the monsters ravaging the city or to search for Franklin.

Though this fight was merely the beginning for them, it should've been something they couldn't win. While the betrayers had been presented with many unexpected things, in the end, it could all be boiled down to the existence of a mere two extraordinary entities — Ray and Rook.

Chapter Three: The Movement on the Board

Paladin, Ray Starling

“That’s one barrier cleared,” I said.

“It appears so,” agreed Nemesis.

We’d escaped the central arena and fought the player killers that’d awaited us at the plaza.

Thanks to Rook’s plan, we’d been able to beat them with few casualties, despite them being far stronger and more numerous than us.

When I’d needed to use Hellish Miasma, I’d been worried about the prospect of involving innocents who still happened to be in the plaza, but a high-rank Master with a radar-like Embryo had shown me that it was all good in that regard.

After that, thanks to Rook using his Touch of the Silencer to cancel an enemy’s spell, and then him and Babi both using their Charm skills like they had in the battle against the goblin horde, we’d gotten an upper hand against the player killers.

I’d thought that the caster’s surprise attack was gonna kill me, but I’d survived thanks to the Dragonscale Ward Shu had given me before we left the arena. The fact that I hadn’t seen it coming had left me without a chance to use Counter Absorption, but that skill’s stock was extremely scarce right now, anyway. Only one use had been restored since my battle against Gouz-Maise yesterday, so having saved it could work out in my favor.

This battle and my encounter with Xunyu before The Clash of the Superiors had made me aware that the skill wasn’t without its flaws. It was ineffective in situations where I didn’t see the attack coming or just couldn’t use it fast enough. Sooner or later, I would have to find a way to make up for these flaws.

Skill problems aside, we’d defeated the player killers in the arena’s plaza.

After the battle, we newbies split up in all directions. I chose to go west, and Rook and a few others accompanied me.

Riding Silver, I led our little group forward. I'd avoided using my mount in the battle at the plaza because the brawl had been too melee-oriented, and I was satisfied with my decision, since the spell that had hit me might've actually melted him.

Following behind me, Rook and Babi were riding Marilyn, and furthest at the back, there were three girl Masters. All of them were staring at Rook, making it pretty certain that his being the ultra pretty-boy was the reason why they had come with us. Not that I could fault them for that, really.

"So, Ray," Rook spoke up. "Sorry for the belated question, but why are we heading west?"

"Well..." Indeed, I was the one who'd decided to go west, and he was right to assume that I'd had a reason. I'd chosen to go there because of the words gnawing at my mind.

It's west.

Hugo had told me this just before we'd separated. He was a Master from the Dryfe Imperium and a member of the clan known as "Triangle of Wisdom," which he'd described as the biggest clan in Dryfe, meaning that it was the one owned by the top of Dryfe's clan rankings: Franklin.

Back then, Hugo had tried to play it off like it was nothing, but I felt that...

"Something's up in the west," I said.

Unless he'd predicted that I would think like this and lied in order to mislead me, we should find something there. Since I didn't think that Hugo was the type to lie like that, I was going straight to the west.

Seemingly understanding, Rook nodded and began riding parallel to me.

Thus, we made our way towards the western gate.

If Hugo's words were truthful and there was indeed something to be found there, I was wholly confident that he himself would stand in our way.

◆◆◆

100 metels above the duel city, on the Night Lounge

Night Lounge — the flying, self-concealing monster — was melting into the dead of night as it flew straight towards the west. Sitting on its back, Franklin was doing something on a device highly reminiscent of tablets from the 2010s.

"The traitors at the central plaza are all dead," he muttered. "This isn't unexpected, but it certainly happened faster than I thought it would."

"What are you looking at?" asked Elizabeth.

"Here you go," Franklin said as he reached into his inventory and presented her with a device just like the one in his hands.

She looked down on it and saw a map of Gideon. It was covered in bright markers that clearly surpassed quadruple digits, and most of them were concentrated in the central arena.

"These lights... They're Masters, aren't they?" she asked.

Though the markers were many, they were nowhere near the total population of Gideon, making her assume that they represented the Masters in the area.

"Indeed they are." Franklin nodded. "Clearly, you're not a silly goose. I like people who aren't silly gooses. You're easy to talk to."

"I do not appreciate being liked by my father's murderer," Elizabeth replied.

"HA HA HA! Thought as much! That's the obvious sentiment, after all! GAH HA!" he laughed heartily, evidently finding it more funny than he had any right to.

Naturally, the princess found his reaction unpleasant, but more than that, she was curious about why it seemed so exaggerated.

"I happen to know someone who doesn't seem to understand that," Franklin continued. "Then again, we're talking about a person that took the imperator's throne by killing all the older royalty. Can't really expect such a character to be reasonable."

"I cannot make sense of anything you're saying," Elizabeth informed him.

"That's because there's a huge difference in the amount of information you and I have. Anyway, back to the subject at hand... Yes, you're holding a location map of all the Masters in Gideon. It's real-time, too."

Sure enough, the many markers on the map were moving.

The map was the result of a device created by The Triangle of Wisdom that was picking up the data signaled by a network of Franklin-made spycam monsters, which he'd scattered all across the city over several days before the plan.

Equipping the monsters with great hiding ability and Master differentiation had come at the cost of limiting the information they provided to show locations and nothing more — they didn't even give the names of the Masters. However, that was all that Franklin needed. He only wished to know where the Masters were, and to be able to tell friend from foe.

"May I ask something?" spoke up Elizabeth.

"You may," Franklin replied in a smug manner.

"These lights are either red or blue. Are they...?"

"Yes. We are red, while blue are the kingdom's Masters. I know that red is often the 'enemy' color, but I happen to like it, you see."

The markers were either blue or red, and the latter ones represented the Masters that Franklin had registered before this incident began. Though the blue markers vastly outnumbered the red, most of them were concentrated in the central arena. The blue and red in the rest of the city were about equal in number, but there was something to keep in mind...

"Not even half of the blue Masters outside the arena can fight properly," said Franklin. "Most of them are either non-battle jobs who weren't interested in the duel or third-rates who couldn't get a hold of a ticket for it."

Due to that, the blue markers tended to disappear soon after they encountered red ones.

The traitors besides the ones at the central plaza had been given the same devices as the ones held by Franklin and Elizabeth, which allowed them to seek out the blue markers, the kingdom's Masters, and kill them. The only real exception was when the outpouring of blue markers from the central arena had quickly made the red markers in the central plaza disappear.

Still, that wasn't unexpected, for the traitors positioned there had been among the weakest. The traitors tasked with doing a search-and-destroy in the city were significantly stronger, so they had little trouble taking care of non-battle jobs and third-rates.

"Though it's not like there aren't any tough cookies among those who didn't go see the event," Franklin commented.

A few red markers surrounding a certain blue one were disappearing.

He muttered, “I prepared this map to make it easier for me to find these ‘exceptions.’”

The device he was holding vibrated as a voice came out of it. “H-Help, Franklin! It’s the sixth in the duel rankings! The ‘Kamen Rider’ is...”

“RIIISEEEERRRRR KIIIICK!” That voice was followed by the sound of a fierce explosion, after which, there was nothing but noise.

Franklin pressed something, ending the connection. “The sixth, huh? Guess it’s safe to expect more like him. Well, at least ‘they’ will have something to do,” he grinned as he spoke to the device. “Club. Move to C3.”

Elizabeth didn’t know what he meant by that.

However, a short while later, she heard a loud impact coming from somewhere in the city. Looking back at the map, she noticed that the blue marker that’d seemingly defeated Franklin’s people had disappeared. In its place, there was red club-like marker.

“Club?” she asked. That was one of the playing card suits. Playing cards were a popular diversion even in Infinite Dendrogram, and casino games such as poker and blackjack were well-known pastimes. That was why Elizabeth instantly knew that she was looking at the symbol for the club suit.

“Oh, that’s a special marker,” Franklin explained. “The other reds were hired only recently, while these markers were my people from the start.”

She fell silent. Looking down, she noticed that there were a total of three such markers.

The first was a club. It moved around here and there, causing any nearby blue markers — including the “exceptions” that could kill red markers — to vanish.

The second was a heart. It was merely standing still near Gideon’s western gate. However, any blue markers that came close to it were vanishing without exception.

The third was a diamond. It was slowly making its way towards the west, and a short evaluation of the surroundings and its position on the map made it obvious that it was Franklin.

Elizabeth was now aware that Gideon had three entities far more dreadful than any monster or traitor.

Club, heart and diamond, she thought, making a certain question come to mind. Where is the spade...?

The spade suit carried the meaning of “sword” or “death,” making it the most ominous of the four, and for reasons unknown, it was nowhere on the map.

“Are you curious about the spade?” asked Franklin, as if he’d just read her mind. “It won’t show on this map. It’s for Plan D, anyway, so don’t expect it to be used.”

“Plan D?” she repeated.

“Yes. That’s what you’d call it if the current one is ‘Plan A.’ And I have no intention to fail with this one.” Franklin made Night Lounge change direction a bit.

Wondering why he’d done that, Elizabeth looked down on the map and saw two blue markers near the diamond, making it clear that it was to avoid them.

“So this map is also meant to prevent you from meeting Masters?” she asked.

“Why, yes,” he answered. “I happen to be a weakling, so I’d like to avoid having to fight by myself.”

Despite saying that, Franklin seemed quite confident that no one below could see through Night Lounge’s concealment ability.

“Though I avoid unnecessary battles, if I were to fight, those who could break through all the monsters at my disposal and land a finishing blow on me would only be my fellow Superiors,” he chuckled as he looked down on the map again.

Gideon was still in chaos as the diamond marker representing him casually moved over an empty area.

All was good.

At least, until a blue marker appeared right behind the diamond.

Surprised, Franklin tried to turn around, but before he could even move his neck, he felt his carotid artery get severed. That attack was followed by a barrage of bullet creatures, which sank into his body and exploded, causing great damage.

It didn’t end there, for the attack extended to the Night Lounge, causing its back to burst in places too many to count. Unable to bear it, the monster began losing altitude and descended to the city beneath.

Surrounded by bewildering chaos, Franklin looked around and saw an entity shrouded in a black mist scoop up Elizabeth — who'd fainted due to shock caused by the explosions — and jump down. The misty being wasn't unknown to him.

...Oh, yeah, he thought. Can't believe I forgot about the Master who killed a Superior despite not being one.

Upon remembering the player killer known as the "Superior Killer," Franklin held on for dear life as his Night Lounge crashed into the streets of Gideon.

◇◇◇

Duel city Gideon, ninth district

When Franklin kidnapped Elizabeth and disappeared from the arena, Marie instantly left her box seat. Her motive was simple — to chase after Franklin and rescue Elizabeth.

Being the Death Shadow, an AGI-focused Superior Job, allowed her to move at supersonic speeds, so she quickly made her way through the arena's hallways and got to the exit. However, when she tried to go outside, she got rejected by the barrier.

Marie didn't find its existence all that surprising. The fact that Franklin could trap Figaro and Xunyu in the barrier on the stage made it entirely possible that he could seal the arena, as well.

She was also quick to conclude that he'd done this in order to make the kingdom's Masters appear powerless. Elizabeth's kidnapping, too, had clearly been meant to increase the strength of that sentiment.

Marie couldn't let herself waste a moment's worth of time, so she instantly escaped the barrier.

She was capable of doing that because she was the Death Shadow — a Superior Job. She could do that for the same reason Xunyu's Zhenhuo Zhendeng Baolongba had broken the upper part of the barrier surrounding the Clash of the Superiors battle. That had been the ultimate skill of the Master Jiangshi — a Superior Job.

Due to that, Marie had assumed that Superior Job ultimate skills could surpass arena barriers. With that in mind, she'd used Death Shadow's ultimate skill.

Though it was a job from the stealth-oriented onmitsu grouping and thus didn’t have much in the ways of firepower, it was more or less suitable for the situation she was in. And so, at the cost of half of her SP, Marie escaped the barrier.

Once out in the streets, she used the Conceal and Conceal Perception skills to search for Franklin.

Eventually, Marie noticed the strange, stingray-like creature of the Night Lounge flying through the sky. She jumped up from the top of a building and used her own clones as stepping stones to reach and assault the creature.

Just as she’d expected, Franklin was riding it, so she hastily sliced his neck and put him in a critical state using explosive, piercing bullets from her Arc-en-Ciel. She followed it up with explosive attacks on the stingray-like creature before taking Elizabeth and jumping off.

And thus, Marie was now running through Gideon’s streets with the second princess on her back.

◇

A soft shaking caused Elizabeth to wake up.

She found the sensation to be familiar, for she’d felt it just yesterday. It was the feeling of being carried on someone’s back, and both the softness and the scent accompanying this sensation were the same as those from back then.

“Ma...rie...?” Elizabeth asked in slight a stupor.

“Yes,” said the one holding her. “It’s me, Ellie.”

“I’m happy to have met you again... But why are you...?”

“For now, let’s just get somewhere safe. We’ll talk later!” Marie said as she ran.

Though Elizabeth couldn’t tell due to the shaking being so mild, Marie’s speed was easily surpassing 100 kilometels per hour. Marie was the Death Shadow, an onmitsu grouping Superior Job, and she had a build focused on AGI and conceal skills. That made it easy for her to run with such speed even while being considerate of someone she was carrying.

The safe place Marie had in mind was the central arena. There were many high-rank Masters there. Not to mention that no one above level 50 could enter.

Sure, when Marie'd used the Death Shadow's ultimate skill to leave it, there had still been some monsters there, but considering all the players inside, it was safe to assume that they'd already been taken care of. Not to mention that one person in particular would be able to do it with ridiculous ease.

"Marie, if we're running, use this," Elizabeth said as she presented her with the device she still had in her hands.

"This is... Well, this will be useful," said Marie as she took the map and began moving while avoiding the red markers.

Just like when she'd attacked the Night Lounge, Marie was still using several conceal-type skills which prevented her from appearing on the map. Nevertheless, it was easy for her to see where she was by comparing the map and the streets around her.

"By the way, do you know the meaning of these card suit markers?" she asked.

"Yes. Diamond is Franklin, while heart and club are his confidants," answered the princess.

"I see..." said Marie while trying to contain the urge to click her tongue. "So he's still alive."

Based on what her Reveal skill told her, Franklin's max HP was almost ten times lower than all the damage she'd done to him, but despite the lack of warding accessories on him, the diamond marker was still there, meaning that he'd survived those fatal wounds.

Looks like he's also using Life Link, not just Castling, she thought. That means that I won't be able to kill him until I take care of the monsters within his capacity.

Life Link allowed the users to share HP with the monsters they had. Though it was certainly a useful skill that could potentially keep the users and their forces alive right until the very end, it also had many disadvantages.

The primary one was the fact that it could only work with monsters within the minion capacity and would have no effect if the monsters were placed in a party slot. However, the biggest one was the necessity of forming a strong bond with the monster in question, making it prioritize its owner over itself.

Creating a relationship in which the monster thought more of its master than itself was usually a process that took a lot of time and effort. Due to that, people who used Life Link were few.

The skill has some difficult conditions, but it seems like they mean nothing to Franklin, thought Marie.

Being a monster creator, Franklin could make monsters that had endless loyalty to him right from the very start, making it easy for him to have procured some Life Link-based HP tanks. That wasn't all. If he also discarded the monsters' combat ability and focused entirely on their HP, even minion capacity wouldn't be much of a problem.

Anyway, him being alive is really bad, thought Marie. Franklin was a Superior, meaning that it was unlikely he would fall for the same tricks again.

She'd also made herself into his target, making it safe to expect him to come at her with unpredictable means. As one who'd already fought and felled a Superior, Marie knew that better than most.

I have to bring Ellie to the central arena as soon as possible...! she thought. All the Masters trapped there made the arena the safest place in the entire city.

However, Marie had an even bigger reason for going there.

The barrier trapped most of the players there... including him. If he's who I think he is, then not even Franklin can win against him.

With that certain person in mind, Marie made her way towards the central arena.

She almost crashed into some monsters along the way, but she quickly blew them away with critical hits from homing, explosive bullets.

Soon enough, the central arena was in sight.

"All right!" said Marie. "We're at the home stretch, Ellie!"

"Yes, Ma—"

"I'll be taking the princess back, thank you very much."

Before Elizabeth could finish her sentence, a voice came from the device, and a moment later, Marie felt Elizabeth's weight and breathing completely vanish.

Marie turned around and saw a songbird-like monster just like the one she saw back at the arena. Elizabeth was nowhere in sight.

Upon realizing what'd happened, Marie clicked her tongue in frustration and cut down the songbird. "I was quite confident we were far outside of Castling's effective range...” she said.

“You were,” replied Franklin. “But it just so happens that I have observational monsters all over the city. I caught up to you by Castling between them. You know, like a bucket brigade.”

Slightly disturbed that he was capable of that, Marie suppressed the urge to question him about the cooldowns and MP usage involved, since she was aware that Franklin was among the greatest monster creators, both Master and tian alike. Asking him about such things was meaningless.

“But man, you sure did me in back there, Superior Killer,” Franklin continued. “I actually thought I was gonna die.”

Though Marie'd sliced his neck not too long ago, the wound was already gone as if it had never been there, letting him speak with a clear tone. That fact greatly irritated Marie.

“Well, I was aiming for at least a death penalty,” she said.

“At least a death penalty? Whoa, that's scary,” Franklin replied.

“I'm coming to kill you again,” she growled. “And take Ellie back.”

“A ha ha ha, truly scary.” Though Franklin's tone had a hint of actual fear in it, his grin was still wide. “Hey, I'm actually scared here... Mind doing something about her, club?”

At that moment, Marie's Danger Perception skill flared up, warning her about a great threat. Using her immense agility, she moved at supersonic speeds to distance herself from where she was standing.

She glanced back and saw the space there begin to crumble.

The paving, buildings, and even plants — everything that had shape was shattering, falling apart and being reduced to dust.

“I'll leave you to my boy here,” said Franklin. “After all, I had him come so he could take care of ‘exceptions’ like yourself.”

Those words were his last before the device in her hands self-destructed. It was probably a function he'd installed in case it slipped into a third party's hands, but Marie wasn't in a position to care much about that.

What had once been a part of Gideon's streets had become akin to a desert, and beyond this scenery, there was a mysterious-looking group of four.

The first of them was a man in a bird-like hat, swinging a conductor's baton.

The second was a centaur playing a violin.

The third was a cat sìth blowing into a flute.

And the last one was a kobold hitting a drum.

Marie quickly realized that she'd seen such a group before, and after a quick jog through her memory, she remembered that they were the exact same band of street performers she'd seen yesterday.

However, the outside appearance of the centaur, cat sìth, and kobold had become entirely different. Back then, they had been surrounded by a large audience appreciating them for both their performance and lovable appearance. It seemed that had been nothing but sheep's clothing.

Now, their fur was gone, revealing surfaces of pure steel. It was a group of mechanical performers that not only played, but also were instruments. A lovable band of merry-makers no longer, they'd turned into machines of murder.

Needless to say, their audience was nowhere in sight.

Anything within their vicinity shattered and crumbled, leaving behind nothing but a desert-like expanse.

"And I truly believed that you were just a skilled band of performers," said Marie. "I guess your presence here means that I can take you for an enemy."

Her perception skills and experience as a Master told her that the opponent before her was not to be trifled with.

“You guess correctly,” the man replied, not with a voice, but with sound. The creatures’ music itself gained word-like meaning and reached her ears.

“May I have your name?” she asked.

“The club on the board,” he replied. “King of Orchestras, Veldorbell.”

“I see.”

“Club” was the title Franklin had given to one of his confidants here in Gideon. Unlike the traitors, whom Franklin had picked up here in the kingdom, the club was an actual member of the Triangle of Wisdom. And King of Orchestras was a Superior Job, just like Marie’s Death Shadow.

He must be quite strong, she thought, assuming that his Embryo was Legion, like hers. She realized that trying to avoid him and going after Franklin wasn’t an option.

Even if I do somehow get to Franklin, I’d just end up being flanked between him and this fellow, and that’s certainly not something I can handle... Man, he’s such a nuisance.

She heaved a long sigh and brandished her weapon, Arc-en-Ciel. “You’re in the way, so just die already.”

“Why the rush, sweet listener? Take the time to listen to the song. It’s your requiem, after all.”

After Veldorbell raised his baton, the surroundings became overwhelmed by a wild exchange of explosive and crashing sounds.

And so began one of that evening’s intense duels — Death Shadow, Marie Adler VS King of Orchestras, Veldorbell.

Chapter Four: Battle of the Artists

???

This is a story of a certain man.

He was a composer bearing musical talent that placed him among the greatest of his generation. Even those without an ear or mind for music would often see his name on movie credits.

The man dreamed of making an opera. It had been a dream for most of his life — ever since a particular opera had enchanted his young self.

He wished to depict the life of a true hero. The champion would not be based on any existing legend, and his opera would show the hero's life from start to finish, displaying people's joy, anger, grief, and raison d'etre in a seamless chain of song and story.

That was extent of his vision.

And yet it couldn't come true.

His outstanding track record had made it more than obvious that he could not only handle the opera's musical composition, but the script and production, as well.

And yet it couldn't come true.

If he had communicated his intention to make an opera, countless sponsors would've jumped in to support him.

And yet it couldn't come true.

A certain person was stopping him from giving shape to the vision he'd always dreamed of, and that person was himself.

Though the vision within him was very much alive, it was so vague and fragile that it always crumbled the moment he tried to make it more concrete.

He'd spent many a day in front of his desk, thoroughly troubled by his inability to create what he so desired. Though he'd composed countless musical masterpieces during his long life, facing his own dream caused him to stagnate.

It took a whole two years of such distress for him to come to know the reason.

I see... I can’t create it because there’s none of it within me.

The story he’d envisioned was failing to take shape because he knew nothing of the battles and struggles of heroes. No matter how hard he’d tried to give shape to his dream, it had always instantly felt fake and vanished. At least, that was the conclusion he’d arrived at.

But then, how do I come to know the battles of heroes?

He himself was far too old to set foot on the battlefield, and it needn’t be said that it would all be meaningless if he died there. Not to mention that the sagas he’d sought simply didn’t exist in the modern world.

Why wasn’t I there during the times when knights thrived? Why couldn’t I witness legends be born?

Upon realizing that such experiences were lost to the world he was part of, the man despaired, compromised his desire, and began to accept the fact that he might have to present his dream work in a half-baked state.

That was when...

“Infinite Dendrogram will provide you with a new world and your very own unique possibility.”

...those words reached his ears.

The words “new world” caught his attention, and he soon found out that it was the promotional line of a certain game.

Though he’d made game music in the past, he’d had next to no experience playing them. However, Infinite Dendrogram had a mysterious attraction to it that seemed to pull him inside. Thus, he’d entered the world where he could come to know experiences much like the ones he’d envisioned.

◇◆

Duel city Gideon, ninth district

Unlike the fourth district, where most of the wares being sold were relatively safe in terms of legality, the ninth district was home to many black markets. Due to that, it was usually about as chaotic as the eighth district — home to pimp and thief guilds — but tonight, it was strangely neat.

That was due to a lack of people and the great reduction in buildings caused by countless explosions and crashes.

At the center of all the destruction, there were two people.

One of them was the Death Shadow, Marie Adler — the PK often referred to as the "Superior Killer."

The other was the King of Orchestras, Veldorbell, and the three parts of his Embryo — a group that had given the death penalty to many formidable Masters of the kingdom.

Both he and Marie had Superior Jobs and high-rank Embryos in their sixth form. Excluding the overwhelmingly mighty Superiors, who didn't even break a hundred in total number, these two were among Infinite Dendrogram's most powerful.

As one would expect of a battle between such entities, the damage it caused to the surroundings was grave enough to liken it to a natural disaster.

However, anyone observant enough would see that only one of the two was responsible for all the destruction.

The crumbling buildings, plants, and paving were all Veldorbell's doing, but that certainly didn't mean that Marie was considerate of her surroundings.

"Tch..." she clicked her tongue as she filled every one of Arc-en-Ciel's chambers with Red Burst and fired bullet creatures made of pure explosive power at her opponent.

Their damage potential was great enough to instantly kill low-ranks and not be taken lightly by high-ranks. If they landed on Veldorbell, the buildings surrounding him would certainly be blown away.

However, not a single one of them hit. All the bullet creatures shattered and exploded midair a little over a hundred metels away from Veldorbell.

Damn it. No matter how much I shoot, none of my bullets get close, Marie thought in frustration.

The phenomenon was caused by one of Veldorbell's Embryo abilities. It was an area-of-effect attack that crushed everything within a range of several hundred metels and reduced it to dust — a property which let it double as defense, as well.

The battle so far and the information she'd gathered yesterday were enough for her to be certain of what had caused all this destruction.

It's sound... she thought. No doubt, Veldorbell's attacks were all caused by air vibrations.

Then again, the way they shattered physical objects made it painfully obvious that there was more to them than that.

Just like my onmitsu grouping is a branch of the ninja grouping, musician jobs also have branches for songs and instruments and the like, Marie thought. With that in mind, this King of Orchestras fellow is probably in... the conductor grouping.

The conductor grouping contained jobs focused on conducting orchestras, and those with jobs in it were generally equipped with abilities that increased the effects of the party members' musical skills.

No musician jobs were battle-oriented, and were they to participate in fights, they would either buff their allies or apply debuffs to the enemies. Thus, the conductor grouping could be considered a support job for support jobs.

Of course, that's something I've never encountered in battle before, Marie added silently.

And yet, the power demonstrated by Veldorbell put him among the most destructive forces Marie had ever faced. Even more when she discounted Superiors. Clearly, it wasn't anything she'd have expected from a "support job for support jobs."

Seems like his Embryo evolved to have some offensive music skills, she thought. This destruction is the result of him using his skills as King of Orchestras to greatly magnify their power.

She was also confident that he had skills that reduced MP consumption. After all, he'd been channeling this lethal, ultimate skill-like attack since the beginning of the battle, which would be impossible unless he had something that compensated for the cost.

My guess is that, rather than crumbling the objects by matching the resonance frequencies, the sound is causing destruction through a high output of air vibrations... shockwaves, basically. After all, even her bullet creatures were getting destroyed before they could reach Veldorbell.

"It pains me to admit it, but I'm at a compatibility disadvantage here," she muttered.

Marie was completely correct. Though the bullet creatures from her Arc-en-Ciel had high utility due to their many types, they were all living creatures, and as such received great damage upon entering the vibration field.

That applied to Marie, as well. It rendered her incapable of using her other forte — hiding her presence and performing a close-range sneak attack on her opponent. It was fair to assume that Veldorbell had no intention of disabling the vibration field until he consigned her to a death penalty.

Now, how do I go about this...?

Marie was a veteran player bearing the title of "Superior Killer." The Masters she'd defeated were far too many to count. Naturally, she wasn't unfamiliar with situations in which she was at a disadvantage in terms of either power or compatibility. She was the Superior Killer exactly because she'd won against such odds.

Marie pondered. I have Ellie to worry about, so maybe I should just use Daisy or Shirahime?

Just like any sufficiently experienced Master, Marie had an ace up her sleeve — her ultimate skill. Were she to use any of those available to Arc-en-Ciel, she could probably make it through this predicament.

But if I use them here, I'll have fewer options when fighting Franklin.

Though Arc-en-Ciel's ultimate skills were powerful, using them came at a great cost. If she used them here, there was no doubt that she wouldn't be in top form when facing Franklin.

Trying to defeat a Superior while not being at her best was nothing but a fool's errand. Not to mention that she assumed Franklin had yet to show even a tenth of his total battle potential.

Now that she'd failed to kill him with that surprise attack on the Night Lounge, it was safe to expect an all-out battle next. And when it came to not showing their full potential, she assumed her current opponent, Veldorbell, was the same.

It was obvious that there was more to his Embryo abilities than this vibration field. At the very least, it was mixed with two more attacks.

My passive skill that counters mental debuffs is flaring up... I guess he's also using some sound-based hypnosis.

The onmitsu grouping had high mental debuff resistance to begin with, and Marie was the grouping's Superior Job. Not only that, she'd spent some of the afternoon mock-fighting Rook, who'd somehow found out her true identity, and thus had equipped an accessory that increased her resistance to Charm and similar status effects. Due to that, she was able to negate the effects of Veldorbell's hypnosis, but it was obvious that it was very real and had a greater range than the vibration field.

Then, there's another... Marie thought as her Danger Perception skill flared up and she let her survival instincts make her jump to the right.

A moment later, something invisible passed through the space where she'd just stood.

The Danger Perception skill flared up yet again, and she quickly dodged while kicking up a piece of rubble, which instantly got split in half. The cross-section was abnormally smooth and sharp.

"Cutting" with sound... she thought. Seems like an ultrasound scalpel to me.

Though it had little to do with surgery, the surgical precision was definitely there. The cut reminded her of the ultrasound attacks used by a certain kaiju from an old movie.

Needless to say, it wasn't a feat that the laws of physics allowed. However, they weren't on Earth, but in Infinite Dendrogram — a world where magic was taken for granted.

It's a magic-leaning musical skill... I'm honestly quite impressed by his Embryo's rich variety, especially when considering that it's bound to nothing but sound.

Ultra vibration waves.

Hypnotic sounds.

An ultrasound scalpel.

Marie guessed that each of these skills was used by one of his Legion of three.

Type Legion is generally split into two categories: those that do nothing but grow in number or those that are few, but are each equipped with a different skill. It's quite clear that Veldorbell is a prime example of the latter.

Distributing abilities generally made them weaker, but Veldorbell used his skills as King of Orchestras to compensate for that and make them even stronger than before.

Experienced as she was, Marie felt pressure that was equivalent to or even greater than the one she'd felt when facing three sixth-form Guardians.

"What a troublesome enemy," she muttered.

Being a Superior Job and a Master of a sixth-form Embryo, she knew better than most that people like her already had one foot in the realm of Superiors. That went double for cases where Embryos and jobs had superb synergy.

"Troublesome, indeed... And yet..."

Due to that, she could easily tell that Veldorbell was a formidable foe. However...

"The music itself is just so... enchanting."

Though the vibration field was a true hell where everything shattered and crumbled, the music reaching the soundscape outside of it was simply magnificent and nothing short of moving.

While gathering data for her manga, Marie — or, rather, Nagisa Ichimiya — had once gone to listen to a famous orchestra's classical concert. It had been grand enough to leave her astonished, but not even that could hold a candle to Veldorbell's performance resounding throughout the battlefield.

Marie certainly wasn't the only one who felt that way. There had already been a few city inhabitants who, despite all the chaos in town, had wandered towards them, enchanted by the melody and searching for its source. Then they had run away when they'd realized that it was caused by a deadly battle.

"I wonder if it only sounds great because of your skills as King of Orchestras," muttered Marie.

"Who knows?" Veldorbell's music turned to words as he replied. "At the very least, I wrote the score myself."

Though the destruction and the heavenly performance had thrown the soundscape around him into chaos, Veldorbell could still hear her speak.

The hundreds of metels between them would have made conversation impossible even if the vibration field hadn't been there. However, Veldorbell was using some sound-transfer skills to allow a proper exchange between them.

"Yourself...? That's quite impressive," said Marie. "However, that makes it even harder for me to understand something... Why are you in a robot production clan? You seem like you'd be more comfortable in an art or battle clan."

"Don't assume I don't take part in their production activities," replied

Veldorbell. “Just a short while ago, I helped them with the composition of the Grand Marshall’s new opening song.”

“Gran...?”

While speaking truths which sounded like jests, Veldorbell continued playing his words.

“The reason why I joined is simple. Franklin won the previous war, and I’m certain that he’ll become a crucial part of many future battles, as well. Sooner or later, he might become a hero... or get defeated by a hero, instead. I honestly do not care.”

“Hero?” Marie repeated.

“Yes. I wish to see the birth of a true hero... to see a champion rise up before my very eyes.”

Though the voice reaching her ears through the music wasn’t natural, Marie felt immense amounts of passion in it.

“In that case, why didn’t you team up with King of Beasts or Hell General?” she asked.

“I couldn’t relate to either of them.”

Marie was about to say something along the lines of “Yet you could relate to that?” but she simply didn’t.

She wasn’t restraining herself from saying it, she just felt like it wasn’t the time for such talk.

Before she’d realized it, the music had turned silent and the effective range of the vibration field began to shrink.

Is he out of MP...? Wait, no!

Disregarding Marie’s perplexity, Veldorbell spun his baton and stopped. It was a motion signaling the end of a performance.

Seemingly obeying his command, the three mechanical beasts comprising Veldorbell’s Embryo stopped playing. With the end of the heavenly music, the destruction of the surroundings also ceased. Despite that, Marie couldn’t see this as a golden opportunity to attack him.

Her perception skills weren’t flaring up. However, her womanly intuition... or perhaps her instincts as an animal were warning her about some grave danger.

“Percussion’s solo. Strings and Wind, take to tuning,” said Veldorbell, using his own vocal chords for the first time since the battle had begun.

At his words, the kobold went forward and readied its drum. The cat sìth and the centaur stood behind it, pulled cables out of their mechanical bodies and connected to the kobold.

"Ah...!"

The feeling from before did a complete 180. Now, Marie felt an impetus to act and stop whatever they were doing as soon as possible.

But before she could move, Marie started coughing up blood.

"Guagh!"

And that wasn't the extent of it — she began bleeding from her eyes and ears, as well, and the dizziness accompanying it all left her unable to move her body properly.

Damage...? What's going o—?

That was when she realized that, despite the performance being over, the dust around her was still vibrating as though caught in a tidal wave of sound.

It's high-volume sound... in a frequency below the human audible range! Low-frequency soundwaves had a wavelength of less than 20hz — the lower limit of what humans could hear. However, sounds didn't stop existing just because people couldn't hear them. Just like audible sounds of great volume could force a person to cover their ears, megavolumes of low-frequency sound could shatter eardrums and damage the nerves despite not being heard.

But what's causing it... Wait... Up!

Using her Conceal Reveal skill, Marie looked up at the sky.

There, she saw a night sky and a celestial body much like the Earth's moon, before which there was a silhouette of a harpy with a keyed instrument hanging on it, which it skillfully played with its talons.

"A fourth!" Marie exclaimed as she came to understand Veldorbell's intentions.

The reason why he'd spent the past few days performing in the central plaza was to give the people the impression that his Legion consisted of just three creatures. That increased the effectiveness of the surprise attack from the hidden fourth and set his enemy up for his more powerful skills.

That was Veldorbell's score — his orchestra.

Marie looked at the harpy up in the sky.

Oh, I see, she thought, realizing that Veldorbell's bird-like hat was just another way for him ensure that no one expected the harpy.

Upon realizing what his Embryo's motif was, most would question the lack of a bird, and the mask was there to prevent that. Veldorbell had been writing the score for the flow of this battle long before it even began.

The harpy landed next to its Master, and connected to the kobold via cable, just like the other two. Seeing the Legion of four all in one place, Marie became all the more certain of what she was looking at.

The centaur was the donkey.

The cat sìth was the cat.

The kobold was the dog.

The harpy was the rooster.

It was a group of four animal musicians. Thus, Veldorbell's Embryo was...

"Beast Orchestra — Bremen, 'Percussion.'"

The name came in the form of the ultimate skill. The focused emission of ultra vibration waves that followed engulfed the surroundings, and Marie with them.

◆◆◆

Bremen was the four-in-one Type Legion Embryo belonging to the King of Orchestras, Veldorbell.

Strings was the centaur playing a violin.

Wind was the cat sìth playing a flute.

Percussion was the kobold banging a bass drum.

Clavier was the harpy playing a piano.

Each of the four was set with their role and could even play sounds from other musical instruments of the same type, and the resulting melodies were great enough to surpass large-scale orchestras.

When in battle, they attacked and destroyed the enemies with Strings's ultrasound scalpel, Wind's hypnotic music, Percussion's vibration waves, and Clavier's low-frequency soundwaves.

Veldorbell, being a man who'd dedicated his life before Infinite Dendrogram to music and was now seeking battle, felt that the abilities of his Embryo were simply tailor-made for him. He wasn't unique in that regard, for most Masters were more or less pleased with their Embryo powers and could understand why they were as they were.

Many would claim that being unable to dislike a power born from oneself was only obvious. However, there were always exceptions, and Veldorbell was one of them.

Indeed, he was pleased with its abilities, but when his Embryo had hatched, he couldn't help but be disgusted by its motif.

Each and every Embryo was based on Earth's myths, legends, fairytales, champions, or natural phenomena, which set their name and appearance.

Velborbell's Bremen was based on "The Town Musicians of Bremen" — a children's tale that most people in civilized countries were familiar with. And that motif was exactly what Veldorbell disliked.

"The Town Musicians of Bremen" is about a group of animals that set out on a journey with the vision of becoming a musical band, he thought. However, on the way, they get a warm house and food from a bunch of robbers and are so satisfied with it that they start living there... compromising on their vision.

Being someone who had a dream and strove make it come alive, Veldorbell simply couldn't tolerate what they were.

Feeling as though they represented his foolishness from the time when he'd thought of compromising and presenting his vision in a half-baked form, Veldorbell continued hating the appearance of his Embryo.

But at the same time, he...

◇◆◇

The vibration waves faded away at the speed of sound, bringing about an uncomfortable silence.

The trajectory of the attack was covered in pulverized solid objects... the dust it had left behind. Nothing else was there — not even a trace of Marie.

All alone, Veldorbell was standing in the ruined ninth district.

Bremen's ultimate skill, "Beast Orchestra — Bremen," was the type that focused the entire Legion's power into just one of the four and allowed it to release a musical skill that greatly surpassed its usual output.

Due to that, it could have a total of four different effects. The one he'd used now, Percussion, released expanded vibration waves that went on for a few kilometels as they tore the pavement as far as Gideon's outer walls.

That abnormal power was due to the ultimate skill still being counted as “musical,” making it benefit from the King of Orchestras’ “Orchestral King’s Conducting” passive skill, which made all musical skill effects several times greater.

Naturally, it was incomparable to the vibration barrier from before.

There had been no bystanders in its way because they’d been afraid of getting caught in the battle’s crossfire, but if there had been, they would’ve surely been reduced to dust. And that was exactly what seemed to have happened to Marie.

“Sound Search,” said Veldorbell, causing everyone in his Legion besides Percussion to investigate the surroundings.

They started making sound and examining the area like a sonar. Even if something was hidden, he could find it as long as it had physical presence.

“No one’s there,” he said at last. There were no creatures in the area surrounding him. That could mean that Marie had gotten the death penalty and vanished or that she’d somehow escaped and gone to face Franklin. In either case, Veldorbell was the one who’d won.

“Heart Beat Palpitation, cancel,” he said, canceling the skill responsible for the vibration field.

It had been active even after he’d stopped swinging the baton before using his ultimate skill and even after he’d used it. The only moment it hadn’t been was when he’d used Beast Orchestra — Bremen.

If Marie had concluded that Veldorbell had ended the performance before using the ultimate skill and decided to close in on him, she’d have died without him having to use it.

“...Well, that certainly cost me a lot,” he muttered to himself.

The passive skills available to King of Orchestras not only increased the power of Bremen’s musical skills, but significantly reduced their MP and SP cost, as well. Even so, a skill as great as Heart Beat Palpitation wasn’t cheap. Keeping it up for a minute had cost Veldorbell, who had a Superior Job, about 4% of his total MP and SP. There was also the cost of the ultimate skill to consider, so he turned off the vibration area to use the relevant restoration items.

A second later, he felt a blade run through his back and split his spine in half.

“?!”

The fatal damage it had caused was negated by the Lifesaving Brooch he had equipped. However, the attack was followed by many more. Before Veldorbell or his Bremen could even do anything, his neck and back was cut several tens of times.

"Heart Beat Palpitation!"

And so, just as Wind created the familiar air vibration field, the attacker backed away at supersonic speed.

"You... You're...?!" he voiced his confusion, speaking through music yet again. The reason he did this was that his natural voice would always be drowned out by the vibration field. As confused as he sounded, however, he didn't even need to ask to know the identity of the attacker.

"That's sixteen with the right and twenty with the left," said the culprit. "I believe that should take care of the defensive items."

In her right hand, there was an Epic special reward, the paralyzing dagger known as "Palsy Stingblade, Belspan," while in her left, there was the attack trajectory-concealing blade, Night Pain. The one wielding them was none other than the Death Shadow, Marie Adler.

I was too careless, thought Veldorbell. Though his enemy had been nowhere in sight and hadn't appeared on his sonar, he shouldn't have canceled the vibration field. After all, it had been the only thing preventing Marie from attacking him. Without the field protecting him, Veldorbell was a sitting duck, just waiting to be killed.

Indeed, he was the King of Orchestras — a Superior Job. However, that was a job from a non-battle-oriented grouping. Though combining its abilities with those of his Bremen gave him battle potential rivaling that of battle-oriented jobs, he had little in the ways of defensive stats such as END.

Like Marie, with her AGI-focused battle-oriented Superior Job, had just demonstrated, those who got close to him could kill him ten times before he could even do anything.

Just as she'd explained to Ray, a difference in mid-battle speed could create a difference in the amount of actions the combatants could take during a specific amount of time, and it was often a far more important issue than strategy or skill.

Veldorbell had survived Marie's onslaught thanks to his equipment, but...

They're all gone now, he thought as he confirmed that not a single one of his defensive accessories remained.

“How did you survive my ultimate skill?” he asked.

“Well, who knows?” she said as she formed an indomitable smile.

Though she didn’t show it, she certainly wasn’t in a good state. The damage she’d received from Clavier was still there, and her SP was nearly depleted. Her SP was what she’d sacrificed in order to survive Veldorbell’s Bremen — that was the cost of the skill she’d used. Specifically, “Art of Vanishing” — the greatest skill available only to the onmitsu grouping’s Superior Job, Death Shadow.

Just as it said in the name, it allowed the user to vanish from the world for a limited amount of time. While it was active, nothing could see them, touch them, hear them, or perceive them in any other way. It was stealth perfected, and the only reason why she’d been able to remain unharmed in the face of an attack so devastating.

This skill was also what had made it possible for her to escape the barrier shrouding the central arena. Unlike the Master Jiangshi’s Zhenhuo Zhendeng Baolongba, it didn’t do any damage whatsoever, but it was still a skill that matched or perhaps even surpassed it.

Naturally, keeping it active came at a cost, and vanishing for a mere minute would completely drain her SP.

This time, she’d kept it up for half a minute, making her lose half of her total SP and leaving it at less than 20%.

However, she believed that it’d been worth it, for she had been able to make her opponent believe she was dead and surprise him with an attack that had deprived him of his accessories.

I should make sure to kill him, no matter what, Marie thought. The moment she’d used Art of Vanishing, she’d already given up on fighting Franklin.

Veldorbell had turned out to be far stronger and more dangerous than she’d expected, and she figured that if she didn’t defeat him here and now, the chances of someone else defeating Franklin would drop, too. Thus, Marie was now determined to defeat Veldorbell with all she had. She took out a single bullet from her left hand — specifically, from the Embryo crest on it.

The cartridge was about three times the size of the bullets she usually put in Arc-en-Ciel. Its sides were red and black and it had the picture of a character on it.

“It can’t end here. I cannot accept not witnessing what happens tonight.” Veldorbell was speaking through his music.

“I have a feeling that history will be made here — that tonight will be legendary.”

Despite being artificial, the voice in his music had more emotion than it would have if he’d spoken using his own chords.

“Thus, I cannot make my exit until I burn that moment into my retina and etch it onto my soul.”

The eyes below his bird-like hat became bloodshot as his music-voice turned louder.

“If I don’t... I’ll never be able to complete my work!”

He was a prime example of a person who truly desired something. Marie... Nagisa Ichimiya saw such a person in the mirror far too many times to count.

“...Oh, I see,” she whispered as a certain realization hit her. “You’re much like me.”

Both he and her had come to this world to gain something they didn’t have and to experience what they needed to continue their works. On that front, Marie and Veldorbell were the same.

And yet, Nagisa Ichimiya AKA Marie didn’t hesitate.

“But I’ll still have to ask you to leave, old man.”

Veldorbell was in the way of her goal, and if she didn’t take care of him, yesterday’s memories with the little girl might become shrouded in sadness. Thus, she had no qualms about destroying this man, even though he was much like herself.

“You can’t force me, you uncouth girl!” he said through his music before stopping it and using his real voice to shout a skill name. “Final Orchestra!”

That was the King of Orchestras’s ultimate job skill. It was a desperate measure that sacrificed 90% of his health in exchange for making musical skills ten times more powerful.

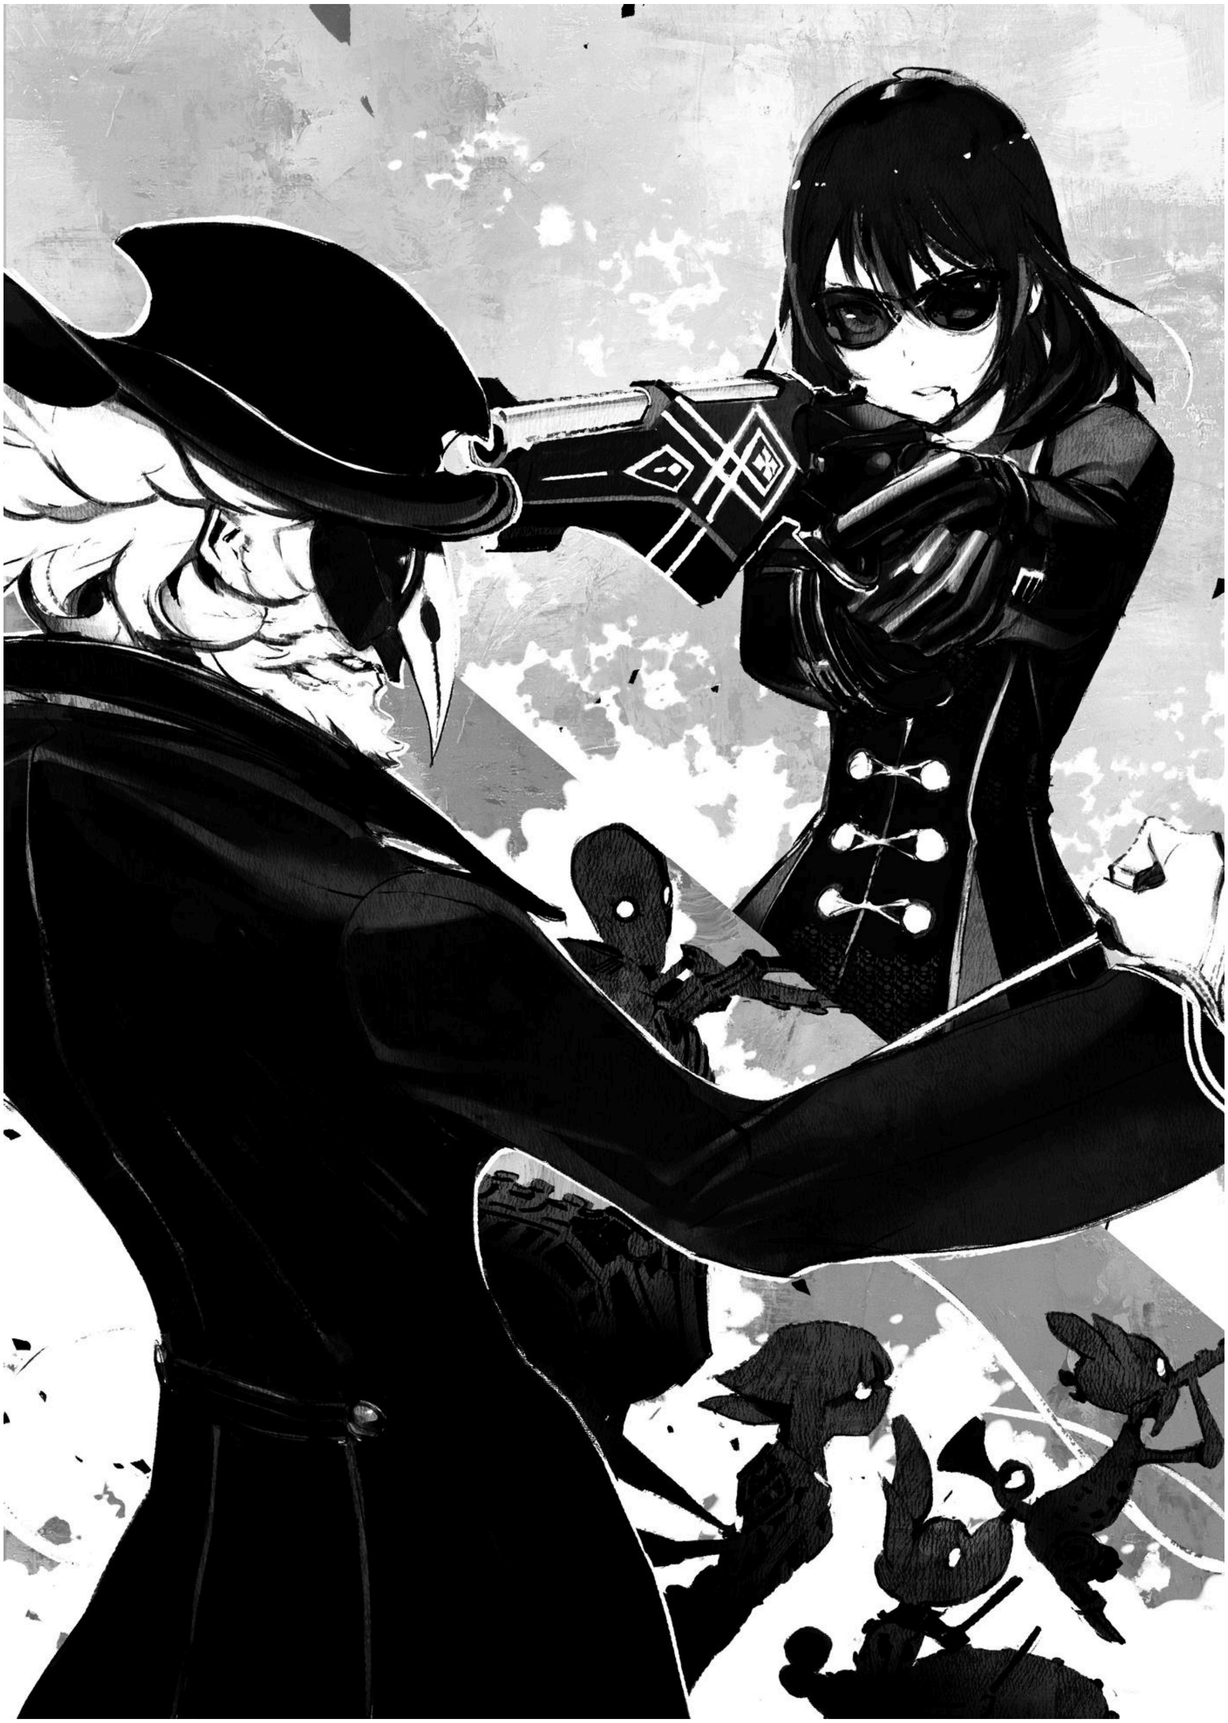
A moment later, the four members of Bremen connected yet again, ready to use the ultimate skill to take care of Marie once and for all.

“‘Uncouth’?” she asked indignantly. “Do excuse me, but superficial politeness is part of my character, you see.” She spun her Embryo, the gun in her hand.

Suddenly, the Embryo’s shape underwent a great change. No longer the six-shooter it had been before, Arc-en-Ciel had become a single-shot, high-caliber handgun. Marie loaded it with the large bullet she’d taken out of her crest and aimed it at Veldorbell.

She wasn’t making use of her supersonic movement abilities. It was difficult to tell whether she was just being careful about the possibility of having it used against her or if she just wanted to give this man — who was much like her — a fair fight.

The two combatants braced themselves. Though the distance between them was great, it didn’t matter at all, for the attacks they’d prepared were fatal regardless. The exchange that would soon follow would decide the victor and the loser.



After a moment of silence, the two made their moves.

"Phantasmal Raingun — Arc-en-Ciel, 'Daisy Scarlet the Explosion Death'!"

"Beast Orchestra — Bremen, 'Wind'!"

Two ultimate skills clashed, finally ending the battle.

◇◆

The ultimate skill of Beast Orchestra — Bremen came in four different forms.

Strings's magic slashes.

Percussion's wide-scale physical attack.

Clavier's stealth low-frequency wave attacks.

And Wind's hypnotic music.

Veldorbell chose the only one of the four that didn't do any damage. Most would question this choice, but he had a total of three perfectly valid reasons.

The first was the possibility of Marie avoiding Percussion's damage, just like she had before.

Veldorbell didn't know how Marie had survived the first Beast Orchestra, and thus believed that the same skill would be countered by the same skill.

The second was the existence of defensive accessories. Veldorbell had survived Marie's onslaught because of such items. If Marie also had some of these equipped, it was entirely possible that simple attack power wouldn't be enough to end her.

The same reasoning had applied to the first Beast Orchestra, but back then, he hadn't had a choice, as picking any other of his Legion would have made him deactivate Percussion's vibration field after using the ultimate skill.

Wind's hypnotic music, on the other hand, would cause the opponent to die regardless of any accessories.

The third reason — and the most important one — was the very melody resounding when Veldorbell combined the King of Orchestras's ultimate job skill with Bremen's ultimate skill.

The most perfect music he had at his disposal in such a state was the one played by Wind. Veldorbell was absolutely certain that it could move the listener's heart, mind, and soul. The music played by Wind when it was supported by Bremen and the King of Orchestras was nothing short of divine.

It was simply to die for.

Far beyond being just "hypnotic," the music played by Wind was of such excellence that listeners would actually give their lives for it. Some would call it the apotheosis of Charm.

The sound ignored all resistances and had already made many veterans kill themselves.

The power in the divine music had yet to fail him, so Veldorbell had limitless confidence in its effects.

He disliked the motif behind his Embryo. But at the same time, he adored their music more than anyone else in existence.

Veldorbell, a man who hated Bremen's form, but was thoroughly enchanted by its sound, believed in the power of Wind's Beast Orchestra more than anything else in the world. He was absolutely certain that no one could remain alive before this music.

And yet, Wind's melody, that had already defeated countless enemies, failed to fell the woman before him.

"W... Why...?" Veldorbell sputtered, as the life drained from his face. He was surrounded by Bremen — all shattered into little pieces.

The only reason why Veldorbell had survived Marie's ultimate skill even after having sacrificed 90% of his life was the fact that his Legion had jumped in to protect him. However, though he was still alive, his defeat was imminent.

His imminent defeat was the very reason why he'd asked that question.

"Looks like it's my win."

Veldorbell looked up to see two people before him.

One of them was, of course, the Death Shadow, Marie Adler. The other was a red girl — the same one that was drawn on the cartridge Marie had loaded into her gun.

A certain group of people would find her appearance and the fangy, ferocious smile to be familiar, for she was a character from Nagisa Ichimiya's manga, Into the Shadow. She was called "Daisy Scarlet the Explosion Death."

Arc-en-Ciel's ultimate skill, Phantasmal Raingun, used the same "paint" cartridges that Marie used to create the bullet creatures and focused them on bullets that Marie herself had drawn. The abilities of the creatures depended on the paint used when drawing, and Marie combined the characteristics of her paints to recreate the characters from her manga to the best of her ability.

Daisy Scarlet was the result of combining red and black paint. She was a vampire that could become explosions. Even as she was merely standing there, small bursts were happening in the area around her. Bremen's and Veldorbell's defeat was caused mainly by Daisy's first explosion, which covered everything in a 100 metel radius.

"Why... Why are you alive after hearing Wind's music? It's supposed to make you throw your life away."

Veldorbell didn't find it strange that he was on the verge of dying. Being in such a state after a clash of ultimate skills wasn't uncommon. However, he couldn't understand why Marie and Daisy were still alive.

Veldorbell already knew that Arc-en-Ciel created bullet creatures. Thus, no matter what kind of creatures Marie created, he would have expected any of them to kill themselves upon hearing Wind's melody. Be they monsters or mechanical dolls, the music was great enough to make them end themselves. Veldorbell couldn't believe that it seemed to have no effect.

"...Oh, sorry," said Marie. "Neither me nor this girl heard the melody."

"You... You didn't hear it?" he replied with pure shock in his voice.

"Yes. After all..." Marie replied as she pointed towards Daisy, "...her explosions blow away the surrounding atmosphere. Sound can't travel when that happens."

An extremely simple reason.

Sounds were vibrations. As such, they could only passed on through things that could vibrate, like air or water. That was why Marie had Daisy blow away the surrounding air to create a wall of vacuum that no sound could pass through.

Simple explosive bullets wouldn't have the power for such a feat, but Daisy, being the result of an ultimate skill, could do it with little trouble.

If Veldorbell had used Strings's magic attack or Percussion's wide-scale attack, this battle might've ended in a draw because they could've broken the vacuum barrier with sheer sonic force. Wind's melody, however, wasn't offensive in nature and was thus useless unless it could reach the opponent.

“A melody to die for...” muttered Marie. “That’s something I’d love to hear, but now is not the time for it.”

“...Ha,” chuckled Veldorbell. “Not lending an ear to good music... you really are uncouth.”

With his gaze full of disappointment, rather than frustration, he closed his eyes.

Marie aimed the muzzle towards him...

“Goodbye, King of Orchestras.”

...and shot his forehead.

Thus ended one of the night’s grand battles, and the board no longer had a club on it.

◇

“...Oh, am I tired,” Marie heaved a sigh as she fell to her knees. She then reached into her wristband-shaped inventory, took out a high-quality SP restoration item, and slowly began gulping it down.

Thanks to her using Art of Vanishing and Phantasmal Raingun, her SP was almost completely drained. Though she had items to restore it, the SP loss was too great to cover with those alone.

Also, though restorative items that had a weak effect acted quickly, the powerful ones used by Superior Jobs such as herself had a significantly weaker effect when used consecutively.

She’d need some time until she had enough SP to participate in battle again. Not to mention that she was still damaged from the low-frequency wave attacks.

And last, but definitely not least...

“With this, I can’t use red or black anymore,” she sighed.

Phantasmal Raingun had two major cons to it.

The first was the necessity to draw the characters on the bullet and the fact that she could only keep a maximum of six of them. The Daisy bullet she’d just used was the only one she had, so Marie was now rendered incapable of using Daisy until she drew her again.

The second con was the fact that the paints used to make bullets used by the ultimate skill were rendered inaccessible for the next 24 hours.

The ones used in Daisy were Red Burst and Black Homing. The former was for explosions, while the latter was for homing shots. Now that Marie had used her, she could no longer use her lethal explosive bullets or the ultra-accurate homing bullets for a whole day. This also extended to other Phantasmal Raingun characters that used Red Burst of Black Homing.

The skill was powerful and versatile, indeed, but its demerits were just as great. Marie's Embryo's ultimate skill drew upon her characters in exchange for draining her reserves.

"It doesn't seem like I'll be able to kill Franklin now," she sighed again. "But..."

Just like Veldorbell, Franklin had a weak, non-battle job that surpassed the average battle job due to synergy with his Embryo. Scary as that was, that could be interpreted another way, and...

"They might actually have a chance."

While running away with Elizabeth and during her battle with Veldorbell, Marie had caught glimpses of Ray and Rook heading towards the western gate.

Their opponent was a Superior. Marie had just barely won against Veldorbell, and Franklin was an entity above the musician. In any normal scenario, two newbies' chances of victory were lower than negligible.

Even so...

"They might just do it."

Ray already had a history of defeating creatures stronger than himself, while Rook had been able to cut Marie's arm off despite being a non-battle job. Considering those facts let Marie have hope that they could win and save Elizabeth.

"Heh heh... Still, I can't leave everything to them," she said as she threw away the empty restoration item and stood up. "I guess I'll just do what I do best."

With that, Marie Adler began running through Gideon's streets as she melted into their shadows.

Chapter Four-Point-Five: Setting

Paladin, Ray Starling

"Hh... What?!"

As Rook, I, and the three newbie girls accompanying us followed the road leading towards Gideon's western gate, we were overwhelmed by a destructive sound so great it made me want to shut my ears. It came from our left — the city's ninth district.

It was the same direction from which we'd heard a musical performance.

I'd found it strange that someone would play music at a time like this, but the blast of sound that'd just reached us was definitely something more than that.

What's happening? I thought.

"Is that where Franklin is?" I asked myself as I questioned whether we should continue going to the western gate or change directions to the ninth district.

"Apparently, he isn't among the ones fighting there," said Rook before I began to ponder.

It wouldn't have been unlike him to notice something I didn't, but I found it strange that he'd used the word "apparently."

"Oh, that isn't my assumption," he added. "I got this info from her." Saying that, Rook looked at one of the three girls accompanying us.

On a slightly unrelated note, while I was on Silver and Rook was riding Marilyn, the three girls were saddled on fluffy, ostrich-like birds called "Landwings" — the easiest-to-get ridable monsters, apparently.

Anyway, the girl Rook looked at was holding a tray-like disk in her hands as she presented it to us. It displayed a map of the area from Gideon's central arena to the western gate, with Roman numerals between I and VII littered all over it.

"What's this, uh...?"

Oh, yeah, I haven't asked for their names yet, I realized.

“M-My name is Kasumi...” she said meekly. “I-I’m a Summoner and th-this is my Embryo... Taijitu.”

Taijitu... I thought, digesting that. A reference to the Investiture of the Gods, I guess.

By the way, the other two girls were Io and Fujinon, a Barbarian Fighter and Mage, respectively.

“My Taijitu shows, uh... the location of the Masters within the area and their Embryo forms...” Kasumi said, explaining her Embryo. “According to this... th-there are two Masters in the ninth district, but they’re both on their sixth forms... s-so I don’t think that they’re Franklin.”

“...What a convenient Embryo,” I said.

Looking at the tray-like disk, I could see a “VII” marker heading towards the western gate, and it was safe to assume that it was Franklin. Thanks to her, I didn’t even have to think about changing directions.

“N-No, I-I just... umm... I-I couldn’t do anything in the p-plaza fight, so... I-I... I’m sorry...”

“Why are you apologizing?” I asked.

“‘Why,’ indeed.” Nemesis shared my sentiment. After all, Kasumi just helped us out a lot.

“Uohh...” She hid her face as she moved to hide behind the other two girls. She was strangely good at handling the reins.

“Sorry about that!” said Io. “Our girl Kasumi is the shy type, as you can see! Oh, but she’s the one who had the courage to tell us to come with you two! After all, we have some white-haired pretty boy and blond young man B-elRGHH!” Before Io could finish her sentence, Fujinon — the last of the three — cut it short with a backhand blow to her side.

Eh? What was she about to say?

“Sorry about this idiot,” said Fujinon. “Oh, we only accompanied you because we saw you fight in the plaza and became very interested.”

“O-Okay?” I replied.

I wasn’t too convinced, but the aura about Fujinon made me feel like pushing it further wouldn’t be the best idea.

“You three seem to get along very well,” said Rook. “Have you known each other for long?”

“Yes,” nodded Fujinon. “We’re all in the literary club in the same school.”

Friends in real life, huh? I thought. No wonder they all act so familiar.

"To my eye, the ones with the most familiarity are you and Brother Bear," commented Nemesis.

Well, we've been siblings for eighteen years now. ...Oh, but I guess that doesn't mean much when it comes to my sister. She... She's just so...

"Ray! What's wrong?!" Nemesis shouted into my head.

Ah! Damn, my consciousness almost lapsed out of reality.

"This has been bothering me for a while now... what is going on with your sister?" Nemesis asked. "Just like with the glasses, I can't see any of your memories about her."

Please, don't ask. Her very existence makes even less sense than Shu's. She's not even in the same genre as us.

"Anyway, we can now go to the western gate without any hesitation," I said.

At the rate we were going, we'd be there in five or so minutes. However, though I didn't say them out loud, I had two questions on my mind. Both of them were related to the map displayed by Taijitu.

One was about the central arena, the place currently keeping many Masters inside.

On the map, there were four "VII" markers, which pointed to Superiors. Two of them were most likely Figaro and Xunyu. Though Xunyu might not appear on the map because the barrier had been stopped right after she'd been defeated.

With that in mind, though, who are the other two — or three — Superiors?

The other question was about the surroundings of the western gate, the place we were heading to right now.

According to Taijitu, there were several dozens of Masters there. They had a wide range of Embryo forms, from II to VI. I assumed that a Master with a radar-type Embryo like Taijitu had found out where Franklin was heading and gathered a group with the intention of fighting him at the western gate.

That was very good for our confidence. After all, we needed to stop Franklin, but were severely lacking in numbers.

However, that sentiment of mine almost entirely vanished when I noticed that they weren't moving at all.

Taijitu was like an active radar, but the Masters at the western gate were still, as though it was just a picture.

There was only one exception, for the one closest to the gate, marked as “III.” It was making slight movements.

For reasons unknown, that marker was making me feel somewhat uneasy.

◆◆◆

Duel city Gideon, the surroundings of the western gate

It happened a few minutes before Ray got a look at Taijitu.

Approximately twenty of the kingdom’s Masters had just arrived at the western gate.

All of them were Masters who hadn’t been in the arena when it had gotten sealed, and who had happened to not encounter Veldorbell after it all began.

“This is the place, right?” one of them asked.

“Yeah. It’s pretty clear that Franklin’s planning to escape through here.”

Using their job or Embryo skills to predict where Franklin was heading, they gathered at the western gate with the intention of ambushing him here.

Their predictions and decisions were correct, for Franklin was about five minutes away.

They were about to prepare themselves for his arrival, but...

“...What’s that?” They encountered a strange sign. It was placed in the middle of the road in a really unnatural manner.

The words on it were in the continent’s common language, and to Masters — who were equipped with auto translation — it said this:

No Master shall pass beyond this point.

“Isn’t that a reference?” one of them asked, examining it. “What the hell is thi—”

“Wait! There’s something over there!” One of the Masters pointed beyond the sign.

There was a large silhouette, standing before the gate as if to prevent anyone passing. It belonged to a Marshall II — no, a Marshall II Revised. It was a humanoid mobile weapon created by the Triangle of Wisdom and fine-tuned for use by a specific individual.

“That’s a Magingear from Dryfe, all right, but it’s a bit different than their official ones or the ones leaked to Caldina,” the other Master agreed. “We might be looking at one of the Triangle’s bigger members. At the very least, he’s not like the player killers messing up the city.”

“He’s probably been put there to make sure that Franklin goes by safely.”

“The mech has higher stats than the average Marshall II, but it’s still just a bit over two times stronger than a Demi-Dragon, at best.”

“Then I guess he won’t be much of a problem for us.”

The Masters gauged the machine’s battle potential using Reveal and Identification. That method wasn’t without its faults. After all, these skills couldn’t see the stats or skills of the Marshall II R’s pilot. However, it was clear that the Masters surpassed him and his machine in terms of both numbers and experience.

“There are way more of us,” one of them said. “We won’t lose even if he uses his Embryo.”

“HA HA! Let’s get to the gate and wait for Franklin! Can’t wait to see his face when we ambush him!”

“‘No Master shall pass beyond this point...’ Heh. As if.”

Thus, the Masters passed the sign and charged towards the Marshall II R. As though he’d been waiting for it, the robot’s pilot spoke up.

“Cyco... ‘La Porte de l’Enfer.’”

“Roger.”

In but an instant, the Marshall II R donned frozen armor as the surroundings underwent a drastic change. Everything within a radius of 200 metels — from the sign to the gate — froze solid. Naturally, the Masters were no exception.

“La Porte de l’Enfer — the enemy dies,” spoke a feminine voice coming from the frost-clad machine.

Her words were mistaken, for no one there had died. They were simply Frozen.

“Eh? Huh? All of them? What?” a Master cried.

“...It’s an Embryo skill!” another one shouted.

Those two didn’t have a bit of ice on them.

“Less than 100, I see,” said the pilot. “They won’t be much trouble, though.”

Thirteen seconds later, the lower half of one of the remaining two Masters suddenly Froze.

"What the hell is this?!" he shouted.

"Hey, are you okay?!" The other remained unfrozen.

"His number is low," said the girl's voice. "He's probably a support job."

"A Priest or something, huh?" spoke the pilot. "Very well, then." Suddenly, the machine aimed the weapon in its left hand — LRW03 Huge Grenade Launcher — towards the two and fired several times.

With a strong impact, the grenades exploded and covered the surroundings in fire.

By the time the smoke faded, the two had already gotten the death penalty and were no longer in sight. Not only that, but the frozen statues that were caught up in the explosion had shattered and were turning into particles of light.

Some of the statues that hadn't been caught up in it also turned into particles. They had used the suicide feature to forcefully give themselves a death penalty. They'd probably wished to avoid becoming the enemy's XP or having him Steal something while they were Frozen.

The pilot had no intention of breaking them or taking their items, but they had no way of knowing that.

The pilot in the cockpit sighed. What had just happened was more of a massacre than a battle, but the pilot had been more or less certain that it would be like this. That was the very reason why he was positioned here.

The pilot and his Embryo were the natural enemies of anyone who had this city as their main haunt.

"This frost is strong," said someone standing at the sign. "But it won't work on me."

The person — who hadn't been in the previous group — was completely clad in flame, making his silhouette somewhat hard to discern. The man's ruffled hair and burning body were well known to anyone familiar with Gideon.

"An Embryo that grows in strength when you clear some complicated conditions, huh?" he said. "Well, my Surt is the strongest fire-based Embryo in the kingdom! No amount of cold can freeze it!" He was the seventh in the Kingdom of Altar's duel rankings. His name was...

"I am Bishmal the Raging Blaze! Just try and freeze this fire!"

Like an erupting volcano, Bishmal made flames burst from all over his body as he charged towards the Marshall II R. A single look was enough to tell that the fire was immensely hot.

Bishmal the Raging Blaze was said to have a punch that was more destructive than anything anyone else in the duel rankings could do. An attack empowered by his flame could easily melt the frozen armor, Marshall II R, and even the pilot.

But alas...

"You won't pass."

...the man clad in the kingdom's strongest fires was frozen solid. He was still aflame, despite this. The expression stuck on his face was an indomitable smile, showing no doubt that he was going to emerge victorious.

"My La Porte de l'Enfer ignores temperature," said the Marshall II R's frozen armor — the Embryo known as Cyco.

Surrounded by frozen statues, the pilot, Hugo Lesseps, shook his head. "Gideon's Masters are tough. They're all veterans far stronger than me and with far more experience in battle against people. And that's exactly why they can never win against me."

Indeed, the one sealing the western gate was none other than Hugo Lesseps — the very same Master that had helped Ray with the Gouz-Maise Gang.

He was now on the board of Franklin's game, acting under the codename "heart."

◆

As the battle between Marie Adler and Veldorbell came to an end, Franklin and his kidnappee, Elizabeth, were making their way towards the western gate.

Though Marie's attack had put Night Lounge on the verge of death, it was still capable of flight, if only barely. Elizabeth, having lost consciousness, was sleeping on top of it.

"...Looks like we've lost Veldorbell," said Franklin as he examined the map on the device, which no longer had the club marker on it.

The blue marker next to where it had disappeared was gone, as well, but Franklin couldn't tell whether it was due to her dying or simply using a stealth skill like the one she'd used before she'd attacked him.

"Hm..." Franklin clenched and opened his left hand. The action felt somewhat slow.

"Paralysis poison, huh?" he said. "Must be pretty damn strong to have such an effect even after I used an Elixir."

Franklin assumed that the dagger that'd torn his neck had been a special reward focused on paralysis poisoning. He was correct, for Marie's weapon had been Palsy Stingblade, Belspan: a dagger specializing in slow-acting paralysis.

"But it's not like it'd be much of a problem for me if I were unable to lift a finger," he said. To his mind, the only trouble the Superior Killer had caused him was the damage to Night Lounge and the loss of Veldorbell. And when it came to the latter, Franklin didn't believe that the King of Orchestras had gone down without a fight.

"The Superior Killer probably doesn't have the power to fight me anymore," he muttered. "And I don't think we'll have any other exceptions of her level, so... I guess I only have to be wary of a potential one or two Superiors, and..."

There were other exceptions, as well. Franklin already had the details regarding the battle at the central plaza, where the newbies had won against the traitors.

While approaching the western gate, Franklin examined how things were going, and noticed that two of the newbies performed some grand feats that made them stand out from the rest.

Naturally, by virtue of being newbies, they were weaker than the high-rank Masters around the city. However, Franklin was experienced enough to know that people like them should never be underestimated. Not to mention that he was already familiar with one of the two newbies.

"If I'd known this would happen, I wouldn't have messed around with the dog ears, and would've just given him a healthy dose of instadeath poison," Franklin muttered.

He was referring to what he'd done the day before. If Franklin had killed Ray back then, there was a chance that he would've posted about it on the internet, which could've put a dent in his plot. Due to that, the scientist had opted to merely mess around with him while getting some information in the process, but that had come back to bite him.

Things might've gone differently if I'd killed him then and there, he thought. For all I know, the Superior Killer wouldn't have entered the fray if I had... but I guess I'm overthinking it.

"First the Old Orchard, now this... The jackass just can't stop getting in my way!" Franklin grumbled. "Well, not that it matters anymore." He grinned. "I have the data, and RSK is complete. As things are, crushing him head-on should be quite satisfying, and a few cameras should make it even better."

Soon enough, the Night Lounge arrived at the western gate and crashed to the ground. Considering the wretched state it was in, this wasn't unexpected. Unable to return to the Jewel, Night Lounge breathed its last as it became particles of light and vanished.

"That thing cost me 70,000,000 lir... Oh well, I'll just make the next one a bit tougher."

Franklin scooped up Elizabeth with his right hand, the one that wasn't numb, and began walking towards the gate. In a moment, a sign saying "No Master shall pass beyond this point" entered his vision.

"I think I remember this," Franklin said. "It's from a Japanese folk tale. One of those witty ones, I think. How nostalgic."

Franklin casually passed the sign and looked at the area around the gate. He saw a mechanical warrior, standing there like the guardian of the gates of Hell.

That description couldn't be more appropriate. After all, the frost permeating the area and the many frozen Masters littered all over the surroundings made the scene highly reminiscent of the Ninth Circle of Hell.

"What a spectacle," Franklin said as he walked through it, clearly amused.

He showed no signs of getting frozen like the other Masters.

In fact, he didn't feel the least bit cold, and the same applied to the tian he was holding, Elizabeth.

"Ah, hey, this is Bishmal. Guy's seventh in the duel rankings," Franklin said upon noticing a man frozen while adorned in raging flames. "Ice to meet you!" he said in a playful tone as he kicked the statue away.

With no hint of resistance, Bishmal dropped to the ground, shattered, and turned into particles of light.

Onlookers would question whether an act like this should be so simple and done so casually.

“If you froze them, you might as well shatter them, you know?” Franklin said to the person inside Marshall II R, Hugo.

“I didn’t want to waste my ammo, and moving in to crush them costs MP,” Hugo answered. “I have to save it so I can keep La Porte de l’Enfer up for longer, right?”

Sounds like a waste of potential EXP to me, thought Franklin before speaking up again.

“What’s the setting right now, anyway?”

“We’re only targeting Masters that don’t belong to the Triangle of Wisdom,” Hugo answered. “Before these Masters came, the tians from the Royal Guard passed through. They’re waiting outside.”

“Oh? The Royal Guard? They didn’t attack you?”

“I’d already put the sign up at that point, so they knew that I had no intention of fighting non-Masters.”

“That might’ve been for the best,” Franklin said. “Attacking tians outside of war gets you on wanted lists, after all... Which is exactly why it’s obvious that I’m already on Altar’s.”

It was common knowledge that there were no crimes in disputes between Masters. Thus, a Master blocking the paths of or killing other Masters would not be considered a criminal.

“Anyway, if the RG is waiting for me outside, they’re probably planning to face me in an open field battle,” said Franklin. “That’s their specialty.”

“What will you do?” asked Hugo.

“Take them on, duh. This country’s tians ain’t shit.”

In the previous war, Dryfe had killed all the country’s tians with Superior Jobs. To his mind, mere high-ranks weren’t much of an obstacle.

“Oh, by the way, once I pass, change the setting a bit,” Franklin said.

“How?”

“Let Ray Starling pass.”

“...Ray Starling.”

“Yes, Ray Starling. He’s blond, has dog ears... well, not anymore. Anyway, you know him well, Yu. Let him pass.”

“...Why?”

Before answering his question, Franklin made a sinister, devil-like smile. “Because I’m gonna smash the twerp myself, duh. He and I seem to be bound by some weird cosmic mojo, so I’ll crush him and sever the tie once and for all. I even prepared a special monster for it.”

“W-Wait, y-you mean the MGD?!” Hugo spoke up with a voice thick with fear.

It wasn’t without reason. After all, MGD was the biological weapon Franklin had made for the purpose of fighting Superiors.

“Ha ha ha! Wouldn’t that be great? MGD could level the whole city... no — the whole country! Anyway, no, I’m using a different monster. MGD’s not finished yet!” Franklin laughed in an amused manner before continuing. “I’ll be bringing it out after we’re done with the kingdom, when we start warring with Caldina or Legendaria. Though, if this plan fails, we’ll be fighting the kingdom head-on, meaning that they’ll get a taste of MGD, too.”

Hugo was silent. Franklin passed by the Marshall II R’s arm and lightly tapped its frozen armor with the back of his hand. “So yeah, let him go by if he comes.”

“...Okay.”

With that, their exchange was over and Franklin made his way towards the gate.

However, Hugo turned back to look at him before speaking up. “S—”

“Yu...” Franklin cut his words short. “In here, you’re supposed to call me ‘leader.’ Your tone’s falling back to old times. Don’t let it fall back to old times.”

“...Yes, leader.”

“So, what did you want?”

“What do you intend to do to the Royal Guard?”

“Don’t worry your pretty little head about that one, sweetheart.” With those words as his last, Franklin finally went through the gates.

Hugo could do nothing but watch as he left.

“Hoo boy,” said Franklin.

Beyond the gates, there was the western field known as the “Jeand Grasslands,” and a group of knights surpassing fifty in number.

“Another spectacle,” Franklin said.

All of them were from the Kingdom of Altar’s Royal Guard, Paladins tasked with Elizabeth's protection, and all of them showed immeasurable hostility towards Franklin. Standing in front of them was their Vice Commander, Liliana Grandria.

"Franklin, I presume?" she said.

"In the flesh, baby," he replied.

"We are taking Her Highness Elizabeth back."

"I'd rather you didn't. Well, losing her wouldn't actually be a big deal for me, but having her around certainly doesn't hurt." The grin Franklin made as he said that made the knights' hatred for him all the more palpable.

"Then we will take her by force."

"Hmm? You can attack me? I'm holding the princess, you know."

"Do not worry," Liliana informed him. "We Royal Guard are bound by magic that prevents us from hurting our royalty. We will not get a single scratch on her."

"Oh? You have friendly fire disabled? No fair..."

"However, the mere act of pointing my blade in Her Highness's direction pains me greatly, so I would be thankful if you let her go."

"Ah ha ha! Yeah, nah." Franklin stuck out his tongue.

"Grand Cross!"

A torrent of cross-shaped light burst out from the base of his feet.

Grand Cross — a Paladin's greatest skill — was an offensive ability that created a cross-like pillar of holy light, dealing some of the greatest damage available to high-rank jobs. It burst out of and burned Franklin's left side, the one opposite where he was holding Elizabeth.

The surprise attack almost caused him to fall, but he was able to balance himself.

"Well, aren't you rash," he complained as he looked at his chest and saw a Lifesaving Brooch, the accessory nullifying fatal attacks. The attack had left it completely broken, meaning that all the monsters he'd used for Life Link were already dead.

Though the power of the Grand Cross was nothing to sneer at, Franklin was made aware that the surprise attack from the Superior Killer had done more damage than he'd thought.

"Gee whiz... this day certainly isn't easy on my wallet," he muttered as the Royal Guard all charged towards him.

Even though he was a Superior, Franklin's stats were low, and his HP wouldn’t last long against more than fifty battle-focused high-rank jobs. However...

“Well, I’ve been given some good test subjects to prepare for when he comes, so I guess that makes up for it.”

...that only applied in scenarios where Franklin didn’t do anything.

“Call — RSK.”

Thus, Franklin called upon that creature.

Chapter Five: Yuri and Hugo

Yuri Gautier

My name is Yuri Gautier. This is the story of my past, and my present.

I was born in southern France, to a family most would call "upper class." My father was a self-made man of great wealth. My mother was an ex-theater actress, and even I, her child, could tell that she was very gentle and beautiful. I also had an elder sister, who was so smart, pretty, and nice to me that I could never stop boasting about her.

That was my family, and most onlookers would certainly suggest that I was blessed to have been born into such a household. However, as one who'd lived it, I had an entirely different opinion.

Though my father was a business genius, he was also greedy, arrogant, and often mistreated my mother, who bore it all while trying to hide the pain from us to the best of her ability. I could see something similar in my sister, too. Though she was always nice to me, I often felt that she was troubled about something.

I clearly remembered the days when my mother took me to the theater she used to act at before she got married. Her eyes as she looked at the plays weren't full of enjoyment or nostalgia — they were clouded with regret.

I could also recall seeing my sister in her room, clearly troubled by what the future would hold.

I lived my life without any inconveniences to speak of. My mother, sister, and even father were all nice to me. The world itself was a gentle place for me to be in. However, it seemed to be getting gradually worse for both my mother and sister.

That was my life for most of my childhood... until my parents got divorced.

And the reason why they did that was my sister's disappearance.

She'd disappeared without a trace after leaving a farewell letter, and though I didn't get to read it, it was obvious that she'd left of her own accord. I knew her reasons for doing that, and so, while I found it sad, I didn't think that it was the least bit strange.

Until a few years ago, my sister had been learning arts and crafts from our maternal grandfather. What had led her to this was the death of Dylan, our pet iguana.

It had made us both very sad, so our grandfather had tried to cheer us up with a handmade plaster figure that looked exactly like Dylan. Though our grandfather hadn't been good enough at this craft to be a recognized artist, my sister had liked the result very much — enough to try her hand at it herself while having our grandfather teach her. She continued making plaster figures even after he passed away.

The day before she disappeared, all the figures she'd made had been shattered, along with everything else our grandfather had left behind.

The one who did it was our father.

"How long can you keep doing this?! You're already arranged for marriage! He won't like the smell these things make!" he'd shouted as he shattered them one by one.

Standing before the pieces, my sister looked at him with the coldest eyes imaginable, left a letter, and simply walked out.

My father became furious, while my mother released the resentment she'd been holding in.

"This is all because she got involved with your old man and this stupid hobby!" yelled my father.

"No! It's all because you were never considerate of her feelings!" shouted my mother.

And so, this incident led to the obvious conclusion — divorce.

I was left in my mother's care, and the two of us moved to live away from him. From that time on, I was haunted by a certain thought:

I should've protected them.

Perhaps it was a childish idea, but I truly believed that things wouldn't have turned out this way if I'd been there for my mother and sister.

I sincerely wished that I could be someone able to protect them, like one of those noble princes or knights from the theater plays my mother often took me to. But at that point, I was already old enough to know that my wish would never come true, so I locked the desire away within me.

◆

However, a few years after the divorce, a certain thing actually made my wish come true.

It was a game called Infinite Dendrogram.

In its promotional line, it promised to “provide you with a new world and your very own unique possibility.”

I, Yuri Gautier, entered this world and became Hugo Lesseps — a High Pilot from the Dryfe Imperium.

Hugo was tall and always acted like a noble young man. I based his behavior on what I’d learned from the plays I saw, and I put a lot of effort into making it work. I also might’ve inherited some of my mother’s acting talent.

I wanted Hugo to be the realization of the wish I’d had since I was young: to be a knight that protected women and defeated any tragedies threatening them. I wished for my role as Hugo to be that of a beautiful flower’s thorn.

If there were no knights to protect women from tragedy, I’d become one myself.

That wish of mine might’ve been warped, but I’d continued playing this role for the entire month — or three months in game time — since I’d started Infinite Dendrogram.

But now, I’d become part of a plan which forced me to discard my role.

The plan was the result of cooperation between The Triangle of Wisdom and The Dryfe Imperium’s prime minister faction.

It was a wide-scale project that covered the entire city of Gideon, bringing tragedy to the innocent people living there. It even involved the kidnapping of a princess.

Normally, Hugo — the symbol of my ideal — would’ve avoided participating in the project even if it meant quitting the clan, but I had two reasons why I simply had to get involved.

The first was the fact that the success of this plan would greatly reduce the number of victims in the long term. If it caused the kingdom to give up, the war between it and the imperium would end without any more bloodshed. If this plan didn’t end the kingdom, the lives lost in the upcoming battles would be numerous. After all, about half of the imperium really wished for that to happen.

The country was split into two... or rather, three factions: The prime minister faction, the field marshall faction, and the imperator faction.

Prime Minister Vigoma was responsible for the country's internal affairs, and he was deeply troubled by the drop in national power due to the money they'd spent on the previous war. Back then, the imperium had gone crazy spending money to buy as many Masters as possible. That had resulted in Dryfe's victory, but it certainly hadn't been good for public finance. Not to mention that the kingdom had remained unconquered, meaning that the imperium had gotten far less than what they'd paid for.

And with the bar now being set, the reward couldn't be lowered. If Dryfe were to do that, the Masters would be as displeased as the kingdom's Masters had been when they hadn't been offered anything, which would result in a significant drop in participants. However, a reward like before could only be prepared one more time, and even if Dryfe ended up winning, the state of public finance would be horrid.

Therefore, the prime minister's faction had prepared this plan for the purpose of ending the war before it could restart. The Triangle of Wisdom had become a part of it because the imperium was their sponsor and they didn't want its economy to crash.

The faction led by the one in charge of the army, Field Marshall Barbaros, had a different opinion about what would be best.

It was nearly completely certain that war wouldn't end with just the kingdom and that Legendaria or Caldina would instantly become Dryfe's new enemies. Therefore, he believed that the best course of action was to demonstrate the imperium's might and military prowess while showing off the great rewards the country could give its Masters.

With that, Dryfe would attract new Masters and, in turn, increase its battle potential, deterring countries like Caldina from attacking them. The field marshall also believed that the money spent could be made up for with the kingdom's national treasury.

The one taking his side was the leader of the devil army: Hell General, Logan Goddhart. But he was merely a man who wanted battles where he could show off, so what interested him more was the method, rather than the goal.

Those two ideas had torn the country in half.

The third faction was the one led by the imperator himself. However, this faction didn't seem to have any solid ideas regarding the situation, nor did they comment on the two other factions, so that only served to polarize the country even further.

"The imperator doesn't care which faction wins this," said my clan leader. "To him, what matters isn't the process or the result, but the goal."

I didn't know what he'd meant by this, but eventually, the two factions had come to an agreement.

The prime minister's faction would go first, and if their plot worked and ended in the kingdom's annexation, the field marshall's faction would accept the results. However, if it failed and the war continued, the field marshall would get all the rights to restart the invasion.

If that happened, then the kingdom would surely suffer. Even if Dryfe won, they probably wouldn't stop at killing just the army or the Masters. It was entirely possible that the kingdom would lose far more than they would during the plan.

Therefore, I had to choose between a tragedy in the present or a calamity in the future.

I chose the former.

The plan would've happened even if I hadn't gotten involved, so I'd joined with the intention of increasing its success rate and ending it all right here and now. That was the first reason why I'd participated in the plan.

The second reason was extremely personal in comparison.

While the first reason was based in my role as Hugo, the second reason was completely my own.

It was because I greatly respected the main mind behind the plan, the one that most in Infinite Dendrogram knew as "Mr. Franklin."

"He" was the one who'd invited me to this world, who had instantly taken me to the clan, and who had helped me out with getting started. Not to mention that I myself wanted to be at Franklin's side and give him the help he needed.

My own feelings were half of the reason why I was standing here as one of the main parts of the plan.

That meant that, while half of my reason for getting involved in this tragedy was obligation, the other half was nothing but my own ego. This fact troubled me greatly.

Then he had come to me and promised that the player killers and the monsters would only attack Masters.

The monsters were designed in a way that limited their targets to Masters, while player killers wouldn't go for tians because they didn't want to get on wanted lists. With those facts, he promised that loss of tian life would be reduced greatly.

To him, harm done to tians didn't matter all that much, yet he promised this to me out of consideration for my feelings. Because of this, I'd decided to believe him and do my best to make the plan a success and to prevent the calamity from happening.

For the sake of being at his side and because of the trust between us, I — Hugo Lesseps the machine knight of ice and roses — had become a cog in this tragedy.

◆

And so came the day of the plan. It began the moment Figaro and Xunyu's duel in the central arena reached its conclusion.

The player killers in Gideon started hunting Masters as the few monsters released began destroying the city.

To take my mind off all the turmoil, I closed my eyes and silently sat in the seat of the Marshall II R that he'd given me.

About ten minutes after the plan began, I heard the sound of hooves galloping on the pavement. Then there were voices.

"That's a Magingear from Dryfe!"

"It's there to stop us from saving Her Highness!"

There was quite a bit of distance between us, but I could hear the contents of their conversation due to one of the Marshall II R's skills: Sound Collection.

I looked through the monitor showing the camera eye's output and saw that they were Paladins from the Royal Guard. Everyone in that group was a person of this world, not a Master. Therefore, they weren't my targets.

I moved the Marshall II R's arm and pointed at the sign I'd set up before the plan began.

"'No Master shall pass beyond this point...' That means we are allowed, yes?" asked a woman clad in flashy armor of pure white.

According to the information I'd been given, I was looking at the Vice Commander of the Royal Guard, Liliana Grandria. She was the exact same person to whom I'd explained the situation yesterday after bringing the children we'd saved from the Gouz-Maise Gang.

"Mh..." Not saying anything, I made my robot nod and moved aside, letting them pass through the gate.

"Very well," she said. "Then we shall pass and wait for Franklin in the Jeand Grasslands."

"Lady Grandria!" shouted one of her subordinates. "Can we really leave this Magingear here?!"

"Fighting in the city puts us at a disadvantage, not to mention that we would be caught between this Magingear and Franklin, once he arrives," Liliana told him. "Moreover, this Magingear is strong enough to be ordered to face Gideon's Masters all by its lonesome. Even if we emerged victorious against such a foe, we would most likely not have the strength to save Her Highness."

"...Understood."

After that exchange, the Royal Guard began going towards the gate while passing by my side. Some were wary of a potential surprise attack, some were tense, while others looked at me with nothing by hatred in their eyes.

This treatment wasn't unexpected. I knew and had already accepted the fact that I was doing something worthy of such reactions.

At the end of their unit was Liliana herself.

Before passing through the gate, she stopped next to my Marshall II R and began speaking. "You are the same person who helped Ray save the children from the Gouz-Maise Gang, yes?"

Though I hadn't said a word, she somehow knew who I was. I couldn't begin to understand what had given it away, but I was somehow able to hide my perplexity.

"You have my sincere thanks for that," she continued. "Also, as myself, rather than the head of the Royal Guard, I have another thing to say..."

She momentarily fell silent and looked at my Magingear's camera eye, staring at me through my monitor before continuing.

"Please don't upset Ray."

Unable to say anything back, I merely bowed lightly.

The Royal Guard passed the western gate and began preparing their formation for “his” arrival at the Jeand Grasslands.

Though I couldn’t help imagining what would happen to them in the fight, I could do nothing but turn away.

Franklin came right after I took care of the Masters that followed the Royal Guard. He told me to let Ray Starling pass, saying that he wanted to take care of him himself.

I’d imagined that I would be the one to fight Ray. I’d already told him that “It’s west.” If, by the time the plan began, he remembered the name of the clan I was part of, he would certainly realize that there was more to me saying that.

The reason I’d said that to him was my own hesitation. A single day with him as my comrade had been enough for me to know that he was like me — a person who couldn’t tolerate tragedies and considered the lives in this world to be worth as much as those on Earth.

In this plan, I’d chosen to be the one bringing about the tragedy, and I’d revealed the part of the plot to him exactly because I’d known he would try to stop it. Though I was part of the tragedy, I felt guilty enough to try and help stop it.

I had entrusted my hesitation — my wish to stop the tragedy — to him.

I'd made him the representation of these feelings, to see which side would win.

I was fully aware that it was much like using him as a coin toss. What I'd done was warped, selfish, and ugly, but it was something I just couldn't avoid doing.

After talking to me, Franklin passed the western gate and went outside. It wouldn't be long until he began fighting the Royal Guard.

Looking away from it, I tried my best to ignore the inevitable result of their battle.

A short while later, he finally arrived.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

The best word to describe the scene before me was "hellish."

The many ice sculptures littered all over the pavement made it somewhat reminiscent of a snow festival I'd gone to when I was little, but the fact that they were actually people frozen solid made my reaction a far cry from the joy I'd felt back then.

All of them had crests on the backs of their left hands, meaning that they were Masters, just like me. Normally, the sight would've left me feeling nothing but fear. However, I'd seen a humanoid frozen in this manner just yesterday, so I had the capacity for other sentiments.

Wordlessly, I looked at a nearby sign.

"'No Master shall pass beyond this point'?" Nemesis read, her voice resounding in my mind. "I reckon this is a warning."

Most likely. And I suppose the ice statues are what became of the Masters who ignored it, I thought.

Still, a part of me believed that it wasn't a warning. I felt as if it carried the meaning of "I can't and won't let you pass, so please, stay away." However, I might only be seeing it that way because I knew the one who'd created the hell before me.

The meaning of this sign contradicted his inviting me here, but I had a feeling that he was completely aware of that.

"Did you want me to come or not... Hugo?" I called.

"...I'm not sure about that myself, Ray." In the middle of the hell stood a mechanical frame, almost five meters in height and clad in bluish-white armor of frost. Each of its hands held ice blades reminiscent of crosses.

The entity bearing the overall appearance of an icy church was none other than the Type Maiden/Chariot Embryo known as Cocytus, while its Master was the man with whom I'd defeated the Gouz-Maise Gang, Hugo Lesseps. He and I had met again on this very day's afternoon and separated on good terms.

His tone now was very different compared to back then or yesterday. It seemed as though he was feeling very cornered.

"Where's Franklin... your clan leader?" I asked.

"Beyond the gate," he answered. "Right now, he's... fighting the Royal Guard."

"Hh...!"

Liliana's people are fighting him? I thought.

That certainly wasn't unexpected. Franklin had kidnapped the princess, so it was only obvious for them to face him. If it meant protecting what was dear to her, Liliana would ignore any dangers, no matter how great they were. I had known that part of her character ever since my very first day in Infinite Dendrogram.

"If that's how it is, we'll be passing through," I said.

"You can pass, but I can't say the same for your friends," he said as he made his Magingear point at Rook and the three girls behind me. "That is my role in this."

Wait... "You can pass?" What? I thought. "Why am I allowed?"

"I wasn't the one to decide that. 'He...' the boss... wants to fight you himself."

I was astonished. Franklin wants to fight... me? But the only link between us is the dog ear drug he gave me yesterday. Not to mention that I'm a newbie and there are many people stronger than me, so... why is he singling me out?

"Why?" I asked.

Hugo said nothing. Perhaps not even he knew the reason.

"...What matters here is that you can pass," he spoke up. "If you wish to stop him and save the princess... then go."

Hugo then moved to the side, clearing a path for me.

If I went on ahead, it would mean leaving Rook and the others behind, not to mention that...

"Go on ahead, Ray," said Rook, as if he knew what I was thinking. Of course, he probably did, and that was exactly why he'd said it.

"You're troubled by two things at once... by what's going on here and beyond the gates, yes?" he continued. "Then you should hurry up and go. I will fight this person in your stead."

"Rook..."

He clearly knew the questions that concerned me right now: "Should I really go on and leave Rook and the girls here?" and "Can I ignore Hugo while he's in such an unsteady state?"

"It's quite obvious that this is the friend who fought at your side yesterday," he continued. He looked directly at me. "I understand that you're wondering why he's taking part in this, and I can tell that you want to talk to him. And it's exactly because I can see all that that I'm saying that you should go on ahead. If you don't make it in time, you would surely regret it forever. That's why I'm suggesting that you go after Franklin."

"...Thanks, Rook... I leave him to you," I said.

"You can count on me!" he replied as I grabbed hold of Silver's reins and turned to the gate.

While facing the frozen hell before me, I was a bit concerned that I'd get frozen like the rest, but upon entering it, I realized that my worries were needless, for it didn't even make me feel the least bit cold.

And so, I rode Silver towards the gate, but then...

...Hugo's robot moved to block my path.

"Hugo," I said.

"...Ray," he spoke through the speakers with a voice bearing no certainty, as though he was wringing it out after having hesitated a lot.

Following a short silence, during which he was likely thinking about whether he should say it or not, Hugo continued his words.

"I'm sorry to fall back on my word... but could you fight me? Just one exchange of all-out attacks will do."

I didn't know what was going on in his mind, and I couldn't tell why he'd decided to say that, but it didn't take long for me to give my answer.

"All right." I nodded as I brandished Nemesis in her black greatsword form. "I have many questions to ask and lots of things to say to you, but for now, I'll leave it at just one attack each."

“...Merci,” he said as I and his robot stood to face each other.

There was about 15 meters between us. With me being saddled on Silver and Hugo riding his Magingear, that distance might as well have not been there.

I instantly began charging towards him, trying to get past his Magingear’s right side.

“Motor Slash!” shouted the voice from the speakers as the robot swung its right cross-blade towards me with all the speed it could muster.

Magingear were said to be Demi-Dragon-tier, and that was an attack bearing the mecha’s whole weight and power. It menaced me more than the Demi-Dragon Worm’s charge, and I could tell that it would easily split me in half if it landed.

“Counter Absorption!” Nemesis exclaimed, preventing that from happening with her barrier of light.

“Vengeance is Mine!” I added, following it up with a counterattack from my blade. That shattered the Magingear’s frozen armor and bent its inner frame.

And with that single exchange of blows, the battle was over and we had switched positions.

With my back turned to him, I charged towards the outside of the gate, entrusting my friend... to another friend.

◆◆◆

Triangle of Wisdom member, High Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

After our momentary battle, I watched as Ray headed out through the gate.

The battle had ended with Ray remaining unharmed and my Marshall II R’s right arm being significantly damaged. If that was all that had to be considered, it would’ve been my loss. However, I’d just taken something important from him...

“So he used it...” I muttered.

Counter Absorption.

It was a defensive skill unique to Nemesis. Though immensely powerful, Ray had told me that it had a stock of uses. If it had run out during his battle against Gouz-Maise, the amount he’d restocked by now was one. And I’d made him use it on me.

To Ray, who was about to fight "him," it was a shackle he couldn't ignore. I'd asked Ray to go all-out because I'd believed he would do exactly that.

What I'd done just now was nothing but betrayal of a friend who — if only for a day — had fought at my side. I'd sent him to certain death and even cut his sole lifeline.

Though it was a bitter choice for me to make, I had done it regardless.

After all, I didn't want to simply let "his" enemy through.

I hadn't been able to stay out of it with Ray heading there with a do-or-die spirit and endless resolve. It was something I'd done because I'd tried to shoulder everything — my emotions, my sins, and my role as an accomplice.

Oh... seriously... why am I so...?

"For you, that was... Nh?!" Cyco spoke up, but before she could finish, a sudden impact cut her words short.

It was caused by a charge attack from the Tri-Horn Demi-Dragon and additional attacks from the Master riding it — Ray's friend.

"Do excuse me," he said. "You happened to be full of openings."

As I tried to fix my frame's posture, the Master, his Tri-Horn, and the succubus — presumably his Embryo — continued the barrage. There was no hesitation or mercy in his attacks, making it evident that he would've ended it with this sole surprise attack if I'd allowed it.

"You're so unfaaair," said Cyco.

"Now that is uncalled for," he replied. "I already said that I'd be the one fighting you. It's not my fault that you got lost in thought."

"Heh heh," I chuckled. "For someone who appears to be Ray's friend, you're certainly different from him."

While Ray was somewhat irrational, tactless, and single-faced, this guy here was logical and calculating to the core.

The expression he was giving me was nothing like the one he'd given Ray. It was cold, and the lack of even a hint of a smile, combined with his well-structured face, made it somewhat frightening.

I felt like he was fine-tuning the impression he gave to other people, much like I did when playing the role of a knight. However, his mask seemed to be far thicker than mine.

"Perhaps," he said. "That might be why I respect Ray so much. Ah, that aside..."

Still sitting on the back of the Demi-Dragon, the Master, Rook, looked at me with some of the coldest eyes I'd ever seen... much like the ones my sister had had on that fateful day.

"...I think I hate you," he continued, his words puzzling me to no end.

Sound Collection then picked up the succubus — likely his Embryo — muttering, "That's the first time Rook's ever said that to someone."

"...Heh," I chuckled. "Hated on the first encounter. Now that's something."

"Perhaps it is," he replied. "But you're simply loathsome. You're so indecisive and uppity that you remind me of a certain someone."

"Incomprehensible nonsense..."

"Is it really?" His gaze had enough power to make me know that he was absolutely sure about something. It felt as though he was aware that I'd averted my eyes to many things and couldn't be definite about anything.

"...I have no idea what you mean," I said. "Regardless, I'll have you freeze where you stand."

I fixed my mech's posture, bashed the Tri-Horn away with my armor, and made some distance between us.

"I cannot allow any Masters besides 'him' and Ray to pass here," I continued. "As a member of the Triangle of Wisdom and as a thorn protecting him... I shall give my all to this battle."

"Very well," he replied. "Then I will use everything I have to defeat you and pass through. I'll do this as Ray's friend... and as myself."

Standing on the Demi-Dragon with the succubus at his side, he faced me.

After a momentary silence and an exchange of glares, I finally spoke up. "High Pilot: Hugo Lesseps, and Embryo: Cocytus."

This was a ritual. I would defeat Ray's friend and prevent him from attaining his goal. This was a ritual for that purpose... and a "duel."

"Pimp: Rook Holmes, Embryo: Babylon, and minions: Marilyn and Audrey." He responded in the same way.

"May the fight..." I said before taking a breath.

"...begin!" we both declared.

The duel had begun.

Chapter Six: The Duel in the Frozen Hell

Past, Lucius Holmes

I was born in the United Kingdom. London, to be precise. I was born into a household that was neither wealthy nor noble nor poor. It wasn't all that special in terms of social status. But it certainly wasn't normal, either.

My father was a detective running an agency focused on solving unresolved cases, while my mother was a thief who specialized in stealing works of art.

Indeed — I was the son of a thief and a detective. Though it sounded like the premise to a joke, it was nothing but the truth.

My father was much like a protagonist of a mystery novel, solving many cases no one else could, while my mother was a movie-like secretive robber who traveled the world and stole things of great value. Both of their families had been doing those things for several generations.

I'd even been told that my father's side had taken the surname "Holmes" because his great-grandfather had changed it when starting his detective work, basing it on the most famous detective in the world. It didn't seem to have mattered to him that it was a work of fiction.

How my parents had met, gotten married, and made a son was a mystery for the ages.

I'd once asked my father why he wasn't arresting my mother. He had replied, "A detective's job is to uncover the truth, not to catch criminals." I'd found that questionable, to say the least.

The curiosities didn't end there, either, for my mother was a thief who always returned the works she'd stolen after a couple of weeks of enjoying them. In fact, most of the time, she stole objects that the owners had acquired by illegal means, and handed them over to the police.

Apparently, her goal wasn't money, but the very process of thievery. "A thief's job is to steal, not to sell," she once told me.

To be honest, I wasn’t quite sure if “thief” counted as a “job.”

Anyway, both of them loved their trades and always gave their all to them, leaving little time for us to spend as a family. Still, exactly because they were so focused on using their talents to do what they so loved, they had been quick to notice a certain thing about me when I was young.

Lucius is extremely gifted.

Insight, observational ability, imagination, dexterity, reflexes, appearance... I’d inherited the talents from both my parents and had even more potential on those fronts than either of them, giving me the makings of both a detective and a master thief. Naturally, my parents had been extremely pleased with that.

With both of them being so passionate about their family business, the two of them thought the same thing:

This talent must not be wasted. I want to nurture him into a great detective/thief, but I can’t ignore my beloved’s wishes, either.

Thus, they came to a certain agreement.

They would take turns giving me their special education.

My father would train my observational abilities, teach me lip-reading, world languages, and the workings of the human mind, while my mother would instruct me in trap disarmament, finding people’s blind spots, and the means of charming and manipulating people.

When I was young, it was set in stone that they would be training my mind and body based on this plan. But neither of them ever ordered me to become a detective or a master thief. Instead, they continually emphasized that they would nurture my talents, and leave me to decide what life I would lead.

A part of me thought that acquiring such a specific set of skills would limit my choices to either detective or thief, but I wasn’t unsatisfied with that.

As I got older and began to reflect upon my life so far, I started to realize that limitations like that were only natural when a person had trained in such things for as long as they could remember, because experiences like that were what became the basis of self.

My education had included common sense and sociology, through which I’d discovered that my standards and values were wildly different from those society considered “universal.”

Knowing that my situation wasn't the least bit normal, I finally concluded that "It's normal in my family, and when talking to those with different standards, I should simply adjust accordingly," which I felt was a thought that truly highlighted the fact that I was my parents' son.

Anyway, after ten years of their special education, by the time I was fifteen years of age, I had acquired almost all of the skills my parents had. I hadn't neglected self-study, either, so I was confident that my total abilities had already exceeded theirs.

Then, when I was just a few years away from becoming an adult and starting to think about what kind of future I'd choose, something happened.

My parents died in a plane accident.

While they were out on a trip together — which was rare for them — their plane crashed. I was contacted about it shortly afterward.

Though I grieved their deaths, a part of me wondered if that would've truly been enough to kill them. It wasn't a denial of reality — I just reasonably assumed that their skills and experience would have allowed them to survive a normal plane crash.

The day afterward, the news showed that several children wearing parachutes and life jackets had been found in the middle of the sea. They had all come from the same plane that had killed my parents. When the media asked them about their experience, the children said, "A tall man and a pretty lady put parachutes on us."

With that, everything made sense. Apparently, rather than focusing on their own survival, my parents had chosen to bet on the possibility of saving the children.

As a fresh orphan, I wished they had considered me and prioritized their own survival, but at the same time, a great sense of pride filled my chest. I felt nothing but respect for what they'd done. Though, for reasons unknown, tears were running down my face.

Following their death, I got everything in order and took a break from life's stresses.

My parents had already taught me how to go through such formalities, so I was able to inherit their land, house, and money without much trouble. With all I had, I could easily live out the rest of my life with no inconveniences to speak of.

However, I couldn't just do nothing, so I... I...

“...Ah.”

That was when I realized that I didn’t have a vision of my own future.

Silly as it was, despite the fact that I was a genius who’d learned everything my parents could teach me, I didn’t notice that until that very moment.

With all the love they’d given me, I’d been comfortable in a life comprised of nothing but honing the skills my parents had bestowed upon me, and thus I’d ended up a person who hadn’t made a single decision in his entire life. I’d followed the road my parents had prepared for me and lived doing very little besides clearing the challenges they’d presented me with, and so I had next to no experience in choosing how I wished to live. That was something that I’d left for “someday,” rather than “today.”

I could vaguely picture the future me making such a choice, but the present me simply didn’t have the guidelines for it. Surrounded by my parents’ love, I’d led a passive life where I couldn’t even shape an image of the person I wished to be.

“Just how should I live?” I asked myself, feeling as though I’d been thrown into an empty wasteland.

It was as if I had water, food, a compass, the knowledge and the ability to survive, but I didn’t have the slightest clue as to my destination. Regardless of whether I went north, east, south, or west, I had no idea what awaited me, and even if I found something, I wouldn’t know what to do with it. I was completely lost, but no amount of thinking brought me closer to a choice.

Well, this is bad, I thought. If I didn’t mend that, I might end up a person who did nothing but live.

Wholly puzzled, I began considering what I should do.

First, I decided check whether or not my parents had left me a message or something in their rooms. A little voice in my head scolded me for searching for my own destination by going through my late parents’ things, but I chose to ignore it.

I started by searching my mother’s room.

It held a trap that, once activated, would burn down the whole room and any potential evidence it could’ve had. I was able to disarm it, but I couldn’t help giving a passing thought to the fact that things could’ve ended badly if this house had been given to someone else.

The only notable thing in my mother's room was her work equipment. There were no stolen works of art. With it being a room that could burn down, I hadn't really been expecting any, and a glance at her diary made it obvious that she hadn't had anything she hadn't yet returned. I was thankful for that, since I would've had to be the one to bring back whatever she'd stolen. Still, a part of me would've liked to have a new goal, however meager.

Aside from her work equipment, the only thing of note was an incomplete hand-knit sweater.

I moved on to my father's room.

Unlike with mother's room, there were no traps to speak of, and I could easily get in with just a key.

Of course, it's probably not normal to expect traps in situations like this, I thought to myself.

Upon entering, I instantly noticed something. On father's work desk, there was an unfamiliar object — a headgear-type piece of electronic equipment.

"Isn't this for Infinite Dendrogram?" I muttered.

The game was part of general knowledge at this point, so I was aware of its existence. It was well-known as a dive-type VRMMO that had gained popularity all across the world. I'd always been busy with my training and studies, so I hadn't had time for games, nor was I particularly interested in them. At most, my father and I had played the occasional match of chess.

"Was Father playing it?" I murmured.

He'd been extremely busy with his detective work and my training, so I found it strange that he'd had any time for it.

After leaving the device where it was, I began looking around and found a single letter in one of his drawers.

At first, I thought that it was his will or something, but I quickly realized that it was a letter he'd received from someone. I considered not reading it at first, but a glimpse at the content had me notice the words Infinite Dendrogram, so I let my curiosity get the better of me.

Apparently, my father had accepted an anonymous request related to the game.

The sender had asked him to uncover its secrets. They believed that Infinite Dendrogram was part of some conspiracy, and had offered my father great amounts of money for a thorough investigation.

Much later, when I looked through the mail, I came across another letter which seemed to be from the same sender. It was condolences regarding his death and a withdrawal of the request, but not of the advance payment. Apparently, the sender was a person of integrity.

Anyway, I was standing before the Infinite Dendrogram game machine left behind by my father. It was a game that someone had asked him, a famous detective, to investigate. Naturally, I was interested, but more than that, I felt a strong desire to "choose."

Having lost sight of where to go, I felt as though it could open up a new path for me.

"If I recall correctly, this game's promotional line is..."

Infinite Dendrogram will provide you with a new world and your very own unique possibility.

I felt as if it was directed at me.

No other words could intrigue a person who'd lost sight of where to go as much as those. And right now, at this moment, that person was me.

"Very well, provide me with that, then."

Present me your new world.

"I hope you can point me to it."

To my possibility.

"Let's go," I said as I put on the headgear in my father's study and entered the world of Infinite Dendrogram.

◇◇◇

Duel city Gideon, western gate, Pimp, Rook Holmes

"Motor Slash!"

"MHOOOOOOOOOOO!"

The frozen Magingear's pilot used its left arm to launch the same skill as before, to which Marilyn responded with the physical attack called "Tri-Horn Upper."

Next, he will quickly draw out and fire that large gun, so... Babi, Little Flare, I thought.

"Okaaay!" she replied.

"Ah!" the pilot exclaimed in surprise as the low-rank fire spell that Babi had gotten through Drain Learning hit the projectile right before it escaped the gun. The resulting explosion destroyed the muzzle, rendering it impossible for him to use the weapon again.

Next, he will stomp with his right leg and slash upwards with the left blade, so...

"(Liz, move,)" I said, not with audible words, but with slight vibrations in my throat. Since she was in direct contact with my whole body, Liz could feel them going through my skeletal frame, allowing us to communicate without me even having to speak.

Of course, Babi had her beaten on this front, since I could coordinate with her just by thinking.

"...!"

I heard the pilot express his surprise again as I dodged his blade with a backwards jump.

I was able to do that thanks to Liz smoothly extending herself to my heels while making sure that he couldn't see it, and then hitting the ground in a way that made the impact take me backwards. With that, I was now at a distance at which he couldn't hit me again.

An opening at the back right. Two seconds long.

"Marilyn, attack," I ordered.

"MHOOOOOOOO!"

"Mrrgh... So annoying," his Embryo complained as the Magingear turned around and used both blades to stop Marilyn's charge right before she hit. She didn't build up all that much speed to begin with, so the damage wasn't significant.

"This sure is difficult to deal with," said the pilot. "It's as though you're foreseeing our every move... No, you are, aren't you?"

Indeed I am, I thought.

Magingear were humanoid and mechanical, so their operative range was easier to grasp than that of humans or other living creatures. I could predict the Magingear's movements even better than I'd been able to predict Audrey's during our aerial battle.

This technique was called "movement observation," and I'd learned it from either my mother or father. I wasn't certain which.

"Yes," I said. "After all, unlike speed-focused Superior Jobs, you don't fight at supersonic speeds or outright disappear from vision."

“Heh,” he chuckled. “You talk as though you’ve fought a Superior Job before.”

I did, I thought. I lost ten times in a row, though.

Still, fighting her, a person moving at speeds impossible in our world’s framework, had increased the precision of my movement observation.

“So if things go on like this, we will be at a disadvantage...” the pilot said.

“Yes.” I nodded. “It’s true that your Magingear has great stats, and the enhance skill that you High Pilots surely have makes them even greater. However, in the end, it’s still merely a slightly improved Demi-Dragon-class entity.”

In other words, Marilyn, who was a Demi-Dragon, could provide a decent challenge to it. The openings her crash attacks created could then be targeted by Babi, who could use the many skills she’d acquired through Drain Learning during the recent hunt.

Though the skills she’d gained were only those of the low-level monsters we could handle, the number she’d amassed easily surpassed fifty. On that front, she was above even Superior Jobs like Marie.

As for me... Since my opponent was inside the Magingear, Charm was rendered useless, so I could only be a target for him to focus on. Still, evading his attacks left him open to ours, and no matter how many of them I avoided, he would still go for me. After all, Babi was my Embryo and Marilyn was my minion, so it would all end if I fell.

My whole body was like a weak spot for us, which was why I had Liz focusing on assisting my evasive maneuvers rather than attacking.

We also did it in a manner that didn’t give it away, since I had a certain play in mind.

“So, at this rate, we will use up all our energy...” the pilot muttered.

Though the Magingear had higher stats than any of us, my movement observation and our powers combined made it entirely possible for us to come out on top. However...

“But I do wonder how long you can stay unfrozen while La Porte de l’Enfer is active,” he added, pointing out the greatest problem on my end. My left hand was already Frozen from the elbow down.

I had no doubt that it was the same attack he’d used on the more experienced Masters around us, turning them into the ice statues they now were. Then there was the fact that I'd had to return Audrey into the Jewel right after taking her out because she'd had half of her body completely Frozen.

The amount of ice on me was slowly increasing, making it obvious that I would eventually become like the other Masters here. Rather than increasing continually, it seemed to increase at regular intervals, somewhere between a few ten to a hundred or so seconds.

First, it had covered my hand and a bit of my wrist; then it had covered most of my forearm; now it extended to my elbow. Though the amount I Froze each time was about the same, the intervals were all over the place. The second time had come 39 seconds after the initial freeze, while the third had happened 130 seconds after the second.

The greatest common divisor for those numbers was 13, so it might have been related to the Embryo's name and the skill's name: "Cocytus" and "the gate of hell."

"What does it mean?" asked Babi telepathically.

Well, Babi, I thought in response, In Dante's Divine Comedy, Cocytus is the name of the Ninth Circle of Hell, which is the frozen hell where the treacherous go. It's where Christ's thirteenth apostle and the greatest traitor in Christianity, Judas, gets his punishment. Some suggest that during the Last Supper, before betraying Christ, he sat in the thirteenth chair. And there's also the fact that thirteen is considered to be an ominous number in Christianity.

"Ohh, so she is an ominous Embryo, right?" said Babi.

For me, at the very least.

If things continued as they had been, I had a high chance of winning, but if I Froze before that happened, I would become unable to arrive at that result. Therefore, I had to use one of the aces up my sleeve, but I couldn't ignore his La Porte de l'Enfer. After all, there was no guarantee that using it wouldn't cause me to become a Frozen statue, just like the rest of the Masters here.

Thus, I began by solving the mystery behind it.

"(Liz, I need a moment to focus on thinking, so you prioritize evasion and defense. As long as you make sure that he doesn't see you, I can leave it all to you.)"

A moment later, my body began being swayed around as Liz, my coat, started moving on her own will. It wasn't exactly comfortable, but it didn't hinder my thought processes.

And so, I began thinking.

I looked around with my erratic vision, and the thing that stood out the most was the pallid ice trapping each of the Masters.

The one thing about the ice statues that really caught my eye were their still faces. Based on their expressions, I could tell that they'd gotten Frozen before they'd even realized it. As in, their whole bodies had been Frozen right from the start. From that, I could conclude that there were four... no, three ways this skill affected its targets.

First, there was the way experienced by me and Audrey: those who got Frozen partially and had it grow over time.

Then there were the ice statues around us: those who got completely Frozen in an instant.

And finally, there were Babi and Marilyn: those who didn't get Frozen at all.

The targets and the skill's effects on them were based on some criteria, and until I knew what it was, I couldn't use my trump card due to the risk of it causing me to turn into an ice statue.

Does it Freeze everyone except for the ones chosen by him? I wondered.

Negative. If that were the case, then Babi, Marilyn, and Liz would've gotten frozen, as well.

Does it Freeze only humans?

Negative. Audrey had been affected, as well.

Perhaps the amount Frozen is proportional to level and stats?

Negative. That wouldn't explain the difference in effect between Marilyn and Audrey, who were just about equal in that regard.

Maybe it's just random?

Negative. That simply wasn't the case, since a luck-based skill wasn't reliable enough to be used in holding important locations or fighting many strong individuals.

There was definitely a certain degree of rule and regularity to it.

"Oaaaaghh!" the pilot roared and made his Magingear slip by Marilyn and Babi, charging at me with its right blade held high, ready for a downwards swing.

"Oh?" I said.

Well, he's closing in on me, I thought. I won't really be able to read his movements completely until I uncover the secret behind his skill, so...

Liz seemed to have decided to try and bear the attack by enhancing the part of the coat it would hit, and according to my calculations based on the estimated damage, Liz's defenses, my own HP and END, I had a 70% chance of dying. There was nothing I could really do during the two seconds before the blade would hit me.

So I'll spend those two seconds thinking and getting the answers I need to know so that I can attain victory when I survive.

"M..." he began shouting his skill as I changed my approach to the mystery I was solving.

Embryo names and their skills weren't unrelated.

For example, Ray's Nemesis was based on a goddess of retribution and was focused on counterattacks, while Marie's Arc-en-Ciel — rainbow — launched bullets of several different colors.

"...o..."

So, I focused on the name of his Embryo — Cocytus.

In Greek myth, it was the river of lament, while in Dante's Divine Comedy, it was the lowest Circle of Hell, the frozen lake.

"...t..."

From the current situation and the name of the skill — "gate of hell" — I could infer that it was based on the latter.

Cocytus was the hell meant for those who had committed treachery, considered to be the greatest sin of all. There, Satan, frozen up to his waist, was continuously gnawing at Judas and other traitors.

It was obvious by now that the name was related to the 13 second counter and the frost, but I felt like there was more to it.

"...o..."

For example, it was possible that the skill had a greater effect on traitors. It would explain why Audrey, who had originally been Gardranda's mount, had been affected the most, and... No, that couldn't be it. After all, it was highly unlikely that the Frozen Masters here were all traitors that could make Judas proud.

"...r..."

Then perhaps, like most hells, it is based on some sort of karma system?

I didn't see it in any of the informational windows, but there could be some sort of hidden stat which recorded the vile deeds done and... no, that couldn't be it, either. The difference in damage just wouldn't make sense if that were the case. Just like with treachery, it was hard to believe that each and every Master here had had enough negative karma to Freeze in only an instant.

"...S..."

I can't quite put my finger on it, I thought. What makes it a hell and what does it count as "betrayal"?

It would be far easier if there were some sort of record that displayed treachery as a concrete number, and...

...Hm? A concrete number?

"...l..."

I was actually aware of something that fit the criteria. It could easily be interpreted as treachery and could be linked to the difference in effect between the entities here.

"...a..."

I had found my answer. This number was the secret behind his skill, and its greatness was what determined its power.

For Babi and Marilyn, the number was 0. I'd gotten some just a short while ago. Audrey had gotten several dozens during yesterday's hunt. And the experienced Masters who had Gideon as their main haunt had it far above 100.

"...sh...!"

Indeed, the number that La Porte de l'Enfer was based on was—

Two seconds had passed. Just as I'd expected, the Motor Slash he'd launched landed directly on me.

As some of my silver hair got scattered into the wind, I was blasted away straight into Gideon's outer wall.

◇◇◇

These were the memories of a not-so-distant past.

Upon logging in to Infinite Dendrogram using the headgear in my father's study, strangely enough, I found myself in another study, this one significantly more old-fashioned.

"Hellooo and welcommme!" In the study, there was a talking cat.

“I am the control AI called ‘Cheshiire,’” it said. “What’s wrooong?”

As I stared at the feline creature, I felt something really odd.

Due to the special education I’d gotten, I saw the world in a manner different than any normal person or even my parents, the ones who’d taught me. By simply observing people, I could uncover the truths about their personalities or see what they were hiding behind their spoken words, allowing me to more or less guess what they were thinking.

With those I was familiar with, my mind-reading success rates were as high as 99%. That number wasn’t nearly as great with people and animals I’d just met, but I could still make a decent guess as to what they were thinking or feeling.

However, the creature before me — Cheshire — was completely unreadable to me. I’d felt as if it didn’t even fit the categories of “feline,” “human” or even “living being.” It felt like I was looking at something beyond human comprehension merely pretending to be a cat.

“Well... perhaps this is normal for control AIs...?” I muttered.

“Umm... Is anything the matter?” asked Cheshire.

“Oh, it’s nothing. My name is Lucius Holmes. A pleasure to meet you.”

Thus began my tutorial.

Soon enough, we got to the character creation stage.

“Will you keep your name as ‘Lucius Holmes’?” asked the cat.

“Can’t I?” I replied with a question.

“You can, but it’s not recommennnded.”

As I began thinking of another name, I noticed something that was in the study.

It was a chessboard. The pieces on it were placed in a way that made it seem as though the players had disappeared in the middle of the game, and one piece — a rook — had the enemy king placed in check.

“I will be ‘Rook Holmes,’” I said. I had good memories of playing chess with my father, so it felt somewhat... right to base my name on something from the game.

“Very welll. Now, for the appearaaance,” said the cat.

I didn’t make any notable changes in that regard. I’d spent many years training to move and act with my own body, so I kept it the same to prevent any potential feelings of malaise. The only thing I changed was the hair color. Instead of keeping the blond I’d inherited from my father, I made it a silver just like my mother's.

Thus, I began the game.

At the end of the tutorial, Cheshire told me that I was free to do whatever I chose to in this world. I could uncover the truths about it, steal its secrets, simply play it, or perhaps even live in it. To my mind, it seemed like good practice at choosing what kind of life I wished to lead.

On my first day in Infinite Dendrogram, the Embryo implanted in my left arm hatched, creating Babi.

"Hellooo! Let's get along, Rook!" She had been exactly the same back then as she was now.

I couldn't help but wonder why she had been the one born as my Embryo. Cheshire had told me that it would be created and evolve based on my own personality and experiences. I was curious as to why those things had resulted in Babi, and that was a question which I had yet to answer.

On my second day in Infinite Dendrogram, I'd realized that, despite not having any relevant skills, I could use the techniques I'd acquired in reality without any problem whatsoever. This world had sense skills such as "Mental Analysis," but I felt that they were weaker than the same abilities of those who'd brought them over from reality.

Anyway, unlike in on-screen games, Infinite Dendrogram had avatars to which I could apply my techniques and analyze the people controlling them.

In real life, I'd used this ability to examine the true faces of those I was talking to and determine whether they were worthy of trust. People's minds were different from the expressions they showed. It was especially common to find those who seemed to be cheerful, but were actually gloomy at heart. This was something I'd taken for granted, as it was only a natural part of the human condition.

And that was exactly why my first meeting with Ray greatly surprised me.

After all, there was no difference between what he appeared to be and what he really was.

Not even his Nemesis surprised me as much as he himself did.

What made his existence a true enigma was the fact that his Infinite Dendrogram avatar seemed to be no different from him as a player.

This world was presented as a game, so differences between the players and the roles they took in their avatars was a given. But Ray showed no signs of showing off, playing some character, or hiding some complex he had in reality.

At first, I thought that Infinite Dendrogram had reduced the effectiveness of my people-observation abilities, so I'd made it my first goal to uncover the mysteries behind him, and I'd reached my conclusion far quicker than expected.

I'd talked to him, met with him again, fought at his side as we'd faced the likes of the Goblin horde and Gardranda, and that had been more than enough for me to know that Ray was simply himself — an honest person with no fronts to speak of. In his heart of hearts, he saw no difference between the two worlds.

The determination he'd displayed during the battle against the Goblins or Gardranda, the grief in his eyes when he'd talked about the children lost during his battle against the Gouz-Maise Gang, and the anger he was currently feeling towards Franklin were all very real.

Ray wasn't roleplaying a character called "Ray Starling" — he stood in this world as none other than himself, and put his very being into his existence here.

He could instantly choose what he had to do in any particular place and time, and he always gave his utmost to achieve his goals, regardless of what hardships awaited him and no matter how low the possibility of success was.

Ray lived genuinely and earnestly.

Unlike me, who was always indecisive, he always had his heart provide an answer for which he would give his all.

"I mean, it would leave a bad taste in my mouth."

Ray was a person who constantly chose actions he wouldn't regret and always acted in earnest to achieve them, and that was exactly why I wished to support him. I was a person who couldn't even choose his own path in life, but seeing Ray and the honesty he displayed when giving his all to face the challenges before him made me want to help him.

For his sake and by his side, I wished to fight in Infinite Dendrogram.

Therefore...

◇◇◇

“...I will defeat you, here and now,” I declared as my momentary flashback ended and I stood up from the outer wall’s rubble, facing the Magingear piloted by Hugo Lesseps and his Embryo, Cocytus.

“For a Pimp, you sure are tough,” he said. “I didn’t expect you to be able to stand after that attack.”

I couldn’t agree more. I’d calculated my probability of survival at about 30%, but even I was surprised at how little damage the attack had done to me.

The most likely cause of this was the Magingear’s right arm. Just by looking at it, I could tell that the frame under its icy armor was bent.

It had been caused by Ray’s Vengeance is Mine, and its effect on the arm had greatly lowered the damage I’d received in this attack.

“I can’t lose here,” I said.

“Heh,” he chuckled. “Don’t expect to be so lucky with my next attack. Also...”

I knew exactly what he was going to say. The ice on me had already reached the top of my shoulder.

The fact the attack hadn’t shattered my arm was quite a stroke of luck.

“...La Porte de l’Enfer continues to consume you,” he continued.

“True,” I replied. “You might say that your skill has me in check.”

I momentarily fell silent, regained my breath and spoke up again.

“After all... I defeated several humans in the plaza battle against the player killers.”

That was part of the conclusion I’d reached.

“...What is that supposed to mean?” he asked, and the momentary pause before his reply was all the confirmation I needed.

“That’s what this skill is based on, right?” I asked.

Even more confirmation couldn’t hurt, so I opened my menu — making sure that Hugo could see it — and looked at the window where the core of the skill known as “La Porte de l’Enfer” lay.

“Battle history window, extras section, creature type kill counters,” I continued. “La Porte de l’Enfer’s effects are based on ‘the kill count for the same type of creatures as yourself,’ correct?”

Creature type kill counters kept a record of the total number of kills of separate creature types, such as undead, beast, avian, dragon, devil, elemental, demon... or human.

"The 'betrayal' that Cocytus looks at is the kill count for creatures of your own type, and it's what dictates the extent of your La Porte de l'Enfer's powers," I went on.

He said nothing.

"The number of 'humans' I've killed is 7. What a coincidence... my body seems to be Freezing about 7% at a time."

I also had access to Audrey's kill counts. Her type was "avian," and she'd killed a significant number of such creatures during yesterday's hunt. The exact number was 58, so it made perfect sense that the skill had Frozen over half of her body.

We'd had yet to fight any devils or dragons, so Babi and Marilyn's counters were at 0, which explained why they hadn't Frozen at all.

And, of course...

...it includes the kills made within the barriers of duel cities such as this one, I thought. Those who frequent this city have probably killed hundreds of people.

Experienced Masters gathering in duel city Gideon had likely spent a lot of time in the arenas, and even if it had happened within barriers, they'd probably killed a number of humans that surpassed 100.

"To add to this, the number is also applied to the chance of it happening every 13 seconds, yes?" I asked.

Sometimes, I got away without Freezing, while the other Masters had all completely Frozen right at the start.

"The description for La Porte de l'Enfer is 'Gives an X% chance to Freeze X% of the selected target's body every 13 seconds. X is the number on the target's kill counter for the same creature type as the target.' Am I correct?"

That meant I had a 7% chance to Freeze 7% of my body every 13 seconds, while those with 100 on the counter had a 100% chance to Freeze completely. The skill also ignored resistances to some extent, seeing as it was unlikely that every single Master here didn't have anything that lowered the effects of the Frozen debuff.

"This skill is the reason why you're standing guard here," I continued. "Most of the kingdom's Masters in duel city Gideon are here for the arenas, so your skill is nothing but their bane. It makes sense to have you block the escape route."

Those who'd fought against many of their kind and become powerful in the process would have that experience work against them. Any and all traitors, killers of their own kin, would be encased in the ice of the frozen hell.

"An interesting guess, but it's based on nothing but circumstantial evidence," he said. "To me, it looks like your conditions merely happened to meet the result."

"Ha ha ha," I laughed. "Your tone just now confirmed that I'm right. You're bad at lying and fooling people, aren't you?"

I could tell without even seeing his face.

"And that's why I hate you," I added.

"That's not the first time you've said that," he replied. "If I may ask, what do you mean by 'and that's why'? Do you like people who are good at lying?"

His words made me heave a long sigh.

He still doesn't get it, I thought. ...No, he probably does.

"I certainly don't like people who can lie well... but I hate those who make their inner doubts and dishonesties so obvious," I answered.

"...What?"

Well, now, should I say it? If I provoke him too much, the time might... You know, I'll just make it a bit harsh and relatively long. He's probably the type to get mad after hearing people out.

"You're like Ray, aren't you?" I asked. "As in, one of those who sees this world as a world, rather than as a game, yes?" I said. "Despite that, your actions are just so... so irritating."

"'Irritating'?" he repeated.

I gathered the slight bit of depression he made me feel and put it into words.

"It irritates me how you've taken up a role in Franklin's game and become complicit in this tragedy, yet you talk and behave in a way that reeks of excuses like 'I must' or 'There's no other way.' It irritates me how you spin your reasoning to try and justify your actions, yet you give it a preface of 'Oh I'm so terrible,' basically making excuses for your excuses. Then there's your exchange with Ray. It irritates me how you, with all your indecisiveness, have the gall to stand in his way. It irritates me how even you felt guilt after doing it, yet you just took to thinking something like ‘Another sin for my scroll,’ basically wallowing in your own guilt. Speaking of wallowing, it irritates me how you’re so full of yourself that you talk with that theatrical elocution. Truly, you’re irritating beyond words.”

As I went on, I realized that I was even more vexed than I’d thought. Still, my volubility took over, and I simply couldn’t stop.

“Oh, and I’m irritated by the church-like design!” added Babi. “We’re just so done with you!”

“Y-You...!” he said with anger.

“K-Kill...” his Embryo joined.

I see... “done,” eh? I thought. I guess that’s about enough, then. Now, for the finishing touches.

“Good grief... You’re full of doubts about where to turn, you can’t be honest with yourself, you wallow in the tragedy you willingly participate in... You’re so much like an even worse version of a certain someone that I can’t help but find you irritating and loathsome.”

As a conclusion to this, I only had one more thing to say to him... no — “her.”

“Stop wallowing in so much doubt and angst... young lady.”

“Kh...!” My words provoked an outburst from the pallid Magingear.

It charged towards me with all its speed, eager to get me into the range of its blades, and the one in the left hand would probably be used to end me, once and for all.

I had an estimated three seconds before it sunk into my head and split me in half. The power behind it wasn’t something Liz’s defenses could bear, and it was unlikely that I could evade it. However, there was no need for that.

After all, we were already done charging.

“Union Jack,” I said, long before my three seconds were up.

◇◇◇

Duel city Gideon, not far from the western gate

This took place a short time prior.

Duel city Gideon’s western gate connected it to the field known as “Jeand Grasslands” and was one of the only four exits out of the anti-air barrier shielding the entire city.

Near it, there were dozens of Masters Frozen solid, and they surrounded the battle between the Pimp known as Rook Holmes and the High Pilot calling himself Hugo Lesseps.

However, that wasn't the only battle going on there.

"Kasumi! Your tank summon is gone!"

"I-I need 55 more seconds until I c-can re-cast it."

The ones fighting were the three girls that had accompanied Ray and Rook — the newbie Masters known as Kasumi, Io, and Fujinon.

Their opponent was a monster looking much like a carnivorous dinosaur with the name "PBS — Preparative Brute Saurus" hanging above it.

"BGHAAAAAARGHH!" it roared as it charged towards Io with its fangs at the ready.

"Tyranno...saurus?" hesitated Kasumi.

"Looks more like an allosaurus to me," commented Fujinon.

"Not the right time to say that!" shouted Io. "This thing's obviously stronger than a Demi-Dragon-class thing! Do something about it!"

"All right. I'll stop it... Almagest."

Standing behind Io, Fujinon readied her Embryo, a staff with a spinning orb on its end.

"Mud Clap, then Star Printer, thrice," she said, using a pair of skills. They caused a magic circle to form at the base of her feet. Then three more magic circles appeared and orbited the center one like satellites.

"Click," she said, causing one of the orbiting magic circles to vanish.

A moment later, the pavement and ground beneath PBS began moving like mud and grabbed its foot. Due to the might of its charge, it instantly broke the bond, but its momentum caused it to violently crash into the ground.

"Click, Click, Click," she continued, making the remaining three magic circles vanish.

Three patches of ground around PBS became mud-like and bound it completely.

Fujinon's Embryo, Almagest, was a Type Arms taking the shape of a staff with a star-like sphere at one of its ends. Its unique trait was the copying-and-pasting of the spells she used, allowing her to create up to three copies, represented by orbiting magic circles, and release them at her command.

Its drawback was the fact that Fujinon couldn't move when a satellite magic circle was present, which was a fitting negative for an Embryo bearing the name of the main text behind Ptolemaic theory.

Mud Clap was a low-rank, earth-based binding spell, and though a single one gave little trouble to an enhanced and modified Demi-Dragon-class monster like PBS, a few of them could hold it in place for several seconds.

It was an opening — an opportunity not to be missed.

"Io!" she shouted.

"Okay! I'll tear it apart! Five-Ring, Splitting Mode!"

Following her words, Io charged, holding a huge, one-sided battleax that probably weighed several tons, with a handle over 5 metels in length.

"Here I gooo!" she called, gathering all her strength as she swung her weapon down on the immobilized PBS's medulia.

Like a beast of legend or an executioner from the middle ages, she tore into its neck, broke its cervical vertebrae, sliced through its throat, and even reached the pavement below, shattering a large portion of it.

Though greatly modified, the monster wasn't able to survive without its head. Thus, it simply became particles of light, leaving behind nothing but its drops.

"Io, there's one in the sky behind you!" Kasumi warned her.

"I know! Crushing Mode!" she said as she turned around to look at the pteranodon-like monster trying to surprise attack her using the night's veil as cover.

At the same time, her Embryo, Five-Ring, changed shape. Its handle reduced to about a fifth of its previous size, and the ax head got replaced by a chain at least 20 metels in length, which ended with a spiked ball that surely had more weight than she did.

Io's Embryo, Five-Ring, was a Type Arms that could transform into several ultra-heavy weapons, such as the one-sided battleax from its Splitting Mode or the giant flail from its Crushing Mode.

Like with Ray's Nemesis, the user didn't feel any of the weapons' weight, making the Embryo excel at dealing damage. On the other hand, the weapons still had huge mass, which made them move very slowly and thus have low accuracy.

Io swung the giant flail towards the pteranodon-like monster. It tried to evade it, but it suddenly got caught by something.

“BOBOBOBOBO...”

It was a marshmallow-like balloon giant — a creature many in Infinite Dendrogram would recognize as the summoned monster called “Balloon Golem.”

“Hold it in place... Balulun.”

Kasumi was a Summoner — a job focused on using magic to create monsters which help them in their fights.

Balulun was one of the monsters she could summon, and she did so often, as its Physical Resistance and Floating Ability made it a capable tank. Therefore, there was nothing strange about the summoning itself.

What was strange was the fact that Balulun had appeared right behind the pteranodon.

That was done by Kasumi’s Embryo, the Taijitu.

It was a radar-like Type Arms that showed the location of all the Masters in a certain area around it. Its drawback was the fact that it neither had nor provided any abilities that were meant exclusively for battle. However, the Taijitu did have something besides its radar function.

It was an ability to teleport any tamed or summoned monsters within Kasumi’s minion capacity to any location on the map. Though greater distances cost her more MP, locations within a 50 metel radius of her weren’t all that draining.

Balulun pushed itself on the pteranodon, rendering it unable to move.

“HIIIIIT!”

Not missing the opportunity, Io threw her flail towards it, pulverizing its bones and tenderizing its flesh.

That single hit was enough to kill the pteranodon. Just like the PBS, it began to turn into particles of light, leaving behind nothing but its drops.

“That’s five!”

“W-We did it...”

Kasumi and Fujinon gave their all into binding and holding the enemies, while Io used her high-rank-tier damage to kill them with a critical hit. This tactic of theirs led them to defeating a total of five Demi-Dragon-class monsters that had gathered near the western gate.

Demi-Dragon-class creatures were said to be equivalent to a party of six low-rank jobs. Of course, Masters had Embryo abilities at their disposal, so it wasn't always necessary for a party to be full in order to defeat a Demi-Dragon, but no one could deny that their success was an impressive feat. Each of them knew about the extent of each others' abilities and fought while making up for each others' flaws in order to achieve victory.

Aside from exceptions like Ray and Rook, among the newbies that had escaped the central arena, these girls had the greatest combined amount of battle potential. If that hadn't been the case, they would never have stood a chance against the modified monsters attacking them.

"Phew," Io sighed. "We can finally catch our breath!"

"N-No, we can't... Rook is still fighting... We have to help..." said Kasumi.

The three had been intending to help Rook fight Hugo right when the battle began, but they'd had to make a change of plans when they'd gotten attacked by the monsters.

"Oh, yeah! How's he holding up?!" cried Kasumi.

"They've stopped and are now talking about something," answered Fujinon. "I can't hear them from here."

"All right! I'll use my Bursting Mode and...!" said Io as she was about to make Five-Ring transform into its third form, but Kasumi and Fujinon quickly stopped her.

"D-Don't..."

"Attacking right now doesn't seem like a good idea. Let's watch and see where this goes... Kasumi, are there any other Masters nearby?"

"N-No..." Kasumi slowly shook her head. "Ray's mark is outside the gates... so he's still alive... Franklin is there, too, though..."

"I see."

"Okay! Then let's go and pick up the drops! Demi-Dragons give lots of stuff!" cried Io before running to take the items around them.

"I-Io... there might be more... so we should be on-guard," Kasumi warned.

"Let's sell it all and split the money equally!" Io cried. "Oh, but I might take the armor the boss boxes give! There isn't much we Barbarian Fighters can equip, you know?"

"Sh-She's not listening..."

Io got absorbed in her looting, while Kasumi looked at her with teary eyes.

Fujinon, on the other hand, noticed something strange. “Drops...? Wait... why are they dropping items? Tamed monsters aren’t supposed to drop anything, aren’t they?”

Her question wasn’t without reason, for what was happening right here was simply impossible.

In Infinite Dendrogram, the system itself made it so that tamed monsters under someone’s command wouldn’t drop items.

“Not only that, but the default setting makes it so that tamed monsters return to the jewel before they get fatal damage,” she continued. “But even if he changed it, there’s still no reason for them to be dropping items...”

It was evident that the monsters had been made by Franklin and were under his command, which was exactly why they were targeting the kingdom’s Masters.

“But what if they’re not actual tamed monsters and aren’t acting by his orders?” Fujinon said slowly. “What if that directive was imprinted during the creation stages? If that’s the case... If Franklin can do this, then...”

As a conclusion began to form in Fujinon’s mind...

—■■■!!

An air-rending clash resounded around them, causing the three to turn to its source.

It came from the frozen hell — the area of effect of La Porte de l’Enfer.

Its cause was the impact made by the enraged Magingear using all its power to bring one of its blades down on Rook.

Following the sound, the silver-haired young man, Rook, disappeared from the frozen hell. It wasn’t just him, either, for Babylon and Marilyn, his Embryo and minion, were nowhere in sight.

The three girls thought Rook had been defeated and that his creatures had disappeared with him. But they soon noticed something strange.

“Who is that?” asked Kasumi, momentarily breaking the silence enveloping the surroundings.

Indeed, Rook’s team was nowhere in sight.

Instead, there was just someone none of them recognized.

◇◇◇

“Wh-What’s going on?” Hugo asked, perplexed more than anyone else witnessing this event.

Enraged by Rook’s words, he’d swung his blade down on him. Then his attack had been stopped.

The unknown person before him used the long weapon in his right hand to stop the superhuman robot’s blade, and that person definitely didn’t look like Rook. He had devilish wings on his back, devilish horns on his head, and draconic scales on his body. In his right hand he held a silver lance, seemingly made out of three bundled dragon horns.

He was a fine figure of a man, looking much the way one would expect the silver-haired pretty boy to look if he aged a bit.

“Who... Who are you?!” asked Hugo.

In response, the creature flashed a grin before answering.

“Union Jack — Dragon-Devil-Man.”

The man closed in on the Magingear and kicked it away. Though its weight surpassed ten tons, the attack made the machine get blasted a few metels back.

“Kh...!” Hugo quickly recovered from the mental shock and the physical impact before regaining his posture.

A moment later, he noticed the man standing right beside his Magingear with his left hand on the robot’s chest armor piece.

“Little Flare.”

The point-blank fire spell melted the frozen armor as it delivered an impact to the inside of the Magingear.

“That’s the magic skill used by the Embryo!” cried Hugo, and he was completely right. But the draconic, devilish man’s Little Flare was several times more powerful than that of Babi’s.

“Tri-Horn Upper!” the man said as he closed the distance between them and swung the dragon horn lance.

That was another skill Hugo was already familiar with. Though the horns had been replaced by a lance, it was definitely the same move that Marilyn had used during the battle before she vanished.

Hugo tried to deflect it with the right blade, but it wasn’t able to bear the attack and broke off at about the halfway point.

“Th-This is too...!”

A moment later, he activated the Smoke Discharger attached to the Magingear’s thigh part. The area instantly got covered in a sight-obscuring smokescreen, causing the man’s movements to become duller.

“Motor Slash!” said Hugo as he brought his remaining blade down on the man, who evaded it by jumping backwards, clearly aware that it was coming. The manner of movement was one he’d already seen many times during this battle.

“I see,” he said. “So that’s how it is.”

Hugo was now absolutely certain about the nature of his “new” enemy.

“So you’re ‘him,’ aren’t you?” he continued. “Right now, you’re merged with your Embryo and monster. That’s the effect of the skill you used before, isn’t it?”

In response, the man... Rook... merely smiled.

His opponent solved the details of his skill, but there was no need for him to confirm it. Hugo himself had reacted in a similar manner, after all. However, it was undeniable that he was absolutely correct.

Master, Embryo, and monster merging. That was indeed the effect of Union Jack, the skill Babylon had gained upon reaching her third form.

It had been born out of Rook’s admiration for Ray and the way his fighting style focused on combining his powers with those of Nemesis. Though Union Jack wasn’t quite the same as what they did, it wasn’t completely unlike it, either.

The skill combined the stats and skills of three creatures to create a single entity.

In this case, it bore the great stats of the dragon known as “Marilyn,” the many skills of the devil called “Babylon,” and the intelligence of the genius man leading them. Thus, it was labeled “Dragon-Devil-Man,” and it was the strongest ace up Rook’s sleeve.

“Can you really perform such a skill without any preparation?” added Hugo, and with good reason, too.

Union Jack wasn’t the only skill that merged or combined certain entities. However, all of them either needed some time to be charged up before they were ready to use or had the combining process itself take a while. That was the ultimate negative of such skills.

“Skill preparation? But I did do it. And for a while, too,” the man purposely answered with words, rather than just a smile.

Noticing that what he’d said had made Hugo subconsciously began rummaging through his memory, the man used the opening to attack him yet again.

“Gh!” Hugo came back to his senses and swung his blade down.

“I can see your movements even better than before,” Rook said as he evaded the sword and lunged the lance into one of the robot’s leg joints.

The Magingear had high defense in its basic state, and it was increased even further by the frost armor. Due to that, the attack didn’t break it completely, but the stats Rook had gained as a result of Union Jack had made him surpass even Marilyn, and the damage done to the armor wasn’t something Hugo could just brush off.

“Now, when do you think I started preparing this skill? Take a moment to think on it,” Rook said in a gentle voice that contrasted with his vicious attacks.

The correct answer was that Babi had begun charging Union Jack the moment Rook had said “check,” and that it was over by the time Babi said “done.” It was a code they’d decided on beforehand.

The reason Rook had dedicated time to explaining his theory about Hugo’s skill, seemingly neglecting the fact that his body had a higher chance to Freeze the more time had passed, had been both to confirm that he was right and to buy time for Union Jack.

In his mock battle against Marie, he’d prepared this skill during the break between the ninth and tenth battles.

Rook wondered how he’d go about buying the time during an actual battle, but in this one, he had been able to do it thanks to his conversational skills and a bit of planning.

"As you may have noticed already, La Porte de l'Enfer has no effect on me anymore," he added.

Indeed, upon becoming the Dragon-Devil-Man, Rook had been freed from the ice damning his left arm. Not only that, but he didn't show any signs of freezing again.

"Right now, I don't count as human, and I don't believe there's even a kill counter for what I am," he said. "So, La Porte de l'Enfer can't do anything to me."

By merging with a dragon and a devil, Rook had become a chimera, and since he hadn't killed a single one of those, the frozen hell was nothing more than scenery to him. Rook had escaped La Porte de l'Enfer's judgment by changing his own creature type.

"From here on out... our battle is merely a contest of strength, Hugo Lesseps," he said.

"La Porte de l'Enfer is meaningless, and you have enough power to match me all by your lonesome," said Hugo. "I can see why you call it that. Very well, I'll face you, Rook Holmes."

Rook jumped backwards, creating some distance between them.

It wasn't to escape. Far from it. He needed the distance to get the speed necessary for the activation of the most damaging skill at his disposal: Marilyn's charge attack.

In response, Hugo, Cocytus, and the Magingear got into posture. Unlike before, they weren't going to use a Motor Slash or some firearm attack.

Among her unique skills, Cocytus had only one that did damage directly. It was severely taxing in terms of MP, so Hugo had avoided using it in order to keep La Porte de l'Enfer active. However, as things were, he decided to prioritize preventing the person before him from getting to Franklin alive. He had become absolutely certain that his opponent was too dangerous to be allowed to go and support Ray.

He's too much of a threat, Hugo thought. It's not about his power... He merely sees through people too well to be allowed to see "him." I have to end him, here and now.

What followed next was a deafening silence.

It felt as though the very air that transmitted sound vibrations became Frozen.

The Dragon-Devil-Man and the Magingear faced one another, not moving a muscle or a mechanical joint.

Surrounded by the many ice sculptures, they stood so still that they, too, seemed like pieces of art.

Suddenly, the sound of an explosion from outside the gate resounded around them, breaking the silence and the tense air.

The two had no means of knowing what had caused it, nor did they care enough to find out. They merely used the sound as a trigger to begin dashing.

Rook brandished the silver-coated dragon horn lance and sprinted with a posture so low that it seemed like he could scrape the pavement. He used Marilyn's charge attack, which was empowered by both the stats he'd gotten due to the merge and the many passive skills Babi had at her disposal.

The lance's attack was now beyond the realm of Demi-Dragons, and it wouldn't have been far-fetched to say that it could bore a hole in a Pure-Dragon.

Tri-Horn Grand Dash.

The Magingear re-created the left blade it had lost. But unlike before, it wasn't an ice weapon. On the contrary — the distorted air around it made it quite obvious that it was a blade of pure heat.

It was Cocytus's trump card — a skill that took all the heat absorbed by La Porte de l'Enfer and transformed it into offensive energy.

Purgatorial Slash!

And so, the two clashed, finally deciding the victor.

◇

The end of the battle was witnessed by only three people — Kasumi, Io, and Fujinon.

"Ah..."

What they saw after the clash was Rook, lying down on the pavement.

The two's most lethal attacks met, and the Dragon-Devil-Man reached his limit before his lance could completely pierce the Magingear's cockpit. The deadly damage he'd received had caused the transformation to be undone, so Babi and Marilyn were lying nearby.

Rook was wounded all over.

“Looks like... I didn’t have the power to win,” he said.

Though many would argue that he’d simply been unlucky. If the Masters defeated by La Porte de l’Enfer hadn’t included Bishmal, the kingdom’s strongest fire user, the heat absorbed wouldn’t have been nearly as great, and the power of the Purgatorial Slash would’ve been significantly lower.

If that had been the case, Babi’s resistances and the Demi-Dragon-surpassing stats would’ve made it possible for him to bear the attack.

“Mh...” Hugo silently examined the damage on his Magingear, as it certainly hadn’t come out unscathed, either. The frozen armor on the front of the machine had shattered, and the armor of the Marshall II R itself was crooked and pierced deep enough to reach the cockpit.

Hugo had seen the tip of the silver lance that had entered his vision. If he’d been just a little bit slower in defeating his opponent, he would’ve surely gotten the death penalty. However, the Marshall II R was still up and running. If the Magingear Cocytus used as a base was still there, and he could still use La Porte de l’Enfer.

As proof of that, Rook — having returned to being human — was beginning to Freeze again.

“Next... it’s those three,” muttered Hugo as he shifted his gaze towards Kasumi, Io, and Fujinon.

That slight action was the greatest mistake Hugo had made tonight.

He should’ve crushed Rook’s head before taking time to analyze the situation.

After all, Rook...

“If I don’t have the energy to beat him directly, I’d like you to open the hatch... Liz.”

...was a boy who always had multiple plans running through his mind.

Following his words, the Marshall II R’s hatch quickly opened up.

“Wha... AH?!” Hugo exclaimed in shock as he saw a gathering of silver-colored liquid metal on the button opening the hatch.

It was Liz the Mithril Arms Slime.

Rook had hid her existence from the moment they’d introduced themselves and used her while making sure that Hugo wouldn’t notice. Liz had been the very thing coating the surface of the dragon horn lance in a brilliant silver. She’d snuck into the cockpit the moment the weapon had pierced inside.

Originally, the plan had been that she would just cut Hugo apart, but the heat of the Purgatorial Slash had made a lot of her volume evaporate, making her lack the strength to do it. Thus, all Liz could do was press the button to the Marshall II R's hatch.

However, that was more than enough. After all, with the hatch open, nothing was separating Hugo and Rook's group...

"Male Temptation."

"Lilim Temptation."

...letting the Pimp and the succubus do what they did best.

"Checkmate," Rook proclaimed. With those words, the battle of the western gate was ended.

Chapter Seven: The Right Arm of the Victor

???

The Kingdom of Altar's Knights of the Royal Guard.

That was the name of the order closest to the royal family — the knights who served and protected them with their very lives.

The minimum requirement to join them was to become a Paladin, a high-rank job of the knight grouping, while their leader the commander had the Superior Job known as "Celestial Knight." This had been the case for the entirety of the order's history.

Being the strongest knight of his generation, the commander had been entrusted with one of the kingdom's national treasures, a Prism Steed, and he had ridden it as he led the country's forces into battle.

As the strongest of knights leading the proudest order, the Kingdom of Altar's Royal Guard had been the very symbol of their country, which was often called "the land of knights."

Again, "had been."

As things were now, the Royal Guard was generally referred to as a thing of the past. The most glorious Altarian knight order had been all but annihilated about half a year ago, Dendrogram time.

During the so-called "First Knight-Machine War," a certain portion of the Dryfe Imperium's forces had killed about 60% of the Royal Guard's members. That was bad by itself, but it was even worse when you considered the fact that, in a sense, it had been done by just a single person: Hell General, Logan Goddhart.

He was one of Dryfe's three — two at the time — Superiors.

Hell General was a Superior Job that mixed frontline battle qualities with army commanding. However, its most notable trait was its focus on summoning devils at the cost of sacrifices.

"Here and now, I consign these many lives I have at my disposal.

Remove the lid of hell and gather, my forces," he had intoned. "Call Devil Regiment."

During the war, the Hell General had summoned more than three thousand devils. The man-eating army had been as tough as it was ravenous, and they'd had little trouble dealing with thousands of the kingdom's soldiers. Even the Paladin-filled Royal Guard had lost over a hundred members upon intercepting them.

As the victims had continued to pile up, the commander of the Royal Guard — Celestial Knight, Langley Grandria — had broken through the devilish ranks all by himself and made it through to their leader and source, the Hell General.

True, many might have argued that Langley hadn't been alone in his charge. He was simply the only one who had survived while trying to get to Logan.

Neither the vice commander at that time, nor the many other skilled, max-level members of the Royal Guard, had been able to survive the devilish onslaught, which had left the Celestial Knight to face the Hell General all by his lonesome.

Their fight had been overwhelming in its intensity.

The Celestial Knight had been considered to be one of the strongest tian vanguard fighters, and he'd proven how worthy he was of that title by fighting toe-to-toe with the Hell General, a Master bearing bonuses given by his Embryo.

The devils at Logan's command had tried to swarm him, but even they had been able to do little to protect their summoner.

"I won't let you stain the kingdom's lands with the blood of my brethren any longer!" Langley had called. "Logan Goddhart, I shall defeat you and banish your devils!"

"Gh! Shit...!"

In a one-on-one battle, the Celestial Knight had been above the Hell General. Langley had seemed to have a chance to emerge victorious and make the devilish army disappear. However...

"Umm, hello hello? Your Excellency the General? You okay? The King of Beasts already took care of the Archsage, y'know? Wait, what? You're not done yet? Are you actually about to lose? Well, ain't that just troubling, your excellency. (lol)" ...a voice of provocation ringing in the Hell

General's ear had changed the situation by messing with his mind.

"DON'T MOCK ME, FRANKLIN!" Suddenly, the Hell General had yanked off one of the items he had equipped. It was a special reward he'd earned by defeating an Epic-tier UBM. "'Here and now, I consign this unique treasure! In exchange for its limitless value, grant me a moment of power! Come from the ancient times, O endless devil!' Call Devil Zero Exceed!"

Thus, the Hell General had sacrificed a special reward to summon a devil with power matching a Mythical UBM.

The addition of such a being had instantly turned the tides of battle, making it end with the death of the Celestial Knight. There had also been the destruction of his beloved Prism Steed, the kingdom's national treasure. So the country had lost both its human and material symbols.

Following that conclusion, the Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin, had gone for the finishing blow and used his modified monsters to attack the forces led by King Eldor Zeo Altar himself.

In the end, the king and all his men had become sustenance for the creatures.

Thus, the Royal Guard had lost their brethren and leader to the Hell General, and their lord to the Giga Professor.

After the war was halted, the order had reorganized, giving their late leader's daughter and the fifth among their ranks, Liliana Grandria, the position of vice commander. With that, she had risen to the top of the Knights of the Royal Guard.

She had been made the vice commander rather than commander because she was the strongest among the order's survivors, but she had yet to inherit the title of Celestial Knight. Every one of the order's commanders for the entirety of its history had had that Superior Job, so the country believed that a Paladin who had yet to gain Celestial Knight wasn't worthy of that title.

Though Liliana wasn't weak, she certainly wasn't at the level of Superior Jobs. The combined level of everyone else in the order was significantly lower than it had been, as well. And the number of those who could use the ultimate job skill, Grand Cross, or the hidden skill, Purifying Silverlight, could be counted on one hand. Thus, the position of commander and the throne of the Celestial Knight had been rendered empty.

The order's failure to protect their lord had severely damaged their status in the kingdom. Countless people had looked down on them, and the surviving knights themselves had been extremely ashamed of their dishonor. Many had quit being knights, run away, or switched to other orders, reducing the size of the Royal Guard yet again. What had once been an elite army amounting to three hundred had become a group of a mere fifty.

Still, all of those remaining had a strong will and a goal to go with it.

Was it a craving for revenge against the Hell General and the Giga Professor? Did they wish to avenge their lord and many brethren?

Wrong.

That sentiment was certainly there, but it was nothing compared to what lay at the core of their beings. What they truly desired was simply "to protect them."

They wished to succeed where they'd once failed, to ensure the safety of the three princesses left behind by their lord and protect the people of the Kingdom of Altar.

Bearing the many hardships, the members of the order still gave their all to their role as knights.

◆

And so, they dashed.

Reaching and breaking the limits of their power, the order struggled against the abomination before them, the RSK. They gave their all to defeat their foe and rescue their princess, and their efforts made them shine like the protagonists of a knight epic.

"Oh, they're shining, all right," I said with a grin. "Like candles in the wind."

Looking around, I — Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin — saw members of the Royal Guard lying on the ground beneath us. Their total number had fallen below the already-small fifty, and those of them still able to move were few and far between. Most of them had been defeated by my RSK.

He was a custom-made modified monster, a cracked sphere of flesh supported by ten tentacles. The creature was based on Evil Offspring and Ropers, and had potential to be classified among the more powerful members of them.

Besides the tentacles, he didn't have any other... interesting features. It wasn't like I couldn't have added any, but considering his main target, doing so would've been pointless.

His skillset and biological tissue were so complicated that he couldn't have been made by the standard Monster Creation skill. I had only been able to do it because of my Superior Embryo's ultimate skill, "Playing God — Pandemonium."

Though custom-made and quite complex, the RSK was a monster I'd hurriedly created during the span of last night. I hadn't had time to test whether he could live and function properly, so the Royal Guard's presence here was very convenient in that regard. The many dead knights lying around him made it clear that the RSK was a success.

"All seems to be A-okay," I said, pleased. "The attacks are on the weaker side, but that's not unexpected."

The lack of damage made it entirely possible that the poor RG folk around it were simply "dying," rather than "dead."

Of course, I intend to finish them off, I thought.

The only still-moving knights were Vice Commander Liliana and Lin-whatshisface — the third among them.

"Sir Lindos! Let's use the stack!" she called.

"Understood!"

Having some sort of plan, they split up and positioned themselves at twelve o'clock and three o'clock around the RSK, clearly readying themselves for a focused attack from both of those directions.

"Grand Cross!" they shouted, causing a sky-reaching pillar of light to burst out from below the RSK.

Grand Cross was a Paladin's ultimate job skill. It created a cross-shaped stream of holy light energy which seared anything in its way, making it an ability not to be underestimated. And the two knights had cast it at the exact same time, increasing its damage to a factor of two.

Naturally, it was a formidable technique, and if the elements matched up, it could perhaps even fell a Pure-Dragon in a single hit. The RSK was actually Pure-Dragon-tier when it came to stats, so the attack could've been extremely dangerous to him.

"Alas, it isn't," I said as I looked at the RSK, completely unhurt by the stacked Grand Cross.

He didn't have a single burn. The immense attack had been about as effective as a mosquito bite, if not less.

Seemingly irritated, the RSK fought back against the two attackers by either swinging his tentacles or opening many of its cracks and firing light projectiles from them.

"It can't be...! How could the stack do nothing to it?!" Sir Lin-whatsisface cried.

"Sir Lindos, not yet! It's too early to give up!"

"Mh...! Understood!"

And so, the two began attacking the RSK again.

Looks like they still intend to struggle, I thought. Don't see why. It's useless, after all.

"Heh... You might've stood a chance if you weren't Paladins," I grinned. Though, if that had been the case, I would've had them face a different product.

Anyway, there was no reasonable way for a Paladin — a job focused on the holy element and sword attacks — to win against the RSK. That's how I'd designed him, after all.

He was equipped with the physical damage-reducing Material Barrier and Holy Negation.

In addition to those skills, he also had Fire Negation, Poison Negation, Weakness Negation, and Intoxication Negation, which were mostly just extras to the "main feature" — the one I'd prepared specifically for that guy.

"Khehehehehehehe," I chuckled. "Man, I hope he doesn't take too long."

I didn't know or care whether it was the hand of fate instantly making my hope a reality, but the RSK was suddenly assaulted by a grand flow of flame. The intense flamethrower was brought about by none other than Purgatorial Flames — an equipment skill from Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda.

Of course, the RSK's Fire Negation made it come out completely unscathed.

But what mattered right now was the very usage of the Purgatorial Flames, for that meant that he had finally come.

"He's here... He's here he's here HE'S HERE!" I screamed. Though a bit later than I'd anticipated, the star of the show was finally on the scene.

"Are you all right?!" Ray Starling asked the other two, upon joining the RG in their fight. With his silver Prism Steed, he appeared extremely prince-like, making his arrival seem reminiscent of another chapter in some knight tale.

And holy shit, is that hilarious.

"Ray?! Why are you here?" Liliana cried.

What a retarded question, I thought. Through my observations, I'd noticed that he was a man acting on the most hero-like impulses. If anyone before his eyes was in peril, he'd rush to help them while completely ignoring all related limitations and risks.

"I'm not exactly a fan of a scenario where a child gets kidnapped. It'd leave a bad taste in my mouth," he said, proving my point. He simply hadn't been able to stop himself from getting involved in tonight's event.

"...I'm also here to beat the crap out of that guy," he added, looking at me.

"Oh? You thought that far?" I said. "Man, that sure is something."

Again, I was fully aware that he disregarded his limitations and risks. But I hadn't actually expected him to come here intending to win against me — a Superior.

He was looking straight at me. Were his eyes full of antagonism? Hatred? Frustration? No... he was simply mad.

"KheHAH!" Unable to hold it in, I laughed in a weird manner.

He was completely serious. I knew very few people who were as earnest about Infinite Dendrogram as him. I could only name her — well, "him" in this world — and then there was the King of Tartarus, and of course me. As expected of a Maiden's Master.

...Or perhaps he was a Maiden's Master because he was this kind of person?

Regardless, I liked him a lot and was very pleased with his presence here. After all... Breaking him will feel so good, I thought with satisfaction.

"Flamingo, you're going to be getting your due for what you did today and yesterday," Ray snarled.

"Ahahah! Then I'm giving you yours for what you did a week ago, dog ears," I grinned.

Welcome, Ray Starling, I thought, smirking. The RSK, your nemesis, awaits.

◇◇◇

West of the duel city, Jeand Grasslands, Paladin, Ray Starling

"The stage is set and the cast is here. Heheh!" For reasons unknown to me, Franklin cackled, clearly unable to contain his amusement.

Right now, he was standing on a floating, platform-like monster surrounded by a visible barrier. Princess Elizabeth was on the ground at his feet.

"All right, then, Ray my boy!" he said as he pointed to the night sky. "Feast your eyes on this!"

Looking up, I saw a monster that looked like a giant eye with bat wings.

"That's a Broadcast Eye," Franklin continued. "Everything it sees and hears is sent to a receiver monster that projects the data as a 3D movie."

So it's basically a living camera, I thought.

"Right as we speak, everything it sees and hears is being turned into a hologram and projected over Gideon. If everything is working as intended, whatever's happening here should be visible to everyone in the central arena, every one of Gideon's districts, and even the royal capital."

"Why is this necessary?" I asked.

In response, Franklin grinned and raised one of the fingers on his right hand. "The first reason is to have the kingdom's people witness the course of events here. Without a live broadcast, they wouldn't know the process, and would just make their own assumptions about the result, which is no good to me." He paused, and then continued. "After all, I want to break this country's spirit."

The amused sneer on his face was nothing but nauseating.

"It would all be pointless if the Altarians don't see the people they so rely on display pathetic impotency as they fall before my creation, and don't witness the powerlessness of the duel city. Surely you understand, right? Dying during your sleep isn't scary, so I'm gonna open their eyes and show them the fingers digging into their necks."

"...Makes sense, but man, that's a pretty messed-up mentality."

"Khah!" he laughed. "Well, it's not like I'm the one who needs this... Anyway, on to the second reason." Franklin then raised a finger on his left hand. "I want to publicly humiliate the ones who chased after me."

"...You what?"

“Hahahah! Man, if things had gone according to plan, no one would’ve come here in the first place. But now we have the RG and you, and boy oh boy, are you all a nuisance! You’re delaying my darling Plan A! And since you got in my way, I decided to get rid of you all while also making you the laughingstock of the kingdom.”

“I had a hunch, but you’re actually an asshole, aren’t you?” I said. “And what’s with the assumption that no one was gonna get in your way if you went out the western gate? Seems pretty naïve, if you ask me.”

Not to mention that there were many who would get in his way even if his plan was a success.

“If that signboard was anything to go by, he lets tians pass, right?” I continued. “That means that Liliana and her people would’ve been here even if I wasn’t.”

“...Wrong,” said Franklin as his smile disappeared. “If you weren’t here, she wouldn’t have come here, either.”

Following those words, for reasons unknown, he glared at me with some of the sharpest eyes imaginable.

However, that expression didn’t last more than a moment, and he was soon back to his maniacal grin. “Anyway, let’s begin,” he said. “RSK... the test is over.”

Suddenly, the monster Liliana and her knights were fighting turned to face me.

The more I looked at the creature, the more eerie it seemed. Though its size was about the same as Gardranda’s, its appearance was completely unlike that of any monster I’d faced so far. It was a flesh-colored sphere with many cracks on it and ten thick tentacles protruding out of its body. The appendages were highly reminiscent of skin turned a dark blue due to blood loss.

“We fought something straight out of a horror movie just yesterday,” I muttered. “And now this thing here is like a nightmare.”

The monster was the type to make people feel uneasy and scared simply due to how hard-to-define it was.

“Indeed,” said Nemesis. “Though I find this one far easier to handle than any undead. But Ray, you do understand, right?”

Yeah, I thought. I know I acted all brave and all, but the situation here is pretty bad.

"If it hadn't been for the battle at the gate, we could've tried for a Counter Absorption and Vengeance is Mine combo, but now that we don't have that luxury, we can only hope that this creature doesn't hit as hard as Gardranda or Gouz-Maise."

True, I thought. After all, my preemptive Purgatorial Flames didn't seem to work, either.

With all the Royal Guards lying around the area, Hellish Miasma wasn't an option. Then there was the fact that Liliana and her knights — who were surely above me in terms of pure Paladin ability — had been completely overwhelmed, meaning that my normal attacks would do little... if anything. The unfavorable situation also prevented me from using that, leaving me with nothing except for Vengeance is Mine, but...

"Mh..."

Can I really use it? I thought.

"Ray?" Nemesis asked.

Just like in my previous battles against foes far stronger than me, my intuition was trying to tell me something.

The visual nausea the RSK made me feel was accompanied by chills that were hard to describe, similar to — but quite unlike — the ones I'd felt when fighting my worst enemy so far, Gouz-Maise.

If that amalgam of the undead loathed all the living, then it was almost like this abomination hated only one thing...

"Ladies and gentlemen!" Franklin raised his voice, cutting my thoughts short. He was looking directly at the Broadcast Eye and acting like he was live on TV. "This is a stream for the people of Gideon and the rest of the kingdom! Hello again or for the first time! I am Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin, and I'm here to show you the climax of my game!"

Upon saying that, he took out a device looking much like a mobile terminal from about three decades back: a smartphone.

"This right here is the switch that releases the monsters I've set up in the duel city!"

"...Gh!" I voiced my frustration.

"This switch has a timer function, and it's set to launch a signal to release all the monsters after 652 seconds!" he continued. "Though, we do have some early birds thanks to a bunch of hot-blooded idiots who tried to escape the arena by attacking the barrier."

"Release all the monsters?! But wait, that's...!" said Liliana with a tense expression, which made Franklin's grin widen.

"Oh, yeees, 500 monsters stronger than your average Demi-Dragon will be released to the city all at once. Well, they happen to be set to attack only Masters, but they're relentless and don't hesitate to destroy buildings, either."

His words and our situation here were being broadcast to everyone in Gideon. Franklin used this to heighten their fear by showing them the remaining number of seconds before the time bomb finally went off.

"Well, as for what I'll do with this switch... Whoooosh!" he said, throwing it towards the RSK.

The monster responded to the action by opening its fleshy sphere and taking the switch inside before closing again, which was a scene highly reminiscent of a clione feeding.

"So yeah, there are about 600 seconds left until the signal goes out, and the only way to stop it is to kill my boy the RSK here." Franklin fell silent for a moment before pointing to Liliana in an exaggerated manner and speaking up again. "The ones braving this fight are these noble Paladins, the vice commander and third knight of the Royal Guard — Lady Grandria and Sir Lindos!"

After pointing to them...

"And let's not forget the only Master here! Another Paladin, Ray Starling!"

...his finger was redirected at me.

"Can the three Paladins protect the city of duels?! It all rests in their hands!"

With excessively grandiose presentation, he was setting up the stage for the "public humiliation" he was talking about.

"So, uh..."

Thus came his final words.

"Blame them when the city's gone, okaaay?"

Which he said with nothing but malice and glee.

"What an incorrigible bastard!" exclaimed Nemesis.

He sure is, but comments about him will have to wait, I thought.

The flesh-colored orb was already making a move. The many cracks on its surface all opened up like wounds and released dazzling streams of eye-piercing light.

Feeling as though I was barraged by countless camera flashes, I could barely keep on looking at it.

“A blinding move?!” I exclaimed.

“Ray! This light is followed by an attack!” Liliana warned us, but my Silver was already dashing away.

“Kh!” Suddenly, something hit the place I was at and exploded.

They were light projectiles the RSK fired during the blinding flashes, and their power was about three times greater than the White Lance Gems I’d used.

However, that was the extent of it.

I’d failed to evade one of them. The impact had been nothing impressive, while the damage had only cost me about a tenth of my HP.

“This isn’t beyond us!” cried Nemesis.

Indeed. We could do this, no problem. I simply had to bear its attacks, heal myself, and land a Vengeance is Mine after getting enough damage.

From what I’d seen of the Royal Guard’s fight against it, the RSK had a constantly-active barrier against physical damage and extremely high resistances against holy attacks and fire. However, the damage from Vengeance was fixed and doubled, making it perfectly capable of taking out large portions of the thing’s HP.

At least, that’s how it should go, I thought. But... why am I feeling so uneasy?

“Your intuition rarely fails when we’re in a predicament,” said Nemesis. “There might be more to this abomination than meets the eye. However...”

...Vengeance is our only option against it, so that’s what we have to go with, I agreed.

“Oh, by the way,” said Franklin. “The barrier of this darling I’m riding right now is directly linked to the RSK, so you have to beat my boy even if you prioritize saving the princess.”

...Even more reason to use it, then.

“Looks like it’s do-or-die,” said Nemesis.

“Yeah.” I nodded. “...Let’s go!”

“Certainly!” With that settled, I made Silver gallop towards the RSK.

Making sure not to stop for a second, I evaded — or purposely took — the light attacks while occasionally going on the offensive myself.

All of my sword slashes were negated by the barrier on its surface, and the same went for my Purgatorial Flames. However, due to the beast being so abnormal, I didn't stop my fruitless attacks, hoping that I could perhaps find a source of its power or something.

Of course, I also didn't neglect to use my healing magic or items to keep my HP up. Thanks to my 5,000+ HP, Paladin's Aegis, my general endurance, and the RSK's lacking offensive abilities, I was able to stack up a considerable amount of damage. It all seemed to be going very well... but my unease showed no signs of abating.

"Wait, the accumulated damage is... what?" said Nemesis. "No, it's pretty clear it came from the abomination, but..."

"Nemesis?"

"O-Oh, sorry. It's just that... I just felt something off."

About the accumulated damage, right? I thought. Nemesis seemed to have an ability to "feel" the enemies that have damaged us. She'd used it during the Gouz-Maise battle, too.

"'Off'? In what way?" I asked.

"The damage is clearly coming from this RSK monster, but it feels like it's... scattered all over."

Scattered?

"If I were to liken it to something from your world, I'd say that it feels as though I'm looking at an X-ray displaying the spread of cancer cells within the body."

"...Wait." Doesn't that mean that the RSK is still the thing that's accumulating damage?

"Yes, that's correct..." she replied, and even though it was telepathic, I could easily tell that she felt uneasy about this unfamiliar sensation.

"...Let's try using it once," I said.

"I don't believe we have enough damage to kill it, though."

"And that's exactly why we have to try. My gut and your feeling are telling us that something's wrong. Rather than having to deal with something unexpected when we go for the finisher, we should confirm our suspicions right now."

"...Very well!"

"Silver!" I shouted as I kicked my steed's sides and pulled his reins, making him speed towards the RSK.

Passing the barrage of light attacks, we closed the distance between us and the abomination. Once it was within range, I swung Nemesis at one of its tentacles, fully intending to cut it off. Then we used the ace up our sleeve, our only means of fighting it.

"Vengeance is Mine!" we shouted in unison, activating the skill that had felled many of our opponents.

Our first foe — the Demi-Dragon Worm.

The tri-faced beast of flame and poison — Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda.

The amalgam of people's death and malice — Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise.

With all the powerful enemies it had helped us defeat, it was small wonder why it was our most trusted skill.

Now, we had used it on the mysterious creature called "the RSK."

"How...?" Nemesis said in bewilderment, and not without reason, for Vengeance hadn't hurt it in the least. My greatsword had simply slipped on the RSK's surface, not destroying a single inch of it.

The attack had rendered us defenseless, and a light projectile that came from one of the monster's cracks landed directly on me. It took away about a third of my total HP, but I couldn't manage to care about that.

"Why...?" I murmured. The only thing on my mind was my skill — Vengeance is Mine. It doubled the damage I'd received from my enemies and brought it back to them, completely ignoring any defenses.

It had worked every time I'd used it on anything that had accumulated damage on me.

However, it'd had absolutely no effect on the RSK.

"Ohhh maaan, what a great expression." I heard a voice thick with intoxication.

"Franklin!" I shouted.

His face was still in a smile, but unlike the basic grin from before, it had become a thoroughly amused sneer. "Ahahah! You look so dumbfounded. Have no idea what's going on, huh? 'Why? How? Wasn't our Vengeance absolute and unmatched, Nemmy-wemmy?!' Lol. Must've been hard to be cast as Nobuta just because of your glasses, eh, Ray-boy?"

"Wh...!"

"Oh, now you look even more surprised. Man, I'm loving this to bits."

The thing he'd just referred to was something I'd only told Nemesis... and that had been after Flamingo had left us. The fact that he knew it could only mean one thing...

"That drug you gave me had more than just the dog ear thing in it, huh?" I snapped.

"Ohhh, yeah it did," he answered as he reached into his pocket and took out a drug bottle filled with the exact same mixture he'd given me yesterday. "The drug I gave you was a Lesser Elixir and Animal Ear Drug cocktail..." He then opened the bottle and poured the contents into his hand.

"...but there was more than just the drug in there," he said as liquid flowed out of the palm, leaving behind a marble-sized object. "This little beauty is a PSS — a Peeping Spy Slime. They're always in a liquid state, have no means of fighting, and get digested by humans in about 24 hours... But in exchange for being so powerless, for as long as they're alive, they send me the stats, skill info, and the words of those they've been ingested by." His grin widened. "Getting the person to not find it suspicious or stay online can be a bit hard, I'll tell you that."

Couldn't you have gone with something else? I thought as I put my hand on my mouth in disgust. I can't believe I drank a damn slime!

"I know everything at your disposal," he continued. "Your Nemesis's three Embryo skills, Miasmaflame Bracers, Greaves of Grudge, your real Prism Steed, your own skills — including Purifying Silverlight — and even the various tactics you used in your battle against the Lich Maise and Gouz-Maise."

That was everything I had. Everything I could attempt to do had been leaked to him.

"And my boy the RSK here was made to counter everything you've got," he finished proudly.

"...As in?"

"Vengeance is Mine doesn't work on him, he doesn't give any debuffs, he negates Purgatorial Flames, Hellish Miasma, Purifying Silverlight, and even Grand Cross, if you had it. Standard attacks of your level don't hurt him, either. Against you, the RSK is completely unbeatable. After all..."

Franklin momentarily stopped talking and flashed an almost dazzling smile before continuing.

"He's the Ray Starling Killer. Custom-made just to defeat you."

“...Made to... what?”

It’s actually called “Ray Starling Killer”? I thought. Franklin seriously made a monster for the sole purpose of defeating me?

“So yeah, you’re losing no matter what. My boy the RSK cost me a whole 100,000,000 lir, but hey, money spent on victory ain’t money wasted, right?”

“Why...?” I burst out.

Why is Franklin — a Superior — doing so much against me? Didn’t we meet just yesterday? Does it have something to do with Hugo?

“‘Why,’ you ask? Yeah, I guess it must be strange to you. Why would a Superior like me throw such serious money to deal with such a nobody?” he said as his smile vanished. “That’s because I’ve lost against you once.” His eyes had turned scarily serious, making me feel as though they could pierce me.

“You lost to me?” I asked. “When did that happen?”

As my confusion reached its peak, Franklin pointed below... at Liliana, who was fighting the RSK.

“I had a plan to assassinate Liliana Grandria, you see,” he said. “You completely destroyed it, so I decided to single you out.”

A plan to assassinate Liliana...? Does he mean the time I...?

“If you hadn’t gotten involved, that bear man wouldn’t have been there either, and the fifty Demi-Dragon Worms would’ve surely taken care of Liliana. You ruined my plan and made me lose, Ray Starling.”

Bear man — my brother.

Fifty Demi-Dragon Worms — Old Reve Orchard.

“And then, a guy with glasses told me, ‘If you have this incense, you can go get some from the orchard outside.’” I remembered Milianne’s words from back then, and it all made sense now.

“I can’t stomach anyone who makes me lose or yield,” Franklin continued. “Whenever someone like that appears, I set up a rematch and make sure they lose so thoroughly it’s pathetic. Then they never feel like standing in my way ever again, and you won’t be any different. Now just lose and become the laughingstock of the kingdom, will ya?” His expression and voice as he said that were thick with madness.

Though it wasn’t like he didn’t make sense. I could understand why he resented me so much. Really well, in fact.

“All right, I understand why you went and built an anti-me thing,” I said.

So he was the one responsible for that situation, huh? I thought.

“Hahahah! Good to see you get it.”

“Oh, I do,” I assured him. “And I also get... that now I have to punch you.”

“...What?” Franklin asked, looking visibly puzzled.

What? Did I stutter? ’Cause I sure as hell didn’t say anything weird.

“You know, you got a child... Milianne... involved in that incident, and when she told me about the man in glasses, a specific thought went through my mind.” I recalled exactly what I’d thought back then and put it into words. “‘I’d like to punch that idiot for sending a kid to a place this dangerous.’”

I hadn’t known the culprit, and both Milianne and Liliana had been okay. Due to that, I’d shelved the sentiment, but I sure as hell hadn’t forgiven the bastard.

“So yeah, now that I know that you’re the one responsible, I’m gonna settle this.”

“Kh...”

“I’ll say it again...” I raised my bracer-covered hand and pointed my index finger directly at him before making my proclamation. “My fist is going straight into your face. Keep it clean for me, Superior.”

“Do your worst... newbie!”

Following that exchange, the RSK moved to stand between me and Franklin.

This thing was a monster a Superior had made for the sole purpose of defeating me. Thus, it made perfect sense that Liliana and her knights had had such a hard time with it.

“It’s because they’re Paladins...” I murmured. The countermeasures made against my job were fully functional against them, as well.

Damn shame, I thought.

Still, if they hadn’t been Paladins, Franklin would’ve probably released some other monsters.

He could actually do so now, if he so desired, but he didn’t, because he wanted to break my spirit by making me lose completely and create a show where those protecting the city got defeated by a single monster without anyone leaving as much as a scratch on it.

Franklin probably would summon more monsters if we defeated the RSK.

However, with the RSK gone, we would stop the monster release in Gideon, and the disappearance of the barrier would give us a chance to save the princess.

“There’s no change to what we have to do, then,” I said. “We kill the Ray Starling Killer... Man, what a damn stupid name.”

“For that, we must find out why Vengeance doesn’t work on it,” added Nemesis.

“I think I know why.”

“Eh?”

“Let me just see if I’m right,” I said as pulled on Silver’s reins, making him stop.

“Ray?!”

I closed my right eye and made my left one open wide before placing my left hand on my face and looking at the RSK through the gap.

The thing was still releasing flashes and light attacks through its many cracks. Naturally, looking directly at it would burn my eyes as effectively as looking at the sun through a telescope. However, I ignored the searing sensation on my left retina and strained to see into the sources of the light — the cracks.

The brightness was literally blinding, and making anything out was a real challenge, but I kept my eye open with the intention to see what I was certain was there.

And so...

“Thought as much.”

...a light projectile hit me the very moment I saw it.

Combined with the damage from the previous attack, my HP was now below half.

“Ray! Force Heal!” Liliana cast a healing spell on me from a short distance away. It was more powerful than the spell I had at my disposal, and it instantly got my HP up to 90%.

“Ray... You fool! That was nothing if not suicidal!” Nemesis screamed.

“Ray! What you did just now was far too careless!” Liliana chastised.

Nemesis and Liliana telling me off at the same time produced a stereolike effect.

"Yeah, sorry about that," I said. "It was worth it, though, 'cause I saw it."

Even after the effects of Liliana's healing magic, my left eye was still somewhat damaged. However, I'd gotten something really good in exchange.

"I saw a name in the light," I said.

"A name?" asked Nemesis.

"In one of those shining cracks, I was able to make out the name display of a different monster than the RSK."

"Does that mean that...?"

"Yeah," I nodded. "The RSK isn't alone. We're being attacked by other monsters."

◆◆◆

In Infinite Dendrogram, there was a monster type called "Children of the Wicked God," which was often simplified to just "Evil Offspring."

Their main characteristic was that they had no designated shape.

The same could be said for slimes, but rather than being completely amorphous, Evil Offspring grew body parts and organs as they saw fit.

They all began life as spheres of flesh, but as they matured, they grew organs and other body parts, which differed depending on the environment they were in. For example, those that were surrounded by predators would grow many ears and eyes to help them sense danger, while those living in cliffy areas would grow many arms to help them climb.

Even if they were driven by necessity and their methods were appropriate for human standards of practicality, their manner of being definitely wasn't comfortable to observe.

Combined with the fact that they had a tendency to go for easy targets and thus often took to consuming young creatures — be they animal, human, or other Evil Offspring — they had become feared to the point of acquiring that name.

When making the RSK, Franklin had thought about basing it around the use of an Evil Offspring's organ specialization ability. After all, the creatures weren't limited to just ears, eyes, or limbs — they could even create organs which released damaging light projectiles. However, Franklin had decided to take it a step further by modifying it to create other monsters that could attack in its stead.

He'd empowered the specialization function to the point where the attacking parts would count as monsters separate from the RSK, while also making sure that they would always be under the RSK's control, rather than autonomous.

Such ludicrous modifications were impossible for standard Monster Creation, the researcher grouping skill that allowed the person to use lots of materials to create many monsters of the same type. Though additional ingredients could give slight changes to stats or give an extra skill or two, there was little room for any big modifications. However, to Franklin, it was entirely possible thanks to his Superior Embryo's ultimate skill, Playing God — Pandemonium.

The result of his efforts, the RSK, was a monster that had many negation skills and generated other monsters using its Kin Creation skill while doing absolutely nothing by itself.

Leaving the attacking to other monsters would normally have been meaningless, while its many negation skills could normally have been avoided by simply using an element that wasn't covered by them.

Due to that, despite being so detailed, the RSK was nothing but a standard Pure-Dragon-class monster.

But that certainly wasn't the case for a certain Master.

◇◇◇

"Other monsters?" Liliana spoke, clearly confused. "But when he called it, he only named the RSK."

"Then they were probably created inside the eyes after it was summoned," I said. "I mean, plant-like monsters sometimes create allies, so who's to say this one can't?"

On our journey to Gideon, we'd encountered several monsters that could multiply by dividing or throwing seeds.

"What is the point of that...?" she asked.

"Well, normally, there'd be none. The result would be the same regardless of whether the attacks came from the RSK itself or other monsters."

However, this method of attack made a world of difference for me and Nemesis.

"As it says in the name, 'Ray Starling Killer' was made to kill me, and my and Nemesis's trump card is Vengeance is Mine — a counterattack that returns double the damage I receive from the enemy."

Therefore...

"This skill has no effect if the target doesn't attack me. The most effective move against us is to not do anything."

That was the crux of it all. What damaged us were the monsters the RSK created, rather than the RSK itself, which rendered Vengeance unusable... or "useless," rather.

After all, no amount of multiplication could make 0 be more than 0.

It was also fair to assume that the light show the RSK created was there to visually conceal the fact that it was a gathering of monsters.

Anyway, I now knew the truth behind it. Vengeance could do nothing against the RSK itself, and even if I killed the attacking monsters, they would just be re-created.

"So, are you done clarifying how screwed you are?" mocked a malicious voice.

"Franklin..."

"Man, you're fast. I expected to see you panic as you tried to figure it out. Well, not that anything changes now that you know!" He formed another sneer.

Franklin wasn't wrong about that. My knowing how the RSK worked didn't change anything.

However...

"I'm relieved that there's a reason why my Vengeance doesn't work," I said.

"...'Relieved'?" Franklin repeated the word as his smile vanished and his brow furrowed.

"It means that not even a Superior like you was able to create a monster that was invincible just because."

"Kh..."

Superiors were the pinnacle of players. They were the strongest elite of Masters and Embryos that didn't even amount to a hundred. And yet, not even one of them had been able to make an undefeatable being.

"That means that there's something I can do," I continued. "Even if it's nearly zero... as long as the possibility is there, I'll never give up trying to seize it." The words I spoke were the same ones my brother had told me... the ones I'd recalled during the Gouz-Maise battle.

"Khah!" Franklin laughed. "Not giving up is fine and all, but you only have 270 seconds left. What can you do in just over four minutes?"

In response, I brandished Nemesis and pointed her at the RSK before speaking up. "Kill that thing."

"...Hmph."

All right, I have four minutes, I thought. So far, neither I nor Liliana nor Sir Lindos had done anything that had an effect.

My Vengeance and Purgatorial Flames were both useless, and since the RSK didn't give any debuffs, using Like a Flag Flying the Reversal would be meaningless. Hellish Miasma wasn't an option, either, since there were people lying around it. Then again, if Franklin was telling the truth, it wouldn't have had any effect, either.

"Mm...?" I murmured.

"Vengeance is Mine doesn't work on him, he doesn't give any debuffs, he negates Purgatorial Flames, Hellish Miasma, Purifying Silverlight, and even Grand Cross, if you had it."

Upon recalling Franklin's words, I realized that there were two strange things about them. First, there was the fact that he had gone out of his way to tell me what the RSK negated.

If he'd stayed quiet, I would've wasted a bunch of the little time we had left just attempting those skills, and he would have derived enjoyment from watching me try and fail.

Why did he say it and throw that scenario to the wind? I thought. Did it just slip out because he was feeling uppity... or is there some other reason?

The second strange thing was the fact that the measures he'd named didn't cover everything I had.

"...Oh, yeah," I muttered. "He did say that it was 24 hours."

That PSS had been alive and feeding my info to Franklin for a whole day since yesterday morning. Due to that, it wasn't strange for him not to know it.

Still, it's unlikely that I can win against it with just this and... Wait, I thought. If I combine these two things... I might have a chance.

"Ray?" asked Nemesis.

"We have a way to turn this thing around," I said. "And I don't think that Franklin knows about it."

"...You mean that?"

"Yeah, that," I replied. "If we mix it with another gamble, we might be able to win against that thing. The risk is pretty great, though. If I'm wrong, what we'll do here will be pretty suicidal."

"I don't believe that any risks we take can be worse than us losing this fight."

"Good point. Still, there's a problem."

I looked at the RSK... or, rather, at the ground around it. There were a number of incapacitated Royal Guard knights there, and I couldn't make my move until I helped them. I was about to go and try getting them away from there...

"You have a plan, yes?" Sir Lindos stopped fighting the RSK and asked.

"It's a huge gamble," I replied. "But if it goes well, I might be able to take care of the monster release time limit."

"Can I help in any way?"

His words made my eyes open wide. I'd only met him yesterday and seen him once again today, but from that alone, I figured that he didn't have the best opinion of us Masters.

"...I know what you want to say," he continued. "However, my opinion means little here. What's important right now..."

"...are the people of Gideon and the princess?" I completed his sentence.

"Exactly." Sir Lindos put on a smile, to which I responded with my own.

"Now, is there anything Lady Grandria and I can do?" he asked.

"I would like you to move the Royal Guard near the RSK away from it," I answered. "Do it within the next two minutes and take them at least 100 meter... I mean, 'metels' away."

The buildup would probably take two minutes.

"Also, you need to keep the RSK in place and make sure you're nowhere near it when I get close."

"That sure is a lot of orders... But very well. Did you hear him, Lady Grandria?!"

"Yes! Leave the rescue to me!" Liliana called.

“Then I shall keep it from moving!”

The two split the roles and charged towards the RSK. Liliana evaded the light projectiles and saved the Royal Guard members while Sir Lindos kept the RSK in place.

Their skill as Paladins was clearly greater than mine, and I would’ve been lying if I’d said it didn’t move me.

“Let’s not fall behind... SILVER!” I called.

My mount neighed.

“Wind Hoof... activate!”

Thus, I used one of the skills on my Prism Steed, Zephyrus Silver.

◇◇◇

West of duel city Gideon, Jeand Grasslands

Ray’s words made Silver use a skill which distorted their appearance.

It was caused by Wind Hoof’s compressed air barrier bending the light around them.

“...Why now?” Franklin asked, slightly surprised and confused. It wasn’t because he was witnessing something unknown. Quite the opposite — he knew the skill well, but he didn’t see any reason to use it. “I mean, that’s a skill for mobility and defense, right?”

Since PSS had been inside Ray when he’d acquired the Prism Steed, Franklin had received its info and knew the details of Wind Hoof. It was a compressed air barrier skill with a flying — or rather, “air-walking” — ability as a bonus.

Wind Hoof certainly wasn’t special, either, as mount-type special equipment or monsters with similar skills weren’t all that uncommon.

Franklin’s countermeasure to this barrier was already in place, too. After all, the many light projectiles fired by the monsters inside the RSK would have little trouble breaking through it. He would’ve added some defensive function if Wind Hoof had been an attack skill, but that just wasn’t the case.

“There’s nothing special in the skill’s description, so nothing should happen if he uses it... right?” Franklin muttered his thoughts as he looked at Silver using Identification. However, the confirmation did little to abate his inexpressible unease.

Franklin wasn’t actually wrong in the least. Wind Hoof was most definitely a skill for a compressed air barrier and aerial movement, and normally, it wouldn't be anything to worry about.

At least, as long as Ray didn't combine it with another item.

"Gouz-Maise!" Ray shouted, his words resounding throughout the surroundings.

As if they heard him, his dark purple greaves groaned in a manner reminiscent of the living dead. They began to flicker.

"Release... your MP!"

Suddenly, the Grudge-soaked Graves emitted immense amounts of magic into the surrounding air.

Normally, magic was colorless and permeable, but Gouz-Maise's energy had a blood-curdling, purple hue. That was due to it being the magic stored in Greaves of Grudge through its Grudge Conversion — a skill that changed the surrounding grudge and negative emotions into the wearer's SP or MP.

The magic released just now was so great it could make a magic-focused high-rank job turn green with envy. In fact, it could even match the maximum magic stores of such Superior Jobs.

"Whoa, whoa..." Franklin muttered as he backed away a bit.

The magic was equivalent to hundreds of thousands of MP — a number most maxed-out spellcasters could only dream of.

"So this is that skill..."

Of course, Franklin knew of Grudge Conversion, as well. However, he didn't see what had caused the magic stored to become that great.

"Where did he get all this gru...? Damn it!" Realizing the cause, Franklin cut his words short and cursed. "It's me!"

The grudge... the negative emotions came from the game that Franklin had started.

He'd let his player killers and modified monsters run rampant throughout the city, and livestreamed himself laughing that he would release even more. Naturally, that had caused the tens of thousands of Gideoners to feel fear, which had then been absorbed by Gouz-Maise during Ray's ride through the city.

Though Gouz-Maise's nature made it so that its greatest source of energy was the grudge of the dead, the fear of the living was viable as well. Naturally, it was far weaker, but when it came from tens of thousands of people, the gathered MP could reach immense numbers.

Did I mess up? thought Franklin. No, this phenomenon was unavoidable. Wait, the problem here is...

During the RSK's creation, he'd pictured scenarios in which Ray used the MP from Gouz-Maise on Purgatorial Flames, Hellish Miasma, or Reversal, but those were already taken care of.

With those things out of the way, Franklin wanted to know the purpose behind Ray releasing all that magic power.

The answer to his question came quickly, since the purple magic in the air was suddenly absorbed by Silver. What followed was a mighty wind, coming from every direction imaginable.

No, "wind" wasn't appropriate, as Silver was simply absorbing all the surrounding air, all for the purpose of unleashing the full potential of Wind Hoof — the skill using the rider's MP to create a barrier of compressed air.

The hundreds of thousands of MP allowed Silver to gather so much air that both he and Ray disappeared from sight. The barrier had become so dense that it no longer allowed any light to pass, leaving behind nothing but a pitch-black sphere.

"Khah...!"

Upon seeing it, Franklin instantly realized that, in this situation, the barrier wasn't actually a barrier.

"RSK! Move! Get away from there!" Franklin shouted.

Since no light could pass through the sphere, anyone inside wouldn't be able to see what was outside. If the RSK moved, Ray would be rendered unable to hit it.

"I won't allow that!"

But the RSK's movements were stopped by a certain Paladin — Sir Lindos.

"Grand Cross!" he shouted, unleashing his most powerful attack.

Just like before, the holy light did nothing to hurt the RSK, but that didn't matter, for even if it didn't take any damage, the pressure of the mighty skill dulled its movements. With that, the stage was set for Ray to unleash his attack.

"Tch! Ca—!" Franklin tried to Call for new monsters that could take care of the threat. However, before he could, the pitch-black wind began speeding towards the RSK.

Sir Lindos instantly went out of the sphere's way and distanced himself from it.

Upon being set free, the RSK tried to escape, but it was simply far too slow to avoid the black object heading towards it.

The spheres clashed, but didn't touch directly, as the RSK's Material Barrier was protecting it. No matter how densely it compressed the air, Wind Hoof was merely a barrier and thus didn't have much in the ways of damage.

Upon arriving at that realization using its limited thinking capabilities, the RSK became relieved. Its creator, on the other hand, clicked his tongue in frustration.

"Wind Hoof, cancel."

The voice came from inside the compressed air barrier and wasn't heard by anyone outside, but everyone saw its effects.

The black sphere vanished, creating a mighty explosion which tore through the Material Barrier as though it was paper and hit the RSK.

◇◇◇

Ray Starling had discovered this phenomenon by complete accident.

It had happened on the morning of the same day, when he was testing Wind Hoof and trying to find a way to make its compressed air barrier useful.

Even when Ray gave it all of his maximum MP, the resulting barrier couldn't shield him from attacks by the most basic monsters in the Nex Plains, and he concluded that it was due to his MP being too low to unleash its full potential.

Then Ray got the idea to combine the skill with his Grudge-soaked Greaves.

Ever since he'd gotten the item, Grudge Conversion had been stocking up on a decent amount of MP — certainly greater than Ray's own maximum, at least — and he figured that it could be used to create a powerful barrier.

He turned out to be correct, and the resulting compressed air shield was strong enough to hold even when he got swarmed by monsters. It had the negative of rendering him incapable of seeing anything around him, but

Ray figured that he could find a use for it regardless.

With his experiment done, he decided to fight the monsters swarming him. However, when he disabled Wind Hoof, Silver's surroundings exploded.

Or perhaps burst was the better word for it.

Surrounded by clouds of dust and a rain of monster guts, both Ray and Nemesis tilted their heads in confusion.

However, there was nothing curious about this.

Wind Hoof's barriers were made of gathered and compressed air, which didn't disappear after the skill was canceled. So, upon losing its "container," the air got scattered into the surroundings, creating an explosion in the process.

It was much like a bursting balloon, only hundreds... or thousands... of times greater. The only thing separating it from a bomb was the fact that there were no life-threatening shrapnel, but the explosive pressure was more than enough to tear a living being apart.

Upon further thought, Ray realized that the result was nothing if not obvious.

Fortunately, Silver himself was designed to not get caught up in the explosion, so Ray and Nemesis were completely fine. Otherwise, he'd have gotten the death penalty.

Though impressive overall, being surrounded by falling ground and flesh was enough to make Ray and Nemesis hesitate about using this skill combo. After a bit of talk, they concluded that it was too indiscriminate and dangerous and chose to never use it again.

Funnily enough, they ended up having to do it a second time on the same day, and with far greater MP than during the experiment.

◇◇◇

Ray himself had had no idea just how powerful Wind Hoof would become when he gave it all the hundreds of thousands of MP from his greaves... however...

"Looks like it was enough to break through its barrier," Ray said as he looked at the RSK, lying on the ground, its insides exposed due to having lost its upper half.

The abomination wasn't the only thing that had been caught up in the explosion. The surrounding ground looked as though it had been turned upside down, making the area seem more like a "wasteland" than a "grassland."

The damage caused was far greater than Ray had expected, and if there had been any other people nearby, the results would've been nothing but tragic.

"...Yeah, this definitely wasn't a skill I could use when the Royal Guard were lying here." Ray worriedly looked around and saw Liliana and her knights, safe and sound.

"Right, then..." he said as he turned to the RSK again.

It wasn't over yet, as the monster still hadn't become particles of light. Ray didn't find that surprising, since he hadn't expected Wind Hoof's explosion to be enough.

"...Yeah, I figured as much," he muttered as he noticed that the RSK began gradually regenerating.

Just like with Gouz-Maise, his enemy from yesterday, the flesh expanded and rebuilt the parts of the body it had lost.

With the RSK being a creature that could spawn monsters, the presence of a regenerative ability was par for the course.

Thus, Ray made the move he had in mind.

"...Let's go," he said as he made Silver dash towards the abomination.

The RSK's regeneration speed increased exponentially in relation to the volume it regained, and soon enough, its offensive function was back up.

The cracks opened up again and began firing light projectiles towards Ray.

Their amount was significantly lower than before, but the reason for that was obvious. Not only had the explosion from Wind Hoof exterminated all the attacker minions it had had in its upper part, but the RSK was too preoccupied with regeneration to dedicate any energy to their creation.

"Break through... Silver!"

The Prism Steed ran on the air and gracefully avoided the light projectiles as he closed in on the RSK.

"You can make it!" Ray shouted.

The moment he was in range, Ray jumped off Silver's back and forced his left arm into the RSK's last wound. Though the meaty pressure wasn't pleasant, it wasn't strong enough to crush his limb.

"Gardranda!" he shouted, preparing his left bracer — the flame thrower — to fire.

"...Ha, now that's just pointless," said Franklin in a mocking voice that Ray was already familiar with, much to Ray's dismay. "Didn't I tell you that Purgatorial Flames and Hellish Miasma don't work?"

The jerk was nowhere in sight, but his voice resounded throughout the surroundings.

"That attack sure as hell surprised me, but it's not like you can do it again, right?"

"Yeah," Ray replied. "It drained all the MP I had in Gouz-Maise, so it's not an option anymore."

"Then you're out of moves, huh?" Franklin sneered.

"Nope," Ray grinned in response. "I can still burn this thing down."

"...Why, though?" Franklin said. "You should know by now that Purgatorial Flames don't work on him. I mean, you tried it yourself."

Franklin spoke nothing but the truth.

"But does it negate regardless of where I fire?" Ray asked.

"Ah..." The words made Franklin fall silent.

"Wouldn't the fire work if it came from inside?" Ray added.

Ray believed it was entirely possible that the negation effect was only present on the surface.

"Honestly, if it could really negate the fire no matter what, I don't think you'd have told me that," he went on. "I mean... you're a huge asshole."

That was Ray's primary reasoning. He had a feeling that Franklin wouldn't have said that if the RSK hadn't had some sort of weakness.

"That's pointle—" Franklin began.

"Is it? I'll see it for myself." With those words, Ray poured all his remaining MP into his Miasmaflame Bracers.

"Wai—!"

"Purgatorial Flames — full power!" Thus, demonic fire began rampaging within the RSK.

They filled its corpus, burst out of its many cracks, and even roared through the hole Ray forced his arm into. The RSK's body, attacker minions, central nerves, Ray's left arm — all of it got caught in the crimson blaze.

“Well, my ‘natural enemy...’ let’s test our endurance!” Ray shouted.

“■■■■■...!” The RSK’s mouthless body released a silent scream as it shook its large frame and swung its tentacles to try and throw Ray off of it.

The abnormality of the situation caused the RSK to break the rule of not attacking Ray by itself.

But Ray was able to stay on anyway by forcing Nemesis in her sword form into one of the RSK’s eyes and holding on to her. His back got hit by the tentacles, but he had enough endurance to bear it.

Ray’s arm burned and his torso got damaged, causing his HP to drop by the second. But he didn’t stop his flames, for he had already decided that he would continue firing until either he or the RSK died.

Right as his limited HP and MP was about to be depleted, for reasons not even he knew...

“GOUZ-MAISE!” Ray shouted the name of the grudge abomination that had turned into his boots, and despite him not intending it, Gouz-Maise answered.

Ray’s flames had turned the RSK into a gathering of pain and rage — negative emotions fit for Grudge Conversion.

Placed directly on this potent source, the boots were able to absorb the grudge with great efficiency, delivering great amounts of MP to Ray. He instantly used it to empower the flow of the fire and even heal himself.

The greater flames increased the RSK’s pain, which, in turn, got converted into MP. It was much like a perpetual motion engine.

However, nothing was perpetual, and something would eventually yield.

And, sure enough, after an amount of time that would have seemed long for some and short for others, something broke.

Surrounded by the crimson blaze, a silhouette crumbled and vanished.

◇◇◇

That night, the tians living in Gideon were overcome by fear.

Fiendish-looking monsters were unleashed upon the city, and its streets were ravaged by the battles between Masters.

Some shut themselves in their homes, some took shelter in designated emergency facilities, some just curled up and shook in back alleys, and some were trapped in the arena and shared their worries with others in that situation.

Likely for the purpose of fueling their fear, a live recording was being broadcast to them through several projections in the night sky. They displayed a madman in a lab coat, a large monster, and a mere three Paladins fighting those enemies. The madman claimed that if they didn't defeat the monster within the time limit, countless more beasts would be unleashed upon Gideon and reduce it to rubble.

Naturally, the people's fear escalated, and they began feeling much like criminals waiting to answer the gallows' call. However, despite the overwhelming despair, they still held on to a bit of hope.

After all, the three Paladins were still fighting the enormous abomination, and their struggle against the odds was more than enough for the people to not give in to despair.

Eventually, the monster and the young man — the sole Master among the three — were both engulfed in flames.

The fire he'd released burned not just the abomination, but himself, as well, and to add to that, the monstrosity's large tentacles were repeatedly attacking him. Despite it all, he didn't give up or show any signs of stopping.

For both those involved and those watching, time seemed to be distorted, feeling long for some and short for others.

However, such differences were inconsequential to the result — the crumbling of a large silhouette.

Its ten tentacles fell apart as the sphere-like gathering of flesh exposed its scorched insides and slowly began turning into particles of light. As they scattered and vanished into the wind, the shape of a young man stood up in the midst of it.

His own flames had carbonized his left hand, while the thrashing he'd received from the tentacles had taken its toll, and his equipment no longer held its original shape. And yet, his eyes were still shining with power.

In his right hand, he held a black greatsword which he used to support his body.

Then, he wrung out his remaining energy to raise his right arm up into the air.

As if to tell the scared citizens of Gideon that the fear was no more, or perhaps just to assert his victory, he raised his arm, making him look much like the many arena champions the inhabitants of the duel city were so familiar with.

A moment later, the city of Gideon was drowned in roaring cheers.

To be continued...

Afterword

Cat: “We won! Franklin’s part is over! Hello, this is the control AI you already know well, Cheshiiire!”

Xun: “Whoa noW, it ain’t over yEt. And hey, I’m the Master Jiangshi, XunYu.”

Cat: “Brother Bear cannot participate due to certain circumstancees.”

Xun: (Certain circumstances...?)

Cat: “We will start this afterword by informing you about something. The manga version of Infinite Dendrogram, drawn by the skillful Kami Imai, recently had its first volume released!”

Xun: “I bet thAt tons of novel rEaders are already readiNg it.”

Cat: “The first volume ends with chapter 5, the one that got lots of ironic ‘Is this the final chapter?’ comments on Niconico Seiga. Our battle had only just begun!”

Xun: “Stop adding uNtimely endings to sTuff.”

Cat: “If all went smoothly, then chapter 6, the continuation of the first manga volume, should already be up on Comic Fire! We will be very glad if you enjoy this story in both novel and manga form.”

Xun: “Well, with the adVertising done, let’s go bAck to talking about tHis volume.”

Cat: “Yes. Despite what I said at the beginning of the afterword, this incident isn’t over yet.”

Xun: “The latter haLf of the Franklin paRt will be in vOlume 5.”

Cat: “Yep. However, while the latter half was too large to fit into volume 4, it’s also too small to fit into a separate volume, so volume 5 will have new scenes that don’t exist in the webnovel.”

Xun: “We’ll leavE the explanation to the aUthor and his serious commEnt.”

Dear readers, thank you for the purchase. I am the author, Sakon Kaidou.

Instead of ending the ongoing incident with volume 4, I decided to make it continue into volume 5.

I figured that making the split and adding additional scenes was a better choice than cutting good scenes just so that I could cram it all into a single volume.

After all, Franklin’s part has numerous scenes and includes lots of characters, so I wanted the novels to use Taiki’s superb drawing ability to portray as many of those characters in as many scenes as possible.

However, this choice wouldn’t have been possible if the novel series had gotten canceled on volume 4.

Thanks to your support, dear readers, we have plans to continue the series further. You are the ones that allowed me to make this choice, and I simply can’t thank you enough for it.

That aside, I have something to say about this volume.

It portrays the battles between people who are “similar, but unlike.”

There are those who began playing Dendro for the sake of their creations: the manga artist, Marie, and the composer, Veldorbell.

There are those who are friends with Ray and are both indecisive in their own ways: Hugo and Rook.

Ray, who uses all he has to seize the possibilities, and Franklin, who has used everything he has to win.

It’s safe to say that this volume was all about such similar people fighting for what they couldn’t give up on.

Rather than the amount of powers or the knowledge needed to win, the results of their fights could have actually been decided by their mental strength.

After all, it was Ray’s unbreakable will that allowed him to defeat his natural enemy and pull victory from the fiery maw.

The only reason why Taiki's wonderful illustration displaying the final scene of the battle could go at the end of the volume was thanks to the split which, again, could only happen because of you — the readers.

I will continue to do my best to answer to your expectations.

Just as you've already been informed, the next volume will contain scenes that weren't in the original webnovel. Up until now, I've been doing primarily sorting and editing of parts too personal or verbose, so this would be my first major addition to the novel.

Little would make me happier than your excitement for the conclusion to this incident in volume 5.

Sakon Kaidou

Cat: "So there, please wait for volume 5."

Xun: "It's alrEady decided when it reLeases, though."

Cat: "...Ah! Infinite Dendrogram volume 5 is—!"

Xun: "Volume 5 is sEt to come out sOon! Look forwaRd to it!"

Cat: "I thought I'd get to say it this time! You thieving cat!"

Xun: "You're the caT here. By the waY, Cheshire."

Cat: "Mrrgh, I didn't get to announce it even once... Well, what is it?"

Xun: "Why didn't thE bear partiCipate in this afterWord?"

Cat: "He said he's on standby for volume 5."

Xun: "...AlreaDy?!"

Bonus Short Stories

A certain day of a certain month, a certain place in Tenchi

"Hmm... What should I do about this?"

That day, Marie was sitting at her table in her private quarters, very concerned about something.

She had yet to acquire Death Shadow, the Superior Job of the onmitsu grouping. She was still just a high-rank job, Shadow.

Marie currently lived in a ninja village and spent her days going through "training" quests. To get fully immersed into her role as Marie Adler, the protagonist of her work, she needed to acquire the necessary ninja-like skills.

The thing that had her concerned was a particular skill.

It wasn't any of the onmitsu grouping's job skills. What bothered her was the new skill she'd acquired on her Embryo, Arc-en-Ciel.

She murmured, "'Phantasmal Raingun — Arc-en-Ciel...' what it does is very clear, but..."

Arc-en-Ciel's ultimate skill was an enhancement of its basic ability — the creation and firing of bullet creatures. With it, her shots could become significantly more powerful.

That wasn't all. Marie could also draw the bullets using any of her paints to control the abilities of the output bullet creatures, which made it a highly versatile skill, albeit a bit costly.

"But... Hmm..."

The skill itself wasn't bad at all, but Marie was concerned that it didn't suit Marie Adler.

The Marie Adler that she'd portrayed in Into the Shadow was a so-called finesse-based professional killer who could match the abnormal killers with superpowers thanks to her wisdom and technique.

However, having a skill like Phantasmal Raingun in her arsenal brought her into the same realm as the abnormal killers. She'd already thought that the gun firing standard bullet creatures was a bit iffy, but she'd been able to convince herself that it was a replacement for the gun Marie used in Into the Shadow. But alas, she couldn't find any such excuses for the ultimate skill.

"I can see that it's strong, but I feel like using it will make the Marie within me less... clear."

Instead of using her role-playing tone, Marie spoke her worries as herself, Nagisa Ichimiya.

"I'd never have to worry about something like this if I roleplayed Daisy."

Daisy, AKA "Daisy Scarlet the Explosion Murder," was one of the characters in Into the Shadow. She was an abnormal killer that appeared early in the story and was basically a vampire that could transform into explosions instead of mist.

Though Marie Adler had defeated her, Daisy had come back to life due to her vampiric nature, only to die again. This had repeated a few times until, eventually, she'd become Marie's ally. After that, she had turned into somewhat of a joke character who almost always died to the new enemy they faced.

Despite that treatment, Daisy still had a lot of popularity, and even Nagisa herself was quite fond of her.

"If Daisy... Ah."

Upon remembering the character, Nagisa was hit with an idea and instantly began drawing using red and black paint.

A few minutes later, her work was done, and she had a picture of the same "Daisy Scarlet the Explosion Murder" she'd just been thinking about.

"...This is it!"

Upon looking at the result, Nagisa... Marie put up a bright smile, as though her worries had all but vanished.

And so, Marie had figured how to use her ultimate skill, Phantasmal Raingun. It would be a power that "fired the abnormal killers Marie had become allied with in Into the Shadow," which covered both its function as a skill and her roleplaying needs.

A certain day of a certain month, Hugo Lesseps

“So this is the world of Infinite Dendrogram...”

That day marked Hugo Lesseps’s AKA Yuri Gautier’s first login to Infinite Dendrogram. She’d chosen the Dryfe Imperium as her starting point and appeared in the imperial capital, Vandelheim.

“Wow... The smells and atmosphere is just like in real life... Hm?”

Like many players, she started out overwhelmed by the game’s degree of reality, but then she noticed something off.

The point of view is a bit high... Oh.

Suddenly, it all came back to her.

She was no longer the junior high school girl known as “Yuri Gautier.” She’d become Hugo Lesseps, the man representing her ideal.

He was about 30cm taller than her, and the leg length that came with this height made it somewhat uncomfortable for her to walk.

Not only that, but...

“...They’re gone.”

She touched her chest, which held, quite obviously, a masculine set of pectoral muscles.

Yuri didn’t care about that all that much. She wasn’t exactly well-endowed, so the only real difference here was the softness or lack of it.

However, she didn’t know what to make of the area below.

“...It’s there.”

Though she didn’t touch it by hand, she could feel something between her legs whenever she tried to walk, and it certainly wasn’t a sensation she had in real life.

I’m not sure if this is how it actually is for men... but I feel it.

She could hardly believe that the game could actually make her — a girl — get to know the feeling of having male genitals. Infinite Dendrogram’s technology impressed her to the point of making chills go down her spine.

Yuri then remembered the words of the control AI that had guided her through the tutorial process.

“Keep in mind that picking the gender opposite of yours in reality can make you feel really uncomfortable.”

Yes, that’s what that “Duchess” control AI told me.

And Yuri had already come to know this discomfort very well.

“But I can’t let this stop me.”

She had something she wanted to do in this world, and for that, she could easily overcome this slight problem.

"Okay. I'll start with tone. I have to sound more like a chivalric knight."

After saying that, she took a moment to practice. In real life, she often pretended to be a theater actress, so she had a far easier time getting used to a change of tone than the change of body.

"This should be good enough. Anyway, I should go and meet up with her. If I recall correctly, I'm supposed to go to the capital's adventurers' guild," she spoke with a tone she considered knightly and chuckled a little bit. "Heh. I reckon my appearance will really surprise her."

Anticipating the other person's reaction, Yuri... Hugo made "his" way towards the place they were supposed to meet.

Those were her first steps as Hugo Lesseps.

Due to the other person also looking completely unlike herself in real life, they needed several hours to finally meet up, but that was a story for another time.

A certain day of a certain month, Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin

I felt like I was spending a lot of my recent time making plots to help the imperium annex the kingdom.

It was all because the previous war hadn't been enough to end it all.

We'd defeated most of their main forces, but Caldina's intervention had prevented us from finishing the job. Therefore, I was now making plots that would allow us to get it all done before Caldina could make their move.

"To do that... I should kill someone," I said.

The target I had in mind was Liliana Grandria.

She was a Paladin and the current vice commander — the de facto leader — of the Knights of the Royal Guard.

In terms of battle ability, she was nothing for us to fear. Sure, her father had been the previous Celestial Knight, and she probably had much in the ways of talent, but it was highly unlikely that she could become a threat by the time the next war began.

However, she was wildly popular.

Liliana's family had been close to the princesses since their parents' generation, and the kingdom's knights had unwavering trust in her. In addition to that, her bloodline had a little bit of something that could prove troublesome.

The biggest problem of all, though, was the fact that she was popular not just among tians, but Masters, as well.

In fact, the current no. 2 in the kingdom's clan rankings was the merger of both her and the princesses's fan clubs: the Altimia, Elizabeth, Theresia, and Liliana Union, AKA the "AETL Union."

As stupid as it sounded, without the kingdom's Superiors or Tsukuyo Fuso's Lunar Society taking part, these maniacs were the most powerful force on their side.

...Well, they'd also had duel rankers like Masked Riser the "Kamen Rider" and Bishmal the "Raging Blaze," but they were too few to be relevant.

"I should get rid of as many of their forces as I can," I decided.

The AETL Union had caused us to use more of our armies than necessary and slowed down our invasion. So, I'd chosen to get rid of their reason to fight.

Though some would turn vengeful and attack us with more ferocity, there would be just as many who'd just quit. After all, to about half of those there, Liliana was just "an NPC they liked."

"The most effective way to get rid of their battle potential would be killing the first princess, but that's not exactly something the imperator would allow..." I murmured.

And when the first princess's future was considered, the other two princesses were off-limits, too. Even in our plans for Gideon, we'd only keep it at kidnapping.

"Well, that plan is all the more reason to kill Liliana," I decided. "Make sure she doesn't get in the way and all."

I chose to start with the orthodox approach — poisoning. And if that didn't work, I'd have her get overwhelmed by the Demi-Dragon Worms hiding in the kingdom.

"I'm going to Gideon, anyway. Might as well pay a visit to the capital and set a trap for her."

After saying that, I put my plans in order, sealed Liliana's fate, and went to log out.

I had no means of knowing that this decision of mine would begin my unpleasant connection to a certain newbie.

To be continued in Episode One.

Chapter Semis: Brother Bear's Welcoming Party Preparations

2045, March 16th, 9:00 A.M.

That day, Shuichi Mukudori was sitting in his living room and talking with his little brother while watching the morning news on his wall-sized monitor.

"Oh, you're finally starting Dendro?" he asked.

"Yeah. I've finished moving, so no better time than now, I thought," his brother answered.

"Ha ha. That's great and all, but make sure not to get too addicted. You don't want to neglect the college you worked so hard to get into, right?"

"Well, yeah. I know that much."

"Let's meet up, all right? I'll prepare a welcome party."

"All right."

"It's decided, then. I'll wait in the Kingdom of Altar's capital."

"Kingd...? What?"

"Find me at the fountain in the central plaza."

Shuichi might or might not have realized that the country name he wasn't familiar with had confused his brother, but he just hung up on him regardless.

"So, now he'll buy the gear, then return home and go through the tutorial... That'll be about two hours here and six hours there... All right, then."

Shuichi stood up from his sofa and stretched his body.

He then looked towards the large monitor, which was now showing the entertainment news. The news anchor was talking about something over a video of a live performance of the worldwide rock star, Rachel Raymuse.

"...As busy as ever, I see."

Shuichi swung his hand and turned off the monitor using its sensor function.

"Well, guess I'll go and prepare," he said.

He left his living room and went to his bedroom, where he kept the hardware for Infinite Dendrogram.

◇◇◇

On an unrelated note, Shuichi Mukudori had an extremely well-featured body.

His height exceeded 180cm, and he'd kept an admirable balance even as he'd built up his muscles, making him look like a first-class martial artist. He was also paying daily visits to the gym in his apartment to keep himself in shape.

He was quite handsome, as well. So much that his face wouldn't be out of place in the acting industry.

Despite being such a fine figure of a man, however...

"HYAHAAH! The bear hungers! Time to forage for the party!"

...he was now speaking borderline nonsense while clad in a bear suit.

Not a single inch of his splendid body was in sight — even his visage was hidden by the face of the animal.

Shuichi had his reasons for looking like that.

He had to hide his avatar because it looked exactly the same as his real body.

It had turned out that way because of some trouble during his tutorial, and he'd been playing the game in such suits ever since he'd started.

Of course, even if it meant he had to hide his appearance, there was no need for him to talk in such a nonsensical manner. Thus, he used the weird tone and spoke with puns simply because he wanted to.

Indeed — in the game, Shuichi Mukudori was the bear-suit-clad Shu Starling.

"All right, so the time here is..."

In real life, it was a bit past nine in the morning, while here, it was a little before dawn. The marketplace was about to open, so he was just in time to do his so-called "foraging."

"Hell yeah! Gonna get these paws full of the stuff!"

◇

First, Shu went to the wholesale produce market.

"Let's start with the capital's favorite remberries. Gotta buy a load of those."

The remberries cultivated in the royal capital were popular in and out of the city. Their rich sweetness and pleasant sourness made them a highly sought-after product.

Shu became worried about a highly unlikely event.

"Hmm, I think I'd feel beary bad if he liked them a lot and wanted more of them, so... all right."

He let this worry guide him to a wholesaler...

"Excuse me, sir. I'd like to buy all the remberries you have today."

"ALL?!"

The seller seemed to be taken aback.

Thus, Shu ended up with an obscene amount of remberries.

Though they'd told him they couldn't sell all of them because they had to give them out to the shops, Shu was able to buy every single remberry that was meant to be sold that day.

After buying a number of other fruits and vegetables, Shu left the produce market with a satisfied smile on his face.

On an unrelated note, a certain bespectacled man that arrived there an hour later was heard panicking and saying, "Sold out?! What the hell do you mean?!"

◇

Then Shu went to a meat shop he was highly familiar with.

"Hey, my guy," he said. "I'm here to get these paws on some meats."

"Well, ain't that a voice I know. So today you're a bear, eh?"

"More or less every day now."

The meat shop dealt primarily in food items dropped from stock-farmed, edible monsters.

Strangely enough, the taste of these drops could differ by specimen, rather than just by monster. The ones looked after by diligent cattle farmers actually produced tastier, better-quality meat. And as always, quality had a direct link to price. Gourmet meat was a luxury, and it wasn't uncommon for a mere 100g to cost 10,000 lir.

Also, monster drops could increase in quantity if the one handling them had high Dismantling. Due to that, the owners of meat shops often raised the level of this skill, raising their own level and getting respectable muscles in the process.

The shopkeeper Shu was acquainted with was no exception. Even though he was fully-clothed, it was easy to tell he had a muscular build.

"Today, I'd like you to give me all the beary high-quality beast, avian, and dragon meat," Shu said. Just like with the remberries, Shu was requesting all the gourmet ingredients the man had for sale. However, the price was significantly greater than before.

"Whoa there, sonny," the man said in a worried manner. "I don't mind selling it all, but that'll cost ya 30,000,000 lir."

"The hungry bear cares not. Today, money is of no matter to me."

Shu didn't hesitate to do away with an amount of money equivalent to 300,000,000 yen.

Though he thought he was merely being considerate of his brother's welcome party, most would agree that he was buying far too much.

And so, after putting the various meats into his inventory, Shu left the meat shop.

◇

"Hm, hm-hmm. Where to next... Nh?"

Whilst whimsically walking to get the other ingredients, Shu noticed something strange.

A single ruined building was facing the street. It was surrounded by a fence, and a sign nearby warned against trespassing and said that the building would soon be demolished. Despite that, however, Shu could hear the laughter of children coming from inside.

Since a part of the fence was missing and because they seemed to be having lots of fun, he assumed that they'd sneaked in to play. However, the building was very aged, and even while standing outside, he could very clearly hear the building creak under their steps.

For now, he chose to merely warn them.

"That's beary dangerous! Play outside, you cubs!"

“Okaaay!”

“Kyaahhh!”

“Hiiide!”

“Meow!”

The children responded in various ways, but it was very clear they’d heard him.

Shu scratched his face, muttered, “I’ll check on them later,” and went shopping again.

◇

The third shop he went to dealt in fresh fish.

Though it was questionable whether it was really “fresh.” After all, the royal capital was a fair distance away from seas, lakes, or rivers, making it impossible for its inhabitants to fish locally. Most of the city’s water resources came from its plentiful underground water veins.

Despite what most would expect, however, the fish in the capital was edible. This was because it was brought here from the port city in the west using time-stopping inventories. The fish and other seafood was still as fresh as they come, so the distance from water sources was of no issue.

This applied to many other products, as well, which made such inventories a crucial part of the economy.

Anyway, Shu was now staring at a fish tank before the shop.

It was only there to showcase the goods, and the actual products sold would come from the shop’s inventories. This method helped chefs and the like get a good look at the fish they would get here.

“Hmmm...”

As serious as one could be about such things, Shu was thinking about what fish to get for the welcoming party. However, all the onlookers only saw a bear, poised to strike at a fish at any given moment.

Feeling great suspense, they actually expected him to throw his paw into the tank and grab one.

In the end, Shu bought lots of ten or so types of fish and several types of crustaceans. Goods imported from the seaside were costly, but again, he spared no expense.

"Will Mr. Bear chew on the salmon?" a young tian asked while pointing at Shu, all stocked up and ready to go.

"Shh! Don't look at it!" the mother scolded the child, concluding the bear man's peculiar shopping trip.

◇

"Vegetables, fruits, meat, seafood... Now, for wheat."

With that in mind, he arrived at the wholesale wheat store.

When it came to grain-based foods, he already had rice, since it was sold as a vegetable. However, the Kingdom of Altar's cuisine was primarily Western, so wheat was a necessity.

"Heyoo, give me your best wheat fur bread and pas...ta?"

Right upon entering, Shu realized that the situation in the store was abnormal.

He saw a masked man point his sword towards an old tian — most likely the owner of the place. There were three other masked men, and they, too, were using their weapons to threaten the employees, customers... and Shu.

"Don't you dare move, or I'll shove this right through your suit!" one of them shouted.

"Come on, you old fart! Bring inventories full of money and food or else!"

The situation and their words made it obvious that they were burglars.

"...Fur real? An incident? Now, of all times?" Beneath his suit, Shu made a troubled... no, an annoyed expression.

By wasting his time here, he could end up being late to meet up with his brother, and might not be able to gather enough ingredients.

With that in mind, he acted fast.

"Hey, you suit freak! I told you not to m—"

First, he made one burglar faint with a backhanded blow to the chin, making sure to not blow away half of his face.

Next, instead of going for the one closest to him, Shu went to the side of the one who turned towards him first. Lowering his power so that he wouldn't make the burglar's insides blow up, he launched a straight thrust into his abdomen.

Then, he faced the closest guy next to him and made him trip with a kick. It broke his legs, but — thanks to Shu holding back again — didn't tear them off.

Finally, he went for the one threatening the old man. Before he could turn around, Shu grabbed him into a sleeper hold, making sure not to snap his neck.

"And so, you won't have to bear these losers now," he told the old man.

All four of the burglars were on the ground in a span of only 30 seconds. Only the one with broken legs was conscious, and, naturally, he was screaming.

Anyway, with the little problem gone...

"Your best wheat fur bread and pasta, please."

...Shu returned to his original goal and asked the old man to sell him wheat.

The old man and the employees thanked him by selling the wheat for cheap.

After leaving the burglar handling to them, Shu, satisfied with his deal, went on his way in an exuberant mood.

◇

"I still have some alcohol among the drops I've gathered, and it's not like he'll drink anyway, so we don't really need it. What we do need, though, is..."

After getting the wheat, Shu thought he more or less had everything, but he couldn't shake the feeling that he was missing something.

He took a moment to think, humming in a strangely bear-like manner, until it finally came to him.

"We need some good ol' H2O."

He still hadn't gotten the water. With the capital's supply being primarily underground, it could vary heavily in terms of quality. The best water in the city was the one in the noble area — specifically, the royal palace.

"...Guess I'll pay a visit," he said.

And thus, for the sake of his brother's welcome party, Shu decided to sneak into the most important building in the country.

And so, in less than 20 minutes, he was in the deepest reaches of the royal palace.

This didn't mean that the security here was weak.

It was all due to an extremely powerful sneak effect on one of Shu's items.

However, the security around the water source was particularly strong. There were many magical items in place to prevent anyone from poisoning it, and not even Shu's equipment could let him pass by unnoticed.

That's why Shu didn't go to the source.

"Now, bear can I find...?"

He started walking around, looking for a person who could share some of the palace's water with him. After all, he was here to "get" some water, not "steal" it.

Of course, no one reasonable would give something to some bear suit that'd sneaked in here.

That was why he was looking for one of his acquaintances, when suddenly...

"Mister suit?"

...someone saw through his sneak ability and called out to him.

He turned around and saw a strange girl.

She wore fancy nightclothes, had fluffy hair, and looked about the age of an early student in elementary school. None of that was particularly strange. It was her posture that made her curious.

She was riding a strange animal — a hamster the size of a large dog. Though its closed eyes made it look asleep, it had no trouble walking over to Shu.

"Oh, hello, Theresia," Shu said.

He wasn't surprised by their appearance. Though the girl and the hamster weren't the people he was looking for, Shu still knew them well enough.

"Why are you here today?" asked Theresia.

"I came to get some water, but I'm having a beary hard time finding the grand chamberlain."

"Oh, he's talking about something with my sister... but if it's just water you want... very well, I'll try asking for some. Will one barrel be enough?"

"It should be."

"Very well. Leave it to me. They won't find it strange if I tell them it's for Dor," said Theresia as she petted the hamster's head.

The furry creature, its eyes still closed, replied by shaking its whiskers, as if to say, "I do not mind."

"Well thanks," said Shu. "I owe you one fur this."

"I'll keep that in mind."

Suddenly, he heard footsteps at another part of the hallway and instantly hid himself.

"...Hm?" he murmured.

For reasons unknown, Theresia and the hamster were hiding with him, too.

Soon enough, a maid passed by them, and when she was gone, he turned to the girl.

"Why did you hide with me?" he asked.

"We're taking a walk while I'm supposed to be in bed," she replied with a guilty expression.

"...You're not the healthiest girl, so just bear in mind not to leave the palace."

"I know. I'm about to go back, anyway. Oh, and I'll have Dor throw the barrel through the window, so make sure you catch it."

"Got it," Shu replied and turned away from her.

He knew where to find her room, so he made his way outside to wait under her window.

"Make sure they do not see you," said someone behind him in a refined, manly voice. "If you kick up a fuss, they will up the security and make it harder for us to go on walks."

Shu showed little care for who had said it. He responded by simply raising his right hand and continued walking.

Thus, he parted ways with the girl living at the palace and the mysterious creature at her side.

A short while later, Shu safely got his water barrel and left the royal palace without being discovered once.

◇

“Phew. Now I’m pawsitively ready.”

Fruit, vegetables, meat, seafood, grain, and water. Though it had taken him nearly four hours, Shu had collected all the foods he deemed necessary. They were all fit for a royal banquet, and their total cost exceeded 50,000,000 lir.

That amount of money was certainly heavy on the wallet, even for a veteran player and ranker like Shu. However, he found it a price worth paying. After all, the little brother he’d been impatiently waiting for would finally start Infinite Dendrogram, and if that wasn’t a reason to party hard — nothing was.

“...Ah, I almost forgot to reserve a restaurant. I hope Darshan’s place is open today.”

Due to him being a Master, the place run by the Star Chef — the cook grouping Superior Job for Western food — had irregular opening times. Nevertheless, it was immensely popular due to his food being significantly better than any of his competitors, and because he was open to using the ingredients brought by the customers.

“Ah, looks like he’s online,” Shu said after he opened his friends list. “Time fur a visit, then.”

And thus, he went straight to the Star Chef’s place.

On a related note, Infinite Dendrogram had no built-in long-distance chat function between friends. Such communication requires relevant spells or magic items meant for this purpose.

Many players complained that it was inconvenient and had asked the developers to implement it, but it doesn’t seem like they intended to do so anytime soon.

Due to this and many other cases where the developers didn’t seem to consider game-like convenience and logic, some players called them neglectful.

The restaurant Shu was aiming for was open, so he quickly made a reservation.

Upon accepting the many ingredients Shu prepared, the owner laughed and expressed his excitement over working on them.

And with that, the preparations were done.

◇

Now, to wait for Reiji to finally log in, Shu thought as he made his way towards the fountain they'd agreed to meet at.

"...Wait, I gave him the place and all, but how will we confirm that we're each other?"

Reiji and Shuichi didn't know each other's avatars, which would make it impossible for them to meet.

"Should I sing? He could tell it's me by my voice," he said.

Shu's idea was sub-optimal, since the sight of a singing bear might make his brother ignore him even if he did realize it was him.

"All right, let's start the vocal exercise... hm?"

Suddenly, Shu noticed something at the side of the street — the ruined building from before.

He'd purposely taken the path going through it just to see if something was wrong, and apparently, there was. Several children were looking at the building from outside the fence, and they all looked very worried.

"A grizzly situation, I assume?" Shu asked, surprising the children.

Some looked scared of him, while others seemed relieved.

"U-Umm..."

"Th-The house is gonna fall, and Thomas is stuck there."

Those words and the state of the building gave Shu all the information he needed.

The structure was even more tilted than before, and the creaking had turned even louder.

The building reached its limit while the children were playing inside, and while most of them escaped, one was still there.

"All right, then."

Shu acted fast.

He pulverized the fence, jumped inside the grounds and charged towards the building, ready to save the child. However, the boy he was going to save came out at about the same time, wailing loudly and holding a cat in his hands. He sped towards the exit, but before he could make it to safety, the building began to collapse.

Losing all that remained of its structural integrity, the roof fell towards the boy and was about to crush him when...

"First form."

"Ready."

...an artillery shell made of light completely blew it away.

The destruction was instant and absolute.

The roof was a roof no longer. It didn't even leave any fragments. It was reduced to such a state that its molecules could never bond again.

Indeed, it was destroyed so thoroughly that it was no longer able to have any integrity as physical material.

The shell that had made it happen had been fired by the cannon that'd suddenly appeared on Shu's left arm.

Much like some device made by the cat robot from that world-famous anime, the cannon replaced his left hand.

"...Safe," he said in satisfaction. "But man, nothing beats this one. At least when it comes to pure firepower, anyway."

It was the first form of Baldr, Shu's Embryo.

He'd realized that the boy wouldn't make it in time, so he saved him by destroying the roof. Of course, a normal artillery shell would've made the damage even worse. But Shu had known he'd save the boy if he'd combined his Baldr with a particular job skill.

"Good thing I didn't switch it off. My heart's beating so fast I can hardly bear it..."

At least, he'd assumed he'd be able to save the boy, and it had simply happened that he'd been successful.

"Eh? Huh...?"

"Meow...?

The boy and the cat in his hands looked like they had no idea what had just happened.

Covered in dust raised by the building's collapse, they both had expressions thick with astonishment.

The same applied to the worried children outside.

"Did you learn your lesson, cubs?" said Shu. "No more playing in places you're not allowed to."

After Shu scolded the boys and girls, they finally took in the situation and started crying out loud, either due to relief, fear, or both.

◇

After that predicament, Shu comforted the children while making his way towards the fountain where he was supposed to wait for his brother.

As he carried or let them climb on him, the children quickly stopped crying and began laughing cheerfully. They were on him even when he sat down at the edge of the fountain. The sight soon attracted even more children, and he was soon treated as a bear-shaped playground.

Shu let them do as they pleased and began making something.

In his hand, he held some wooden remains he'd took from the ruined building.

After linking a rod with a board, he wrote something on the latter.

"Welcome little brother"

Shu believed this would be more than enough for his brother to recognize him. He got the idea when he was looking at the sign telling people to keep away from the ruined building.

And thus Shu, swarmed by children, held the sign and waited for his little brother for about an hour.

End

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 5 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 4
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

Copyright © 2017 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2017 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2017 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2017 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author's intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: January 2018

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
5. Those Who Bind the Possibilities

“Save your desperate counters fur a cooler sceeene, goofus!”
No one saw the moment that man appeared before Ray.

Infinite Dendrogram

5. Those Who Bind the Possibilities

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki

"Frank...lin...!"

Ray had lost his right arm and even let go of Nemesis, yet he still dashed towards Franklin.

After all, he was facing the very reason why he was here — his ultimate goal for coming to this place.

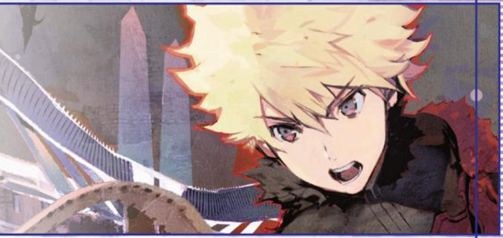
"FRANK-LIIIIIINN!"

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

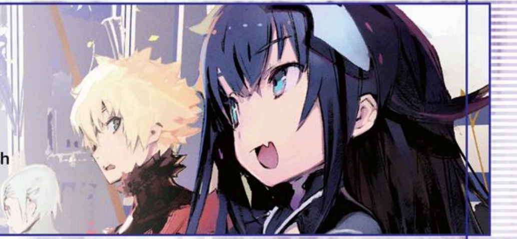
A young man who began playing Infinite Dendrogram. Though generally a calm person, he has a strong will and sense of righteousness that allows him to keep struggling for as long as he needs to.



Nemesis

Nemesis

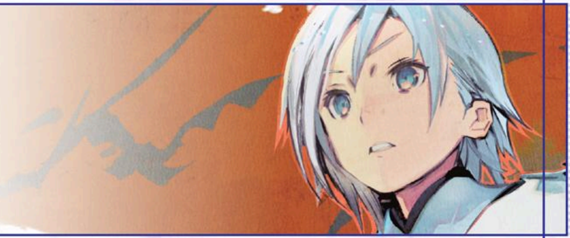
A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. She has the ability to transform into a greatsword or a halberd, and is equipped with skills such as Vengeance is Mine, which damages enemies for twice as much as they damage Ray.



Rook

Rook Holmes/Lucius Holmes

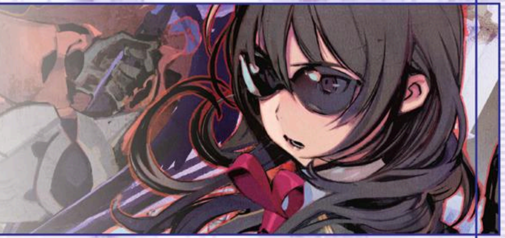
An astonishingly beautiful boy in Ray's party. His job is "Pimp" and he fights using his tamed monsters. His Embryo is the Type Guardian "Depraved Devil, Babylon."



Marie

Marie Adler/Nagisa Ichimiya

A Journalist player working for the information organization called "DIN," giving her access to lots of various info. Having gained an interest in him, she now accompanies Ray, who has a tendency to be at the center of large incidents.



Shu

Shu Starling / Shuichi Mukudori

Ray's brother and the one who invited him to the game. He wears a suit because, during character creaton, he accidentally made himself look just like he does in real life.

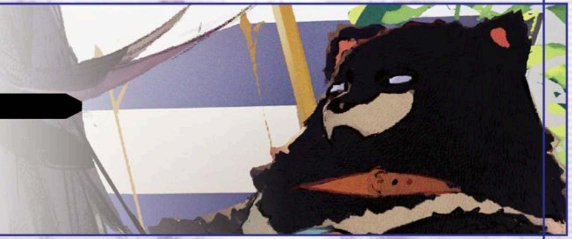


Table of Contents

Cover
Color Illustrations

Examination Chapter: ■■■ ■■■■■’s Analysis
Chapter One: Plan C
Chapter Two: Those Who Bind the Possibilities
Chapter Three: And His Name is...
Chapter Four: King of Destruction, Shu Starling
Chapter Five: Game, Set, Match
Epilogue A: The Superiors
Epilogue B: The Sisters
Epilogue C: Ray the Unbreakable
Midword
Extra: A Change of Clothing
Extra: Reiji’s Everyday Life / Ray and Nemesis’s Everyday Life

Afterword
Bonus Short Stories

About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Examination Chapter: ■■■ ■■■■■’s Analysis

Central arena, audience seating, **■■■ ■■■■■, ■■■■■■

“Lad, did you see that?! That kid’s amazing!” the middle-aged tian man seated next to me cried.

“Yes, he truly is!” I enthused.

As I gave the appropriate response, I analyzed the broadcast. The moment it had appeared, I’d changed my thought process from personal to tactical. The Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin, had started the broadcast in order to make the kingdom’s tians despair. However, the newbie young man called “Ray Starling” — a surname I knew very well, by the way — had turned it around and emerged victorious, bringing about the opposite of Franklin’s intended result.

If he’d committed this act of terrorism just to make the kingdom lose faith in its Masters, it was safe to say that he’d failed, but Franklin still had some pawns on the board. Needless to say, he wasn’t out of plans just yet.

I began forming an image of the overall situation, starting with the numbers of pawns on both sides of Franklin’s Game.

First, I went through Gideon’s forces.

No. 1 in the duel rankings, “Endless Chain,” was sealed. No. 4, “Black Raven,” and no. 8, “Vagrant Golden Sea,” were both bound by the barrier around the central arena.

No. 6, “Kamen Rider,” and no. 7, “Raging Blaze,” had been defeated in battle.

No. 2, “Monster Cat Mansion,” no. 3, “Guillotine,” and no. 5, “Bone-Eater” were not present. No. 9 and below weren’t all that relevant to the situation at hand.

The barrier’s disappearance would release nos. 1, 4, and 8, which could greatly influence the flow of the battle. In fact, no. 1 was capable of killing Franklin all by his lonesome.

The non-ranking Masters outside the arena were gradually decreasing in number, but many of those incapacitated at the western gate were only bound by the Frozen debuff, meaning that they could re-join if it was removed.

There was also the person who I assumed to be the Superior Killer. I'd lost all trace of them, but I was absolutely certain that it was due to stealth abilities rather than death.

The newbies that had left the arena had lost half of their number, with only about twelve still alive. However, Ray Starling — the newbie who'd achieved the most — was badly injured, making it questionable whether he could continue fighting.

Then there was Franklin's battle potential. The Masters he'd hired were gradually being purged, and the same applied to the monsters released unto the city. However, it was glaringly obvious that he had more in store, making it entirely possible that the numbers on his side could increase.

The three characters thought to be his heavy-hitters had been taken care of.

Veldorbell, the one who'd killed "Kamen Rider," had in turn been killed by the Superior Killer. Hugo Lesseps, the one who'd sealed "Raging Blaze" and many other Masters, had been captured by the newbie called "Rook." And the Ray Starling Killer, the monster that had greatly damaged the Royal Guard, had, ironically, been killed by Ray Starling.

Though the number of pawns on the board clearly wasn't all that great, all the ones sealed within the barrier and the unknown monsters Franklin still had in store made it hard to predict which side would win. And I wasn't even including the pawns that could destroy the board itself.

By that, I meant the joker Franklin had placed beneath this arena and the three abnormally powerful individuals sealed in here — myself included.

I looked over the stage, eyeing the opposite side of the arena. By straining my eyes a bit, I could see a woman with a porcupine on her knees. Her eyes were directed at the broadcast, and I couldn't tell whether she was amused or bored.

Suddenly she shifted her gaze towards me, causing our eyes to meet. Though her expression was devoid of any killing intent, I felt as if it came with the question, "You wanna go?"

If I responded to the challenge and fought her, we would bring about far more death and destruction than all the battles so far combined.

Right now, I had no intention of becoming the cause of such a calamity, so I simply shook my head. With that, she seemed to lose all interest in me and returned her gaze back to the broadcast.

This is the first time we've met, but so far, she gives me the impression of a wild beast, I thought.

Anyway, with that curious exchange, it became obvious that she wouldn't make a move unless provoked.

Besides the two of us, there was one other abnormally powerful individual here. He would make his move as soon as whatever was holding him back was gone, meaning that the climax of this event was near.

I can't wait until he enters the scene, I thought. He's probably even stronger than he was the last time we fought.

What was about to happen would be far more intense than tonight's Clash of the Superiors or Franklin's Game.

"It's your turn now... Shu," I murmured.

Those words escaped my mouth, confusing the tian man next to me. I lied my way out and began waiting for the time to come.

Chapter One: Plan C

Duel city Gideon

Gideon was roaring with cries of joy — cheers over Ray and the Royal Guard's victory.

With the defeat of the RSK, the remote controlling the monster-releasing devices had been destroyed as well. Even after the time limit had passed, there was no sign of any monsters being released in Gideon. Thus, the city's people became overwhelmed with joy and praised the victors.

The traitors working for Franklin, on the other hand, either became upset by the failure or scorned Franklin for his mess-up.

Though the reactions were mostly split between those two, there were a few exceptions. One of them was Hugo. Being one of Franklin's people, he was aware of Franklin's plans and knew what the man would do next. That perspective also applied to a few of the veterans fighting or merely observing the situation.

They knew that it wasn't over yet.

◇◆◇

Jeand Grasslands

Using optical means to hide himself, Franklin observed what was happening in the Jeand Grasslands.

"Well... damn. Seriously," he muttered while looking down at the place where the RSK had vanished. His tone contained suppressed rage, irritation, and a hint of self-derision.

Tonight, he'd started the plan he'd formed as a member of Dryfe Imperium's prime minister faction. At the same time, though, he'd challenged Ray Starling to a revenge match.

Franklin loathed defeat more than anything else, and he wouldn't find peace until he made anyone who won against him experience an even greater loss. That was how he'd broken the spirit of the Master who'd killed him, and that was exactly how he'd planned to get back at Ray for ruining his plan and indirectly defeating him.

He'd intended to have the fine-tuned monster defeat this newbie and make him aware of his powerlessness when all the monsters ravaged Gideon. However, the actual result of the revenge match had been nothing like that.

The RSK, the 100,000,000 lir Pure-Dragon-class monster he'd designed specifically to kill Ray Starling, was turning into particles of light.

Franklin had lost to him again.

It was an unexpected result, but he could've predicted it if he'd considered several factors.

Franklin began thinking what he had to do in order to win against Ray Starling with the handicap he'd set for himself. That was about the only thing on his mind while looking at the place where the RSK had vanished.

Though he ruined my plan and defeated me, he's still a newbie, he had thought yesterday. Going all-out on him would be immature. Not to mention that it's a waste of resources. Then there's the fact that he helped out one of my people, so... All right, I'll handle him with a single Pure-Dragon-class monster.

Franklin slowly shook his head and sighed. "I was such an idiot for thinking that yesterday," he said in a voice thick with anger and self-derision. He regretted his ever choosing to set a handicap, and tried to think of what he should've done instead, but in the end, he believed the result would've been the same regardless of what he did. That was because his opponent was Ray Starling.

This was the person who'd defeated a Demi-Dragon Worm — a match for a high-rank job — while being level 0.

Then, a few days later, he'd faced and defeated the UBM known as "Great Miasmic Demon, Gardranda."

On the day that followed, he'd defeated the head of the infamous Gouz-Maise Gang and felled the UBM born out of the group's grudge: Revenant Ox-Horse, Gouz-Maise.

And just now, he'd emerged victorious against his natural enemy, the RSK.

The newbie had already brought about a number of miracles, and Franklin had a hunch that he could do it again. The memory of that hunch mixed with the reality of his defeat made his thoughts go into disarray.

I don't want to lose a single time, yet I've lost twice now. It happened even with my countermeasures in place. I can't stomach this. I won't allow it.

Gradually, his verbal thoughts became emotions. A staggering lack of words overwhelmed his head before gathering and forming a single sentence.

"I'll go all out... and kill him."

At that moment, Franklin, the Superior from Dryfe Imperium, reached a certain conclusion. His greatest enemy wasn't the imperator faction's King of Beasts, the field marshall faction's Hell General, any of the four Superiors from the kingdom or any of the nine Superiors from Caldina's pride and joy that was Sefirot.

It was him.

The newbie known as Ray Starling was Franklin's smallest, yet greatest, nemesis. Thus, he decided to defeat him using all he had.

Next time, I'll grind him into dust using my anti-Superior monster: Mechanic God Dylan, he thought furiously.

However, that was something to do another time. MGD still wasn't complete, and Franklin had other priorities. His revenge match against Ray Starling was purely a personal thing. He still had a role to fulfill as a Superior sponsored by the prime minister.

With that in mind, he regained his composure and sprung into action, starting with...

◇◆

By the skin of his teeth, Ray had defeated the RSK and announced his victory to the people of Gideon.

Following that moment, he reached his limit, lost consciousness, and fell flat on his back.

"Ray!" Nemesis shouted his name as she returned to her human form and supported his body. Liliana, Sir Lindos, and several other Paladins of the Royal Guard gathered in Ray's vicinity.

"Ray, are you all right?! Force Heal!" shouted Liliana as she cast a healing spell.

“Those with spare MP, you take turns healing him and the incapacitated knights!” Lindos gave his orders. “Franklin is hiding right now, so the rest of you, search for him and Her Highness Elizabeth! Don’t let that man escape!”

“Understood!” the knights replied in unison before scattering.

A small number of them stayed with Ray. One was Liliana, who healed him with a pained expression on her face.

“We can restore his health, but...” she said while looking at Ray’s left arm. It was Burned so badly that the debuff merely upgraded to Charred. Even high-rank healing magic would have a hard time with such grave injury-based debuffs. Defeating the natural enemy of all Paladins had caused him to pay a heavy price.

Thankfully, Ray was a Master and thus could be completely restored by simply getting the death penalty and respawning once the time had passed. Whether he’d be willing to take this course of action, however, was a different matter entirely.

“For now, just keep him alive, please,” said Nemesis. “Ray doesn’t want to make his exit just yet.”

“I understand,” replied Liliana as she and the other knights healed Ray.

A moment later, the sound of clapping reached their ears. Surprised, they looked for the source and found it in the hologram projected into the sky.

Though they were unaware of this, it was displaying the exact same thing as the ones projected all across town. Right now it showed Franklin, smiling so widely it seemed unnatural.

“Did you see that, dear audience?” he asked. “The monster I’ve created has been destroyed. How sad. Truly a pity. Even so, I believe the Paladins who pulled it off deserve a round of applause. So here, clapclapclapclap.”

Clapping was exactly what he did. However, not a single soul joined him in that. In fact, the viewers who had been cheering just a few moments ago had turned silent upon seeing him.

“So yeah,” he continued. “Congratulations. 251 seconds have passed since the time limit and uh, it’s pretty clear that the remote is destroyed. The monsters don’t seem to have been released, after all.”

Franklin placed his hand on his forehead and shook his head in a disappointed manner. Then he reached into his pocket with a blank expression...

“Lo, this right here is a spare!”

He pulled out a remote, just like the one consumed by the RSK.

“You wretch!” shouted Nemesis, the anger in her tone all too palpable.

“Hahahahahah! The folk on the scene all look like, ‘What was the point of the last battle?’ I’m guessing the rest of the audience feels the exact same way.” Ignoring Nemesis’s words, Franklin continued speaking in a smug manner. “The battle up until now was just a sideshow — a revenge match. Come on, now. Stuff breaks, you know? Making spares is the obvious thing to do, don’t you think?”

A grin formed on his face yet again.

“By the way, this one works without a timer, so... I’ll just press it. Beepbeepbeepbeep.” With that, he nonchalantly activated the devices, releasing the 500 monsters in Gideon.

“Franklin!” Nemesis roared in anger, but again, he paid no heed.

“Hahahahahah! You were a pretty great sideshow. Sure, I didn’t like the result all too much, but seeing you now makes it kinda worth it. If only Ray was awake, too. I’d love to see his reaction.” Franklin laughed mockingly.

Liliana glared at him, told her subordinates to continue healing Ray, and stood up.

“Well, hi there, your excellency miss vice commander,” Franklin said cheerfully. “You’re gonna go help the citizens? Or are planning to defeat me? You think you can do that when you’re hurt all over? That’s some impressive perseverance... Anyway, I’m not having that. Call — DGP, KOS.” Franklin raised the Jewel on his right hand and summoned two monsters, both of which appeared right next to Nemesis.

One of them was Dino-Earth Giga Phalanx: a pachycephalosaurus-like dinosaur emitting a red aura.

The other was a King-Size Oxygen Slime: a blue Slime just like the ones he’d released in the arena, only several times bigger.

“Th-They’re...” Nemesis muttered as her intuition told her something. The two monsters before her were far stronger than the RSK, the creature they’d just worked so hard to defeat. In fact, they were actually more menacing than Gouz-Maise, their foe from yesterday.

“What? You find it strange?” asked Franklin. “I have the Superior Job of Giga Professor, and I am the owner of a Superior Embryo. You didn’t actually believe that the RSK was the only monster I had or that it was the strongest, right? In fact, out of all my special creations, he was among the weaker ones. While he was Pure-Dragon-tier, these are a match for Masters with battle-oriented Superior Jobs and Legendary-tier UBMs."

Nemesis and the Royal Guard were at a loss for words. Franklin continued.

"Surely you saw this coming, right? The only reason I used the RSK was because Ray had been able to kill a Demi-Dragon Worm, and going a step up in terms of tier seemed like the reasonable thing to do. I spent the appropriate amount of money to make sure everything was accounted for and intended to thoroughly break his spirit. But the result... well, I lost again." He heaved a long sigh as his smile faded. "Ray won against me two times out of two. I swear that I'll get back at him for this humiliation."

Nemesis stayed mute. She realized that, with the RSK, Franklin had been partially playing around. Though everyone had believed him to be immature for singling out a newbie, he'd still been somewhat considerate. However, now that he'd lost two times, Franklin had no such sentiments left.

A Superior — one of the few strongest players — now saw Ray as an enemy.

"Still, I have no intention to fail tonight's plan," he said. "Anyway, let's see how the city's doing. The monsters there are weaker than these babies, but I did throw in a few troublesome ones and... Hm...?"

After looking in the city's direction, Franklin tilted his head in a puzzled manner.

Nemesis could easily tell what had him so confused.

Gideon is too quiet.

For a city being ravaged by 500 monsters, it was far too silent.

By straining their ears, they could hear some sounds of battle, but they were strangely infrequent.

"...Did it only release a part of them?" Franklin pressed the button again, but Gideon still remained the same. "The remote is functioning properly. That means the problem is on the other en..."

Suddenly, he remembered something.

Tonight, he'd encountered a certain person who could easily take care of the many devices hidden in the city. It was a person clad in a black mist which made it hard to tell whether it was a he or a she.

The person's name was...

◇◆◇

A certain place in duel city Gideon

"Oh, I'm so glad I made it," a certain person muttered while looking up at the projection above.

Her name was Marie Adler. She was sitting at the edge of an alley to take a breather.

Right next to her, there was a bag filled to the brim with devices with Jewels fixed inside of them.

Each and every one of them were broken.

They were the monster-releasing devices Franklin had placed all over the city.

After fighting the King of Orchestras, Veldorbell, Marie had run around the city collecting them. Being the crux of the plan, these devices had had to be hidden until it was time. Because of that, in addition to their long-distance monster-releasing function, Franklin had also equipped them with a high-quality Conceal ability. That was the reason why they had been able to remain in the city for a few days without anyone noticing. However...

"Sadly for him, I happen to be as good at finding as I am at hiding," she said.

Being a Death Shadow — a Superior Job from the onmitsu grouping — Marie excelled at Conceal. She could not only masterfully hide herself, but discover those in hiding as well.

Marie's Conceal Perception skill was maxed out. It was what had allowed her to see through the Conceal on Night Lounge, the monster Franklin had used to escape.

During her search, however, she'd noticed the many Concealed monster-releasing devices littered across the city. Thus, after her fight, she'd taken it upon herself to gather and break as many of them as possible.

In the end, she'd taken care of 403 devices — more than 80% of the total.

Considering that a number had already released themselves ahead of time, it was hard to imagine that there were many left.

This result certainly wasn't all thanks to her. The Paladins' battle against the RSK had bought her time to minimize the harm.

This also marked a turning point in the situation: the Masters high-rank or above were now capable of leaving the arena. The only thing that had been holding them back was the potential of releasing monsters upon attacking the barrier. With that gone, they were now free to break it and retaliate against Franklin.

His plan had completely collapsed.

◇◆◇

However, some veterans were more than aware of just how abnormal Superiors could get.

They knew just how tenacious and meticulous Franklin was.

Thus, they were absolutely certain of one thing:

It's not over yet.

◇◆◇

Duel city Gideon, not far from the western gate

"...Oh, so that's what's happening here. Hahah. Now ain't that funny. You all just keep ruining my plans. How... disheartening."

As he listened to Franklin, Hugo became painfully aware that the plan had failed.

"...So it's over," he muttered to himself.

Hugo was currently sitting on the ground, virtually unable to move. Rook and the others had bound him when he'd become Charmed. The debuff had canceled Cyco's merging with the Magingear, and she was now at his side, Charmed and unable to do anything. As long as she was in that state, Hugo had no hope of breaking out of this situation.

Looking away from the broadcast, he examined the situation around him.

He was no longer in the area right before the western gate.

Rook and the three girls with him had all moved to a place where they could see Franklin's broadcast, and they'd taken Hugo with them. By Rook's decision, he hadn't been given the death penalty yet.

"Ray defeated that monster," said Rook. "The devices, too, were taken care of by... someone.”

Though he didn’t say so, Rook was completely certain that the culprit was Marie. Hugo, on the other hand, was completely unaware of her existence, so all he took from this was the reality of the plot’s failure.

“It appears so,” Hugo said. “Heh, Plans A and B have both failed... The plot is as good as over.”

I guess this will mean an all-out war between the kingdom and the imperium, he thought sadly.

“So I failed to prevent the calamity and ended up simply supporting the tragedy,” he muttered in self-derision. “If I’d known it would go down like this, I would’ve had ‘him’ reconsider, and... What?”

Hugo noticed that Rook was looking between him and Franklin’s projection with a puzzled expression on his face.

“You just mentioned ‘Plans A and B,’” Rook said. “Can I have their details? They’ve already failed, right?”

“...Very well.” After a moment of hesitation, Hugo began his explanation, which sounded somewhat like a sinner’s confession. “For Plan A, we sealed the Masters that came to see The Clash of the Superiors in the central arena and kidnapped the princess. Then we threatened to release the monsters to force them to stay put inside. The low-level Masters that could leave the barrier and those that weren’t inside from the start were then handled by player killers, meaning me and Veldorbell... he’s a master with a Superior Job in our clan. Our leader was then meant to escape from Gideon with the princess, which would make the kingdom’s tians lose faith in the kingdom’s Masters. And that was pretty much the whole plan.”

“...Not exactly thorough, if you ask me,” said Rook.

“Indeed.”

“The part about keeping the Masters in by making it so that damage to the barrier releases monsters is a huge flaw. After all, as proven by us, low-levels can pass freely.”

“That was part of the plan,” Hugo said. “Apparently, it was necessary that we fight the kingdom’s Masters and defeat them in a one-sided battle. Low-levels are the most suitable for this purpose.”

It wouldn’t be enough for everything to end when the Masters were sealed and rendered incapable of doing anything. To break the kingdom’s spirit, it would have been necessary for the imperium’s forces to gain a flawless victory against the kingdom's Masters. Thus, it had been optimal for them to be as weak as possible, and that limitation on the barrier had been perfect for this. In the end, however, Plan A had completely failed because of anomalies such as Ray and Rook.

"The way you handled the Masters that weren't inside the barrier was very sloppy, too," said Rook. "The plan would've completely failed if a Superior with no interest in the fight had just hung around town, right?"

"The possibility was there, yes," replied Hugo. "But as you're aware, that didn't actually happen. Not to mention that we had Cyco — the bane of many Masters here — and the King of Orchestras, Veldorbell."

Franklin had displayed a lot of cunning by positioning Veldorbell in Gideon days before the plan had begun. He'd had him act as nothing but a Master street performing in the central plaza, and soon enough, most of the people in town had become familiar with him and his band. Even the fact that he had his Legion Embryo out all the time had been taken for granted.

When the plan began tonight, many of the kingdom's Masters hadn't recognized him as an enemy, giving him a perfect opportunity for surprise attacks.

Though his stats were significantly lower than those of battle jobs, the bonuses from his Superior Job skills greatly empowered the attacks of his Bremen. And since they all moved at sonic speed, only AGI-focused Superior Jobs could ever hope to evade them.

The Masters he'd defeated had been far more numerous than those Frozen by Hugo, and most of them had been reduced to dust before even getting the chance to realize what had happened to them.

If the Superior Killer hadn't been an AGI-based Superior Job with the Danger Perception skill, there was a high chance that she would've died from his first attack.

"So," said Rook, "I assume Plan B was what you had in store in case the Masters in the barrier turned impatient and just broke out, or if someone made it through the obstacles and got to Franklin — which is what's happened now."

"Yes." Hugo nodded. "Plan B was basically the release of all the monsters regardless of the remaining time. The ensuing chaos have would allowed our leader to escape with the princess. This was also what would've happened if 'he' had been caught off guard and been given the death penalty."

Franklin's claim that it all would've ended if he died was nothing but a lie. It would've actually acted as the trigger to release the monsters, which was a testament to his meticulousness and troublesome nature.

"Regardless of what transpired..." Hugo said before cutting his words short. He couldn't bring himself to add that "...the leader had no scenario in which he didn't release the monsters."

However, Rook was practically able to read minds, so he could infer Hugo's words even if he stayed silent.

"If he wanted to break the country's spirit, he could've done something far more effective than merely kidnapping the princess," Rook commented.

"You're probably right," said Hugo. "However, 'he' promised me that he designed the monsters to only attack Masters. He wanted to limit tian casualties, too."

"...Oh, I see how it is," Rook responded with a short sigh.

"What do you mean?" Hugo asked, thoroughly puzzled.

"I've been wondering about this, but you saying 'he wanted to limit tian casualties' makes it all clear."

"Makes what clear?" Hugo couldn't understand what Rook was wondering about and what kind of answer he'd found.

In fact, Hugo was actually the only one who couldn't make sense of this. Basically...

"I now understand why you're so blind when it comes to Franklin. You actually believe that he'd never massacre tians, don't you?"

...it was a question regarding Hugo's perception.

Before, during, and even after the plan, Hugo had continued to believe in Franklin, and that was exactly what Rook was curious about.

"You... y-you think I'm blind?" asked Hugo.

"Yes," answered Rook. "You probably don't think that, but to my eyes, that man's a person who can easily start a massacre."

"He'd never. He's like me! He also understands that tians aren't just NPCs, but entities close to living beings... no, actual living beings! He'd never do something that vile!"

"So what if he does understand that? Does that get in the way of him starting a massacre?" Rook demanded.

Being told that Franklin was the type of person to commit such atrocities wasn’t something Hugo could stomach. “He’d never do that! I... I’ve known him for a long time! Don’t act like you understand him better than me!”

His anger made apparent, Hugo shouted at Rook, who replied with a cold gaze and his own words.

“That’s true. I only know Franklin through word of mouth and this incident. I’ve never even talked to him directly. Even so, I can assert that my assumption is correct.”

“Why?!”

“It’s because I don’t know him. By simply lining up what he’s done so far, it’s pretty easy to predict that he’s prepared something even more sinister. Anyone would assume that much. You’re probably the only one who doesn’t.”

“Gh...!” Hugo gasped in response.

Rook’s conclusion was based in nothing but reality.

Franklin had participated in the war. He had killed many soldiers by feeding them to his monsters, and had even killed the king of this country that way. And tonight, he’d kidnapped the princess and tried to destroy the city in order to make the kingdom’s Masters look bad. It was only natural to assume that a person like that would do something even more atrocious, and Hugo was alone in not thinking so.

“You say you’ve ‘known him for a long time,’ huh?” Rook continued. “I’m sure you have. It’s why you don’t see him as he is right now. You’re observing him through a filter, much like the mother of a criminal. ‘My boy would never do such a thing,’ and all that.”

“Gh...!” If he wasn’t bound, Hugo would’ve most likely tried to punch him. Unable to do so, however, he simply continued sitting as Rook stared at him with the coldest eyes.

That was when Babi talked to Rook through telepathy. “You’re very harsh on him, Rook.”

That was a very natural comment to make. After all, the boy known as Rook was generally very courteous and could get along with just about everyone, so it was the first time Babi had ever seen him be so cold and judgmental towards someone.

“I’m only this candid with those I can’t bear to watch,” he thought in response.

To Rook, Hugo was the opposite of Ray, the person he wanted to observe as thoroughly as possible. His standards regarding this were extremely vague. However, the fact remained that watching Hugo filled him with a strong desire to make sure he didn't continue as he was, so he pointed out his mistakes in a really harsh manner.

"You know what, since you believe in Franklin so much... let me give you a simple prediction," Rook said.

"A prediction?"

"Franklin is about to say something vile," Rook said with certainty in his voice as he looked at the broadcast.

A moment later, Franklin — who'd seemingly been despairing over Plan B's failure — suddenly raised his head. On his face, there was a full smile.

"Oh man, this is annoying. I can't believe both Plan A and B have failed... The big and scary meatheads are probably gonna leave the arena soon, so... I guess I'll have to start on Plan C."

"...Huh?" Hugo voiced his puzzlement. That was about the only thing he could do upon hearing Franklin's words.

All the Masters who'd participated in Franklin's plot were just as confused as him. After all, none of them had been told about the existence of a "Plan C."

The only one who had known its contents was Franklin.

"Plan C for 'Crisis...' Total annihilation of Gideon by 56,826 monsters."

And its contents were, as Rook had predicted, absolutely vile.

Chapter Two: Those Who Bind the Possibilities

Jeand Grasslands

Franklin's words made the surrounding air freeze.

Nemesis, Liliana, Sir Lindos, and the other Royal Guard members failed to fully understand what Franklin had just said.

"F-Five... eh?"

"Wasn't it 500...?"

"56,826 monsters? Hmph. Isn't that a bit too large a number to work as a bluff?" Nemesis asked, the worry in her voice all too apparent. She knew exactly what he was saying, but it was clear that she simply couldn't believe that he was capable of that. "You planned to release just 500 into the city. Do you really expect us to believe you can increase that number a hundredfold?"

Nemesis wanted to think he was lying, and most of those in and outside the city likely shared her sentiment.

In response, Franklin simply nodded and widened his smile. "It's just that I couldn't make more than 500 monsters with the useless 'attacks only Masters and buildings' trait. They cost me quite a lot, though."

In other words, he had been able to prepare far more monsters that targeted all creatures, and that number was above 50,000. The 500 monsters in the devices in Gideon had only been made out of consideration for one of his own: Hugo.

"But now that plan A and B are bust, I can't allow myself to care about appearances," he continued.

That word made Nemesis realize something. "Plan...!"

It was clear what she meant.

Plans A, B, and C — the more Franklin failed, the longer the kingdom held against his schemes, the more intense and destructive the plans became.

Franklin had intended to end it with plans A and B. As he always said, he'd had no intention of losing. However, he had devised plans just in case he was defeated, and he'd done it all for a single purpose.

"Oh man, what a shaaame," Franklin mocked. "It never would've come to this if you'd all just given up."

All to break the country's spirit.

All to make its people painfully aware that their fruitless struggle would only increase the casualties.

That was why he'd gone out of his way to create other plans in case his earlier ones failed.

"Find Franklin! Put the wretch to death before he can summon the monsters from his Jewel!" Sir Lindos roared, causing the Royal Guard to begin desperately searching.

Defeating Franklin before he summoned his monsters would mark the end of the crisis. The fact that the two monsters from before had appeared right next to them must have made Liliana assume that Franklin was nearby.

However...

"Heh heh heh. 'From his Jewel'? Come on now, if I got them on the board by Calling each one separately, morning would come before I could even get to 10,000." Franklin formed an indomitable smile and snapped his fingers. "Optic Camouflage — cancel."

A moment later, the world was shaved off, much like the scales on a fish. An area of the nightly darkness crumbled, revealing whatever was hiding there.

It was an object so large that it could make people forget the fact that it was ever hidden. Its silhouette was reminiscent of a mix of a box, a dragon, and a spider. Countless smokestacks were extending out of a cube that had sides reaching a length of a kilometel.

The inorganic cube was fixed with a large, elaborate head of a dragon. It also had eight arachnid legs extending to its sides. It was abnormal in terms of both size and design.

Everyone besides Franklin was immediately puzzled as to why they'd failed to notice an existence this unnatural. Franklin stood at the top of the abnormal structure and introduced it.

"First time seeing this? Well, you'd better remember it, since this is my Superior Embryo. Type Plant Fortress — Magic Beast Factory, Pandemonium.”

“Superior Embryo” was a term used in reference to the Embryos that had evolved to the seventh form, the apex of Embryos.

Gideon’s inhabitants were highly familiar with the term thanks to their champion Figaro, the Over Gladiator. However, before the overwhelming abnormality of Franklin’s Pandemonium, that familiarity did little to help their state of mind. It was simply far too unlike the Superior Embryos Figaro and Xunyu had used in their match.

“This bad boy wasn’t evolved during the war, but yeah, this is my Superior Embryo,” Franklin said gleefully. “His unique abilities are monster production, as I’m sure you’re all aware, and monster transportation.”

With that, the large, mystical fortress opened its mouth. Within it, there were countless dim lights. They were eyes — the sinister gazes of the numerous monsters about to be unleashed.

“All right, let’s start with 5,000 of my Suicide Series,” Franklin said in a casual tone, causing a slope to go down from the dragon’s mouth.

5,000 monsters grouped up and began marching, all for the purpose of annihilating Gideon.

◇◆

■■■ ■■■■■, ■■■■■■

Superior Embryos were the apotheosis of Embryos.

Though that was true for all of them, the path they took to get to that point and what they became upon reaching it differed on a person-to-person basis.

For example, there was the one belonging to Over Gladiator, Figaro: the heart-shaped Superior Embryo with a name still unknown to me. It and its Master were literally one, and its unique ability was a very simple thing — the enhancement of the items he had equipped.

Basic as it was, however, thanks to the enhancement proportional to battle time, the enhancement inversely proportional to the number of equipped items, and a third type of enhancement — the ace up his sleeve — he was theoretically able to improve his equipment without limit. And that was enough for this Superior Embryo to be considered an apex among Embryos.

Then there was Tenaga Ashinaga — the prosthetic limbs Superior Embryo belonging to Xunyu, the Master Jiangshi. They could stretch at the speed of sound and had durability matching that of Ancient Legendary-tier special rewards. Though Xunyu had an END-focused caster job, this Embryo gave her the potential to match AGI-focused Superior Jobs in terms of close-quarter fighting ability.

Then there was her Embryo's ultimate skill — the space-bending attack capable of destroying the organs of and killing targets far in the distant horizon, even if they weren't in battle.

Thus this Superior Embryo was, without a doubt, another apex among Embryos.

Then there was the Superior Embryo belonging to the Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin.

It was a Plant Fortress: a Type derived from the basic category of Type Castle, and the only one of its kind so far. It had two main unique abilities: monster production and storage.

Monster production was again split into two types: mass production and the creation of specially-made monsters using the ultimate skill.

The former was the one relevant to this situation, and the skill it used was simply called "Monster Mass Production."

As far as I was aware, it was a skill that empowered the researcher grouping's Monster Creation skill and allowed the production of multiple monsters at the same time. Of course, Franklin needed materials for this, but I'd been informed that it was entirely possible for it to produce 1,000 monsters per day.

The skill also came with the effect of lowering the costs the more monsters he produced at once, making it more than deserving of the name "Monster Mass Production."

Instead of being instantly moved to the Jewel, the monsters created by this could then be stored inside Pandemonium using its "Storage" skill. Even though taking them out just once would make it impossible for them to be Stored again, until then, they could be kept inside semi-permanently.

Pandemonium was a gigantic fortress factory capable of producing as many monsters as resources allowed, then storing and unleashing them, making it more than worthy of being considered another apex among Embryos, a Superior Embryo.

Now, what if these three were to fight in a defensive battle?

Specifically, what if Franklin had attacked Gideon and the other two had protected it?

The expected result was obvious — Franklin would win a hundred times out of a hundred.

It wasn't a matter of who was better than the other. It all boiled down to the difference in the vectors of their abilities.

As made obvious by its equipment enhancement ability, Figaro's Superior Embryo was an "individual battle type," focused on the power of one, and the same applied to Xunyu, as well.

Franklin, on the other hand, could summon countless monsters. He commanded armies that could overwhelm the earth, skies, and seas. In player terms, that made Franklin a "wide-scale suppression type."

When that type was on the offensive side of a defensive battle, it was considered to have an absolute advantage. Those focused on individual power were staggeringly incompatible with those who had numbers on their side.

Sure, they would never actually be defeated. In fact, they could probably break through the overwhelming ranks and take down their leader. However, when defending an area, they would lack the numbers to keep the enemies at bay, and the place would be destroyed by those that leaked through.

Perhaps they could have been able to defeat the head of the enemy — Franklin, in this case — before his monsters reached the city. However, due to a trick by Franklin, it was evident that the monsters would continue attacking even if he was defeated. The battles — or, rather, their aftermaths — here in the city made that all too obvious.

Due to that, Figaro and Xunyu would have been able to do little against him.

Even my individual battle type comrades would have a hard time in these situations.

◇◇◇

Jeand Grasslands

"Hell yeah, baby. Man, it feels good to just... let it all out." As Franklin expressed his pleasure, Pandemonium continued unleashing the numerous monsters. The way they swarmed out of the dragon's mouth was highly reminiscent of a scene from an old anime.

Due to that, the sight might've been somewhat comical. But the fact that they were all heading to destroy Gideon, which was only a few kilometels ahead, made it no laughing matter.

"Get the Embryo!" shouted Sir Lindos. "Kill Franklin! We can still make it!"

A number of knights followed his order.

His decision was sound. Though they couldn't stop the numerous monsters, they could prevent any harm to the city by defeating Franklin and making them all disappear. The knights would give their all to that possibility.

"'Make it'? Sorry, not happening," said Franklin, making the knights halt. "With respect to the fact that you ruined two of my plans, let me reveal something to you, dear people of the kingdom."

He was talking not only to the knights before him, but also to all the Masters trying to stop the tragedy.

"These monsters won't stop if I die, and I can't make them stop even if I try."

His words confused just about everyone listening. It just didn't sound like the words of the one who'd unleashed all these monsters unto Gideon.

"What are you saying?" asked Liliana. "These monsters are your doing, aren't they?"

With that question, she was speaking for just about everyone on the scene.

Franklin simply widened his grin. "Yep. I made them all with my Pandemonium. However, they're no longer mine." He paused briefly. "I mean... I let them go."

Once again, the ones listening had trouble processing what he was saying. And even after they were done, they still had trouble understanding.

"What... What are you saying?" asked Liliana, representing everyone yet again.

"Well, you know minion capacity, right?" said Franklin in response. "Giga Professor might be a Superior Job, but I still don't have enough of it to take in that many monsters. And a party only has five slots, too."

Tamed monsters worked using the minion capacity, which allowed the monsters to act as the owner's own battle potential.

Though it could be increased by taking jobs from the tamer, knight, researcher, pimp or other groupings, the limits were still there. Using monsters too numerous or too strong for the capacity would either cause them to be unusable or greatly lower their power. Thus, Franklin had chosen to not be bound by it.

"If you want to make that many monsters fight to their full potential, letting them go is about the only option," he explained.

Monsters that were let go were no longer being used by the ex-owner, so they also weren't bound by the capacity. He'd completely discarded the restrictions.

"Oh, and don't worry," Franklin continued. "They're properly programmed, so they won't attack me. They've been set to 'move forward until death' and 'kill everyone besides my clan members and my other monsters.' That's why I call them the 'Suicide Series!'"

Though Franklin proudly puffed his chest, what he had done was nothing short of nauseating. He'd created an army of lives, set to move forward from birth to death while doing nothing but killing everything except a select few.

It was abhorrent enough even to those who saw Infinite Dendrogram as a game, and to those for whom it was another world, this deed was a work of pure madness.

"Why do you think I ran to the west?" he said. "If I'd used this in the north or the south, I could have damaged our dear Dryfe or Legendaria — the third party in this war. This is a deathly army made up of tens of thousands of monsters that are constantly on the move and can easily go through borders as long as they're alive... And yeah, there's Caldina in the east, but I don't care. They're our enemies too, after all."

Not to mention that the likes of The Earth and the King of Termination will make short work of them when they get there, he was probably adding silently.

"Anyway, there's nothing I can do about the monsters I let go, and they'll keep going even if you somehow kill me. Tu as compris?" Franklin willfully used his real-life mother tongue to taunt his enemies.

Nemesis, Liliana, and the other Royal Guard knights were stunned into silence. They had to defeat every single monster and then their source — Pandemonium and Franklin.

In the best case scenario, they would take care of Pandemonium before it could release the remaining 50,000 monsters. However, they simply didn't have the required battle potential to do it.

It would be difficult for Liliana, Sir Lindos, and the other knights to defeat Pandemonium by themselves. They would be able to do little to buy time against such an overwhelming number of monsters.

The barrier around the central arena had already been rendered useless, meaning that the Masters there could finally destroy it, and Cocytus's La Porte de l'Enfer had been canceled, as well. In a few minutes or so, the Masters from both places would come to their aid.

Before that, however, the Suicide Series would ravage the city of Gideon, and Pandemonium would release even more of the wretched creatures. Those "few minutes" were far too long.

Franklin spoke what everyone was thinking. "Heh heh heh, you won't make it—"

"I'll buy the time." A completely unexpected person spoke up, wiping the sneer from Franklin's face.

No one had thought he'd be in the spotlight again. After all — his battle was over. He'd been sleeping after having sacrificed his left arm and exerted every inch of his being to defeat his natural enemy.

And yet, he still stood up.

Ray Starling still had the power to stand.

His consciousness was in an uncertain state. The battle had completely drained him, and even the mind of the player controlling the avatar was in a sorry state. It was likely that he didn't even have a proper grasp of the situation.

And yet, he would still face the 5,000-strong monster army charging towards Gideon.

"Ray!"

"Ray?!"

Nemesis and Liliana's worried shouts weren't without reason. Ray still had a number of injury-based debuffs, couldn't move his left arm, and didn't even have half of his maximum HP.

And despite all this, he still stood up.

“Nemesis, Silver... let’s go,” he said as he called his trusty steed and extended his right arm towards his Embryo.

“...Certainly!” Nemesis said after a moment of hesitation. Then she took his hand and turned herself into the black greatsword.

“Ha ha... ha ha ha ha... Oh man, I think I’m gonna cry,” laughed Franklin. “You’re pretty maimed, my dude. It’s pretty greedy of you to try and struggle in that state. Your battle is over, so why not just, you know, go to sleep?”

“It’s not over.”

“Hm...?”

“It’s not over yet,” Ray said firmly. “It’s too early to stop. I’ll keep going as long as I can stand and swing my blade.”

It was possible he was speaking those words only due to the uncertain state of his mind.

“As long as you... as long as I’m faced with tragedy.”

However, it might’ve been a glimpse into the very deepest reaches of his heart.

“...Oh, I see.” Franklin nodded, seemingly having realized something. “Though you’re both Maidens’ Masters, you’re completely unlike him. If anything, you’re just like the King of Tartarus.”

Ignoring Franklin’s words, Ray rode Silver towards the front of the 5,000 vile creatures.

“Hellish Miasma!” he shouted, causing his right arm to release the familiar triple debuff of poison gas.

Poison, Intoxication, and Weakness caused the monsters to slow down, but that was about it. The monsters unaffected by the gas either pushed the affected monsters to the side or simply trampled them, continuing their charge towards Gideon. However, a number of them recognized Ray as an enemy and moved to fight him.

There was no hint of cooperation between them. They randomly attacked Ray using their weapons, claws, fangs, organic projectiles, and offensive magic. Ray and Silver failed to evade them, causing him to end up on the ground.

It was uncertain whether it was because he was injured, because the enemies were many, or simply because Ray was a weakling whose level didn’t even break 50. Whatever the case, he was unable to move, and a number of monsters were approaching to finish him off.

Liliana, Sir Lindos, and the other knights tried to help him, but the other monsters were holding them back.

“Ray!” shouted Nemesis as several monstrous claws reached to take his life.

He didn’t have the time to heed her warning and get up.

And so, when Ray was on the verge of experiencing his second death in Infinite Dendrogram...

“GYAGHGHGHGHGHGHGHGH!”

...it was prevented by his first death.

The monsters that had been about to kill him were pulverized by bullet-like creatures — the very same ones that had once pulverized Ray himself. They came from the Embryo known as “Arc-en-Ciel,” and its Master was...

“AllOw Me to aSsisT.”

...the Superior Killer — a player killer shrouded in mystery... and a black mist preventing people from telling their age or gender.

“TheY haVe tHe nUmbeRs,” the figure said in an unnatural voice, most likely passed through a voice changer. “We shOulD coOperAte foR noW.”

“Gh...”

It was the same Master that had killed Ray back in Noz Forest and later gone on to help him in his battle against Gardranda.

Faced with this person, Ray said:

“Yeah. I’m counting on you... Marie.”

He called her by name, as if it were no big deal.

“WhA?! EeeeEeeeEehHhhH?!” the Superior Killer cried.

“Eeeeehhhhhh?!” Nemesis shrieked.

At that moment, a monster closed in from behind Marie. Ray quickly transformed Nemesis into the flag halberd and thrust her into it. Though Nemesis was still in a state of shock, Ray could still will her to change, and the monster was now thoroughly skewered.

“WhY?! HoW diD You KnoW?!” the Superior Killer cried.

“That’s Marie?!” Nemesis yelled. “What is the meaning of this, Ray?!”

“I couldn’t tell when we first met, but now, I can more or less make her out through the mist.” After saying that, Ray heaved a sigh.

A monster saw that as an opening and tried attacking him, but Marie made short work of it using her spread-piercing bullets.

As she watched the monster disappear, Marie canceled the Voice Change skill and began speaking in her own voice. “Oh man, do I feel stupid for trying to hide it with Voice Change.”

“Eh? Marie is actually the Superior Killer? You’re not joking?” asked Nemesis, still flabbergasted.

“This is a bit of an emergency, so I would be thankful if you ignored that for now,” said Marie.

“Sure,” Ray replied as he launched a Vengeance on a monster that had previously attacked him. “But only if you duel me once we’re done here.”

He then brandished Nemesis in his only usable hand.

“Very well. I’ll fight you with all I’ve got,” said Marie as she brandished Arc-en-Ciel and the Palsy Stingblade before standing back-to-back with Ray.

And so, the two faced the monsters charging towards them.

The two had never before fought on the same side.

Marie had helped Ray once during his battle against Gardranda and had killed him back during their fight in Noz Forest, but that was the full of extent of their common battle history. But despite that, they cooperated without any flaws to speak of and killed the encroaching monsters with great efficiency. That was possible because Marie had observed Ray to try and find what she lacked, and because Ray had often thought about the actions taken by the one that’d killed him.

They moved as one, forming a wall that slightly slowed down the 5,000 monsters charging towards Gideon.

“HA!” Franklin shouted. “There’s still just two of you, you know? Do you really think you’re enough to hold against 5,000 monsters? Like hell!”

Franklin’s words were nothing but the truth. Even if one was a newbie with a history of miraculous victories and the other was a player killer that had felled a Superior, two people simply weren’t enough to stop the 5,000 monsters from the first wave, much less the 50,000 Franklin still had in store. Their defeat was all but inevitable.

“Then we will stop them with twenty.”

Thus, they needed someone to link them to the possibility of victory.

The voice had come from behind the western gate, followed by countless attacks that left the monsters overwhelmed.

There were flames from an avian, offensive magic, a giant ball of steel, fire arrows, and the overpowering allure of Charm, among many other skills.

The 50 monsters standing at the forefront of the 5,000 were destroyed in but an instant.

“Ray! M— McBlackJack! I brought reinforcements!”

“Rook!” shouted Ray.

“...Is ‘McBlackJack’ supposed to be me?” asked Marie.

“He probably couldn’t call you by name with all these people here,” commented Nemesis.

At the western gate, there were twenty Masters, along with their summoned and tamed monsters. Standing at the front of the group were Rook, Kasumi, Io, and Fujinon, along with four other newbies that had gone different ways after the battle at the plaza and been able to survive long enough to make it here. The other twelve were the high-rank Masters that had been Frozen by La Porte de l’Enfer at the western gate.

Those Masters were very enthusiastic.

“Hell yeah! Let’s go, boys!”

“We can’t let the newbie kiddos get all the spotlight!”

“...I wonder if this will get on tomorrow’s MMO Journal Planter.”

“It’s simple. We kill the Franklin!”

Evidently, their reasons for joining the battle were varied, but they were all Masters bearing the powers of high-rank jobs and Embryos.

Though they’d lost to Hugo due to compatibility issues, they were experienced players that had this duel city as their main haunt.

Naturally, the group was far stronger than Ray, and them joining the battle had a great effect upon it.

“No way,” Franklin muttered, more surprised than anyone else there.

After all, this turn of events was impossible. Franklin knew better than most that the Frozen debuff caused by Cocytus’s La Porte de l’Enfer wasn’t easy to undo. It nullified items that removed status effects and could last at least an hour, even if Hugo himself was killed.

The only way to get around these rules... was to have Hugo — the user of the skill — willingly undo its effects.

“You canceled it, Yu...”

It couldn’t be done by simply Charming him, either — he had to do it by himself. That could only mean that Hugo willingly betrayed Franklin and canceled the skill.

Oh wait, I was the one who betrayed her first, Franklin thought in self-derision.

"Well, whatever," he said in a murderous tone. "There are still only twenty-two of you. If you think you can stop this surge of magic beasts, go ahead and try."

This was followed by the Suicide Series roaring and baring their fangs.

They had already been set into the wild, so it wasn't like they actually followed Franklin's will. The core of their beings... every cell in their bodies... was screaming for them to attack the newly-appeared enemy creatures before them.

"We've gotta buy time!" one of the high-level Masters cried. "Don't let a single one of these into the city until the guys from the arena get here!"

"Try to keep the newbies alive! They've worked too hard to get the death penalty here!"

"...Will we be famous if we pull through?"

"KILL THE FRANKLIN!"

The high-rank Masters charged towards the monsters, marking the start of a 22 vs 5,000 battle. In terms of scale, this was the largest battle that happened tonight so far.

However, it certainly wasn't the largest that would happen.

Gideon's central arena, the stage

No one saw the scene.

Most of the audience in the central arena were watching the broadcast, either with despair or slight hope.

Thus, no one saw a certain man approach the barrier sealing the stage. He was tall and wore the pelt of a black bear.

With casual steps, he closed in on the barrier.

There were some other Masters nearby. Upon realizing that there was no danger of monsters being released inside the city, they'd moved to try and free the two Superiors stuck inside the stage — Figaro and Xunyu. However, that barrier was even tougher than the one surrounding the arena as a whole, and when they'd realized they couldn't break it, they'd also started staring at the broadcast.

This man passed by them and stood right next to the barrier.

Suddenly, something attacked him.

It was a blue Slime — the remains of an Oxygen Slime that Franklin had released into this arena. Though most of them had been destroyed by the Masters here, one had been able to survive thanks to being hidden by some rubble.

Because it relied on things other than sight to perceive its surroundings, the Oxygen Slime was the only creature there that had noticed the man. And, since he'd happened to be right next to it, it had attacked him right after crawling out of the rubble.

The moment it came close to him, the man reduced it to dust with a casual backhand blow.

The hyper low temperature, ultra poisonous immortal Slime was destroyed by a mere fist.

"Eh?"

"Huh? Since when...?"

The sound of the battle — if you could call it that — caused by the Slime being pulverized made the Masters around the barrier notice the man. Right when they did, however, he swung his fist again and — just like the Slime — destroyed the barrier in one hit.

With it broken, the two Superiors inside were rendered free.

As the barrier's destruction made everyone in the arena panic in confusion, the man spoke to one of the Superiors: Over Gladiator, Figaro.

"I'm leaving this place to you. If the thing below or the two in the audience look like they're about to do something, you stop them, all right?"

After saying those words, the man made his way towards the exit.

"What will you do?" asked Figaro.

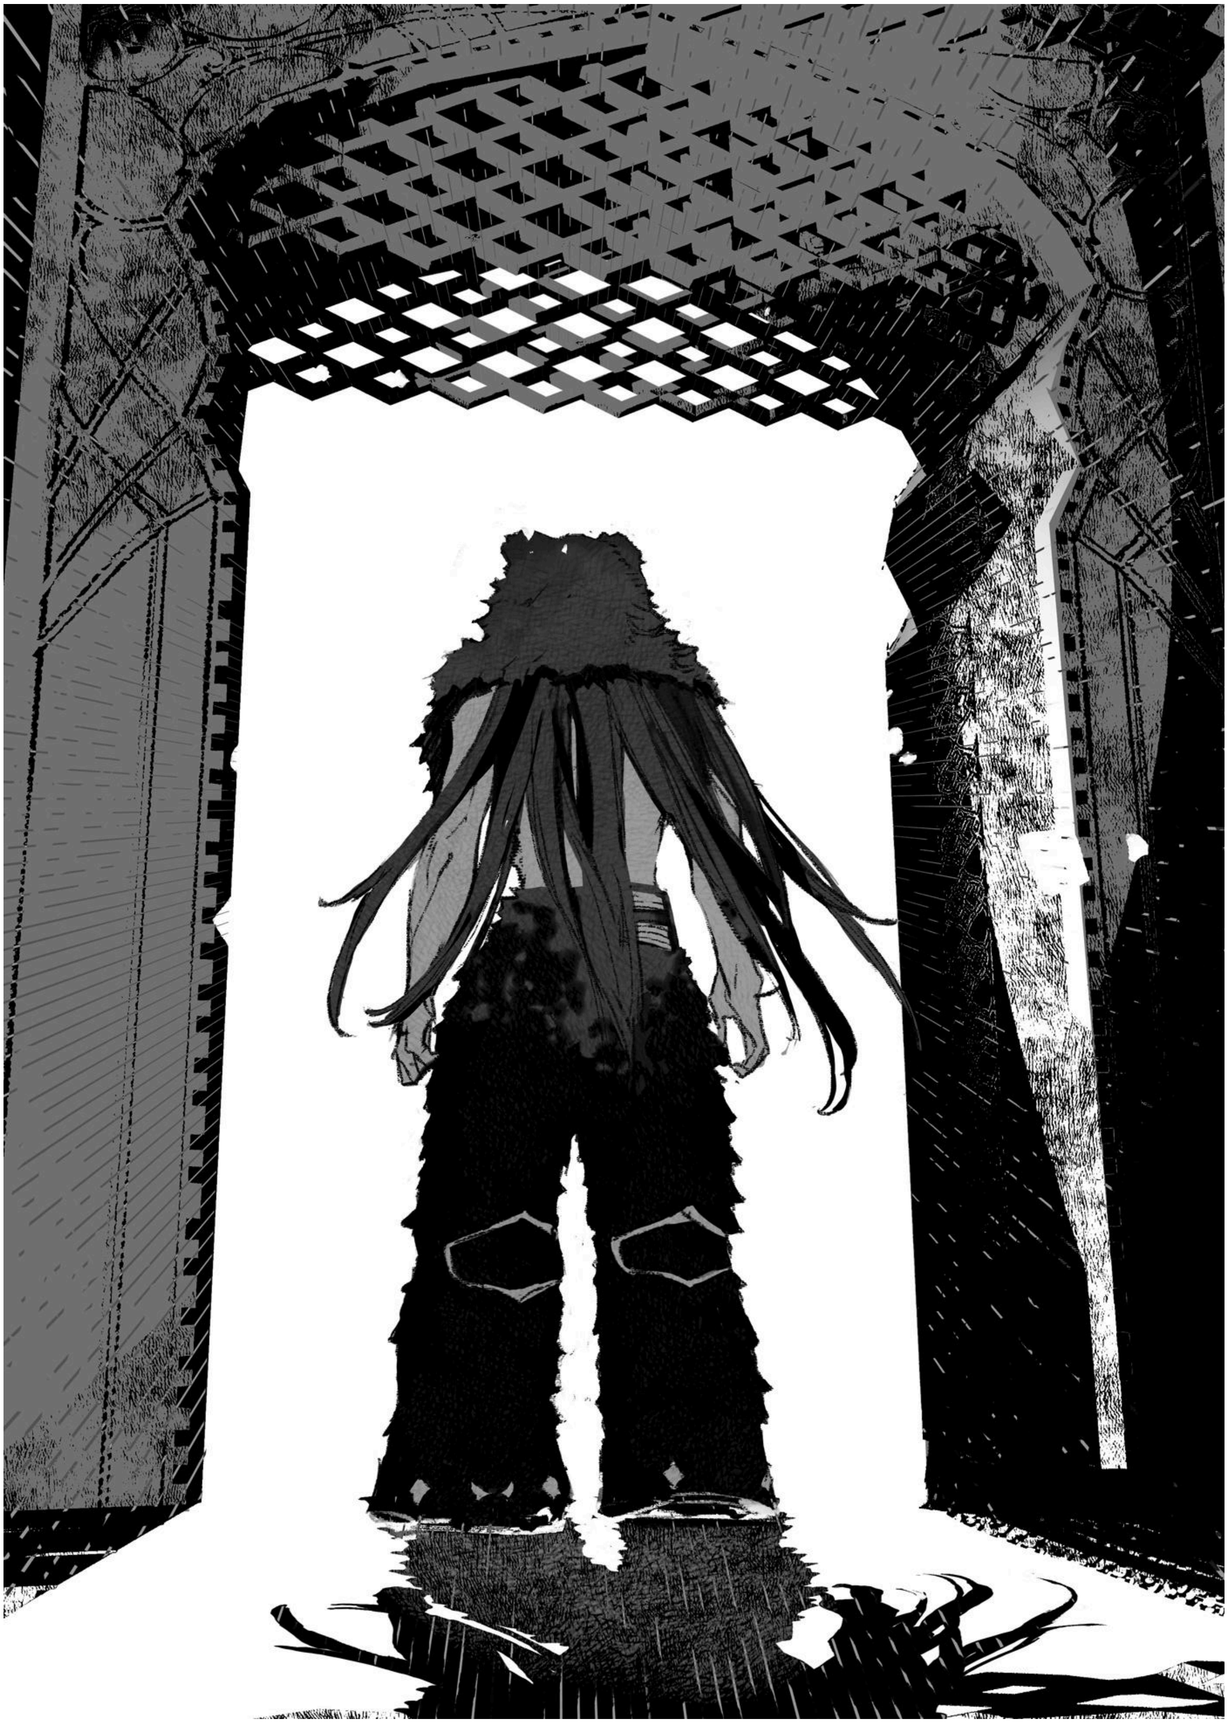
The man momentarily looked up at the broadcast and — with his back still turned — responded.

"I'll bind the possibility he seized."



Chapter Three: And His Name is...

■■■■ ■■ ■■■■■■■■■■■, ■■■ ■■■■■■■■

In this game of his, Franklin had made a total of three grave mistakes.

Of course, those were just the mistakes from my perspective. A third party might see more or fewer than me.

These were the mistakes, one by one.

His first mistake was separating his plot to destroy Gideon and kidnap the princess into Plan A, B, etc. and going through them one after the other.

Considering the fact that he wanted to break the country's spirit by starting worse and worse plans the more the kingdom struggled, that might've been the right course of action, but in terms of the force he released, this design was highly ineffective. When unleashing your battle potential, you should always release everything all at once.

He should've released the monsters in the city and unleashed the 50,000 from Pandemonium right after using the barrier and starting the PK massacre. That way, the kingdom would have had next to no way of fighting back. The princess would have been kidnapped, and Gideon would have been severely damaged.

Since he'd chosen to do them all one by one, the plans had all been taken care of in that order, bringing us to our current situation.

What? "The result will be the same if his 50,000 monsters succeed," you say? Well, true, the results would be the same if they succeeded. I'm fully aware of that.

His second mistake was mixing revenge against him into his plan.

You're wondering why that was a mistake? Surely you've noticed that adding the whole thing with the RSK into the plan extended the time until monster release, right? So that must be what I mean.

Ohh, no no, you've got it all wrong. The revenge itself wasn't a mistake.

The mistake was doing the revenge along with the plan, effectively putting something on the line into his battle.

You look like you don't understand.

Normally, that RSK thing would've beaten Ray. But by creating a condition where he would lose something if he lost, Franklin had made Ray significantly more powerful. And if that wasn't a mistake, I don't know what is.

In fact, even Ray's air bomb had only been possible to use because the city was thick with grudge that he could transform into MP.

If Franklin had aimed for Ray alone, he could've crushed him like a bug, don't you think? That was how the Superior Killer got him, after all. But Ray was really strong in cases like this, and that was why the RSK had lost.

It's not like we get many cases when people's lives are at stake on the other side, after all.

As for the third mistake... Ah, screw it.

Saying it is embarrassing.

Hey, even I can feel shame.

What? "A person who can feel shame would never walk around like that?" Oh, shut up. The reason why I have to walk around like that is because you messed with my character creation and...

Hm? "Just say the third mistake already?" All right, all right.

Franklin's third and greatest mistake was...

◆◆◆

Jeand Grasslands

In Infinite Dendrogram, people had a tendency to use the terms "Demi-Dragon-tier" or "Pure-Dragon-tier" to denote a creature's fighting ability.

A Demi-Dragon-tier creature was equivalent to a party of six low-rank battle jobs or a single high-rank job, while a Pure-Dragon-tier creature was equivalent to a party of six high-rank jobs. That meant that a Pure-Dragon was about six times stronger than a Demi-Dragon.

One had to keep in mind that the power of the owner of a high-rank job greatly varied depending on how well-leveled their six low-rank jobs and two high-rank jobs were. Thanks to their Embryo bonuses and unique abilities, many high-rank Masters were able to defeat Pure-Dragons all by themselves. Still, it was a decent way to indicate a creature's strength.

Every single one of the 5,000 Suicide Series monsters released by Franklin were Demi-Dragon-tier, which made them equal to 5,000 high-rank jobs.

The ones fighting them were merely twenty-one Masters with low or high-rank jobs.

Even considering the sole Superior Job among them, their number was still only twenty-two.

By trying to add their Embryos into the equation, you could assume that they were all Pure-Dragon-tier, but even then, the difference in battle potential would be about 5,000 vs 132.

Naturally, those odds were ridiculous.

Despite that, however, even after three minutes had passed, not a single Master had died.

"...Well, they're sure holding out well," Franklin muttered, clearly unamused. Even the one who'd unleashed the monsters hadn't expected this.

This result was due to all the Embryos there.

The Masters alone numbered twenty-two, and even if Franklin disregarded the Embryos he'd known about, there were still twenty Embryos. Some greatly enhanced their allies, some created walls, while some were just really good at keeping armies at bay.

Embryos were extremely vibrant in terms of variation, and by using their powers wisely, they were able to hold their own against the 5,000-strong monster army.

Of course, Franklin's monsters had great variety, as well. However, the Suicide Series had been programmed to do nothing but charge forward and kill until they themselves died. Though varied, they didn't have the mental capacity to be able to cooperate and make the best of their variety.

Due to that, despite having an overwhelming numerical advantage, they didn't seem to be able to break through the twenty-two Masters.

"...Well, then," Franklin muttered.

In all honesty, having his monsters held back like this wasn't a problem for him. Pandemonium was already releasing the next batch of monsters. According to his calculations, even if these Masters bought enough time for the Masters from the central arena to gather, the city would still end up severely damaged.

The twenty-two Masters holding back the monsters were already doing it with lots of desperation. Though none of them had died yet, they had only taken care of a small percentage of the 5,000 monsters. And the Masters had used up lots of their MP and SP, making it more than obvious that they would soon be rendered unable to struggle and get overwhelmed.

Then there was the fact that Franklin had ten times that number of monsters, not to mention that he was protected by the likes of DGP and KOS, both monsters matching Superior Jobs in power.

Franklin recalled that the Masters in the central arena amounted to around 1,000, which was a number that he could certainly handle.

When it came to battle ability, Franklin was among the weakest Superiors. In a fair, 1v1 battle, he could even be defeated by a low-rank job.

However, he excelled at strategy.

After the war with the kingdom half a year ago by Infinite Dendrogram's time standards, he'd spent enough time and resources to gather enough monsters to handle 1,000 Masters with little trouble.

"...Well well, then," Franklin murmured.

The only real problem left was those two Superiors: Over Gladiator, Figaro and Master Jiangshi, Xunyu. By intervening in their Clash and sealing them using the barrier's stopping function, Franklin had most likely made enemies out of them. If they intervened, Franklin would almost certainly be given the death penalty.

Figaro was exclusively a solo player, so there was a chance he wouldn't get involved. Xunyu, on the other hand, could very possibly use her ultimate skill to claw his heart out at any given moment.

However, Franklin didn't care about that.

Even if he were to die, the 10,000-strong monsters released so far would still attack Gideon, not to mention the fact that he had another ace up his sleeve.

While Franklin was the diamond, King of Orchestras was the club, and Hugo was the heart, the spade was a certain something placed underneath the arena that was patiently waiting to be activated.

That was exactly what would happen if Franklin were to get the death penalty. It was part of Plan D — the final plan he'd hinted at when talking to Elizabeth.

Still, Franklin assumed that it would all end before he would have to go through with it. Franklin's monsters would soon overwhelm Gideon and completely ravage it. This group of people was nothing but a speed bump against his army.

If Gideon fell while being actively protected by Masters, the kingdom would finally break, and his goal would be achieved.

“...Well well well well, then,” Franklin murmured.

Franklin was going to win regardless of whether he chose to do anything more or not.

“All right, they piss me off. Let’s kill them.”

And that was exactly why he made his move.

Franklin looked at DGP, the dinosaur that was scattering the Royal Guard around Pandemonium. He’d used a Legendary UBM’s special reward in its creation. That gave it enough power to match such UBMs, and due to that, it was his strongest monster currently on the scene, not counting the spade.

When Ray had charged towards the Suicide Series, Franklin had assumed that it wouldn’t need to be used. But now, he ordered it to massacre all the Masters that’d gathered.

“DGP, be a darling and trample those eyesores.”

“VRGHAAAAAAHHHH!” It released an earth-shaking roar as it charged with ground-shattering power in its steps. It was heading straight towards the front lines of the battle between the 5,000 monsters and twenty-two Masters, and it got there in only a few moments.

First, the twenty-two Masters became twenty.

DGP, clad in a red aura, went straight for the two high-rank jobs right at the front, quickly crushing and turning them into dust. In addition, an Embryo that took damage in their stead reached its limit and shattered.

Then the twenty became nineteen.

The red aura canceled a spell from a high-rank magic job.

DGP responded by swinging its tail and splitting the person in half, instantly making them vanish.

Then the nineteen became sixteen.

Three Masters simultaneously attacked it using their ultimate skills, but before they could have an effect, DGP chomped them all with a speed so great it left afterimages.

In but a moment, the twenty-two that had held against 5,000 had become sixteen because of a single creature.

“Tch!” Marie — the only Superior Job on the scene — clicked her tongue as she shot piercing bullets into DGP's head.

Upon entering the red aura, the bullets lost their power and speed before being deflected by the monster's shell.

"This is the defensive and offensive 'Dragon King Aura!'" she realized. "This one must've been made using material from a Dragon King!"

Marie was completely right.

"Dragon Kings" were a type of UBM. They were basically Pure-Dragons with great enough power to be titled kings of their sub-species. Their Dragon King Aura could weaken all attacks coming their way, and since they were unique for every generation, all of them were recognized as UBMs.

Franklin had defeated a number of Dragon Kings, and DGP had been made using the special reward from one called "Fangdragon King, Drag-Phalanx." Due to that, its power easily surpassed that of Pure-Dragons. It could easily have fought on par with the UBM used as its base, and it even had the Dragon King Aura symbolic of their kind.

"VGHAAAAAHHHHH!"

"Khh...!" Marie cried.

When in top shape, Superior Jobs such as Marie had only about a 50% chance of winning against Legendaries. However, using her ultimate skill against Veldorbell had rendered her incapable of using bursting and homing bullets, lowering her chances even further.

I could try to send "Ulbetia the Piercing Murder" at a vital spot where the aura is thin, but even then, it's questionable if that would be enough, she thought.

Even though doing that would cost her the Green Piercing and Silver Flash bullets, Marie believed that it wouldn't do the job on this creature.

Entities above Pure-Dragon-tier had great HP, and it was rare for them to die due to just a single ultimate skill from a Superior Job. Combined with the fact that DGP had powers matching that of the Fangdragon King that had been used in its creation, it was highly unlikely that Arc-en-Ciel would be enough to defeat it.

But then again, they were in no position to battle it for long. The more DGP ravaged the front lines and the longer Marie stalled, the more monsters would enter the city.

Marie readied herself and loaded Arc-en-Ciel with a special bullet meant for ultimate skills.

"Phantasmal Raing—"

Before she could go through with it, the DGP made its move.

Just like before, it moved at a speed great enough to leave afterimages and charged towards a Master a short distance away — in this case, Ray.

"Ray!" both Marie and Rook shouted as DGP quickly closed in on him.

In a sense, this turn of events was only obvious. Franklin wanted to crush Ray more than anyone else on the scene, so there was nothing surprising about DGP following its owner's will.

"Wait— kh!" Marie tried to go after it, but she was then surrounded by a number of AGI-focused Suicide Series.

"Mh..."

Ray silently watched as DGP stormed towards him, and it was hard to tell whether it was because his mind was still hazy or because he knew exactly what he had to do.

He sighed.

"Ray...?" Nemesis spoke as he brandished her.

Ray was already aware that he had no means of escape. He wasn't riding Silver, and even if he was, he still wouldn't have the speed to avoid the upcoming attack.

Thus, he knew that he was about to experience his second death in Infinite Dendrogram.

However, he intended to do something before leaving the scene. Specifically, he wanted to land a counterattack at the same moment he was damaged.

Even if the attack instantly killed him, he thought he could hit it with a single Vengeance before dying, which could maybe help turn the situation around.

As such thoughts went through his mind, Nemesis read them and prepared for what was to come.

"Very well," she said.

She would do all in her power to activate the skill at the right moment.

As the two readied themselves, DGP arrived at just a few metels away from him. It opened its maw, determined to erase the enemy of its creator.

"Bring it!" Ray shouted.

Everyone was watching that moment.

Marie watched it.

Rook watched it.

Kasumi, Io, and Fujinon watched it.

The ten surviving Masters watched it.

Liliana watched it.

Sir Lindos watched it.

The Royal Guard watched it.

The people of Gideon watched it.

The people of the capital watched it.

Figaro and Xunyu, now free from the barrier, watched it.

Franklin watched it.

Ray faced the deathly jaws opening before him, fully prepared to do what he needed to do before he died.

Nemesis, too, faced the enemy, ready to fulfill her Master's wish, even if it would cost him his life.

Everyone watched it... and yet no one saw it.

No one saw the moment that man appeared before Ray.

"Save your desperate counters fur a cooler sceeene, goofus!" the man called.

"Eh?" Ray muttered a voice of confusion, and he certainly wasn't alone in that regard.

As if some frames were skipped, the man appeared as though he had always been there.

He was clad in furs, which definitely made him look odd. The upper part of his head was covered by the pelt of a bear, which extended to his back and flowed like a cape. He was tall, and though he had no upper clothing, his exposed muscles looked much like pure steel. Black pants reminiscent of a hakama covered his legs, and their texture seemed to be the same as that of the fur on his head.

For reasons unknown, his right leg was raised towards the sky.

From the fact that he had no trouble keeping the pose up, it was safe to assume that he'd had his share of physical training.

"Bro, this is the kind of stuff you pull when you know you'll survive and kill the enemy," he said with his leg still raised to the sky. "Doing this only to damage them and die regardless of whether you succeed is just... beary lacking. All right, all right, I'll drop the puns for now."

The man's appearance and words were strange enough, but there was something even more weird about the sight.

The dinosaur was gone.

DGP, the monster that had been about to consume Ray, had completely disappeared the moment the man in the furs had shown up.

"...Nooo wayyy," muttered Marie.

She, along with a few other Masters, had noticed what was happening here. They were all looking towards the sky — towards DGP, hurtling off several hundred metels in the air. Those with good eyesight could see that its head was completely shattered and that it was slowly turning into particles of light.

From the dinosaur's sorry state and the man's right leg — still raised in a kicking position — the onlookers assumed two things.

The man had just kicked a monster weighing at least ten tons up into the sky, and he had destroyed the beast in just a single kick, ignoring the Dragon King Aura and its immense HP.

"Hmm, that lizard had some decent weight," the man said.

"...Ah."

Upon seeing the manner in which the man lowered his leg and looking at the lower, unhidden part of his face, Ray realized that it was someone he knew very well.

"Well, you went and overdid it, as usual, but you're still alive, so it's all good." Upon saying that, the man gently patted Ray on the head. "Kept you waiting, huh?"

"...So you came," Ray said.

"Hey, I told you I would, didn't I?" After taking his hand away, the man in the furs reached into the bag at his side, his inventory, and took something out. It was a ring called "Voice Amplification Ring" — a name that said it all. "Uhh... Test, test. You hearing this, Franklin?"

"...Uh, Yeah, I am..." Franklin said.

"All right, that's good. I'll just make a little proclamation, then."

"...A proclamation?"

"You made a really big mistake in this game of yours," said the pelt-clad man before pausing for a second. "You messed with my little brother."

Though only a few could understand what he was talking about, everyone on the scene and even those just watching the broadcast could feel the intensity of the fighting spirit in those words.

“So yeah... Franklin. Here’s how it’s gonna go,” the man said. “I — The King of Destruction — am gonna obliterate every single one of your precious monsters.”

Shu Starling made his will known.

Thus began the night’s final battle.

The wielder of the imperium’s most numerous force — Mr. Franklin.

The wielder of the kingdom’s most powerful force — Shu Starling.

Quantity vs quality.

Giga Professor vs. King of Destruction.

Superior vs. Superior.

In a great act of irony, that evening’s main event had been replaced by something fundamentally identical.

The Clash of the Superiors.

Chapter Four: King of Destruction, Shu Starling

???

Shu Starling, the King of Destruction, was one of the kingdom’s four Superiors, and he’d reigned at the top of the country’s kill rankings for over two years of Infinite Dendrogram time.

His name was known to few, but his many deeds were spoken of far and wide.

These were such things as the defeat of the Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria; the Corpse Stronghold incident in the Southern Sea; the Kim-un-kamuy incident in Tenchi; the disappearance of an entire mountain range in Caldina, attributed to his battle against The Earth; and the crashing of the Unidentified Flying Stronghold, Laputa, which was one of Huang He’s Superior Embryos.

Though he’d gained a reputation as the central figure in those and countless other such events, there was next to no information about him.

His appearance was as much of a mystery as his name, and many argued that his avatar wasn’t actually human. Witnesses described him as “white,” “black,” “always looking different,” or “soft and fluffy,” and though it turned out those rumors weren’t wrong, there was no denying the vagueness of them.

However, there were two specific pieces of info most thought to be highly accurate.

One was the idea that he held a Superior Job from the crasher grouping. Its stat growth focused entirely on STR, and its specialty was the breaking of material defenses in events such as castle sieges. Alas, that job grouping’s AGI and END was very low, making it unsuitable for vanguard roles.

But the King of Destruction, Shu Starling, was...

◇◆◇

Jeand Grasslands

The sight was much like a scene from a decade-old action manga.

The man kicked a monster. The sad creature was pulverized and sent flying towards other monsters, all of which shattered upon impact.

Another monster came from behind the man.

Before the monster realized it, the man had placed his fist right below its neck and thrown it upwards for an uppercut, launching the unfortunate creature to the stars.

In less than a minute, more than 300 monsters had been completely shattered — no, destroyed.

And it was all done by one man: the King of Destruction.

"You've gotta be shittin' me..." Franklin muttered in disbelief, and he was fully justified in doing so.

After all, the hundreds of monsters the man was sweeping up definitely weren't just cannon fodder. They were all Demi-Dragon-tier, and therefore monsters strong enough to match battle-focused high-rank jobs. In fact, their relentless nature and lack of concern for their own lives made them even stronger than a usual Demi-Dragon.

And yet, they could do nothing to stop this man.

The man began to run, pulverizing a monster.

He casually swung an arm, making another monster explode.

Another monster dropped dead by simply grazing one of his fingers.

Countless monsters were destroyed as though they were more frail than papier-mâché.

Now, Franklin would have been fully willing to accept and understand the scene if the man had been using a skill that did something along the lines of "Destroys what you touch."

But there was simply no such thing.

The man wasn't using a single skill.

The King of Destruction was able to create the scene simply because he was strong.

"Hhhhh..." Franklin sighed, impressed to the point of speechless shock. After all, he was the one who knew the reasons behind the ridiculous feats better than anyone else on the scene. Franklin's right eye was shining blue, emitting an aura of knowledge and understanding.

All high-rank and Superior Jobs had ultimate and unique skills, and Franklin's Giga Professor was no exception. One such skill was "The Analyzing Eye of Wisdom."

It allowed him to find out the target's stats, skills, growth, status effects, and materials dropped by simply looking at them long enough. Even skills such as Conceal or Disguise meant little against that skill.

Skill explanations would be shrouded in a mist that slowly faded, while stat points would start at 0 and gradually rise at a pace of about 2,000 per second until they arrived at the correct number.

For example, he had seen all the stats of Marie — the stealth-focused Death Shadow — in only about 10 seconds of looking.

Franklin was now using it on that man, and he just didn't know what to make of what he saw.

The King of Destruction job level was 1,080, while his STR had already exceeded 100,000 and still continued to rise.

"Man, what the actual fuck?" he burst out.

The stats seen by The Analyzing Eye of Wisdom stopped rising upon reaching the right number, meaning that the man's STR easily surpassed 100,000. Considering that some stat-focused Superior Jobs had a hard time breaking 10,000, that number was nothing if not ludicrous. Sure, the number included Embryo and equipment bonuses, but that did little to soften his astonishment.

The Analyzing Eye of Wisdom also displayed any skills the target used.

They appeared as momentary, flashing pop-ups, and Franklin had yet to see any of them since the King of Destruction had entered the scene, effectively proving that the man was merely destroying the monsters with nothing but pure power.

All the destruction here was caused by simple standard attacks.

"When it comes to STR alone, he might be a match for the King of Beasts," Franklin muttered, comparing the man to the strongest Master he knew.

The King of Destruction might actually be the Master with the greatest STR.

But that was with STR alone. The rest of the stats weren't high. And it wasn't like they merely seemed low because of the towering, six-digit STR.

All of the other stats besides it and the five-digit HP were in the four-digit range.

In fact, his AGI was just barely over 1,000. There was simply no balance in these stats.

The go-to path for vanguard roles was to focus on either AGI, so that they could move at supersonic speeds, or END, in order to bear many attacks. A standard Superior Job like that would have at least 5,000 of one or the other, but the King of Destruction was different.

He had a pure STR build, focusing entirely on STR while discarding all the other stats.

Sure, that gave him a lot of attack power. With all the Embryo and equipment bonuses, he was now doing damage that made him seem more monstrous than the actual monsters.

However, he shouldn't have been able to survive this fight.

Though the monsters were merely Demi-Dragon-tier, the ones focused on speed had five times more AGI than the King of Destruction did. A STR build like him should've been showered by attacks from the AGI monsters, and he should've lost his HP until it was all gone.

One such monster attempted to bite into the man's neck from one of his blind spots, only to be shattered by a fist that was placed right before its eyes.

"This makes no sense," muttered Franklin. The scene seemed to both match the stats and completely betray them.

Most of the onlookers likely thought that the King of Destruction was just strong. Franklin, however, could see the stats, notice the inconsistency, and realize that it wasn't caused by some skill.

Thus, he came across the answer... but he couldn't comprehend it at all.

There was no other possible explanation for the scene, but it seemed like a part of some joke.

After all...

"Am I seriously supposed to believe he's using fighting skills he brought from reality?"

◇◇◇

Central arena, the stage

"'If the enemy is ten times faster, you just read ten moves ahead,'" Figaro quoted.

"What thE hell?"

"Apparently, he reads their movements and places his attacks at points where they can't change their trajectory."

"Huhhh...? What tHe hELl?"

It was the central arena, the location of what was supposed to have been the night's main event, the Clash of the Superiors. Two Masters were standing on its stage and watching the broadcast above.

One was the Over Gladiator, Figaro, while the other was the Master Jiangshi, Xunyu.

They were the stars of the Clash of the Superiors and the ones who Franklin had locked up in the time-stopping barrier. Now, after being released, the two were just standing and watching the second Clash.

Of course, the other Masters in the arena — especially those who'd tried to save them — wanted the two to join the battle outside. However, Figaro showed no interest in participating in an ongoing battle, while Xunyu seemed to have entered spectator mode. Getting them to fight was hopeless at this point.

Being the greatest players of all, Superiors were often the most troublesome and stubborn of eccentrics. Upon realizing that, the rest of the Masters reluctantly gave up on getting their help and headed out to battle themselves.

They assumed the Superiors would move the moment the arena or the tians inside it were endangered, and they weren't wrong on that front. Still, there was no denying that the two Superiors' casual chat didn't seem to fit the situation.

"How did yoU even get to knOW that?" asked Xunyu.

"We had a fight after he became King of Destruction," said Figaro. "That was when I asked him how he could guard against my attacks when I have so much more AGI than him, and that was his answer."

"Oh yeah, thE bear deflected my attAcks, too..." Xunyu remembered. "But is it even pOssible to read ten movES ahead?"

"It's possible for him, it seems. He said he's 'dabbled' in martial arts in the past."

"Whoa, that's prEtty cool. Maybe I should pick martiAL arts when I'm in juniOR high... Though, wAit, I think thAt was an oPTion for bOYs only.”

“Even if you can’t take classes, you can find gyms or dojos in most sufficiently civilized towns,” Figaro said.

“Or maybe I cAN find some crazy mArtial arts in some seclUded place or soMEthing. That’s hOw it goes here, anYway.”

“Oh, you mean that one Superior Job discovered in Huang He? ‘The Arts,’ was it? I always thought that the ‘The One’ series of jobs was limited to weapon types and magic elements, so I was pretty surprised to find out that there was one for bare fists.”

“Man, how did thAT guy even clear those cONditions?!” Xunyu added. “He’s not okAy in the head! The bEar gives him a run fOR his money, thOugh! They’re both MAdmen!”

“Shu’s a friend of mine, but I can’t deny that.”

Despite fighting each other in an intense, deadly battle just a mere hour ago, Figaro and Xunyu were now watching the show at Jeand Grasslands and talking like good friends.

Many delinquents of the past had believed that anyone who went all out against each other would become pals, and though that wasn’t quite true, duel rankers seemed to have something similar. After all, their current interaction made them look like the best of buddies.

“Anyway, wasn’t he in a beAR costume?” asked Xunyu. “What’s with that appEarance? He’s still a bear, bUT still.”

“It’s a convertible piece of equipment,” answered Figaro. “It’s presented as an Ancient Legendary ‘Suit,’ but it’s actually a Mythical ‘Godcloth.’ You know how there are bosses that basically go, ‘This isn’t even my final form’ and transform? They drop these convertibles every now and then.”

“...I’ve nevEr met any of these retrO RPG demon loRds.”

“Really? You have about a 1% chance to meet them at the boss rush in the later stages of the Tomb Labyrinth.”

“...Eh? You’ve beEN there more than 100 tiMEs?” Xunyu asked.

“Isn’t that normal? And it’s 214 times. It hasn’t been long since I started reaching that point.”

“That’s a lot, mAn. But now it makEs sense why you hAve all those items.”

“All that stuff can be troublesome, though,” Figaro said. “Even when it comes to inventories, I have so much that I don't know what to do with it all. Anyway, convertible equipment is interesting, but their abilities can be really weird. Shu's is a UBM special reward, so it seems to be adjusted for him."

"Oh?"

"As a Suit, it was focused on stealth, so I think that applies to the true form, too," Figaro said. "From the way he entered the battle, I assume it has some skill that 'Hides your appearance and presence until you enter the battle.' It might have some other conditions, though."

"...He cAN pull off a surprise attAck with that kind of damage? That's just unfAir."

"Your ultimate skill isn't too different, though."

"GheaHahAhahaH! You gOt me therE!" Xunyu guffawed.

Their exchange was friendly, and they talked like true gamers. However, to the audience in the arena, it looked like the two Superiors were consulting about how to handle the chaos threatening Gideon. Due to this, the overall sentiment in the audience was tenseness and excitement at what was happening on the broadcast mixed with hope for the two champions on the stage.

But alas, the two they so believed in were just having a simple chat.

"By the wAY," Xunyu said.

"What?"

...Or so it seemed.

"When will thAt shitty labcOat dude use the thing undER us?"

"It's probably a tactical self-destruction monster, so he'll probably do it after his Plan C falls apart," Figaro said. "It shouldn't be long now."

Not all of it was just idle chatter after all.

"Then I'll get riD of the thing wiTH my ultimate sKill. You shoUld—"

"I'll stop the two 'strongests' if they go on the offensive. I'm interested in the thing below, but sadly, I'm a pure solo player."

"GhehAh! But those two arE way more tROublesome!" cried Xunyu.

"Dealing with them sounds like fun, though, doesn't it?"

"AgreEd."

Watching the fight of their fellow Superior, the two readied their fangs.

◆◆◆

Central arena, audience seats

At the eastern side of the arena, there was a woman with a porcupine on her knees. Just like everyone else, she was watching the broadcast.

While doing so, she noticed something. Not about the scene displayed, but about Behemot — her porcupine partner.

She could easily tell that the sight of the King of Destruction filled the creature with much excitement and joy.

They'd been in Infinite Dendrogram for over four years now, so it was easy for her to notice such changes in the porcupine's mood.

"That's clearly the same bear that you were so fond of," she said. Upon remembering how Behemot had climbed on the bear suit's head, she formed a faint smile.

At the same time, a thought came to her mind. It was a sentiment shared by many of the audience members watching the broadcast.

He's strong.

Just like most, she saw Shu Starling as powerful. However, what that strength made her feel was quite unlike what the rest of the audience felt.

To most, his struggle was their last hope, while what she felt was very different.

He's using tricks, too, but most of it is just pure power, the woman thought. I like that. It makes my heart flutter. I want him to hit me, and I would love to crush him, too. He'd be a much better opponent than the two on the stage.

She was the only one watching him who wanted to face him as an enemy.

Her gaze was that of a bloodthirsty beast, and the meager amount of bloodlust she exuded was enough to make the surrounding tians shake in fear, unaware as to why. But she was quick to hide that lust for battle, for Behemot sent her a certain thought.

"He's like a hero."

In the broadcast, Shu scattered a number of monsters with but a single kick. Despite facing countless of the disgusting creatures, he stood strong and continued felling them, hit by hit.

The sight made her nod. "Yes, he truly is a hero. Especially when you consider he's fighting the Giga Professor, who's quite the villain."

Shu was a true hero facing a horde of disgusting monsters all by himself, while Franklin, the leader of the horde, looked like nothing but a vile madman.

"Well, I certainly won't call it pathetic," she added, giving her opinions on the situation while telepathically talking to Behemot.

"Hey," said the porcupine.

"Yes, what is it?" asked the woman.

"Which is stronger — the queen of beasts or the hero?"

"Well..."

She knew the hidden meaning behind the question and put her response into spoken word.

"We should see for ourselves."

It was a promise for a not-so-distant future.

"Anyway, it's good that we came here," she added telepathically. "I'm happy we found someone who meets our desires."

With that, she focused entirely on the broadcast.

Thus, she and Behemot — the two representing the joker card that wouldn't help Franklin in his game — decided to just silently watch the battle.

◇◆◇

Jeand Grasslands

The King of Destruction's bare fists had already destroyed more than 1,000 monsters. Not only that, but his feats allowed the ten-odd Masters nearby to regroup and take on any monsters that slipped through the Superior's devastation.

The Masters that had been closed in the central arena were now pouring through the western gate and aiding the war effort, too.

The Masters outside had been able to buy enough time, and the situation was shifting in favor of the Masters guarding the city of Gideon.

Despite all that, Franklin still had a wide grin on his face.

"Well, I have his skills and stats now, and it sure is something..." he murmured.

The King of Destruction's stats and battle prowess were astonishing, indeed. Each of his punches was on par with a high-rank Embryo ultimate skill, and the fact that they were paired with excellent combat ability made them nothing short of frightening.

It didn’t end there. The Analyzing Eye of Wisdom allowed Franklin to see the King of Destruction’s unique skill, and it was definitely something to be feared.

Its name was “Right of Destruction,” and its description was, “Allows you to destroy indestructible targets with endurance lower than your attack power.”

Franklin believed the skill let the King of Destruction destroy creatures that nullified physical attacks, such as Slimes and Spirits. After all, the skill had flashed up on his Eye of Wisdom when the King of Destruction had destroyed a King-Size Oxygen Slime in just one hit.

Considering the attack power his ridiculous STR gave him, Right of Destruction likely allowed him to negate any and all Destruction Negation skills.

“Well, he sure surprised me,” said Franklin. “But he won’t be a problem.”

No matter how strong and combat proficient, the King of Destruction’s strength was still merely the strength of one. He was the same as the other two Superiors Franklin had deemed to be of little concern; he wasn’t anything Franklin couldn’t deal with.

The many other masters gathered here weren’t a big problem, either. Pandemonium would soon finish unleashing the remaining monsters.

Though they were also part of the Suicide Series, they were of a different version than the 5,000 that had been released first.

About a third of them were on par with Pure-Dragons, but that certainly wasn’t all. When Pandemonium released Franklin’s monsters into the wild, he could make slight modifications to them, which included the addition of simple orders.

The reason he’d released the 5,000 first was to make the kingdom believe that all Suicide Series monsters only charged forward. The new order he added to the 50,000 monsters was simple: “After all the Suicide Series monsters are released, surround Gideon and invade it.”

That meant the city was about to be attacked by 50,000 monsters coming from every direction.

The kingdom’s Masters would be able to handle it if Franklin released them gradually. If they banded together and focused all their powers into sweeping up the monsters, they could likely protect the city with little trouble.

However, if the 50,000 monsters all split up and attacked simultaneously from every direction, the side with the smaller numbers wasn't going to stand a chance.

Even if they had the King of Destruction and his exceptional STR, and even with the 1,000 Masters from the arena, a significant portion of the monsters would surely break into the city. And with that, Franklin would be victorious.

As Pandemonium released the last of the monsters, Franklin spoke up.

"All right, now they'll advance to the city and—"

But before he could finish his sentence, the world before his eyes underwent a drastic change.

Parts of the ground were ejected upwards, and its pieces and dust began covering the sky.

Violent ear and flesh-rending explosive sounds overwhelmed his surroundings.

The stench of gunpowder and blood assaulted his nose.

And between the explosions, he could hear the dying wails of countless monsters.

He realized that the monsters he was releasing were quickly being exterminated by countless cannon shots from places unknown.

"Artillery?! What the...?!"

At that moment, he remembered the two most reliable rumors concerning King of Destruction, the mysterious Superior.

One was the idea that he was a Superior Job from the crasher grouping. The other was...

"A battleship!" Franklin shouted.

The surrounding explosions abated, and the battlefield was caressed by a speedy gale. It blew away the cloud of dirt shrouding the ground beneath, revealing that not a single one of the Suicide Series had survived the onslaught unscathed. And beyond the wretched creatures, there was something that hadn't been there before.

Just like Franklin's Pandemonium, it had once been hidden by Optic Camouflage, but now it was concealed no longer.

It was larger than Gideon's walls.

It was a weapon.

It was a vehicle.

It was a Superior Embryo.

It was a land battleship, crushing the ground beneath with its gigantic caterpillar tracks.

It very much confirmed the second most reliable piece of information about the King of Destruction: “His Embryo is a battleship.”

This was the War God Ship, Baldr.

“Twin Quintuple Cannons, firebombs loaded... Barrage.” The Superior Embryo spoke in a robotic voice as it fired the quintuple cannons on both its sides towards the surviving monsters.

The incendiary shots leaked fuel as they rent the air and slammed into the monsters, either turning them into burning effigies or simply reducing them to ash.

“Stardust Genocider,” the Embryo said.

It wasn’t just artillery that it had. The extremely masculine, tank-like, ship-like Embryo suddenly exposed countless aircraft catapults on one of part of its deck.

They all momentarily lit up and released strange projectiles that left trails of smoke behind them.

Like ravenous hawks, the flying objects relentlessly went after the monsters, exploding upon impact and reducing them to dust.

“Bloody Laser Storm.”

Certain parts of the ship’s hull slid open, revealing a number of sentry guns. They all started autonomously releasing crimson lasers towards the monsters within range, neatly slicing them up.

If this wasn’t an overwhelming annihilation, nothing was. Each and every piece of Baldr’s weaponry was focused on wide-area extermination.

In a short while, it had already taken care of more than 10,000 of Franklin’s monsters. The menacing creatures he’d wanted to use to make the kingdom succumb were nothing but lowly insects before the battleship.

“He... What... He kills stuff in a large radius, too?!” For the first time that day, Franklin raised his voice in anger.

He had every reason to do so.

After all, he was looking at his natural enemy.

Franklin’s Pandemonium was a wide-scale suppression type — one that felled a target location through sheer numbers.

The King of Destruction's Baldr was a wide-scale extermination type — one that killed great numbers through sheer force.

Like skills, items, and jobs, Embryos also had compatibility.

Just like Franklin was certain he could win against Figaro and Xunyu, who both focused on individual power, he was now certain that he couldn't win against the King of Destruction.

The barrage of attacks had already felled 10,000, and it wouldn't be too long until there was nothing left. The surviving monsters followed their imprinting and tried to split up, but it was obvious they wouldn't last against that firepower.

The King of Destruction, true to his name, would destroy them all.

He was the kingdom's most powerful. He was the country's strongest Master, bearing the Embryo with the greatest firepower. He could never be stopped by mere numbers with half-baked abilities.

"...I guess this is it," Franklin muttered as he realized that his Plan C had failed completely.

It would take some time for the Suicide Series to be completely exterminated, but they could never harm Gideon now.

Even if, by some freak miracle, some monsters survived the onslaught, the other Masters on the scene would have no trouble mopping them up.

"I lost Plan A to Ray Starling, Plan B to the Superior Killer, and Plan C — the one that took the longest to prepare — to the King of Destruction..." The fact that he was being cornered made Franklin laugh in self-derision. "Ha ha ha ha... Funny how they just keep getting stronger every time I use a nastier plan..."

At this point, there was simply no way for Franklin to win. The King of Orchestras, Veldorbell was down, Hugo Lesseps had abandoned him, and the traitorous Masters on his side were thoroughly unreliable.

We'd probably be able to turn it all around if those two decide to participate, Franklin thought. But he knew that it wouldn't happen. The two girls he'd counted as his joker had dropped out of the scene the moment they'd found out that the first princess hadn't come to Gideon.

Hell, if she were here, we could... No, that's stupid. What am I even thinking? Franklin even went as far as to remember a certain person who was no longer at his side, and ridiculed himself for it.

“...Enough.”

He looked down at Pandemonium, the battlefield, and Gideon with the coldest of looks on his face.

“All right, I get it. I can’t win this, no matter what.” As though convincing himself, he spoke those words and reached into his lab coat’s pocket. “So I’ll just delete both your victory and my defeat.”

He pressed the button to activate his final pawn.

◇◆◇

Central arena, underground

As the many people in the arena's audience watched the broadcast with either joy or worry, a certain something 4,000 metels underground was digging through the bedrock and making its way towards the surface.

It was a monster highly reminiscent of a centipede.

Using the spinning, drill-like appendage on its head, it broke through the tough bedrock and charged towards its destination.

The monster's name was the NDW, short for the Nuclear Dragon Worm, and it was the final piece that Franklin had prepared for his plan.

The NDW was a creature that had been developed using a Demi-Dragon Worm as its base, and that gave it a great tunneling ability. However, that certainly wasn't its main feature.

The NDW was equipped with a single, extremely powerful weapon.

Since it was underground, no one could see the creature, but if they did, they'd notice that its chest was shining red.

It was basically a nuclear bomb.

Franklin had defeated an Ancient Legendary UBM called "Nuke Dragon, Untergang" and used its special reward to create the NDW.

Once activated, it would burn everything in a two kilometel radius in a storm of fire and radiation. Naturally, the NDW would die as well, but it wouldn't mind that. Right from the start, the monster had been designed to be a self-destruction superweapon.

The NDW was the main component of Plan D for "destroy," the plan that Franklin had decided to start if the many Suicide Series monsters from Plan C somehow failed.

It was his spade — the final ace up his sleeve — and using it would be the equivalent of flipping the entire game board upside down.

If the NDW reached the surface and blew up, everyone in the arena would die. That would include the tian spectators, Count Gideon himself, and the Masters still there.

Of course, the arena — the symbol of the city — would blow up, as well.

The severe losses would bring great chaos and despair upon the kingdom, and the country would be unable to claim they'd been victorious against Franklin.

He'd prepared the NDW to prevent the kingdom and its people from rebuilding, on the off chance that they might attain victory against him.

Franklin would've liked to have kept the central arena and its precious functions for when the imperium gained control over the kingdom, but even that was nothing compared to the possibility of losing.

"DRRRRRRR..."

The NDW drilled through the hard bedrock, making short work of it. At the rate it was going, it would reach the surface within the next few minutes or so. It would fulfill Franklin's desire and burn his defeat along with Gideon.

When it came close to the surface, its high-quality biological audio sensors began picking up the voices of the people above.

"Go, KoD!"

"Masters! Please do your best!"

"Please help us..."

Most of the voices were supporting the King of Destruction and the other Masters fighting the monsters, while the rest were worried about whether they would see tomorrow. But none of them were overcome by despair.

Clearly, none of them had any idea that they would be wiped from this world the moment the NDW reached the surface in just a few minutes.

The creature didn't think much of it, mostly because it wasn't equipped with the ability to think. The NDW's only role was to "stand by below the arena, wait for the signal, rise, and blow up," so it didn't need to have any sort of thoughts.

Even its biological audio sensors were nothing but a means of knowing where it had to rise. Thus, the NDW didn't pay any heed to the people's voices...

"Magic Range Extension, Magic Power Magnification, Magic Area Designation Magnification, Magic Conceal."

...even when someone was speaking a curious set of words.

"Now, for the MP I'll give to the magnification skills... All right, I'll go with 500,000 each."

It sounded like delirious gibberish to those who didn't understand, and delusional nonsense to those who did.

Naturally, the NDW, not having any mind to speak of, ignored the words. But then...

“Mud Clap.”

...the very next moment, it was rendered completely immobile. It was unable to move even a single one of its many legs.

“DDRRRRRR?!”

Though the NDW couldn’t think, the thoroughly unexpected event caused errors in its programming which made it release a sound much like a shriek.

It tried moving the drill on its head, but it couldn’t spin at all. In fact, the burden of even trying to move it made the drill break.

Of course, the NDW couldn’t understand what was happening to it. But anyone looking at the situation from the side would surely realize that the NDW was surrounded by ground compressed to the point of becoming ultra hard.

◇◆

The central arena’s audience was astir.

It was caused by the ground below them slightly shaking.

Though earthquakes in the kingdom hadn’t been all that uncommon recently, the suddenness of this shaking made the people panic slightly.

Still, since there was no aftershock, most peopled believed that it had been nothing but a side effect of the raging battle outside, and they quickly shifted their attention back to the broadcast.

Among the people, there was a man that muttered something inaudible while looking downwards. The turban and the skin-concealing, loose clothing he wore made him look highly Arabic.

“I used about as much as that other time... but it seems it was too much,” he said and sighed. “Should’ve used a third of that.”

His pensive face made the middle-aged spectator at his side call out to him.

“Hey, what’s up, lad? Why the muttering?”

The Arabian-looking man looked back at him with a troubled expression.

“Oh, it’s nothing,” he said. “There was a bug below, and it caught my attention.”

The words made the middle-aged man look at him in shock before bursting into laughter. “Ha ha ha! You care about bugs in this situation?! I can’t tell if that’s tough or weak! Oh well, it’s not like we can do much from here! Let’s just leave it to the King of Destruction and the other Masters!”

“Ahaha, yes. Let’s leave it to them.” The Arabian-looking man laughed and chose to watch the broadcast along with the fellow spectator.

3,000 metels under them, Franklin’s final pawn, the NDW, was completely bound and unable to move.

That had been done by the basic earth spell of Mud Clap, but the insane amounts of magic used had brought its effects far beyond “basic.”

The worm was equipped with a powerful tunneling ability, yet it couldn’t even shake one of its legs. It was as though it was lodged into a casket designed specifically for it.

The NDW had been rendered incapable of doing anything.

To prevent it from accidentally exploding while underground, Franklin had made sure to set it so that it would only blow up when it reached its target.

And now that it was stuck below ground, his last pawn was rendered completely useless, and a few minutes later, Xunyu used her ultimate skill to rip out its core and kill it.

◇◆◇

Jeand Grasslands

“Just a few more minutes...” Franklin sighed and muttered after pressing the button to activate the NDW.

In Franklin’s final act of terror, his game became nothing but an event where he simply waited for the result. Regardless of whether it ended with the NDW’s explosion or his own death penalty, it was all over for him.

“There were just too many unexpected factors,” he muttered.

The Superior Killer, the RSK’s defeat, Hugo’s disaffection, and then the appearance of the King of Destruction. Though Franklin had taken measures to assure his success, the unforeseen factors had just been too many for him.

“Especially that King of Destruction. Guy’s just unfair.”

The King of Destruction’s Embryo’s artillery had destroyed both Franklin’s Suicide Series and the ground beneath. The Jeand Grasslands were grassy no longer.

“Well, at least all the shots he’s firing cost materials, just like my monsters, so it probably hurts him as much as it does me,” Franklin muttered.

He assumed that this barrage had cost the King of Destruction about 3,000,000,000 lir, which made him grin in a satisfied manner.

But at the same time, a question came to his mind.

“So... why isn’t he attacking Pandemonium, again?”

That firepower and range would’ve made short work of Franklin’s Embryo.

He considered why the man wasn’t doing it, and quickly noticed the reason at the edge of his vision.

The second princess was not far from him, sleeping at the top of Pandemonium.

That’s right, Franklin realized. He wasn’t the only one riding his Embryo — he was accompanied by one of the most important figures in the country.

The King of Destruction couldn’t use that infernal artillery when Franklin had such a hostage.

Franklin now knew the reason why he’d avoided attacking Pandemonium, but that brought him to his second question.

“Why didn’t he use the Embryo from the start?”

That battleship could’ve easily taken care of the 5,000 monsters released first. And yet, the King of Destruction had taunted Franklin with his proclamation and gone out of his way to show off and waste time fighting the monsters without his Embryo. He’d only started using the battleship when the 50,000 monsters had been about to make their move.

It was just illogical.

Almost as if...

“He has something planned!” The moment he shouted that, a silver silhouette passed the edge of his vision.

Before he could confirm what it was, he heard hooves hit the top of Pandemonium and felt the silver silhouette land behind him.

“Mh...”

Franklin felt the ominous presence, but he was above doing anything as pathetic as hastily turning around in shock. That was mostly due to the fact that he had Life Link — the skill that transferred damage done to him over to his monsters.

DGP, KOS, and all his other minion monsters were already destroyed, but he still had Pandemonium. The Embryo was basically a giant monster, and Franklin believed that, even though King of Destruction could made short work of it, the person standing behind him couldn’t damage it all that much.

Thus, with a certain degree of calmness, he slowly turned around.

“Yo. You sure have an annoying habit of charging in on the front lines, don’t you... Ray?”

“Well, I still have some unfinished business,” the man replied.

The man standing there was exactly who Franklin thought it would be:

Ray Starling.

Chapter Five: Game, Set, Match

Jeand Grasslands

The battle in the Jeand Grasslands was approaching its end.

The army of over 55,000 monsters was already down to half of that number, and the many Masters on the scene, especially the King of Destruction, were quickly taking care of those still standing.

Franklin also didn't have any more of his unique monsters. The RSK had been felled by Ray Starling, while DGP and KOS had been destroyed by the man's brother.

The fights in the streets of Gideon were abating, as well.

The freed monsters and the traitors had been more or less exterminated, while the King of Orchestras, the second strongest imperium Master on the scene, had been given the death penalty.

The direction of the battle was fixed, and Franklin's defeat was now inevitable.

Normally, the surviving Dryfean forces would have ended the battle by retreating, but they displayed no intention of stopping. After all, the overwhelming majority of those remaining were monsters of the Suicide Series, an army of biological weapons whose cells practically screamed for them to charge and kill until death. They were the reason why the kingdom's Masters were still fighting and why the King of Destruction's Baldr continued its infernal artillery.

Even now, the Suicide Series — and chunks of the ground, along with them — were being scattered into the wind by the battleship's bombardment.

It was happening a short distance away from the kingdom's Masters, and one of them was keenly observing the sight.

"Ray's brother's Embryo sure is something," muttered Rook to himself, feeling much like someone watching a firework show.

He wasn't alone in that. Just about every one of the low-rank Masters present on the battlefield was doing the exact same thing.

When the many high-rank Masters had escaped the barrier surrounding the central arena, the newbies had been told to stand back.

It wasn't because they would get in the way, but because the high-ranks had a consensus that the newbies had worked too hard to get the death penalty here.

Rook himself was unable to keep up with their speed without using Union Jack or Liz's protection, so he could only agree that he had no place on the front lines.

"High firepower artillery..." he muttered. "Honestly, I'm not sure if that fits him all that well..."

That sentiment aside, Rook was in absolute awe at Baldr's power, proficiency, and precision. It fired countless shots, yet none of them hit Ray as he made his way towards Pandemonium.

Despite being a newbie just like Rook, Ray was still out there fighting. He'd broken through the enemy lines and gone after the leader, Franklin.

Rook had seen Ray and Shu talk to each other. The two hadn't spoken aloud, and instead had used the Telepathy Cuffs Shu'd given Ray before he'd left the arena. Nevertheless, Rook had been able to correctly assume what they'd talked about.

Ray had said that he wanted to get to Franklin atop of Pandemonium. Shu had decided to help him.

By their own will, with no hesitation to speak of, they instantly set out to do what they had to do.

Rook found it nothing short of dazzling, and observed Baldr's artillery while basking in the aftertaste of the sentiment.

Suddenly, something caught his attention.

"Hm...?"

It was somewhere in the area ravaged by Baldr's attacks.

"That's..."

Surrounded by explosions and dust, there was a familiar silhouette.

It quickly disappeared beyond the veil. Rook could easily tell that it went towards Pandemonium and fully understood the reason why.

Rook heaved a sigh, understanding that this had happened because of his carelessness. Absentminded as she was, he'd left her all alone without any supervision. But at the same time...

"That's much better than merely hesitating..." he murmured to himself.

...he was a bit satisfied.

◇◆◇

“Ray Starling has arrived at the upper part of Pandemonium,” Baldr reported to its Master.

"Right," Shu said as he swung his fist. It landed directly on a Suicide Series monster, instantly obliterating and making it vanish.

The unfortunate creatures stood no chance against fists that could instantly kill legendary monsters.

To add to that, his Right of Destruction negated most defensive skills and fatal damage negation effects, such as those provided by the Lifesaving Brooch. Some of the Suicides he’d pulverized had impressive resistances, but those meant nothing before his punches. Yet the Suicides continued attacking him, showing no fear whatsoever.

Their minds weren’t even equipped to consider their own lives, so they kept on charging towards Shu — towards certain death.

“Mh...” he muttered.

It was easy to describe it as disgusting and call it a day, but Shu felt like their way of existence was a brief glimpse into the mind of their creator, Franklin.

He clearly defines what he has to gain, what to discard, what to win, and what to spend for that purpose, Shu thought, feeling that Franklin was much like himself and a bit like Ray in that regard.

Shu looked up at Pandemonium, where Ray should be facing Franklin, and recalled what his brother had told him over the Telepathy Cuffs.

I have something I have to do and a question I have to ask him. Can you help me get to him?

Remembering Ray’s request made Shu form a faint smile.

“You just do whatever you think you have to,” he muttered as he looked up at the top of Pandemonium, towards Ray. “Whatever happens, I’ll set things straight. That’s my role as your big bro.”

◇◆◇

Franklin, the mastermind behind the evening’s terrorist plot, was grinning.

The tables had completely turned, and the numerous monsters he had made were being exterminated by overwhelming destruction and a unified will to protect Gideon. Despite it all, Franklin stood atop his Pandemonium and faced Ray Starling with a smile on his face.

“KoD over there is doing all the needed work,” he said. “You’re damaged all over, Ray-boy. Why didn’t you just stay back and sleep?”

Ray’s appearance more or less confirmed Franklin’s suspicions that the King of Destruction’s strange actions were nothing but a distraction. His flashy performance had attracted Franklin’s attention, allowing Ray to arrive at the top of Pandemonium.

The fact that Ray had been able to ride Silver all the way here without being caught up in the bombardment was all the proof that Franklin needed. Also, the explosions had killed all the monsters he’d positioned in the Jeand Grasslands to act as sensors. The broadcast monsters around Pandemonium were dead, as well, meaning that no one else could see Franklin face Ray.

“Still... the King of Destruction himself...” Franklin mused.

Franklin had a good reason to believe that the Superior had a reason to help Ray. It was the name.

Along with the stats, Franklin’s Analyzing Eye of Wisdom allowed him to see the name of the King of Destruction — “Shu Starling.”

“Here’s a question, Ray Starling,” he said. “Do you know a Master called ‘Shu Starling’?”

“He’s my big brother,” Ray answered with no hesitation.

Upon hearing that, Franklin nodded in understanding and formed a wry grin. “Two brothers and two sisters,” he said. “The older ones are Superiors and the younger ones are Maiden’s Masters... Helluva funny little coincidence.”

“Huh...?” Ray raised an eyebrow.

“So, what’s so important that you had your brother help you get to me?” Franklin asked.

“I’m here for three reasons.”

“Well, that’s a number. I already know one of them, though.” Franklin pointed at a part of the floor they were standing on, towards a young, unconscious girl. It was Elizabeth, the second princess of the Kingdom of Altar. “You’re here to save her, aren’t you? Your brother can’t attack

Pandemonium while she's here, right?"

Elizabeth was his enemy's Embryo's Achilles' heel. Without her, the King of Destruction would barrage Pandemonium with focused hellfire. Franklin was fully aware of that, so he was being careful not to let Ray take her.

"So what's the second thing?" he asked.

"I have a question," Ray replied.

"A question, eh?"

This was within Franklin's expectations. If Ray had only been here to save the girl, he could've done it while atop Silver, not giving Franklin a chance to react. And if Ray had only come here to defeat him, he could've hit him with a surprise attack. The fact that he'd gone out of his way to get off his horse and stand there talking meant that he was obviously here for an exchange.

"What do you want to hear about?" asked Franklin. "My recommended hunting spots? The UBM habitats I know? Or perhaps my country's internal affairs?"

Franklin had a hunch that it wasn't any of those... but...

"Why did you do this?"

But the question that actually came wasn't within his expectations.

"Why... What? Didn't I talk about my goal? Did you forget it?" Franklin shot back.

"You wanted to give the kingdom's Masters an embarrassing defeat and break the Altarian fighting spirit by showing them a devastated Gideon, right?"

"Hey, so you do remember."

"That's not what I'm asking, though."

"What's the question, then?" Franklin asked with a ridiculing look in his eyes and a jeering tone.

Ray looked directly back at him.

"What do you think of the tians?" he asked.

The question momentarily confused Franklin, but he quickly processed it and understood what it meant. "Oh, you want to know whether I think that Infinite Dendrogram is a world or a game?"

Ray nodded.

"I see, I see... AHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAH!" Franklin roared with laughter.

As though broken in more ways than one, Franklin laughed out loud until he had to catch a breath.

"Anyone who thinks this is just a game is either a retard or a child who believes everything he's told," he said with the most serious expression imaginable. "A game? Like hell. The realism, the models, the life. Everything besides the system-related stuff is way beyond game level. Honestly, if the system weren't there to try and convince us that we're just playing something, none of this would look like a game."

"Tsk..." Ray said.

"I have no idea what all of this actually is. I'd assume it's the human experimentation phase for the creation of a national... no, worldwide virtual reality, but that's way above our current cutting-edge tech, so I don't think it's likely. For all I know, those guys who say this is an actual other world or that aliens are messing with us could be right."

"...Then what do you think of the people living here?" Ray asked slowly.

"AI with minds so sophisticated, they might as well be human. Or perhaps actual people from another world. Or maybe life that conforms to those boundaries. At the very least, I don't think they're just 1s and 0s."

He paused.

"So I want to make this perfectly clear, bucko. If this were our Earth, if my situation, conditions, and powers were the same in real life, I'd still go through with this plan. I would act exactly the same way as I act in here. No matter how many thousands it would kill." He proclaimed that with absolute certainty. "That's what you wanted to know, isn't it, Ray-baby? A Maiden's Master like you just couldn't help but wonder why I would design such an evil plot, right?"

"How could you do this?!" Ray asked with a voice wrung out from the very depths of his heart. Those were the words of someone who recognized this world's lives as real and couldn't tolerate the tragedy that had nearly befallen them. The words didn't have a hint of theatrics or falsehood in them; they were all Ray's mind made vocal.

"Hm..." Franklin silently looked at him, finding the young man somewhat dazzling. He realized that they were alike, but completely different at the same time. With respect to that fact, Franklin chose to respond with the same honesty. "Because I never want to lose again. I've had enough of being controlled. I'll live free, create what I want, and enjoy the world as I please. No one will ever bind me. I've decided to crush anyone trying to obstruct my way of life."

He then fell silent. He didn't have anything more to say.

Franklin's words were vague, and he was probably the only one who could ever understand them. Nevertheless, the mad scientist felt that he said all he had to.

"I see how it is." Ray nodded in understanding.

To avoid defeat, Franklin wouldn't hesitate to cause tragedies, and that was exactly why he had to be defeated.

His pursuit for his way of life would bring about the most devastating of calamities, which was all the reason needed to stop him at all costs.

"Anyway, that's the second thing settled," said Franklin, his tone back to normal. "So what's the third?"

"It's th— hgh!" Ray tried to answer, but his words were cut short by Pandemonium starting to shake wildly — not because it had started to move, but it because it was being barraged by an artillery storm.

"What the... KoD is attacking?" asked Franklin, thoroughly confused. "But I still have the princess. Did he finally snap or someth...?" He stopped mid-sentence and became even more puzzled.

He'd shifted his gaze to the princess's position, and realized that she'd disappeared.

Ray wasn't the one responsible for this.

Franklin had been observing him this whole time, so he was absolutely certain that Ray hadn't been the one to take the princess. Someone else had sneaked up here, taken Elizabeth, and saved her. Franklin knew exactly which person would be capable of that.

"The Superior Killer..." he said. "So you were a decoy, too."

While Franklin had been focusing on Ray's moves and words, the Superior Killer had come up and saved the princess. He couldn't tell whether they'd planned this out, or whether the Superior Killer had merely taken advantage of Ray's actions.

Regardless of that, Pandemonium had lost the one thing protecting it from Baldr's artillery. Countless shots pierced into the factory and exploded, distorting the already-strange creature even further and gradually bringing it to the ground.

“This sure is intense,” Franklin said as he kept himself standing by holding onto the railings installed atop of Pandemonium.

Because Ray was here, none of the attacks were hitting the top, but Franklin was more than aware that the factory would soon collapse.

Even the stat summary said that it had less than a tenth of its total HP left.

“Mh...”

Franklin’s death and Pandemonium’s destruction weren’t outside of the expected outcomes. His defeat would simply trigger Plan D. Or so it should have, but...

“They’ve taken care of it...” Franklin sighed.

A glance at the device he was holding told him that the NDW had lost its life. And Gideon remained the same. That could only mean that the central piece of the final plan, the spade, had been killed before self-destructing. It had vanished without doing any damage to speak of.

“I had a feeling this might happen,” he muttered.

The King of Destruction had been the one to show up here in the grasslands, rather than either of the Superiors from the Clash. That situation had made them into a wild card, which meant that this turn of events was entirely possible.

Normally, the spade’s underground tunneling ability would be impossible to counter, but the ultimate skill Xunyu displayed in the Clash of the Superiors would make it really easy. If Franklin had known about that ability before the Clash, he’d have prepared something else, but thinking of what-ifs was meaningless at this point.

With DGP and NDW, Franklin had now wasted two monsters made with special rewards — ones he could never make again. And with Plan D falling apart, Franklin had lost not only his chance of winning, but his chance of “not losing,” as well. If he was given the death penalty here, he’d officially suffer a crushing defeat.

Perhaps he could make it a bit less overwhelming by escaping, but...

“...It’s too late,” he muttered.

Large as it was, Pandemonium had nearly no means of fighting, and it was on the verge of being completely destroyed.

The Castling monsters he’d positioned all over the Jeand Grasslands had been thoroughly exterminated, too. Franklin’s death penalty was imminent.

After all... Ray was charging straight towards him.

Not even wasting his time getting on Silver, he dashed on his own two feet, showing no hesitation whatsoever about Baldr's barrage.

I guess he expected these attacks, Franklin thought. Well, they're brothers, after all. They probably agreed on this or just knew what the other would do without even having to talk it through... I'm kinda jealous. Feeling a little bit sentimental, Franklin breathed a light sigh.

"So the third reason you're here is to kill me," he muttered.

Ray gradually closed the distance between them, but Franklin had no means of doing anything about it. He'd already used up all the custom monsters in his arsenal, so there was no one to protect him now.

Very well. I'll accept this defeat. He gave up and prepared himself for his death penalty. But someday, I'll...

At that moment, a silhouette arrived at the top of Pandemonium.

"Hgh!" Ray exclaimed in surprise.

"Eh?" Franklin voiced his confusion. The silhouette was a half-broken Magingear. Much of its metallic armor was lost, and it was only complete because of the frozen coating. It was the unit piloted by Hugo and armed with Cocytus.

"Kh..."

If the Magingear had been a person, the damage would surely have killed it.

Some of the damage had been caused by his battle against Rook's group, but he'd gained most of it after undoing La Porte de l'Enfer and letting the Masters fight the monsters. There was no way he could have remained unscathed while breaking through the veil of fiery destruction created by Baldr's artillery.

Despite being more damaged than the Magingear he'd used against Gouz the day prior, this Magingear was still able to move.

"AAARRGHHHH!" the pilot roared. It was a voice that the roleplayer acting as a chivalrous knight would never use.

With that, the Magingear stood right before Ray, as though to protect Franklin.

◇◆

Hugo had spent much of the time until and during the plan doing nothing but doubting himself. He'd wondered whether he should participate in the plan, whether he was right in doing what he'd chosen to, and whether he should face Ray, who was a friend from the day before.

While he was doubting himself, he'd been defeated by Rook, heard his words, and seen Franklin begin Plan C, filling him with even more doubts.

While hesitating, he had undone La Porte de l'Enfer's Frozen debuff that was trapping the Masters near the western gate. He'd done that instantly, without thinking it through.

Hugo had thought that he couldn't let things continue as they were, but even then, he hadn't been sure if it had been the right thing to do. That action had helped stop the tragedy before his eyes, but it had been a move against Franklin — the person Hugo so greatly admired.

Then, in the midst of those doubts, Hugo had remembered that Franklin had lied and planned to destroy Gideon, which filled him with even more doubt.

Once Rook and the other Masters had gone out to the Jeand Grasslands and left him alone, the Charm effect had disappeared, and he had hesitated further still.

But then, all of a sudden, Hugo had stopped thinking and doubting himself.

He'd realized that he couldn't do anything if he'd spent all his time hesitating.

Once all the doubts and self-questioning went away, he'd arrived at a single, ultimate answer for what he had to do.

It was the answer that was always inside Hugo and the girl controlling him, Yuri.

It was...

◇◆

"I'll protect my sister!"

With those words, the Magingear began moving.

"Even if I have to defeat you!" The frame was on the verge of shattering, and it only held together because of Cocytus. Nevertheless, the icy machine soldier charged towards Ray. Though he had been a friend the day prior, Hugo brought everything he had to his attack.

"Bring it, Hugo," Ray said, ready to face him.

He didn't know Hugo and Franklin's relationship. But as an opponent and as a friend, he wanted to face him properly.

With that, the Paladin and the High Pilot... the two Maiden's Masters... clashed.

It was their second battle since the one at the western gate, and surely the last one they'd have today. The clash seemed to last no more than a blink of an eye.

"Motor... Slash!" Hugo roared. His Magingear raised its right arm and tried to attack with a swing of the icy cross-sword. "...Hgh! Kh!"

That single motion was the straw that broke the camel's back. The frost armor in the area broke apart, the whole right arm was dislodged from the torso, and the power of the swing made it fly off into the distance.

It was the same arm that had suffered from Ray's Vengeance and the Devil-Dragon-Man's Tri-Horn Grand Dash. The many powerful attacks it'd gone through had brought it to its limit, and the skill just now had gone past it.

"Not yet! Motor Slash!" Hugo roared again as he instantly used the skill with his other arm. The icy blade went right towards Ray, ready to split him.

"I can't break through the armor like this," said Ray. "Then I'll just...!"

He loosened his grip on his black longsword, Nemesis, and threw her up into the air. Then he bent his body to avoid the sharp cross-blade and extended his right arm into its path.

"Gh...!"

The frozen blade cleanly cut it off, dealing great damage to Ray and making him bleed. However, the sharpness of the weapon made it so that the impact didn't blow him away.

"Hgh...!" Ray exclaimed as he, still bent, moved to the Magingear's side.

As he did that, Nemesis fell back towards him.

However, with his left arm being charred and his right arm being completely lost, he had no means of holding her hilt.

Or so they thought.

"Hh...!" Ray exclaimed.

“What?!” Hugo shouted.

His surprise wasn’t without reason, for Ray had bitten into Nemesis’ hilt with his teeth.

“Mfh...!” Ray couldn’t say a word, but...

“Very well!” said Nemesis, having read his mind.

Ray moved his head in a way that made the greatsword in his teeth reach into the frozen armor coating the Magingear’s cockpit. It wasn’t enough to break through, but that didn’t matter at all.

“Vengeance... Is Mine!” said Nemesis, activating the skill.

The counterattack doubled the damage Ray had suffered and delivered it into the frozen armor, instantly making it vanish. Without anything to protect him, the black blade dug into Hugo’s chest and pierced his heart.

“Ah...” he breathed his last before becoming particles of light and vanishing out of this world. His Embryo, Cocytus, disappeared soon after, leaving nothing but the remains of the badly damaged Magingear.

“Argh!” Ray roared.

He was done with Hugo, but he still had some unfinished business. Nemesis fell out of his mouth as he charged towards his target — Franklin.

The mad scientist didn’t even run... or perhaps he even forgot to do it upon seeing Hugo vanish.

“Frank...lin...!”

Ray had lost his right arm and even let go of Nemesis, yet he still dashed towards Franklin. After all, he was facing the very reason why he was here, his ultimate goal for coming to this place.

Ray wasn’t here just to save the princess or to present Franklin with his question. In fact, even defeating him was a secondary goal. He was here for something he’d decided he’d do long ago.

I’d like to punch that idiot for sending a kid to a place this dangerous. My fist is going straight into your face. Keep it clean for me, Superior.

Indeed — Ray only wanted to punch him.

“FRANKLIIIIIINN!” Ray forced his charred right fist into Franklin’s left cheek, finally settling the score.

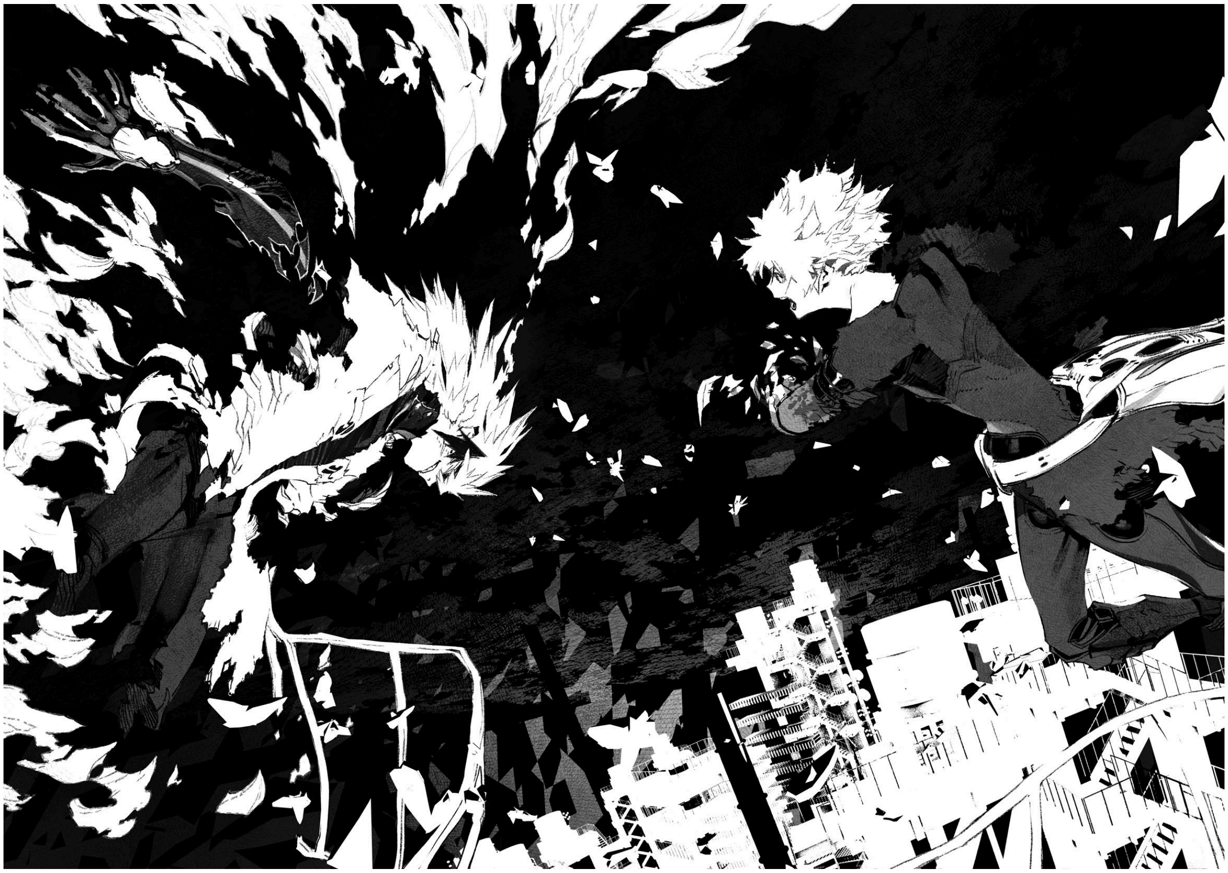
“GHAH?!” Franklin exclaimed.

The power of the impact caused Ray’s fragile arm to begin crumbling. But the moment it hit Franklin’s face, the Miasmaflame Gauntlets released a burst of flame that spread across the mad scientist’s body, quickly turning him into a human torch.

Franklin no longer had a Lifesaving Brooch or any monsters he could use for Life Link. The purgatorial fires made short work of his mediocre HP, and he soon began to vanish.

“Kgh...” Just as he was about to be taken by this world’s rules and disappear, Franklin opened his mouth and spoke. “We’ll win next time.”

And with those words as his last, he became particles of light.



Thus, the Dryfean Superior that had designed and executed this nightmarish plan upon the people of the kingdom vanished at the hands of a single newbie.

With that, the incident was settled.

Or perhaps this outcome had been set in stone long ago, when a certain Superior had tried to use a certain little girl, and a certain newbie had tried to help her.

◇◇◇

Twenty minutes after Franklin’s disappearance, the last of the Suicide Series were downed, ending the battle at Gideon.

Traitors working under Franklin were dead or deserted.

The Suicide Series was thoroughly exterminated.

The club, King of Orchestras, Veldorbell, was dead.

The spade, NDW, was dead.

The heart, High Pilot, Hugo Lesseps, was dead.

The diamond, Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin, was dead.

Thus marked the end of the terrorism at the city of duels.

Franklin’s Game was over.

Epilogue A: The Superiors

Journalist/Death Shadow, Marie Adler

A few hours had passed since Franklin's annoying little game, and dawn was only a few moments away.

Tonight, I'd fought the King of Orchestras, gathered and broken the devices all over Gideon, protected the city against the Suicide Series, broken through the King of Destruction's bombing to get on Pandemonium, saved Ellie, and handed her unconscious body to what remained of the Royal Guard.

Naturally, I was thoroughly drained, especially since it was the second night in a row I'd been running around doing stuff. Sure, my Superior Job gave me some great stats, but even so, I had my limits.

I definitely wasn't the only one who had found this night to be highly taxing. Ray and Rook had gone through a number of harsh battles, as well. In fact, Ray had even lost both of his arms.

Franklin's death penalty made Pandemonium vanish, making Ray fall towards the ground below. Thankfully, he was saved by Nemesis and their Prism Steed, which was named "Silver," apparently.

The girl picked up Ray's right arm, and the Masters on the scene were able to put it back on him using high-rank healing magic. It would take a few days until he would be able to move it as smoothly as before, but it wasn't that big of a problem. However, I couldn't say the same for his left arm.

It had been completely Charred and crumbled to pieces because of it, so retrieving it was impossible at this point. And loss of body parts couldn't be fixed by mere high-rank healing magic.

Now, high-rank Embryo ultimate skills would probably do the trick, but as far as I was aware, the kingdom didn't have any high-ranks whose ultimates were focused on healing others.

There was one person who'd be able to heal Ray's wound. The High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso, a Superior Job from the priest grouping and an owner of a Superior Embryo, could give Ray his arm back in the blink of an eye.

But I couldn't recommend relying on her.

She was the head of a cult, and the prospect of being indebted to her was nothing short of frightening. Worst case scenario, it could even go beyond Infinite Dendrogram.

Considering these circumstances, I'd recommended that he just take the death penalty, since that would have him return completely healed.

However, Ray had shown no intention of doing so, giving me the wild response that, "I still have my right arm, and I found out I can even use my mouth if I have to. I can make this work."

Upon hearing him mention using his mouth, Nemesis had put on a distant look and muttered "Does that count as a kiss...?"

Personally, I thought that biting into the hilt of her greatsword form had been quite unlike kissing.

Anyway, following that exchange, Ray had basically collapsed and logged off, making it obvious just how drained he was, both physically and mentally. No one could fault him for it.

Rook was quite tired, as well, so he'd logged off right after feeding Liz some mithril to restore her volume.

And so, I'd ended up being the only one of our party still online to greet the dawn.

I was extremely sleepy myself, but as both a Journalist and a manga artist, I just couldn't miss this beautiful opportunity to collect quality material.

I mean, it's not every day you get to be on the scene of a settled terrorist incident, I thought.

Anyway, time for a rundown of all that had happened.

Approximately one hour after the last of the Suicide Series was exterminated, Count Gideon declared that the trouble was officially over.

With Ellie saved and Franklin's forces destroyed, he had no reason not to.

Well, there were some player killers that had escaped, but none of them would be stupid enough to do anything at this point, likely because they were afraid of being erased by the King of Destruction or the Super Gladiator.

Speaking of the King of Destruction, Count Gideon had stated that he planned to reward him, Ray, and all the other Masters that had helped take care of the incident. I'd found that surprising, considering he also had to pay for city repairs. It was hard to tell whether he was just that rich or simply a good guy.

Thinking about city repairs made me wonder how much it would cost to fix the area destroyed by me and King of Orchestras and...

Yeah, I probably don't want to know, I thought.

As far as I was aware, the damage there had likely been greater than anywhere else, and I couldn't be more thankful for the fact that they didn't know who was responsible.

Anyway, after Gideon's declaration, the people reacted in two ways.

The knights, guards, and other public officials became busy with damage reports and other post-incident business, while the civilians and Masters took to revelry.

It was only to be expected. Franklin had ruined their big event and replaced it with a night of dread, so merrymaking was the natural response to seeing the man responsible for that defeated so thoroughly.

Masters aside, I was quite impressed by the quick recovery from the civilians.

I guess duel city folk are befittingly hardy, I thought.

Still, once the sky turned bright, a significant number of carts and dragon carriages were seen leaving Gideon, and I couldn't really fault them for that. After all, even the so-called strongest city in the kingdom, the one farthest away from the imperium, hadn't been safe from such an incident. It was only natural to expect some merchants to be scared into taking their riches and leaving for another country.

They were most likely heading to Caldina, so this incident had actually ended up being beneficial to them. Not exactly an unexpected effect, but still.

Hm? Now that I think about it, this war was really profitable to them, I thought.

Not only was Caldina the primary destination for wealthy refugees, they'd also experienced a boost in trade with Altar. Naturally, the kingdom wasn't exporting any of its food to Dryfe, so Caldina was there to buy it all up.

Altar hadn't been left without its share of goods, either. Caldina had sold them lots of war-like wares, such as magic items from Huang He or weapons from Tenchi.

But enough about them. Really, it was only natural for the "land of merchants" to take advantage of such a situation.

Back to the aftermath of Franklin's game.

He'd intended to display the powerlessness of the kingdom's Masters, to break the country's fighting spirit and to have it merge with Dryfe through "diplomacy" before the war had a chance to restart.

However, thanks to the hard work from the newbies and the Masters that hadn't been caught by the barrier, Plans A and B had completely failed.

The most significant event during this interval had been the broadcasted battle between Ray and Franklin's unique monster, as it had had the exact opposite of the intended effect. Though Franklin had planned to completely crush him and break his spirit, Ray had achieved a miraculous victory which had uplifted the masses.

That battle had been quite popular among us Masters, too, gaining lots of replies and comments on related discussion boards and video sites.

It was the third biggest Infinite Dendrogram-related news story, with the first obviously being the King of Destruction's appearance in the spotlight and his fight against Franklin, and the second being Figaro and Xunyu's Clash of the Superiors.

This incident was sure to get Ray a nickname or two. In fact, people were already exchanging ideas both here and in real-life discussion boards. There was even a meeting going on in the central plaza regarding that.

Normally, such meetings were only held for people who made their debut in the arenas, but this time, they were gathering nickname suggestions for Ray, Rook, and King of Destruction, who was no longer "Unknown."

The proposed nicknames for Ray included, but weren't limited to: "Dark Paladin," because he was a Paladin that certainly didn't look like one; "Prince on the Silver Steed," obviously because he'd been riding Silver; and "The Light and Dark-Wielding Hero Clad in Violet and Crimson," which made me wonder about the mind behind such a... polarizing name.

Any of those would probably make Ray want to crawl into a hole.

Still, there were some simple, fitting ones that I personally really liked.

Anyway, back to the results of Franklin's plot.

Following the failure of Plan B, Franklin had started Plan C, which had been significantly worse than the other two, clearly designed to show that "resistance will only make it worse." I and a few other Masters had been there to buy some time, but it was clear that we wouldn't have been able to hold for long, and the damage would've been great.

Enter the King of Destruction, who had instantly turned it all around.

The thousands of monsters that had been meant to overrun Gideon had become nothing but punching bags for the King of Destruction to show off his power.

Franklin had intended to show just how powerless the kingdom's Masters were, but had ended up doing the exact opposite. At the very least, it was now clear that the kingdom wouldn't go down without a fight.

But it was hard to say that it'd been a good thing for the country.

This incident had not only displayed the power of the kingdom's Masters, but also confirmed a certain truth that was on the minds of the country's people... and just about everyone else in Infinite Dendrogram.

Basically, a war force with Superiors was on a completely different level than one without.

A Superior was capable of razing an entire city, or perhaps even a whole country.

Franklin had created monsters that surpassed 50,000 in number, while the King of Destruction had completely annihilated them all. Evidently, they had only been able to have a proper fight because they were both Superiors, while the rest of us were only waiting to be massacred.

It was more obvious than ever that a Superior could only be countered by another Superior.

Of course, there were exceptions, among which was my avatar, Marie Adler.

Marie had a Superior Job, but she wasn't a Superior because she didn't have a Superior Embryo, and the reason why she'd received the nickname "Superior Killer" was because she'd defeated a Superior and sent the criminal to the gaol.

Mind you, that victory had been the result of many factors, such as my abilities, the Superior's abilities, various conditions, and a lot of tactics. All of them had come together, letting me emerge victorious against the King of Plagues, Candy Carnage — a wide-scale suppression type, wide-scale extermination type Master bearing the title of "the greatest tian murderer" and the nickname of "Legions Lost."

...Honestly, I still find it hard to believe I won, I thought.

Back to war matters. The kingdom had been thoroughly devastated in the previous war because there had been no one to counter the imperium's Superiors. In this incident, the kingdom had won because it had the King of Destruction, effectively proving that the outcome of a war was decided by the presence of Superiors or the lack of it. Because of this, the main thing to consider in the next war was the number of Superiors that would participate.

The imperium would obviously have the three that already had accolades from the previous war: the very familiar Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin, "The Weakest, The Worst"; Hell General, Logan Goddhart, the "Contradictory Equation"; and King of Beasts, the "Physically Strongest."

If nothing changed, they would be the only ones, but we also had to consider that the imperium had won the previous war event and had given great rewards to those who performed well, so it was reasonable to expect more Superiors to switch to Dryfe.

The kingdom, on the other hand, would only have two, at best: Lei-Lei the Prodigal of Feasts, who came online at highly irregular times, and the King of Destruction, whose appearance in the spotlight had made it safe to expect him to participate. Those two could easily drop to one if Lei-Lei wasn't online on the day of the war.

Of course, they weren't the only Superiors in the kingdom.

The kingdom also had the Over Gladiator, Figaro. He was symbol of the duel city and the one who'd just won against Xunyu, a foreign Superior.

Then there was the High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso — the leader of the largest clan in the kingdom and the user of the Lunar Divider Field, said to be the most wicked skill one could face in a large-scale battle.

If they were to participate, they would be an invaluable force against the imperium.

However, Figaro was widely known as a pure solo player, so it was clear he had no intention to take part in a battle involving great numbers. Tsukuyo Fuso, too, had refused to participate because the kingdom hadn't accepted her downright unreasonable condition — to make her cult's teachings into the state religion.

The former was tough on his policy, while the latter was a highly demanding Princess Kaguya, making their participation extremely unlikely.

In fact, Tsukuyo might even switch to the imperium if they accepted her condition that the kingdom wouldn’t.

Not to mention that Dryfe also had more non-Superior forces, both Masters and tians.

The kingdom wouldn’t go down without a fight, but a defeat still seemed completely inevitable.

I wonder what the Superiors themselves think about this, I pondered.

◇◆◇

Duel city Gideon, twelfth district, King of Destruction, Shu Starling

“Man, am I tired,” I grumbled. “I need some booze to bear it.”

“Good job back there,” said Figgy. “Drink all you want. It’s on me. You too, Xunyu.”

“ThanKs,” she replied. “I’m underAge, though, so I’ll just haVE some juice.”

I and two fellow Superiors were sitting around the table, enjoying some drinks. We were in a private room of a high-quality club in Gideon’s twelfth district.

Figgy had reserved this place ahead of time. He’d planned to use it right after the Clash, but thanks to a certain shithead in a lab coat, we’d ended up coming here long after his reserved time was up. Thankfully, the store had been kind enough to allow him to use this room after the incident was over.

I was kinda impressed by the management’s professionalism. Not everyone had the guts to continue working in this situation.

“Honestly, I’m pretty glad we have this place,” I voiced my thoughts. “If we were outside, the number of people around us would be unbearable.”

Mind you, I had run riot in a completely different get-up than I was in now, so maybe they wouldn’t realize it was me. The Scandinavian berserker-like clothing was easy to move around in, but the costumes I wore always made me feel calm.

“Yeah, that’s exactly why I reserved it,” said Figgy. “Sure, we could just log out, but a good battle always makes me want to cool off like this.”

“I get whAT you mean,” Xunyu joined in. “But man, this place has sOme good juice." She emptied her glass and ordered some more.

Well, if that ain't an action befitting her age, I thought. I really don't know how to feel about her being twice as tall as me.

"The face under the talisman and the Voice Changing Fu made me suspicious, but you really are a kid, aren't you?" I asked.

"I'm turning ten this yEAr," she answered. "That's doubLE digits, so I'm now a prOper lady."

"Really, now?" I said.

Her excessively long limbs might've been the result of a desire to travel far and a wish to grow up. Humpty, the control AI for Embryos, could probably give a more detailed analysis, but all she ever did was lead me to trouble or watch me struggle to take care of it.

"What are your plans now, Xunyu?" asked Figgy.

"I still have a jOb to protect the prince, so I'll be stAYing in the capital," she answered. "Guess I'll also rAid the kingdom's dUNgeons." The items you could get from doing so differed depending on the country you were in, so that was a good idea.

...Speaking of items, I still had to stock up on materials for Baldr's ammo. It'd cost me roughly 3,300,000,000 lir.

"Oh, but rAiding alone can be prEtty hard, especially whEN going deep into a creAted dungeon," Xunyu added.

You'd have to be Figgy to effectively raid dungeons by yourself. Not to mention that you'd also have to have an Embryo you could chat with just to make it more bearable.

"Coming wiTH?" she asked.

"I'm exclusively solo," Figgy replied.

"And I'm not leaving Gideon fur a while," I said.

"Man, you guYs are cold."

I can't just leave while that walking bomb is still here, I thought.

"If you want, I can introduce you to some duel rankers here," Figgy said, proposing an alternative. "They'll probably want to spar with you, too."

"Then should I set you up with the kill rankers I know?" I joined in. "Oh, but I don't know bear they are."

I wonder what Catherine Kongou's up to, I thought.

"Yeah, thAt'll help a lot." Xunyu nodded. "Wait, uhh... Figaro is the kingdOM’s no. 1 duelist, while the beAr is no. 1 in the kill rankings, rigHt?”

“Yes,” Figgy nodded.

“Bearily so,” I said and did the same.

Oh boy, I know where this is going...

“Then how aboUT the no. 1 in clan raNKin—”

“Avoid her,” Figgy and I simultaneously cut her words short.

“...Is she trOUble?” she asked.

In response, we both simply nodded.

We were unfortunate enough to already be acquainted with that shady cultist fox, and I honestly believed that a person was better off not meeting her. Ever.

“I see hOW it is,” Xunyu continued. “Looks like every country’s top clan owner is bad news.”

“Come on, that’s a bit of an exaggeration...” I began. “Wait, is it?”

The kingdom’s fox... Nope.

The imperium’s lab coat shithead... Nope.

Granvaloa’s military nerd... Nope.

Legendaria’s masked lover of little boys and girls... That one deserved a red card.

I didn’t know much about Tenchi’s, and Xunyu’s words implied that Huang He’s was no good, either.

Well, damn, there actually wasn’t a single decent clan top anywhere.

The owner of Caldina’s Sefirot seemed okay, but he was somewhat scary. Like a rabbit living with a pride of lions.

Oh, speaking of Caldina...

“Hey, this is unrelated, but... did anyone in the arena make a move?” I asked.

My question would’ve been unclear to most, but it was more than enough for the two I was talking to.

“I crushed the cOre of the thing below bEfore it could do anYthing, and it was all ovER,” said Xunyu.

“The Physically Strongest didn’t do anything,” added Figgy. “But Caldina’s Magically Strongest got involved, apparently.”

Did he just say “apparently”? “Why the uncertainty?”

“The mONster I killed wasn’t moVing at all,” Xunyu answered. “I later used the skill tO dig through the dirt arOUnd it and... herE."

She put something on the table. It was about the size of a pebble and looked very much like one, too.

I took it in hand and grasped it with about a tenth of my strength, but that wasn't enough to break it.

"Hnrgh!" I grunted as I used a third of my STR, approximately 60,000, which finally made it break. "It's dirt made by binding magic he enhanced several times over. Makes sense why the thing couldn't move."

It's like being in a skintight coffin, I thought. I know it well. The guy did it to me once...

"I'm not too smart, so I don't really get it," said Figgy. "Why did they come here, anyway?"

"To watCH our battle, obviousLY," Xunyu answered. "I don't kNOw why the Physically Strongest didn't heLP the lab coat. They're bOth from Dryfe, aftER all."

"Mh..." I fell silent and pondered.

I'd known about the other Superiors in the audience before Figaro's and Xunyu's match even began. I'd even told Figgy about them.

Their presence here hadn't been strange at all. It was only natural for Superiors to investigate the abilities of other Superiors, since they were their primary opponents in this world. UBM hunting, special events, war — there were many situations in which Superiors could compete against other Superiors, so knowing their abilities ahead of time was never a bad thing.

So it was only natural for them to come and observe a duel between two Superiors, and honestly, it was strange that we hadn't had anyone from Legendaria here. The country was as much of a neighbor as Dryfe and Caldina.

Figaro and Xunyu had both been fully aware that they were being put under the magnifying glass, and they most likely hadn't used the aces up their sleeves. Figgy hadn't shown his ultimate skill — which not even I knew about — and though Xunyu had used hers, it was clear that she was still hiding something.

That aside...

"This is just a guess," I spoke up. "But I think the Physically Strongest, the King of Beasts, came here with a goal unrelated to Franklin's plot, while the Magically Strongest, The Earth, came here because he knew that Franklin was about to terrorize Gideon."

"...Isn't thAt the other way arouND?" asked Xunyu, and it was a reasonable question.

But...

"The King of Beasts is widely considered to be the strongest being in all the three western countries. If Franklin's terror plot involved her, then it would've also been designed around her," I said.

The fact that Franklin's Game had been so layered and focused so much on using as few of his forces as possible made it obvious that the King of Beasts hadn't been working for him.

"The Earth, on the other hand, intervened with one of Franklin's plans, making it safe to believe that he came here for this reason. Mind you, this is less about him and more about Caldina. They wouldn't like it if Dryfe merged with Altar, since separated countries are easier to manipulate."

Caldina was surrounded by four land countries and Granvaloa. Having two of them become one would be a huge problem for them, so they'd obviously do something to prevent that.

Though, in the end, they were probably planning to take advantage of the all-out war and take off with all the spoils. It wasn't hard to imagine Caldina invading and conquering weakened countries.

Anyway, the fact that they'd sent The Earth made it clear just how serious they were about this. Honestly, it was entirely possible that he would've done something if I hadn't been on the scene. If that had happened, Jeand Grasslands probably would've had to be renamed "Jeand Desert," "Jeand Wastelands," or "Jeand Swamplands."

Well... not like it was much of a grassland now that I was done with it. My Baldr had blown it sky-high.

"But mAn... The Physically StrONgest and the Magically StronGest, eh?" Xunyu muttered. "Are they reAlly such a big deal? I've never foUght either."

"I've heard that Shu here fought The Earth," said Figgy.

"Oh yeAh, I've heard of those rumORs, too. Which of you wOn?"

That had happened some time before the war... about a year ago in Dendro time.

"We tied, I guess?"

"You 'guEss'? What do yOU mean?"

"Exactly what I said. A tie. No clear winner. Match invalid. We pawsitively had to stop because of a third party."

"...What kind of thiRD party could intervene in thAT battle?"

Right when we'd been about to finish it, Humpty and the environment control AI had come over and told us off.

Honestly, we'd probably deserved it, since our battle had completely destroyed a created dungeon.

Anyway, The Earth, eh...? I thought.

I said, "If he came all the way here, he could've at least said hi."

◇◆◇

East of duel city Gideon, Cruella Mountain Belt

The Cruella Mountain Belt was one of the border zones between the Kingdom of Altar and the great desert country of Caldina, and it was one of the trade routes connecting Gideon and the city-states of the commercial union.

Dawn was about to break as several dragon carriages traced the mountainous paths of the belt. Each and every one of them belonged to Caldinian merchants. Since their country was a land of deserts, they had decided to make some distance by leaving early, when the sun wasn't high up and the heat was easier to bear.

A certain man was riding one of the dragon carriages. He looked much like any of the merchants he shared the vehicle with. The only difference was the crest on the back of his left hand — the sign of a Master.

Snacking on a smoked chicken sandwich, he gazed at the mountains and forests that would soon be bathed in the light of dawn.

"This sure is tasty," he muttered.

The smoked food he was eating had been given to him by the spectator sitting next to him during last night's Clash. Once the act of terror had ended, the middle-aged man, who'd been as high spirited as anyone else, had taken some of the smoked goods from the shop he owned and presented them to him.

The man in the carriage had put the smoked goods between some of his leftover bread and made his way to Caldina while relishing the curious mix of midnight snack and breakfast.

"A smoked chicken sandwich," he said to himself. "I should get our leader to make this sometime."

Remembering the leader of the clan he belonged to, the man realized something and reached into his inventory.

"Umm, the souvenirs are... all here," he said. "I have something for everyone except Moneygold. I don't intend to spend a single lir on him... but he should be satisfied with the video of last night's battle."

He nodded to himself while mumbling things not uncommon for travelers... and mixing it with things no common traveler would understand.

"Magic Activation Acceleration — instant; Magic Multi-Activation — 28... no, 143; Magic Conceal; Magic Range Extension — 8,000 metels... Bottomless Pit."

◆

In the Cruella Mountain Belt, a certain group was watching the Caldinian merchant carriages. All of them were crest-bearing Masters and members of the PK clan known as "Goblin Street."

"Those look like merchants from Caldina, boss," one of them said. "What do we do?"

No response. The one he talked to, the King of Burglary, Eldridge, closed his eyes in silent thought.

Most of the clan's members had left Caldina and come to do their business as indiscriminate bandits here in the kingdom. The group's crimes during the blockade incident had been limited to the Masters and tians of the kingdom, so although they were wanted by Altar, they had yet to get on Caldina's list. However, that would surely happen if they attacked these Caldinian merchant carriages and left survivors who could tell the tale.

On the other hand...

It might be time to leave the kingdom for good, he thought.

Before switching to this area, they'd worked near the capital, where every member besides Eldridge, who hadn't been online, had been completely annihilated by Lei-Lei the Prodigal of Feasts.

After coming here, things hadn't gotten any better, as they all — Eldridge included — had been killed by Xunyu the Yinglong. That incident had made some members lose faith in Eldridge, and the clan's numbers had dropped by half.

Given the members lost at the capital and the ones who'd left on their own, the clan's situation wasn't too good. Still, it all might just be a sign that it was time to drop this place and try finding prey somewhere different.

"We'll attack those carriages," he said.

"Really?" his clan member asked.

"Yeah." Eldridge nodded. "And once we're done with them, we're moving to Granvaloa... to the sea. Enough banditry. It's time to try the pirate life."

He turned towards his clan and formed an indominable smile.

"Let's go! Say goodbye to Caldina! We'll make some bank with these and ditch that sandbox for good!"

His words made the members still with him all fired up.

"Yeah!"

"Hell yeah!"

"When this attack is over, I'm becoming a pirate!"

Right after they said those things, a large hole appeared right under their feet.

"Ah?!" Eldridge gasped as he jumped away, avoiding the hole.

His clan members weren't as lucky. They all fell in, were buried alive, and left the world due to death penalty.

"What happened?!" he shouted.

No one could hear him in these empty mountains, but even so, he couldn't hold himself back from voicing his shock.

◆

"One of them avoided it," muttered the man in the carriage. "Let's make it a bit bigger, then... Earth Eater."

◆

Eldridge ran through the mountains.

Something strange was happening.

He was obviously under attack, but he couldn't see his enemies or any signs that they were attacking.

He was even more confused than he had been during his battle — if you could call it that — with Xunyu. Still, he was able to run away using his high stats and powerful intuition.

But he soon noticed something strange.

"It's... far?" he murmured.

The sky seemed distant, as though it had become higher.

The nearby mountains seemed taller, as well.

Eldridge found it strange, as he had yet to go down the belt.

Soon enough, he was surrounded by dirt walls from every direction.

No — that wasn't the case...

"Th-This mountain is sinking into the ground...!" he cried.

Indeed it was. The mountain was going down much like an elevator.

Puzzled and perplexed, Eldridge tried to think of what could be responsible for this.

"I-Is this Caldina's The Ear—?!"

Before he could finish his sentence, the sunken mountain he was on was crunched by the surrounding ground and sand, instantly giving him the death penalty.

◆

"...Oh, I leveled up," muttered the man in the carriage. "Was there someone strong among them?"

An earthy smell rode the wind and reached the carriages, but none of the merchants noticed. Oblivious to the sudden and silent disappearance of a nearby mountain, they simply continued chatting.

"Oh, I'm so glad this trade route is safe to use now," said one of them.

"Truly," another agreed. "I hear some Masters took care of the bandits in the area just the day before yesterday. What a helpful bunch."

They didn't know. While the Gouz-Maise Gang, the most infamous bandit group in the area, had been thoroughly destroyed, there were many more bandits lurking in the mountain belt.

They didn't know. A group of PK bandits had been aiming to attack them for their goods and wealth.

They didn't know. The group and all the other bandits in the surrounding mountains — a number of people surpassing the triple digits — had been buried alive, in the blink of an eye, by just a single person.

They didn't know. They were sharing a carriage with the one they called the "Magically Strongest."

Confirmed the elimination of all threats in the surrounding area, he thought. Setting a two kilometel auto-interception zone.

Fatoum. He was the bearer of that nickname and the owner of the Superior Job "The Earth." He ran his mind through those mechanical-sounding words and activated an automatic interception barrier.

Even so, no one in the carriage noticed.

The immense amount of MP he'd put into Magic Conceal made it impossible to detect. Even the experienced tian guards were thoroughly clueless.

I must admit, my visit to the kingdom lasted far longer than I expected, he thought.

Done with his job, he'd switched his thoughts from battle mode back to normal.

At first, it was just a trip to investigate the UBMs and Ruins in the country while also setting some slow-acting magic, but then the King of Toys suggested I arrange the blockade terror around the royal capital.

Fatoum ran his mind through the incident which involved a culprit still unknown to the people of the kingdom.

To top it off, I then received information about Dryfe's terror plot in Gideon and had to go there to stop it. Dear me, what a long trip this ended up being... I hope she's not too mad.

His visit to the kingdom had taken almost a month longer than expected. That fact made him picture his wife, who was waiting for him back in Caldina.

Well, I have the souvenirs, and I guess I can make it up to her by taking her out on a nice date.

The Magically Strongest, Caldina's most powerful force, was thinking things you'd expect of a busy salaryman.

I must admit, the Clash of the Superiors was truly an excellent battle, well worth watching. And thanks to Franklin, I even got to see Shu fight again. It's been far too long since last time. Which made Fatoum remember a certain detail.

"Oh, I completely forgot to greet him," he said. "But that might've been a good thing."

Regardless of the circumstances, he simply couldn't greet his old acquaintance. After all...

"Meeting him would just make me want to fight him. And, well..."

...it's far too early to destroy that city.

No city would stand after a battle between him and Shu.

With that thought on his mind, the Strongest that had sneaked into Altar returned back to Caldina, leaving the kingdom with a few of his tricks.

Epilogue B: The Sisters

Imperial capital outskirts, headquarters of the Triangle of Wisdom, High Pilot, Hugo Lesseps

The Dryfe Imperium's capital, Vandelheim, had two faces.

One was that of a city from 19th century Europe. These days, you could only see such townscapes in the simple, black and white photos from that era. Though it was at the technological forefront here in Infinite Dendrogram, it was nothing but retro to Earthlings living in 2045.

That was one of Vandelheim's two faces, while the other could be demonstrated by the sight before me.

"GHAAH!" one person panicked. "The new amphibious model has sunk into the pool! It ain't going up!"

"Oh, out of MP, eh?" said another. "It uses magic engines for both oxygen generation and the anti-pressure barrier, so that's kinda to be expected."

"Looks like we'll have to use conventional chemistry for the oxygen supply and fight the pressure with better design and materials," a third one joined in. "We can't just try to solve everything with magic. We're dealing with robots here."

"Be serious, people! Help me get Zerbahl Type M out of there!"

"Glubglubglub..." the one in the sunken robot mumbled unintelligibly.

"Oh, it's not exactly airtight, either."

"Looks like there's water inside. A problem with the gaskets or the frame, I assume?"

"YOU GUYS!"

"GLUBGLUB, I'M DYING!"

The one panicking at the side of the ten-meter-deep experiment pool was Zerbahl, an Engineer. The two observing the results as they gathered data and worked on something were Flosch and Roboroman, both Mechanics. I wasn't too sure about the one drowning in the water, but it was probably one of our Pilots, Kuromiki.

“Excuse me,” a girl spoke to two of our members. “The custom Marshal II requested by the military seems to be constructed, but how was it supposed to be painted, again?”

“Well, they said something about red, so I think that’s the color we should use on the whole thing,” said one of them. “Let’s give it a horn, too.”

“We don’t need no horn,” said the other. “Our communication devices don’t require any antennas. Also, we’re only painting the shoulders.”

“...Hey now, a base dark green Marshal II with red shoulders is way too basic.”

“Well, I could say the same about a purely red Marshal II with a goddamn novelty horn.”

“It doesn’t matter, you two, just—”

“IT DOES MATTER!” they both shouted simultaneously.

“Eek!”

The girl with the report in her hands was Luphia, a tian working in our general affairs section. The two people pushing their own policies — tastes, more like — in response to the presented demands were the Painters, MS Geomad and Assault Tripper.

“Oh, yeah. Apparently, our leader went out to do something, lost, and came back,” said one person in another group of three.

“Got sauce for that?” asked another.

“MMO Journal Planter.”

“Oh, yeah. I’ve been so busy with my designs and tests that I forgot to check it.”

“Same here, aheheheh,” the third person laughed in a strange manner.

“How many days behind are you?”

“Five.”

“I win. I’m at seven.”

“...Is that really a victory, though?”

The three were pulling consistent all-nighters both here and in reality, and yet — though they were doing it with mad-looking grins on their faces — they still had the capacity to construct Magingears. They were High Engineers: Boolantan, Draragun, and Black Company.

They all created what they liked, faced various problems doing so, asserted their ideas, and sometimes went overboard with their work.

“Well... this place is the same as always,” I said to myself.

After my death penalty had expired, I'd logged in and found my clan completely unchanged.

I was standing in the large, 200,000 square meter facility located in Vandelheim's outskirts. It was the headquarters of the Triangle of Wisdom and the center of the imperium's cutting-edge technology.

This scene here... this mix of eccentrics, weirdos, and normal people playing with robots was the other face of the imperial capital.

Such sights weren't uncommon in this city, but nothing could match the Triangle of Wisdom in terms of scale.

This was the clan he had created — a place where people could gather, combine their intellects and create what they wished, as they pleased.

"Mh..." I silently looked at the scene and pondered.

Just like the city, people also had multiple faces. If the plot in Gideon was the dark side of his dream, then this was surely the bright side.

"All right, then..." I murmured.

I turned away from the everyday scene and walked towards a certain place in the headquarters: the structure's central part.

It was the clan leader's... Mr. Franklin's... my sister's room.

◇◆

"I'm having you leave the clan," she said right as I entered, without as much as a greeting, enjoying the comfort of her chair.

"So you're firing me," I said, not surprised in the least.

I was already prepared for this. After all, when she'd activated Plan C — the one she'd hidden from me — I'd gone and betrayed her. If I hadn't deactivated La Porte de l'Enfer's Freezing, her plan would've gone a bit better.

"Veldorbell said that he's leaving the clan, too," she added. "Well, he was a guest, so this isn't unexpected."

Her tone as she fired me and talked about Veldorbell was exactly the same as always — the one she used while roleplaying the mad scientist known as "Mr. Franklin."

"He also left us with a nice parting gift of three soundtracks. A highly methodical guy, that one. It's a shame to lose him, but... well... I can't really argue with it."

“You can’t?” I asked.

“Yeah,” she nodded. “He only joined this clan to find ‘a true hero’ or whatever, but taking part in my plan made him miss out on quite a lot. I also think that he wasn’t too amused by what I did.”

She then closed her eyes, as though remembering something.

“I’m not the most popular person. He wasn’t the first to distance himself from me. Right before the war, AR-I-CA, the Ace, left me and went on to become one of Caldina’s Superiors. People are turning away from me left and right...”

She formed a wry grin and looked directly at me.

“Yu,” she said, changing her tone. She was talking to me as herself now. “Why did you come to help me? You were disgusted with me, weren’t you?”

“That’s not...”

“You felt betrayed, didn’t you?” she cut my words short, not letting me deny it.

“That’s...”

If I tried to answer that question with “That’s not true,” I would definitely be lying. She’d made a promise that she wouldn’t hurt tians, but had gone on to design a plot where that promise was broken.

“That’s why, before you leave, I want to know,” she continued. “Why did you did you come to help me on the Pandemonium?”

She wanted an answer. But...

“I... I don’t know that, either,” I muttered.

I looked inside me, but couldn’t find the answer, no matter what. After all, I’d acted before thinking it through, so no amount of thought could help me know that.

“I just don’t know...”

Before I’d realized it, tears were flowing down my face.

They were a belated reaction to the fact that I will now be separated from my sister in this world, too. The words “before you leave” reminded me of this.

I finally understood.

Even if she’d lied to me, betrayed me, and did things I thought were horrible... I still really loved my sister.

Since I couldn’t give my own answer and just continued crying, she went and formed her own conclusion. “You couldn’t think of what to do, so you acted without thinking and ended up doing what you did.”

She stood up from her chair and walked up to me.

“Next time, take the time to form a conclusion that you can hold with you to the bitter end,” she said as she took out a handkerchief and wiped my tears away.

“Ah,” I silently gasped as I realized that she was doing it with the exact same precision and care as she used to.

“Yu.” She looked into my eyes. “Travel and broaden your horizons. That’s what I did back on Earth.”

“Eh...?”

“Thankfully, the experiences in this world — especially those related to your disposition — don’t ever go to waste. There’s a lot for you to gain if you leave my side and travel around, so don’t bind yourself to me or the clan. Experience Infinite Dendrogram as you please. And if you wish to return once you’re done, I’ll always be ready to accept you.”

“Sis...”

“Oh, also.” She reached into her inventory and took something out. It was a Garage storing a Magingear. “This is both a parting gift... and a birthday present. You’re turning fifteen on Tuesday of next week, right?”

“You remember...?” I asked, making her form a wry grin.

“Don’t be silly. I could never forget your birthday.” Then that grin became a smile.

It was unlike any expressions she’d displayed during the incident in Gideon. If anything, it was like one of the gentle smiles she’d given me long ago... when we still lived together.

“Francesca...” I spoke her real name as the tears she’d just wiped began flowing again.

I finally understood.

That devilish man was right — I’d always avoided looking at her bad side. It surely existed, and it made lots of people suffer, but it wasn’t all that she was. Just like now, she could still be very gentle to me, and that was no delusion.

“Thank you, Francesca,” I said. “Let’s meet again someday.”

“Of course, Yu.” She nodded. “Until next time.”

With that, I left the Triangle of Wisdom.

Once I walked out of the room, Cyco appeared out of my left hand.

"That's a nice expression, Hugo," she said.

"Mhm..."

"Good thing you got to be honest with your sister, right?"

"Cyco..."

Apparently, this sharp-tongued partner of mine had been watching me and my sister's conversation.

"Thanks, Cyc—"

"Still, I know you're girls on the inside and all, but you both look like adult men. And a scene where two adult men talk like women and have a teary farewell is a bit... you know..."

...Cyco, those words completely ruin it, I thought sourly.

◆◆◆

Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin

Still in my own room, I looked at the monitors and watched Yu leave.

She was surrounded by a large number of my clan members. I'd just announced that she was going on a journey, so they were there to see her off.

Though sad about her leaving, they all encouraged her and wished her the best.

Yu had only been in the clan for about a month of real life time, but she was already quite popular among our members. She was gentle to a fault, and as far as I knew, she'd spent a lot of her time helping people out. She even remembered the names of a few hundred clan members, which might've been part of why she was liked.

And speaking of being liked... a group of girls was bawling. They were the clan's Yu fan club.

Which was fine and all, but... she was a girl on the inside. I was a woman, too, but strangely enough, people rarely noticed.

Were they anything like fans of the Takarazuka Revue?

It wasn't something I could relate to, to be honest.

"It's gonna get pretty lonely here," said one of the clan members surrounding her.

"Yeah... We're losing a skilled test pilot."

"I really wanted him to test the Supersonic Death Revolver Catapult."

Okay, what is that wonderfully-named device, and why don't I know about it?

"Oh no! We're losing a Master who's handsome both inside and out."

"They're much rarer than those who are only handsome on the outside."

"Only the beautiful die young..."

Yu's not dying, though.

"There goes the pilot with a Maiden..."

"They were so picturesque, too... especially for lewds..."

"Oh, speaking of which, I'll send you the new leader x Hugo thing when we're done."

All right, the fanfiction department is next in line to be eaten by my new monsters.

"The leader should've come and seen him off, too."

"Dude, do you even know who you're talking about? Guy's probably watching this through those cameras over there."

"Should we hack and kill the camera network?"

"...We're the ones who'll have to fix it, you know?"

I would very much prefer it if they didn't damage their own surveillance system. Still, they were completely right about me watching.

The goodbyes continued for a long while. During her month — three months in Dendro time — in the Triangle of Wisdom, Yu had become a true clan member.

"Hm..." I quietly pondered.

I was the one who'd invited her to the clan, or rather, Infinite Dendrogram as a whole. Honestly, I could've invited her much earlier, and it was somewhat strange that I hadn't.

After the imperium had gained superiority over the kingdom, after I'd killed the one who'd given me the death penalty, and after my Triangle of Wisdom had become more prosperous than ever, I'd suddenly had the idea to invite her over.

I didn't know whether I'd just had an urge to show her what I'd created, or whether I just hadn't had anything better to do, but that was when I'd become determined to meet her again, after several years of separation.

And soon enough, she and I had met in this world.

In all honesty, I truly hadn't expected her to be like me and use an avatar of the opposite gender. That had made our rendezvous far more troublesome than expected.

Anyway, though a few years had passed since we'd seen each other, she was still a very good girl. Though she was roleplaying a pompous, theatrical knight/prince-like character, she was still as gentle as ever.

Her Embryo being a Maiden made it clear that she was also considerate of the tians calling this world their home, which was very much like her.

Yu was gentle, indeed.

However, it seemed like she'd misunderstood something.

"Well, it's more like that I made her misunderstand," I said.

She probably believed that I'd made her leave the clan and go on a journey purely for her sake. That was part of the reason, yes, but I'd also done it for myself.

Why? It was very simple.

"With her at my side... I'd be unable to do anything truly gruesome."

Plans C and D had failed. That meant that the next time I designed a plot or worked to extinguish those who'd defeated me, I'd have to do something far more fiendish.

If Yu was at my side, she'd put a mental brake on me.

In hindsight, I could've been far more relentless with my plot in Gideon. Though her presence had given me peace of mind, she'd been in the way of my march to victory.

And now, she was going away.

My dear sister — the person I wanted to appear gentle to, and the embodiment of my conscience — was no longer at my side.

I was now free to act without restraint.

I wouldn't have to cherry-pick my methods, and I'd be able to fight the ones who'd defeated me with all I had.

"Keep your head clean for me... Ray Starling," I said, as pure vitriol bubbled up my throat.

Epilogue C: Ray the Unbreakable

Duel city Gideon, first district, Paladin, Liliana Grandria

Bells were tolling.

Three mornings had dawned upon Gideon since that nightmarish night. Clear, yet sorrowful bells were echoing throughout the city, as all the churches in Gideon were sounding out a requiem.

It was a sound for the second day of the three day-long combined funeral happening here in the knight offices in the first district, mourning the knights and guards that had laid down their lives during the incident.

Our Royal Guard had lost 18, Gideon's knights had lost 15, and the guards had lost 28, making for a total of 61.

"...Sixty-one," I silently voiced the number.

The only saving grace was that the lives lost here had been relatively few compared to the crushing defeat and loss of life we'd suffered during the war. And most of all, by some miracle, the incident hadn't killed a single civilian. Though, sad as it was, I couldn't say that it was the result of the sacrifice of the deceased.

Not saying a word, I looked at the mourners.

A young boy standing before a coffin was calling out for his father.

A woman was on her knees, sobbing uncontrollably.

An old man looked at the flower altar, completely still, as though in shock.

Clearly, they were family of the knights and guards who'd never made it back.

I could tell because they were exactly the same as Milia and I had been when we'd attended the combined funeral for those lost in the war... including our father.

"...Hhaah," I breathed a sad sigh. As ones with a duty to protect the kingdom, knights and soldiers were all ready for death.

However, I doubted that any of them thought they'd die on that night.

Death could come suddenly and without warning.

Gideon’s knights and guards had been killed by either the monsters that had attacked the streets, or by the lawless Masters the other Masters referred to as “player killers,” while my subordinates had died in the battle against Franklin. Some had been crushed by that tentacle monster, while others had been consumed by the overwhelmingly powerful dragon clad in the red aura.

All of us had been powerless against them.

But Ray and his brother — the King of Destruction, Shu Starling — and many other Masters had avenged those that were lost. They’d saved my subordinates and the kingdom’s second princess, too, while also sending the tian-killing “player killers” to the gaol.

Thanks to their efforts, many of the deceased had been recompensed, and those that had died that night hadn’t died in vain.

I was silent.

Both the one who’d started the incident and the ones who’d ended it were Masters.

They had only been able to stop Franklin because they were like him.

“Even so, Masters... those chosen by Embryos... aren’t special,” I whispered.

They were as human as the rest of us.

They simply had a means of escaping death and were blessed with immense powers.

Though they were quick to gain power, their powers weren’t their identities.

That was why we had Masters who crushed others, such as the Hell General or Franklin, as well as those who stopped them, such as Ray and the King of Destruction. That was how it was among us tians, as well.

There was a vast difference in power between tians and Masters, but they were just as human as us.

That power difference was exactly why only Masters were capable of stopping a rampaging Master. That was what had happened that night... and what hadn’t happened in the war half a year ago.

“Protecting the kingdom requires their aid... Lady Altimia,” I muttered and pictured the person I served, the first princess and the acting ruler of the country, Altimia A. Altar.

Sadly, it was doubtful that Her Highness Altimia intended to borrow the powers of the Masters.

She didn’t consider them to be as human as us.

“Still...”

I watched the flower altar and noticed that the left hands of those placing flowers there were varied.

Those with and without crests alike were mourning the deceased and adding bouquets to the altar.

One was gently patting a crying child’s head, while another comforted a different child with a light embrace.

Another one supported a woman who was about to fall due to the staggering despair.

Another took the hand of an old man who stood still in shock, and helped him place his flowers on the altar.

“They really are just like us... Lady Altimia,” I whispered.

Speaking of Masters, I wonder what he’s doing, I thought.

Yesterday, he’d come here to present his flowers the moment the combined funeral was opened.

He’d just lost his left arm, so I could only hope that he wasn’t doing anything reckless. With what he’d done during the trouble with Milia, the Gouz-Maise Gang, and Franklin’s Game, it was clear that he wouldn’t hesitate to do absurd things for the sake of others.

“But that quality might just be a part of his kindly nature,” I said to myself and pondered about similar nothings when suddenly, Lord Lindos ran up to me with a panicked expression.

“Lady Grandria! We have trouble!” he exclaimed.

“Oh? What’s the matter?”

“Her Highness Elizabeth, she...”

“She has no official business today, yes? Today is a free day for her.”

She’d spent all of yesterday attending the combined funeral, and had spent all her days prior to the Clash dedicated to the relevant preparations. Because of that and due to her kidnapping by Franklin, she’d been given a day off today so that she could have a proper rest.

“Did Her Highness say anything?” I asked. “If she wishes to leave, simply have a number of Royal Guard accompany her, and—”

“She left a note and escaped the Count’s residence! Again!”

“...Augh.” I voiced a strange sound as I turned dizzy.

◇◇◇

Duel city Gideon, sixth district's arena, Paladin, Ray Starling

When using Nemesis in her greatsword or halberd forms, I never felt a hint of her weight. Both of those forms could be classified as ultra-heavy weaponry, but I could swing them with ease thanks to that trait.

I was always thankful for it, but never was my gratitude as great as it was now that I'd lost my left arm.

I tried swinging the greatsword, then had her switch to the halberd and did the same.

Though I couldn't spin the flag halberd due to risk of dropping her, I could still thrust, slash, and cleave without much trouble.

"Looks like I can get by without my left arm," I said.

"Indeed," Nemesis agreed. "The lack of an arm is nothing to us."

Well, I wouldn't go that far. Losing an arm was a pretty big deal. However, she was right that it wasn't much of a problem when fighting with her as my weapon.

A very clear problem, however, was Gardranda.

Without my left arm, I couldn't equip the left bracer, meaning that I couldn't use Purgatorial Flames, which was one of my main skills. When punching Franklin, I seemed to have discovered a new way to use it, too, but now it looked like that would have to wait.

I'd thought that losing my left arm would render me incapable of storing Nemesis, but there was no problem at that front. The crest had simply moved to the upper left arm — the part that was still there.

Clearly, losing an arm wasn't enough to lose the sign that I was a Master.

"Still, holding you with one arm will make it pretty hard to fight while riding Silver," I said.

I mean, I can't really hold Silver's reins with my teeth.

"Mhm," Nemesis agreed. "But I believe it's a good thing here."

"Because... why?"

"We're about to battle her again, and I want us to face her like last time — with just the two of us."

"Oh my, aren't you enthusiastic," the "her" she was referring to, Marie, said jokingly.

Just like during our encounter in Noz Forest, she was shrouded in the same black mist and held her gun-like Embryo, Arc-en-Ciel, in her right hand. She and I were in this arena to have the rematch duel we'd promised to have when fighting Franklin's monster army.

We were facing one another in a block shielded by an impermeable barrier.

Besides us, the barrier contained a few spectators — Rook, Babi, Shu, Figaro, and one more person.

On an unrelated note, Rook had already known that Marie was the Superior Killer. Hell, Shu had known it, as well.

In hindsight, Shu... the King of Destruction... had tried to kill the Superior Killer even if it took burning down the entire Noz Forest, so him knowing her identity wasn't all that surprising.

Speaking of that incident, apparently he'd done it to avenge me.

I had lots of things to say about that, including but not limited to, "Dude, what the hell," "No one asked for this," and "You scorched a goddamn forest," but I chose to tell him off later.

After all, we were accompanied by someone far more troublesome than Shu.

"Marie, do your very best!"

For reasons unknown, the princess that we'd all worked so hard to save was among the spectators.

"...Might I finally know why you're here, princess?" I asked.

"Hm? Very well," she said.

Apparently, she had awoken right before my battle at the top of Pandemonium. Because of this, she clearly recalled how I'd faced Franklin and how Marie had rescued her.

Wanting to thank us, she'd snuck out of the count's residence again and walked around searching for us.

During her search, she'd found Shu and Figaro, both of whom were in suits that really stood out from the crowd. Thinking that she could find me by following my brother, she'd done exactly that and eventually came here.

Apparently, she had the whole day off, but that wasn't the problem here...

"Liliana!" I shouted, unable to hold it in. "You really need to do something about your security!"

"That's more or less how I feel. 'What? Again?' and all that," said Marie. "Still, rather than poor security, I'm starting to think that it's Ellie who's just really good at sneaking out. It's the second time she'd done this, after all."

"The princess might have a talent for it," added Rook. "She might make a good thief."

A princess who's a thief...? What?

"Anyway," said Marie. "Ellie's watching, so victory's as good as mine! Don't expect any consideration or mercy!"

"Well, I wouldn't have it any other way, but..."

This is nothing like the revenge match I'd imagined, I thought.

After Marie had given me my first death penalty, I'd pictured a desperate rematch between two enemies. But now, right as we were about to fight, we were surrounded by a peaceful air of friendship.

"...And that's fine, really," I said.

"Indeed," Nemesis agreed.

Though Marie had once killed us, she was now nothing but a friend, and that was in no way a bad thing.

"Still, I want my rematch," I continued.

"Heh heh," Marie chuckled. "Such vigor and drive... But do you really think you can win?"

Well, that's the question...

"Let's see... you're way above me in both level and stats," I said.

Her total level was over the cap for low and high-rank jobs, while her AGI was at least several dozens of times greater than mine.

"My technique is just incomparable to yours."

She'd been fighting in Infinite Dendrogram for far longer than me. Her experience was on a whole different plane.

"And I'm here without my left arm — quite a handicap. It's pretty clear that I have nearly no chance of winning."

This battle would've been hard even if I was in top shape, so this definitely didn't help my chances.

"Still... I won't say that I can't win."

No matter how severe the situation, I would never quit without even trying.

"If there's a possibility I want, I'll never give up reaching for it."

That was what my brother had taught me.

"That's what seizing the possibility is all about."

My words made Shu laugh out loud and give me a thumbs-up.

"And that's why I'm in it to win it," I concluded my speech.

"And also why you're Ray the 'Unbreakable.'"

"Unbre... Huh?" What?

"Oh? You're unaware?" she said. "That's your nickname."

"I have a nickname?"

"Indeed you do. 'The King of Destruction's little brother, the one who didn't break before a Superior.'"

"Well, that sure is something..."

What an awkward nickname to have, I thought.

"There's also 'Dark Paladin,' 'Prince on the Silver Steed,' and 'The Light and Dark-Wielding Hero Clad in Violet and Crimson.' Any preferences?"

"Unbreakable, please."

It's not even a damn choice with those other options.

"I'm quite fond 'Prince,' though," Nemesis commented.

"...No, thank you."

Anyway, "Unbreakable," eh...? I actually kinda like it.

"Okay then," said Marie. "Here I go, Unbreakable!"

"Yeah! Bring it on, Superior Killer!"

We prepared for battle.

Marie instantly pulled Arc-en-Ciel's trigger, making it fire bullets as numerous as they were during the first time she'd killed me. It was a repeat of that day.

Time for a quest, then, I thought.

My target was the strongest PK, the Superior Killer.

My destination was beyond the familiar veil of bullets.

And my goal... was victory.

"Let the quest..."

"...begin!" Nemesis finished for me.

I kicked the ground beneath me and dashed forward.

To be continued in the next episode...

Midword

Cat: “Greetings, dear readers, I’m the Cat you all know well by now, Cheshiiire.”

Xun: “I’m Xun, for XunYu.”

Bear: “And I’m the one and only Bear... the King of Destruction, Shu Starling!”

Cat: “We knew, and so did the sharper readers. Maybe even since volume 1.”

Bear: “You’re cold! I’ve been prebearing for this for five volumes!”

Cat: “That aside, this concludes the Franklin arc and ends the first part of Infinite Dendrogram as a whole.”

Bear: “What a good finale.”

Cat: “Hey! The part is done, but the product is still going on! Don’t jinx it!”

Xun: “But the lAst scene was somEwhat like the last chApter of a manga. Honestly, it woUld work pretty well if it just endED here.”

Cat: “Stop! Nothing’s ending! We’re still going on!”

Bear: “Anyway, jokes aside, the beary presence of a midword means that there’s something more, right?”

Cat: “Yes. There will now be two everyday life stories set after the Franklin arc.”

Bear/Xun: “...”

Cat: “You two look like you want to say something.”

Bear: “Who puts everyday life stories after final scenes like the one we just had?”

Xun: “...Wouldn’t tHE volume leave a bettEr impression if it ended hEre?”

Cat: “Silence. Anyway, the latter of the two stories is completely new.”

Bear: “...Did the author need to fill some pages?”

Cat: “He tried to write something new into the main story, but he couldn’t think of anything besides expanding on The Earth and the DOA worm.”

Xun: “Hey, don’t cAll it DOA. I had to be realLY careful with the bomb whEN killing that thiNg.”

Bear: “He could’ve expanded on me and my ursine greatness.”

Cat: “You’re saying you want more scenes?! I want some, too, you know?! I didn’t show up in volumes 4, 5, and won’t show up in the story that comes next, either! When’s my turn?!”

Xun: This has been bOthering me for a while... Why is Cheshire so nAive when it comes to appEArance in the story?

Bear: “Anyway, enough of the sad cat without any scenes. Please enjoy the stories that come next. Thank you beary much.”

Cat: “Give me a turn!”

Extra: A Change of Clothing

Paladin, Ray Starling

Ten days had passed in Dendro since the incident started by a certain bastard in a lab coat.

Rook, Marie, and I were still staying here in Gideon, busy either sparring or fulfilling guild quests.

The need for repairs in the city had created a demand for building materials, and Shu's obliterating Jeand Grasslands had turned it into a habitat for strong monsters which needed to be culled. Such quests were so MMO-like that they reminded me that Dendro was, indeed, a VRMMO.

As for the sparring... though I rarely came out as the victor, I'd learned quite a lot.

My opponents had included Marie, Shu, Xunyu, Figaro, and even the other local duel rankers. Though they'd allowed me to use consumable warding accessories, my victories had still been few and far between, which was a clear testament to just how strong they were.

Thankfully, all our duels had taken place within the arena barriers, so all the items used and accessories lost had come back to us once the battle was done. With the Lifesaving Brooch and the other stuff I'd used having a combined cost of about 10,000,000 lir, I'd never appreciated the restorative functions of the arenas as much as I did now.

10,000,000 lir — in other words, ten times more than we'd received for killing Gardranda. It was a great fortune no matter how you looked at it, and it was in no way an amount I could have used when I'd started out. But the current state of my finances allowed me this luxury. After all, I'd recently had two great bursts of income.

First, there was the money I'd won by betting the reward for the Gouz-Maise Gang on Figaro. The 60,000,000 I'd put in had been multiplied by 1.2, giving me 72,000,000. Cleaning up after the mess made by a certain bastard in a lab coat had made the reward come a few days late, but it had come nonetheless.

Then there was the reward from Count Gideon.

He'd presented great amounts of money to all the Masters that'd fought in Franklin's game. The newbies who'd escaped the central arena and those who'd already been outside had received especially large portions.

Sadly, Marie hadn't been among the recipients, since only our inner circle knew that she was the Superior Killer, but she'd made her share of the Count's money by doing other work for him.

Naturally, Shu was rewarded with the greatest sum of us all.

"With this and the drops from the Suicide Series, I made back enough fur a tenth of the ammo I used," he told me.

I wasn't sure if I wanted to know the total cost.

That aside, the subject of our rewards wouldn't be complete without the story of how Rook used his, and my involvement in it.

It had happened two days ago...

◇

As I sat around, thinking of what to do with the copious amount of money I'd received from Count Gideon and through betting, Rook walked up to me.

"Ray, can I ask for your help with something?" Rook asked.

"Hm?" I said. "Well, this is unusual. It's rare for you to ask for something."

"Perhaps," he admitted. "But this is something I just can't do by myself. It's related to my job change..."

For a while now, Rook had wanted to switch to being a Lost Heart — the pimp grouping's high-rank job. It had three conditions: having reached level 50 as a Pimp, the sum total stats of all underlings being above a certain point, and at least 1,000,000 lir earned through Pimp work.

Rook had already cleared the first two, but the third one was proving to be an issue. He probably could've gotten the money when he'd done the modeling quest, but he'd chosen Marilyn and her carriage instead of a monetary reward, so it didn't count for the condition.

Because of his inability to move on to Lost Heart, after he'd maxed out Pimp during Franklin's Game, he'd switched to Tamer and leveled up his Monster Strengthening skill.

And I guess he's now found a way to solve the problem, I thought.

"You have an idea for how to switch to Lost Heart?" I asked.

"Yes." He nodded as he reached into his inventory and took out a coin pouch. "Could you give me a job and use this money as my reward?"

"...Ohh, I get it," I said.

Earning 1,000,000 lir through honest Pimp work would likely take lots of time and effort. But if you prepared the necessary money and had a third party give you the job, you'd clear the condition as if it were no big deal.

I'm guessing this option became available thanks to Gideon's reward, I thought.

"This bag has 1,000,000 lir for my reward and 1,000,000 lir for the Pimp guild's charges — a total of 2,000,000 lir. Use it to give me a job," Rook said.

"Yeah, sur— Wait, the Pimp guild takes half the money?!"

Holy shit, what a kickback!

"I can't really fault them," said Rook. "The Pimp guild must pay lots of taxes to continue being an official guild. There are some Pimps who don't like that and do pimping on their own... but that's a crime here in the kingdom."

...So the Pimp job is a gray zone in and of itself, I thought.

Apparently, the merchant grouping's Slave Dealers were handled in a similar manner — work through a highly-taxed guild was legal, while freelance slave dealing wasn't. The kingdom was somewhat... no, very strict about this.

Anyway, I took the money, went to the Pimp guild, and gave Rook a job.

It didn't matter what I requested, but I'd remembered seeing an elephant stand on a ball while watching the morning news, so I'd nonchalantly written down that I wanted to see Marilyn do the same.

It went without saying that I'd come to deeply regret not giving them an easier task.

They had taken quite some time just finding a ball large enough for a triceratops-sized creature to stand on, and then they had to spend an entire day and night training her to be able to do it. Naturally, I was really sorry about all this.

Still, her success had made her fulfill the request, and Rook had cleared the condition, letting him become a Lost Heart.

Also, a short while after my request, a rumor had spread throughout the city that “some rich weirdo paid 1,000,000 lir to a guy just to see a monster step on a ball,” creating a sort-of “ball-stepping boom” among Gideon’s Pimps and Tamers.

◇

Now, back to my circumstances.

The money I’d won in the bet and the Count’s reward had given me some leeway in spending, allowing me to buy lots of various equipment. I’d started by giving Shu the accessories I’d broken during my first quest, and then bought myself a Lifesaving Brooch and other items, among which was a simple prosthetic arm.

It could be best described as a hook that a generic pirate would wear. It didn’t connect to my nerves or anything, and it was much like a long glove that I wore on what remained of my lost arm. I could use MP to make the hook tighten, but I couldn’t fine-tune it, and the lack of fingers made it impossible to use as a normal hand.

Some would question the tightening function’s usefulness, but the answer to that was simple: holding a horse’s reins. According to Alejandro, the man who’d sold it to me, these prosthetic arms had been developed for knights and nobles who’d lost their arms, but who still wanted to ride their horses. As the proud owner of Silver, I greatly appreciated that function’s existence.

There was the problem in that it limited my left side to only being able to hold the reins, making it a blind spot in horseback battles. And its shape didn’t allow me to equip the left Miasmaflame Bracer, either. But there was no use in minding that right now.

Apparently, Legendaria and Huang He had high-quality magic prosthetics, while Dryfe was highly advanced in the mechanical side of the spectrum. However, all such prosthetics were custom-made specifically for the customers, so you couldn’t find them anywhere on the market, which went doubly so here in the kingdom. I couldn’t waste time trying to get what wasn’t available here, so this prosthetic arm was more than enough, especially since I’d likely find a way to heal my arm sooner or later.

Still, I couldn’t help but note that those surrounding me — mainly

Nemesis — looked at me as if they had something to say.

Well, the hook's pretty pirate-like. It probably stands out, I thought.

Anyway, with the leeway in my finances, I could allow myself to roll the gacha in Alejandro's shop. Specifically, one 100,000 lir roll per day. Honestly, I had the money for it and was up for more rolls, but Nemesis just wouldn't have it.

"That's all I will allow. Roll any more, and I'll eat food that costs as much money as you spend," she'd said, making me back down immediately. With how spacious her stomach was now, that threat sounded all too real.

That aside, the gacha had yet to give me any capsules above C rank. Unsurprisingly, Bs and above were considerably rarer than the ones below, meaning that Rook and I had been very lucky to land an X and an S on the same day. Still, I felt that it was high time the gacha blessed me with a B or an A.

With that thought in mind, I came to Alejandro's place, did my shopping, and stood before the gacha to make my daily roll.

"...Let me ask you something, Ray," said Nemesis. "The fortune in your hands allows you to buy most of the things you require, no? What compels you to roll the gacha?"

"It's the unknown," I replied.

"...I'd prefer it if you didn't try to make it sound so cool."

Was it wrong to find something attractive simply because you didn't know what it will give you?

Anyway, it was my turn, so I threw in today's 100,000 lir and made my roll, which gave me...

"...An 'A'?"

The capsule was marked with a letter denoting the second highest level of rarity — not quite a jackpot, but close enough. However, my excitement was drowned out by my confusion at the capsule.

The S one that Rook had received had looked like a rainbow-colored mineral, while, aside from the obvious rarity, the X capsule I'd gotten Silver from had looked perfectly normal. But I definitely couldn't say the same for the capsule now in my hands.

It was black in color, the "A" on it was blood-red, and, for reasons unknown, the letter was written in a "melted" font. Not only that, but the capsule's surface was covered in lines much like blood vessels. To top it all off, it had letters on it saying, "WARNING: Please don't open when children are nearby."

...What the hell? was just about all I could think about it.

"What you hold in hand is a wealth coffer of hex and malediction," said a voice coming from my side.

I looked away from the capsule and towards the source, where I saw a girl wearing gothic-looking dress armor.

"Oh, Juliet," I said. She was an acquaintance of mine.

Juliet the Black Raven was one of Figaro's fellow duelists, and the fourth in the kingdom's duel rankings. She was one of the two Masters who had fought in the semi event before the Clash of the Superiors. I had come to know her through Figaro and sparred with her several times now.

Despite appearances, she was very easy to get along with, and since she was younger than me IRL, I could talk to her with no reservations to speak of.

"Heh heh heh," she chuckled in a curious manner. "We haven't been in one another's presence since our last immortal battle two nights ago, Light and Dark-Wielding Hero Clad in Violet and Crimson."

Sure, she talks a bit strangely and uses one of my weird nicknames, but she's an okay person, anyway.

"Oh, yeah, I haven't seen you since our sparring match two days ago," I said. "So, do you know something about this capsule?"

"Verily. The coffer seals a maledicted artifact soaked in blood and tainted by grudge. The mark of rarity speaks volumes about the treasure's power, but alas, that power might prove to be a double-edged blade that gnaws at the wielder's heart."

Mhm...

Basically, she was saying that "There's a cursed item inside. The A means that it's something good, but it also means that the curse is powerful, as well."

"Mh..." Nemesis looked at me in silence.

"When balance thrives, the one to suffer the malediction will be the wielder alone," Juliet added. "But when the stars of ill omen shine bright in the heavens, the calamity will fall upon those environing them, as well. Never banish this memory to oblivion, lest you bring about a new tragedy."

I see.

She was saying that “Normally, the curse only affects the one equipping the item, but it might sometimes extend to the people around you, so be careful.”

“Mhh...” Nemesis continued quietly looking at me.

“All right,” I said. “Then I guess I’ll go open this somewhere with no people around. Thanks for the warning.”

“Heh heh heh,” Juliet chuckled. “My advice needs no gratitude. But if you so desire, O Light and Dark-Wielding Hero Clad in Violet and Crimson, we may partake in yet another immortal battle.”

“Sure, let’s spar again sometime.”

With that, Juliet and I parted ways.

All right, so I’ll go open this where there aren’t people around, and...

“...Might I ask you something?” Nemesis said with an indefinable expression on her face, finally breaking her silence.

“What is it?” I asked.

“How can you talk to her so smoothly?”

“What? Juliet? Sure, her gear is a bit scary, but she’s a good, approachable girl.”

“That’s not what I... Oh, never mind. If you don’t get it, I won’t push it.”

...What’s with her? I wondered.

Anyway, we moved to the usual place: Nex Plains. Ever since I’d gotten Gardranda, this seemed to have become my go-to testing area for new items.

Upon confirming that there were no people within 100 meters of me, I opened the cursed capsule.

Inside, I found upper body armor called “CBR Armor,” where “CBR” stood for “Cursed Bloody Regeneration.”

It was a piece of light armor that was blood-red in color and generally looked very sinister.

It gave +200 to defense, making it even tougher than Gardranda — the hardest piece of equipment in my arsenal.

Additionally, it came with a level 3 skill called “Bloody Regeneration,” which restored three HP per second. That didn’t seem like much, but it was completely passive and didn’t use a bit of my MP or SP.

Though not as unbalanced and broken as a special reward, CBR Armor was definitely a decent piece of equipment. However, it was called "Cursed" for a reason.

The item said:

CBR Armor

Armor mass-produced by a wicked alchemist.

Provides the user with regenerative abilities born of the grudge seeped into the steel through the blood of the victims.

This unstable source of power afflicts the wearer with various curses.

Curses: Bleeding, Doom, Weakness.

I was all too familiar with the effects of the debuffs named.

"Well, this thing sure doesn't have a pleasant background," I said. "And wearing it makes you bleed out, renders you immobile, and cuts your stats by half... Basically, this is just a damn blood bag generator."

I can't use this at all, I thought. The decent positives don't make up for the insane negatives. What the hell was the guy thinking when mass-producing these?

Not only that, but it had a total level requirement of only 50, most likely to make it equipable so that it could curse as many people as possible, and if that wasn't kindness nobody wanted, I didn't know what was.

What do I even do with this...? Can I sell it...? I don't think I'm getting my 100,000 lir back, though.

"A Dark Knight could probably wear it without a problem," I said.

Jobs from the dark knight grouping, like Juliet's Fallen Knight, had a skill that weakened the negative effects of cursed items.

Because of that, this armor would've been good for a Dark Knight, but I happen to be a Paladin.

"Eh?" Nemesis released a confused-sounding voice.

"Eh?" I responded the same way, confused by her confusion.

"...Oh, right," she said. "You are a Paladin."

"You shouldn't forget your partner's job," I said.

"Well, your battle style and clothing are a far cry from 'Paladin-like...' And to think you used to shine so bright." She put her hand over her mouth, so I couldn't make out much of what she was muttering.

But man, whoever thought that an armor that gives you Bleeding and Weakness was a good idea... Hm?

"Isn't that one fewer curse than before?" I asked.

I still had the armor's description window open, and it felt like the text there had changed a bit.

The three debuffs became two, didn't th—? Oh, it dropped again.

Now it was just Bleeding, but soon enough, that one disappeared, as well. Not only that, but the skill level on Bloody Regeneration had dropped from 3 to 1.

It now said:

BR Armor

Armor mass-produced by a wicked alchemist.

Provides the user with regenerative abilities born of the grudge seeped into the steel through the blood of the victims.

It used to afflict the wearer with various curses, but they vanished when the grudge was dispersed. This weakened the armor's regenerative abilities.

Even its name and background were different.

"...Why?" I asked.

"How curious," said Nemesis.

Why had the grudge just gone and "dispersed"? Had it gotten sucked out or something?

"Ah," Nemesis and I simultaneously exclaimed and looked at my feet... towards my Grudge-soaked Greaves — an item that could absorb and store the surrounding grudge.

Unlike Gardranda, who I'd talked to while out cold, it didn't appear to have any remnants of consciousness, but I couldn't help but feel that it felt satisfied and well-fed.

Apparently, it had absorbed the grudge from the CBR Armor.

"...I had no idea you could be used like this," I said.

The curses had been caused by the grudge, and with it gone, they'd vanished, as well. As a result, the unusable CBR Armor had become the usable — if slightly weakened — BR Armor. It was definitely better than the armor I was wearing just to fill the slot, so I didn't hesitate to put it on.

"Hey, it looks spiky, but it's actually pretty easy to move in," I said.

I quickly took a liking to it. With the good defense value and Bloody Regeneration, I had no reason not to use it.

"Mh..." Nemesis looked directly at me, clearly wanting to say something.

"What?"

“...Nothing. You’ve made your choice, and I won’t say anything against it.”

“Hm?”

Nemesis wasn’t as articulate as usual today.

“Is something troubling you?” I asked.

“I’d be lying if I said ‘no,’ but it’s not something I can tell you,” she replied.

I could only assume that it was some girl thing, so I had no business pushing her any further.

“Fine by me,” I said. “Let’s get something to eat.”

“...Very well.”

And so, elated thanks to my new gear, Nemesis and I returned back to Gideon.

◆◆◆

Dryfe Imperium, Triangle of Wisdom headquarters

That day, a certain man in a lab coat — namely, the Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin — was checking the footage filmed by the spy monsters he’d sent to Gideon’s surroundings.

He’d been gathering information this way for a while now, but things had changed recently.

Following Franklin’s Game, Gideon had become filled with skilled counterespionage personnel, making it impossible for Franklin’s spy monsters to enter the city. Because of this, nowadays, he was only sending monsters to the city’s surroundings.

Of course, Franklin had no intention of executing any more plots in Gideon, but the city was the main haunt of the one he considered to be his archenemy, and he wanted to observe him to the best of his ability. This loathsome person happened to appear on one of his monster’s footages as Franklin was casually eyeing them.

In the Nex Plains, he opened a capsule he’d gotten from a gacha machine, received a cursed piece of armor, spent some time thinking about something, then equipped it and returned to Gideon.

Upon seeing that, Franklin began to ponder.

“That appearance...”

A demonic bracer on his right hand.

A gnarled hook instead of his left.

A pair of boots fashioned from the dead.

Clad in armor rife with curses.

“...He honestly looks more like a Hell General than our actual Hell General.”

Ray’s fashion sense was staggeringly heinous, but the boy was completely oblivious to it.

Franklin was aware that someone who constantly wore a lab coat wasn’t all that much better, but even he felt like there was a thing or two to say about Ray’s appearance.

“Did no one tell him about this?” Franklin mumbled as he looked at the archenemy in his monitor with a hint of pity in his eyes.

Franklin’s question was nothing but reasonable, and the answer to it was, “No. No one told him.”

Ray was surrounded by people such as Shu, who was always in an animal costume; Rook, a guy in a Slime coat; Marie, who wore a suit despite being in a fantasy world; Figaro, who only cared about stats and wore a mishmash of gear because of it; Xunyu, who had prosthetic arms and legs far too long for anyone; and Juliet, who wore a highly-adolescent set of gothic dress armor.

Other Masters weren’t all that different, so tians tended to simply ignore it, thinking something like, “Well, he’s a Master, so...”

There was no one who could tell Ray about the state of his fashion, as anyone wanting to do so would be rendered incapable of doing so when they simply looked at themselves.

And so, spurred by their silence, Ray’s fashion took a turn toward the dark side.

Extra: Reiji’s Everyday Life / Ray and Nemesis’s Everyday Life

March 29th, 2045, Reiji Mukudori

About two weeks had passed since I’d started playing Infinite Dendrogram.

I’d spent a lot of this time in the game, and thanks to its tripled time feature, those two weeks had felt way longer than usual. Then again, all the stuff I’d experienced so far would make even a whole six weeks seem short.

I’d rescued Milianne during Liliana’s quest, encountered Marie in Noz Forest, met Figaro in Tomb Labyrinth, fought against Gardranda, met Hugo, rescued the children with him, struggled against Gouz-Maise, and defeated Franklin, ending his plot to break the kingdom’s spirit.

All those events had happened during a span of just four real-life days, and I couldn’t help but wonder how I’d ended up with such an event-heavy start in that world.

The days that came after were relatively peaceful. I did quests with my party, sparred against Figaro and his fellow duel rankers, tested Shu’s cooking, and raided the Tomb Labyrinth with the three girls we’d met during Franklin’s Game — all of which made for a pretty standard MMO experience.

According to Nemesis, “This is merely the calm before the storm. I’m certain that you will soon be involved in even greater trouble,” and I could only hope that she was wrong.

Still, I couldn’t deny that I had a tendency to get caught up in all sorts of incidents.

There was the car accident Shu had saved me from. Then there was the trip abroad that my sister had dragged me into, during which I’d gone through things that’d made me question whether it was actually real or I’d just dreamed it all.

Oh... just remembering that made my body tremble, so yeah, it had been very real.

That aside, there was something I had to do regardless of whether my new adventures in Dendro would be normal or not.

I had to go through college enrollment preparations.

Starting next month, I would be a college student. I'd spent half of the month remaining before college diving into Dendro so much that I'd rarely had time to go outside. In fact, I'd been online longer than I'd been off, and it wouldn't have been surprising for me to forget the important things in my life.

Still, I wasn't negligent enough to miss the days during which I had the necessary college-related procedures, and I'd already gone for the briefing, the cooperative, the textbook selling, the physical examination, and so on.

Today was the final such day — the one in which I'd settle everything related to the humanities course I was going to take.

Being fresh out of high school, I couldn't help but wonder whether this process really had to be so complex and split into so many parts, but this might've been normal here in college.

Well, it wasn't like my apartment was all that far from the place. I could get there in less than half an hour on bike, so I had no trouble being on time and going through whatever I had to do.

I'll be back by evening and log in to Dendro then, I thought as I walked towards the apartment building's elevator.

On my way, I passed a fellow resident.

"Hello," I greeted her.

"Ah, hello," she reciprocated with her slightly awkward Japanese. She was a foreigner living on the same floor as me.

This apartment building was luxurious and secure, even by the city's standards, so it had no shortage of female tenants.

However, the high rent was a huge barrier preventing the common college student from living here, meaning that most of the collegians in this place were the children of particularly wealthy people. I was an exception to that, since I lived here thanks to Shu.

"Wait, that woman..." I muttered to myself.

The one I'd just passed was probably only a few years older than me.

Her lack of mastery over Japanese made it safe to guess she was a transfer student in some college. Even Shu had told me that there were lots of rich foreigners in this building. Since she was able to live here, she was probably a member of an upper class family.

No use thinking about a stranger's private life, I thought.

"But... what was her name, again?" I murmured.

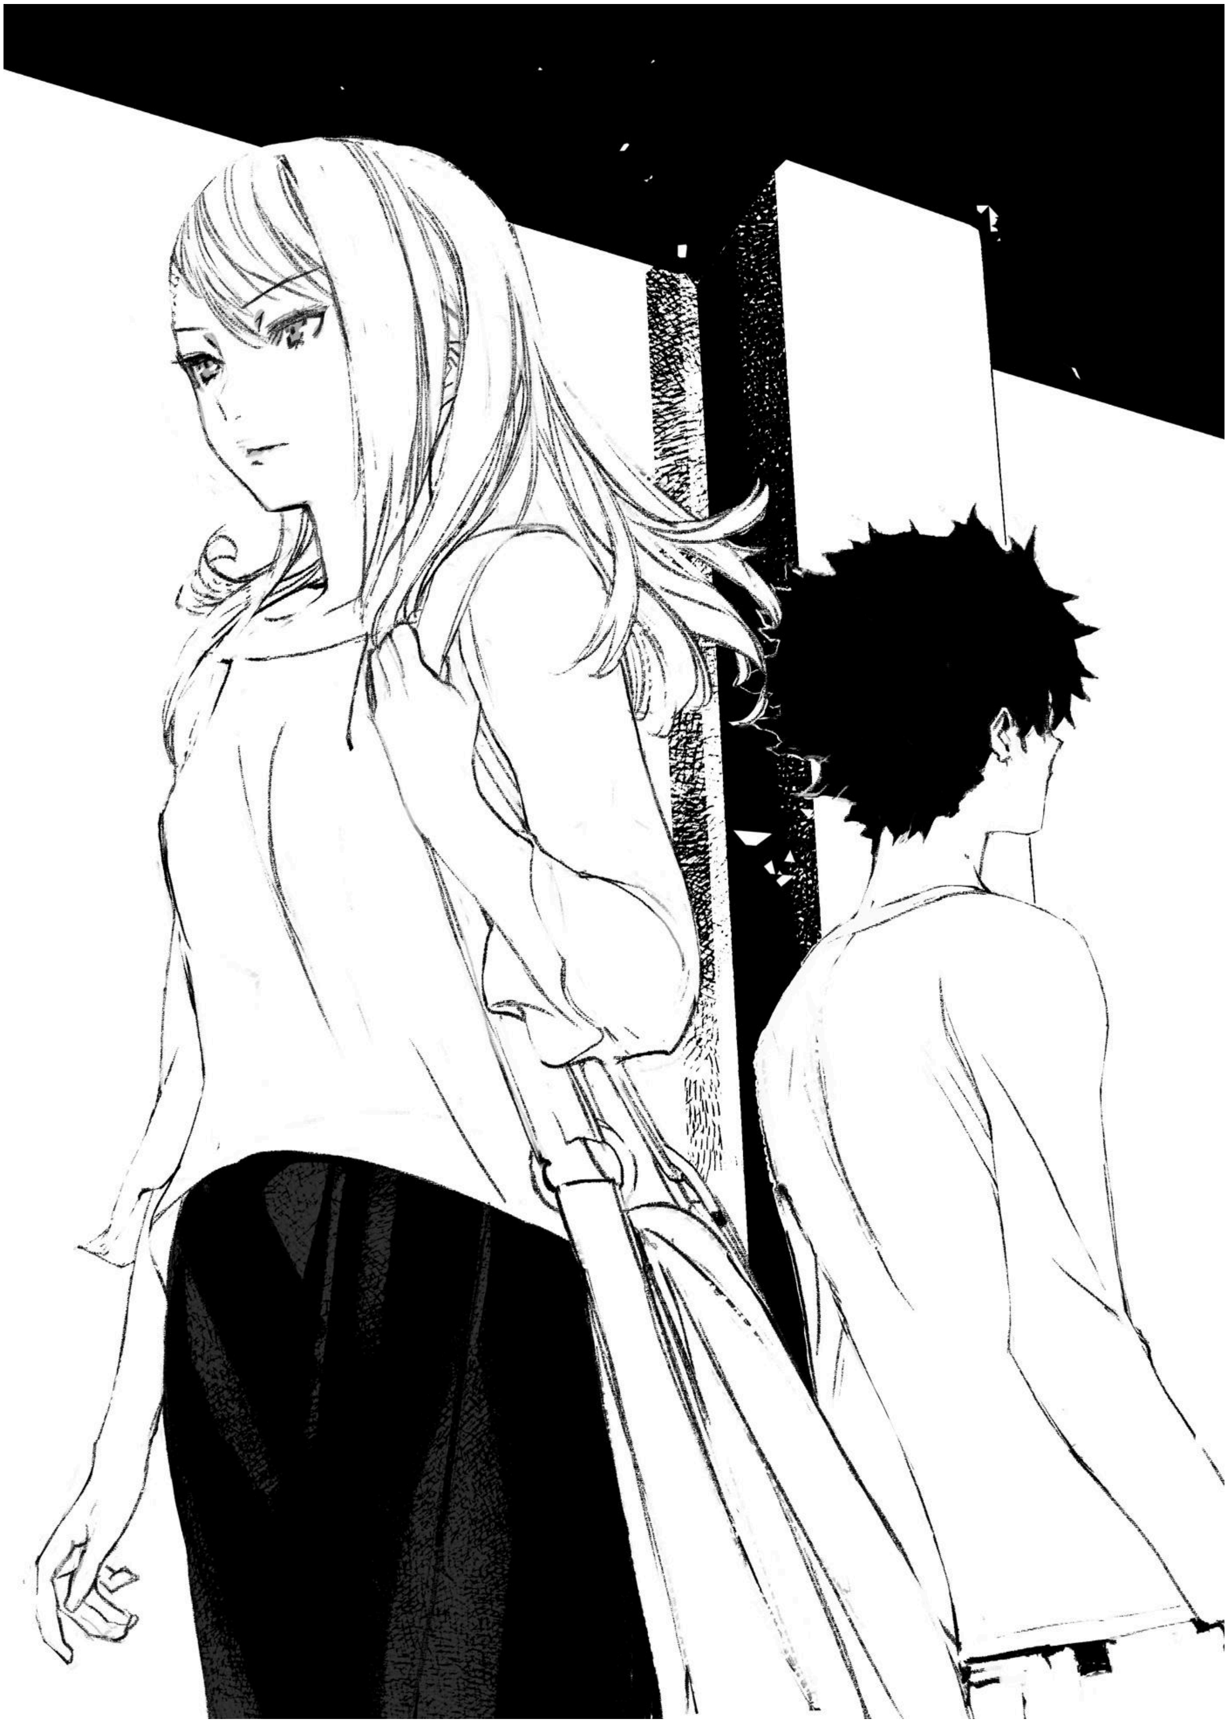
When I'd moved in, I'd followed the cultural practice and greeted the neighbors on my floor with some soba. We'd introduced ourselves back then, and the fact that I couldn't remember her name bothered me so much, I stopped to think about it.

"It went something like Fra... Fra... Franklin? No, no, no, no."

Hearing "Fra" instantly made me picture that mad scientist lab coat bastard, but that was just wrong in all possible ways. Confusing that guy with that pretty blonde lady would be nothing if not rude. Her actual name was...

"Oh, right," I said as it came back to me. "It's Francesca."

Refreshed from having this weight on my mind lifted, I left the apartment building and went to college.



◇

During my high school years, I'd always thought that all educational facilities were nearly empty during spring break, but a few visits to campus had quickly changed that.

There were lots of people here, even though it was late March. Some went to seminars, some paid visits to labs, while others were busy with club activities. The most passionate people were the ones ready and waiting to invite new members into their clubs.

"Clubs, eh...?" I mumbled to myself.

I was about to become a proper college student, so it might be a good idea for me to join one, too.

To my eye, the people promoting the sports-oriented clubs were the most enthusiastic of all. The mixed martial arts club, for one, was full of men with physiques larger than Shu's, showing off their muscles as they gave warm, or perhaps heated, invitations to the freshmen.

They also had a banner saying "Aim High! Leave a Mark in the Unlimited Pankration College Tournament!" — their goal, most certainly.

The Un-kra mention intrigued me, mostly due to the memories of Shu from when he'd still been in school.

However, unlike my superhuman brother or my downright inhuman sister, I was completely ordinary. Hell, I hadn't even been all that much into sports during my high school years, so I really had no business in that club.

"Ah, my high school years..." I muttered and went on a trip down memory lane.

Though I hadn't been in any clubs during my second and third years, I had been an active member of a club when I was a freshman. It'd been called the "Electronic Game Research Society" or just "EGRS," and its activities had begun and ended with only one thing: playing video games.

The school must've been pretty lenient to allow something like that, but then again, we had also been active in various e-sports, going as far as to participate in several national tournaments.

The club president had won first place in a Verseair (card game) event, while the vice president had been the last survivor in a major War Grounds (FPS) battle royale. I, too, had left my mark in a Stream Fighter (fighting game) tournament, so we'd ended up with three trophies in our club room.

The president and vice president had graduated soon afterward, but I recalled them having been pretty satisfied with the good memories they'd made.

I wonder what they're doing right now, I thought as I pictured them — the ones who had become college students two years before me. They send me New Year's cards, but those didn't say much about what they're doing. Knowing them, they're probably still gaming.

"I could try joining a game-related club like I did in high school, but... Oh, whatever, I'll think this through once I actually start college," I decided.

I'm too busy with Dendro right now, anyway.

Suddenly, I imagined a college life spent doing nothing but playing online games. I quickly shelved the picture to the depths of my mind and resolved to do my best with both my higher education and my job hunting two or three years later.

◇

I was done with my student card creation and all the other college-related business before the clock hit noon. In fact, all I really had to do was present my fingerprint.

The simplicity had me bewildered, but apparently, this was normal these days.

According to an aged worker, "Things have gotten increasingly more computerized over the thirty years I've been working here. Even this procedure has become this simple."

The schools in the area I'd lived in were pretty advanced, too, but nothing there was this speedy, which went to show that metropolitan higher education facilities were always ahead.

Honestly, if it was this easy, I couldn't help but wonder why it wasn't done along with the briefing.

Anyway, though that was over with unexpectedly quickly, it was now past 11 o'clock — a bit early, but still a good time to have lunch. With that in mind, I made my way towards the cafeteria, hoping that the food I'd be eating here over the next four years would actually be good.

“Wow... There are multiple cafeterias here,” I said as I entered one of them, surprised by how different it was from high school.

I looked at the menu and noticed that it had multiple daily special meals and a great variety of noodles. While eyeing the intriguing, yet highly unappetizing, “Miso-Cooked Lobster Special,” I ordered spaghetti with meat sauce — a favorite of mine.

“Hm...” I tasted some of it and concluded that it was normal. No, as far as school food went, it was definitely delicious. Still, I couldn’t help but compare it with something else.

“The taste is... kinda dull.”

It lacked a certain something I’d grown accustomed to.

Now that I think about it, I haven’t cooked much recently, I realized.

I used to help around the house a lot, so I was familiar with basic chores and cooking. Enough for my mom to be certain I wouldn’t have any trouble living by myself. As things were, however, I was barely doing any cooking for myself, and was instead opting to eat basic onigiri or sandwiches from convenience stores, or cup-a-soups sent to me by my parents. It didn’t take me long to figure out what had caused this change in my eating habits.

“It’s all because of Dendro,” I said.

All the food there was better than here in real life, as it had the strange powers unique to fantasy worlds.

To people familiar with RPGs, food was a thing that, for example, healed or raised stats — but in Dendro, a game which had taste, it didn’t end there. There were foods and skills focused entirely on flavor, and restaurants built with certain construction skills gave a taste bonus to all food made inside. By stacking such effects, the popular establishments, according to Shu, could “easily surpass the fanciest places in real life.”

Mind you, I didn’t know how to feel about hearing him say that, considering he could easily surpass the enhanced Dendro restaurants by sense skill alone.

Recently, he’d called me to try his handmade candy, and it had been so good that I’d experienced some indefinable phenomenon called “taste inflation.”

Back to the matter at hand... Basically, the food in Dendro was so good that it made real food feel lacking. I wasn’t doing any cooking because I just hadn’t felt that anything I could make would be worth the effort.

Lavish eating in Dendro*, basic nutrition intake in real life... I've read about this online,* I thought as I realized I was unintentionally following the so-called "Dendro Diet," popular among women and avid players.

"Mh..." I silently continued eating my spaghetti.

By all reasonable standards, it was good food, but it seemed to lack the power to overwhelm my taste buds.

...Let's try adding this Tabasco sauce and grated cheese, I decided.

"Ahh, I'm finally done with everything I had to do," said a woman sitting at a table behind me. "What a pain that was."

"Well done," said a man accompanying her.

There weren't many people in the cafeteria at this time of the day, so I could hear their conversation quite clearly.

"It must be nice to have all your stuff done long before the deadline, eh, Kage?" she continued. "You coulda shown me what you'd done, you know?"

"I consider schoolwork to be something you do by yourself," replied the man.

The woman had a Kansai accent, slightly Kyoto-like, while the man talked in a very polite manner.

Looks like college really is a place for people from all across the country, I thought.

Once done with my lunch, I went towards the cafeteria's exit and noticed the papers hung on a nearby bulletin board. Surprised that such an advanced college was still using something so archaic, I took a moment to look through it.

While most of the papers were about in-campus contacts and clubs, there were also some leaflets for part-time jobs. There seemed to be demand for cafeteria, shop workers, and even private tutors.

I was living fine on just my allowance right now, but I probably had to consider eventually getting a part-time job for extra income.

Well, perhaps I'll do it when I'm not as busy with Dendro as I am now, I thought as I walked out.

◇

Once done with my college business, I went to buy some necessities and returned home a little past noon.

As I was handling what I'd bought, my mobile phone began to vibrate as someone called me. The display said that it was Mom, so I didn't hesitate to answer and bring the mobile phone to my ear.

"Hello? Reiji?" Sure enough, it was my mother, speaking to me with the same voice I'd heard yesterday.

"Hi, Mom. What's wrong?" I asked.

"The schedule says that it's the day of the last part of the enrollment process, and I was just wondering if you'd actually gone..."

Yeah, I expected as much, I thought.

My mom was highly prone to worrying, and didn't hesitate to call me on days when I had something going on. She'd also called me yesterday morning, saying "Today's the physical examination, isn't it? Are you ready for it?"

According to Shu, she had always been this much of a worrywart. I supposed I couldn't really blame her, considering she'd had my sister as her first child.

Ever since my sister was young, even her most basic antics had been outside the realm of reason. Just like in the various misadventures I'd recalled this morning, my sister had a tendency to get caught up in the most absurd of situations and make it through them using nothing but brute force, and because of this, our parents had had a really hard time with her.

To make things worse, Shu had been born soon after her, and though he wasn't as absurd a creature as our sister, he certainly wasn't normal, either.

In his younger years, he'd entered showbiz and became both a child singer and actor. Later down the line, during his middle and high school years, he'd dabbled in martial arts and gone on to win Un-kra. And when he'd started going to college, he'd casually picked up cooking and made food so good that it made people pass out.

Basically, he could do just about anything he tried.

As far as I was aware, the only exception to this was art. I recalled having looked at his "works" and thinking that I would probably have to be an alien creature for them to make even a bit of sense.

Anyway, having those two abnormals as their children must've been pretty taxing on my parents, and I could totally understand why they would worry about me, as well.

Still, compared to them... no, without any comparisons, I was as normal as people come, so they really didn't have to mind me all that much.

...Weird. An auditory hallucination bearing Nemesis's voice had just asked, "Does a normal person fight by eating undead flesh? What about punching people's faces with a charred arm? Is that normal?"

...Hey, I'm still more normal than my siblings, I replied silently.

"Reiji?" Mom spoke up in a worried tone, returning me to reality. "What's wrong? Did something happen?"

"Uh, no, it's nothing," I said to calm her down. "I did all I had to before noon. It's all good. Now, I just have to wait for the opening the day after tomorrow."

Which was true. This year's April 1st, the day when the term would usually start, was a Saturday, so the event had been moved to Friday, March 31st. Still, it would be nothing but a guidance event, and the schedule said that the actual entrance ceremony would be held some time after college began.

I remembered finding it weird that the entrance ceremony would be separate from the actual entrance.

"Well, that's good to know," said Mom. "Your dad and I will come see you at the entrance ceremony. If you need anything, you can ask Shu for help. He's not far from you."

"Yeah, I know."

Shu said the same thing, I thought.

"But wow... my little Reiji is a college student. Time sure flies..." Though we were talking by phone, I could easily tell that she was turning sentimental. "You were such an easy child to raise... Well, I could say the same for Shu, but he was just too little trouble. Your sister, though..."

I could almost see her place her hand on her head as she recalled something. She was either remembering the same sister-related events I was, or deeds that had happened before I was even born.

Unless...

"Did something happen to her again?" I asked.

"She called me from overseas yesterday and said, 'I got caught up in a bomb terror plot in Val Verde. You might see my name on the news, but know that I'm perfectly fine. I even caught the one who set it up.'"

"Yikes..."

The fact that she'd caught the terrorist made it obvious that she hasn't changed at all.

Wait, Val Verde...? She's in South America again? I thought.

"Sometimes I wonder if she isn't some sort of Superman or Terminator," my mom added.

Considering my sister's love for Western movies, that comparison was very much like her, but...

I told Mom, "Last I asked, she said, 'Hospital examinations say that I'm an Earthling. Oh, and DNA tests support that, too, of course.'"

"That girl is just so..." my mom said and sighed. "I can understand Shu, since he's a man without a steady job, but I'd really like to see your sister settle down soon. At this rate, she'll enter her thirties without anything changing."

"Well, you'd first need to find someone brave enough to bond with her," I commented.

I certainly know I wouldn't do it, even if we weren't family, I thought.

"What about you, Reiji? Got any sweet stories to share?" Mom asked suddenly.

"...Eh?" I exclaimed, confused as to why the subject had switched to me.

"Have you gotten a girlfriend in college yet?"

"I've only been to the briefing and gone through the enrollment process," I protested. "There's no way I could have gotten one at this stage."

In Dendro, I'd become acquainted with Liliana, Marie, and the duel ranker girls such as Juliet or Chelsea, but those were all just friends — far from the "girlfriend" Mom had in mind.

"What about food? Have you had a girl make lunch for you yet?"

"...Nope."

Sure, Marie had made us a midnight snack while we were heading to Gideon. However, considering the thing she'd made to be food was an insult to all cooking everywhere, it didn't count... surely.

"Have you at least gone for a drive with a girl?"

"I don't even have a license to drive cars," I retorted. "I have one for motorbikes, but I don't have one of those here."

Nemesis and I occasionally rode Silver, but riding a horse was different from "driving," so, again, it didn't count.

"I see," said Mom. "I just thought that you were the one best suited for love out of you three."

"What? Wouldn't that be Shu?"

As far as I knew, he was extremely popular among girls. I could clearly remember the loads of chocolates he'd brought home on Valentine's Days when he was in high school.

"Well, he's unemployed right now..."

"Ohh..."

True enough. These days, he was in Dendro around the clock, so he probably wasn't as popular as he used to be. Or maybe he was and I just didn't know about it? To my knowledge, he was only popular among children, and even then, only as nothing more than a bear-shaped jungle gym mascot thing.

"Oh, but Mom," I argued, "Shu doesn't have a job, but he has an income, right? I'm sure he'll be popular with women who marry for money. It's fine."

"That seems like a problem in and of itself..."

...Yeah, I realized that right after saying it, I thought.

"Would I be asking for too much if I wanted to see a grandchild within the next ten years?" she asked.

"Well, Shu will be married before he closes in on his forties," I answered. "Probably."

"And your sister?"

"..." Deafening silence.

I'm sorry, Mom, I thought. I just can't picture her ever getting married. That might be a possibility that would have to be seized from far, far beyond the radix point.

◇◇◇

Duel city Gideon, Paladin, Ray Starling

After wrapping up my exchange with Mom, I logged in to Infinite Dendrogram.

First things first: I checked the time and found out that it was right about three in the afternoon here.

As I did that, Nemesis left the crest.

“Are you done with your college business and whatnot?” she asked.

“Yeah.” I nodded. “I went through the last part of the procedure.”

Which means that, today and tomorrow, I can focus on Dendro entirely, I thought.

Then again, I’d start going to college soon after that... but that was something I could think about later.

“So, what shall we do today?” Nemesis asked. “The meeting with Rook and Marie was tomorrow in this world’s time, no?”

Being a party, we regularly went on various quests.

The particularly popular ones were those related to the Jeand Grasslands. The drastic change to the area had affected the local ecosystem, creating conditions that made new monsters come dangerously close to the city. Quests to cull the more threatening ones were becoming more common by the day.

We’d intended to go on such a quest today, but my business with college had ended unexpectedly quickly, giving me lots of free time.

I looked at my friends list and, sure enough, Rook and Marie weren’t online.

“Well... I guess I’ll pay a visit to the knight offices,” I said.

“The usual business, I assume?” asked Nemesis.

“Yeah.”

When I came there, a worker greeted me and led me to the usual place, clearly used to doing this by now. We stood before a heavily sealed door as the worker used some spells to undo the seals.

Once beyond it, I was surrounded by a load of container-shaped inventories, all of which contained nothing but cursed items.

There were many ways weapons and armor could become cursed. Some got cursed due to the grudge of the dead; some were designed to be cursed by the Dark Knights using them; some were merely left behind by Hexers, a job focused entirely on cursing people and objects; some became cursed due to monster skills; et cetera, et cetera.

Though some curses could be lifted by the common clergyman from the priest job grouping, many were too strong for that, demanding the powers of skilled, max level tians — a rarity in the kingdom, and doubly so in Gideon, since most hardened clergymen were in the capital.

Another problem with cursed items was that they could neither be disposed of — since someone might find them and be subjected to the curse — or destroyed — since the cursed item might react to that by unleashing the curse. There was also the fact that these had once been good items, so people were somewhat reluctant to get rid of them.

Because of these reasons, the long years of "purify or store" handling had created this massive hoard of cursed items. Since the game had started and Masters had entered this world, resulting in an increase in high-level clergymen, the situation here had slowly gotten better, but the cursed items were still great in number.

Many of the items being held here had once been powerful pieces of equipment. Returning them to a usable state would give the people greater power while dealing with events like Franklin's Game or the wars to come, and because of this, Count Gideon had been pushing to get them uncursed.

But it had been going too slowly, and while they'd been wondering what to do, I'd received and uncursed the CBR Armor using my special reward.

The Count had somehow heard of this — likely from Elizabeth, who'd heard it from Marie — and sent me a request to undo the curses on the items here. I'd accepted, provided I wasn't bound to any schedule and could do it whenever I had free time.

Thus, I paid occasional visits to the offices and worked to undo the curses on the items here.

It took me about two hours to uncurse a single inventory. That might seem like a long time, but clergymen had it even worse. Due to MP and cooldown limitations on their skills, they had to gradually purify items over the course of an entire day, while my Grudge-soaked Greaves did it much faster with me doing nothing but being close to the inventory. Still, it would be a pretty long time until I was done uncursing everything here.

"The equipment purification will take quite a while, I assume?" asked Nemesis.

"Well, they've spent many years hoarding these," I answered. "Just look around."

"So it's a great mess, even for Gouz-Maise the grudge vacuum."

"...Grudge vacuum? Well, that's pretty on-point."

Whatever the case, I was allowed to do this whenever I pleased, so could purify it all at my own leisure.

Hell, doing this was advantageous for me, too. After all, the MP and SP stored in the Grudge-soaked Greaves grew the more grudge it absorbed, and considering the chances of my wanting to use it in future battles, having more of it certainly wouldn't hurt.

The reward for this activity, by the way, wasn't monetary. For every ten inventories I purified, they let me pick any one of the purified weapons. These inventories contained sacred swords, mystic blades, and gem brands, and I was allowed to take any one of the ones I'd uncursed.

Considering that there might situations in the future in which I'd have to fight without Nemesis at my side, or with her helping me in human form, I figured that having a spare weapon was a good idea, and I hadn't hesitated to accept those conditions.

But alas...

"No good," said Nemesis. "This one is lacking, as well."

"Tsk..."

When I'd told her about the spare weaponry, Nemesis said that she wouldn't allow it unless the weapon passed her examination.

She was so strict that none of the ten weapons I'd purified so far had made the cut.

There were some really strong-looking blades, too, I thought.

"I still don't see a single sword that passes!" she declared.

I knew she'd said, "I'll have to make sure that it's fully worthy!" but I'd certainly had no idea she would be so strict.

Does a weapon that passes her examination even exist? I thought to myself.

◇

After purifying one inventory, I left the room, looked outside, and saw that it was evening. Once done reporting today's results to the person in charge, I went out to the hallway...

"Oh?"

...and saw someone familiar — Liliana.

Her face was red, and she was talking to several people while looking somewhat anxious.

"So she's no longer in Gideon," she said before coughing loudly. "I do not think we couldn't find her if she was anywhere in the city, so we can only assume she went outside...”

The people she was talking to were clad in navy blue shinobi clothing, and wore masks and plated headbands on their heads, making them look like the most standard of ninjas. These days, they weren’t an uncommon sight here in Gideon — you could see them jumping from rooftop to rooftop at noon and midnight alike.

The primary cause of these sightings was one of our party members: Marie.

Count Gideon was really bitter about his city being subjected to the horrors of the Gouz-Maise Gang and the terror of Franklin’s Game. Because of that, he’d decided that he had to be strong on policing and intelligence, leading him to ready his pocket money to set up an intelligence agency.

Since such a group would handle sensitive information, Count Gideon had wanted it to be made up of tians, rather than Masters, but there had been a significant lack of qualified people.

During the attack by a SUBM called the Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria, and the war that had come later, the kingdom had lost many of its battle-focused tians, leaving the country’s forces underleveled and underskilled. Most of the few capable tians were in the knight orders and other groups rooted in the capital. Thus, to form an intelligence agency that could double as police, the Count had first had to acquire the right people, and he’d chosen Marie to help him with this purpose.

After Franklin’s Game, Elizabeth had introduced her to the Count, and Marie had taken the opportunity to sell him the Jewels storing the monsters that only attacked Masters, which had gone on to be used to train and powerlevel tian knights.

She’d also revealed to him that she was the Superior Killer and the Death Shadow — the Superior Job of Tenchi’s onmitsu grouping. Upon hearing that, the Count had wondered if he could use Marie’s connections to hire some Tenchi ninjas for his intelligence agency, since they were known to be highly capable operatives.

Marie had accepted his request and contacted the Tenchi ninja group she was still connected to, which was the shinobi village where she got her onmitsu jobs, apparently.

As luck would have it, a civil war in Tenchi had destroyed their employer’s household and left them wandering, searching for a new boss.

Count Gideon’s wants and the ninja group’s wants had matched perfectly, and soon enough, the entire village had moved to the city.

“Soon enough” was a bit of an understatement, actually, considering they’d come all the way here from Tenchi — the other side of the continent — in less than a week’s time. It was a speed impossible for most Masters, let alone tians, and naturally, the Count had been absolutely dumbfounded.

When he’d asked about it, however, they’d merely said, “It’s a trade secret. Nin-nin,” in a manner as questionable as it was ninja-like. Apparently, not even Marie knew how they’d pulled it off.

Whatever the case, true to their reputation, the ninjas were highly skilled.

Tenchi, the land where the Gideon Shinobi Force had originated, was known as the country with the strongest tians. For Tenchi’s battle-focused tians, reaching level 500 was more like a starting point than anything else, since they would then begin to hone their techniques until they became true martial artists worthy of the name. Because of this and other reasons, Tenchi was often referred to as the “land of strife.”

Luckily or unluckily, depending on your perspective, the country’s current state was much like that of Japan during the Sengoku Era, so almost none of their great power was directed toward other countries.

It’s not like a constant civil war is all that better, but still, I thought.

Anyway, the highly stereotypical ninjas were all max level stalwarts, making them simply perfect for the job. Count Gideon had quickly hired them and set up the Gideon Shinobi Force, an information agency answering directly to him. And thus, we now had a Rome-like city in which ninjas were a common sight.

Also, Marie had made big bank for her role as mediator, and she’d gone on to treat us to some food.

So yeah, the ninjas were a normal part of Gideon by now, but Liliana’s panicked expression as she talked to them certainly wasn’t.

“We will split up and search Gideon’s surroundings,” said one of the ninjas.

“Please do so,” replied Liliana and coughed yet again. “I’ll join you soon.”

“Do not overdo it.”

The ninjas kicked the floor beneath, dashed away, and vanished like shades in sunlight.

"Ah, Ray!" Liliana cried as she saw us nearby, again looking somewhat anxious.

"Are you okay, Liliana?" I asked.

Her pallid expression made it evident that she wasn't in good health.

"Oh, don't mind me," she said and coughed again. "Her Highness escaped today. Have you seen her, perchance?"

She showed little intention to answer my question, instead revealing that she was caught up in more Elizabeth-related trouble.

"...No," I said, shaking my head in response.

The kingdom's second princess was a very free and brazen character, as well as a genius escape artist. Though she refrained from doing it on days with official business, her leaving the Gideon residence she was staying at had become a nearly daily occurrence by this point.

The fact that she was able to escape while being observed by the Royal Guard and several max level ninjas spoke volumes about the extent of her skill. It was hard to believe she was just a child who didn't even have a single job.

...Well, the primary reason why Elizabeth had become so good at escaping was the coaching from Rook, who, for reasons unknown, had been trained in such things in real life.

Our party is full of eccentrics, I thought.

"And you're no exception," Nemesis commented telepathically.

...I can't really deny that.

"Well... I know I probably shouldn't say this, but isn't that a common thing at this point?" I asked Liliana.

"Indeed it is." She nodded. "But things are slightly different this time."

"In what way?"

Elizabeth had sneaked out, and the officials had gone out to find her. What could be different there?

"A short time ago, as a countermeasure against her antics, we gave Her Highness a Jewel."

Jewels were items that allowed the storage of tamed monsters that obeyed their owners. Even if they couldn't fit the monsters into their minion capacity, children and low-level humans could use them by putting them in party slots.

"I see," I said. "Since you can't prevent her from escaping, you decided to give her a means to protect herself." As far as safety was concerned, that was perfectly reasonable.

"Yes," Liliana said and coughed again. "Count Gideon used his connections to procure a Pure-Dragon and presented it to her."

"Well, that's something..."

Their rarity on the market made Pure-Dragons quite a luxury. While Demi-Dragons went for about 1,000,000 lir, Pure-Dragons were often over ten times more expensive.

I figured the Count hadn't hesitated to fork up the money for something so costly because he'd felt responsible about Elizabeth getting kidnapped during Franklin's Game.

But man, Count Gideon sure is rich, I thought.

He'd rewarded the Masters, given money to the families of those that'd died, paid for city repairs, created the Gideon Shinobi Force, and he'd still had more funds to spend. His wealth might've been another reason why Franklin had picked Gideon as his target city.

"And, well... the Pure-Dragon's name is 'Stealth Dragon,'" Liliana added.

"Oh, 'Stealth Dragon,' eh?" I said. "Wait... Stealth?"

I have a bad feeling about this.

"Stealth Dragons have the ability to hide themselves and the people riding them," she explained.

...I more or less see how it is.

She went on, "Count Gideon assumed that this quality would make it an optimal bodyguard, since it could hide Her Highness and take her away from trouble, but..."

"...it was also an optimal escape partner," I finished her sentence.

The escape artist princess had been given the perfect ally: a monster that was basically a huge, flying Marie. Sure, it didn't have Arc-en-Ciel, but that wouldn't stop it from being stupidly troublesome.

"Yes." Liliana nodded. "We've been searching for Her Highness and the Stealth Dragon ever since they disappeared in the morning, but we can't find them anywhere in Gideon, so we assume that they might've left the city."

"That's... plausible," I said.

Among the ninjas, there were many people from the onmitsu grouping, just like Marie. That grouping excelled at both hiding and finding hidden things, so if they'd had no luck finding Elizabeth in Gideon, it was likely that she'd gone outside the city.

Thanks to the Gideon Shinobi Force, the city was now considerably more peaceful and safer. However, the same couldn't be said for the city's monster-ridden outskirts. Even if you had a Pure-Dragon bodyguard, this was a world where you could easily be ambushed by something even more powerful.

"I had the Gideon Shinobi Force extend their search to the outside of the city," said Liliana as she walked towards the exit. "I'm about to join them and—"

She cut her words short and coughed so heavily that she staggered.

It had been bothering me ever since I'd seen her today. The red face, the coughs — it was clear that she was ill.

"I'm sorry," I said. "Do you have a Cold?"

"...Yes, but it's just a normal Cold, rather than the Epidemic they had in the capital."

In Dendro, illnesses were classified as disease-based debuffs. However, unlike the basic poisons and the like, they could be significantly more troublesome, as many of them couldn't be removed by your standard Elixirs or Antidotes.

The Food Poisoning I'd once gotten had disappeared after I'd taken just one drug, but there were Epidemics that could only be cleared by healing skills from Superior Jobs. Alas, not everyone had access to people with such skills, so most had to settle for slowly healing themselves with medicine made by people in the doctor grouping, simply waiting for the illness to go away, or...

"Liliana," I said slowly. "Have you met with Her Majesty before she ran away today?"

"Yes." She nodded. "But she disappeared soon afterwards..."

I'm starting to see what's going on here, I thought.

"All right, I'll search for her, too. But you have to stay in Gideon and rest."

"But I...!"

“Leave it to me,” I said while looking her in the eyes. She momentarily hesitated before giving me a light nod.

“Very well,” she said. “I leave Her Majesty to you.”

“Don’t worry, I’ll find her no matter what.” I nodded confidently and left the knight offices.

[Quest Received: Search — Elizabeth S. Altar, Difficulty 5]
[Confirm the quest details in the quest window]

The message I received was highly reminiscent of an event I’d experienced a month ago.

◇

After leaving the offices, I took Silver out of my inventory and jumped on him, and as I made my prosthetic left arm hold the reins, Nemesis climbed up behind me. Then I activated Silver’s Wind Hoof skill and dashed through the air towards my destination.

“You know where to find Elizabeth, Ray?” asked Nemesis.

“Yeah,” I said. “I’m almost completely certain that she went out to look for a food that works on Colds.”

Dendro had loads of foods that made people healthy, and some of them were effective against Colds. One such food were Clearberries — a type of berry often found in the areas surrounding Gideon. However, Clearberries also weakened the symptoms of the Epidemic that had attacked the capital recently, so most of Gideon’s Clearberries had been sent there. Alejandro had told me that the storage was completely empty.

This morning, when she’d seen Liliana suffering from a Cold, Elizabeth had clearly wanted to do something about it and decided to get her some Clearberries. And if she hadn’t found any of them in Gideon’s shops, it was entirely possible that she’d used her mount-bodyguard to go forage for them directly.

“Well, she’s a proactive girl, after all,” said Nemesis.

Thanks to a quest I’d done not long ago, I knew where I could find Clearberries. They grew in the area southwest of Gideon, the Saudade Woods.

“The monsters there aren’t particularly high level, so it’s not too dangerous,” said Nemesis. “A little girl with a Pure-Dragon at her side should fare just fine, no?”

“The monsters there were below Demi-Dragon-tier, so it wasn’t too dangerous,” I replied, emphasizing certain words.

“...Past tense, eh?”

“Yeah. Things are different now.”

Following Franklin’s Game, the ecosystem in Gideon’s surroundings had slowly begun to change. The most noticeable difference was that the more powerful monsters that had once lived farther away had started coming closer to the city.

When I’d been searching for quests to take with my party, I’d learned that the southwestern woods was now a habitat for Pure-Dragon-tier monsters and above.

◇◆◇

Southwest of Gideon, Saudade Woods

In the middle of Saudade Woods, there was a girl and a Pure-Dragon.

“Phew, this should be more than enough!” The second princess of the Kingdom of Altar, Elizabeth S. Altar, nodded in a satisfied manner while looking at a basket full of Clearberries.

“KYULULU.” The white Pure-Dragon with rabbit-like fur released a voice, as if agreeing with its owner. It was a Stealth Dragon called “Kyululu” — named so by Elizabeth because of the sound it made.

“Let’s go back, then,” said Elizabeth. “It’s already evening. If we don’t come back now, they might start to worry.”

Little did she know that they were already worried. The girl’s standards regarding this were quite unlike those of the people responsible for her.

Elizabeth climbed up on Kyululu’s back and, just like when they’d arrived here, had it use Optic Camouflage and Presence Block to hide them both and leave the Saudade Woods.

Kyululu spread its wings, ready to take flight...

“Kyu?!”

It jumped to the side in surprise. A moment later, something large broke through the surface and burst out of the ground.

“SHAAAAAAH...”

It was a large monster bearing the head of a cobra-like snake and many centipede-like legs.

It bent its head and looked directly at Kyululu and Elizabeth as though Optic Camouflage had no effect at all.

“Wh-What?!” Elizabeth cried.

“KYULULULU!”

As Elizabeth got frightened, Kyululu began jumping away from the monster, careful to not throw the girl off.

The snake-head creature went after Kyululu with a precision so great, it was scary.

“Kyululu! Can’t you fly?!” shouted Elizabeth in desperation.

“KYULULU...!”

Despite having wings capable of flight, Kyululu was running on land. Its instincts were telling it that flying would instantly kill them both.

The monster chasing them was a Viperhead Dragon Worm. It was a Pure-Dragon-tier monster bearing Poison, the worm-like ability to dig underground, and the snake-like skill called “Heat Perception.”

It was much like thermography, and it allowed the creature to see Kyululu despite its Optic Camouflage.

“SHAAAAAAH!”

Though Kyululu was a Pure-Dragon, too, its focus on camouflage and surprise attacks made it have relatively low stats.

The Viperhead Dragon Worm not only had greater stats, but it also nullified Kyululu’s prime merit, Optic Camouflage, by using its Heat Perception.

The creature was basically the Stealth Dragon’s natural predator.

Its only way out of this predicament was to fly, but it would all be over if the Viperhead spat its Poison over Kyululu when it stopped to take flight. It had to increase the distance between them, but the creature was gaining on it with frightening precision.

Soon enough, the Viperhead’s poisonous fangs reached for Elizabeth, but then...

“Counter Absorption!”

...a barrier of light appeared in the creature’s way.

“Eh?” the girl exclaimed in confusion.

“KYULU...?” the Stealth Dragon cried as it and its owner both tried to turn around and see what caused the crashing sound behind them.

“Don’t turn around! Just run! Get some distance, fly, and get out of here!”

Urged by the loud order, they both looked forward and continued running.

Kyululu quickly created the necessary distance and flew up into the sky.

That was when Elizabeth turned around for the first time.

There, she saw a dark-red knight on a silver horse fighting the snake-headed insectoid.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

Upon hearing dragon wings flutter behind me, I breathed a sigh of relief.

“That was uncomfortably close,” said Nemesis.

“Seriously.” I couldn’t help but agree. I dreaded to imagine what would’ve happened if I’d been just a second late, and I was really glad I’d made it.

“Now, we just have to do something about this snake-head,” Nemesis added.

“True.”

The snake-head before me — a “Viperhead Dragon Worm,” apparently — seemed to be quite irritated. I could only assume it was upset about me getting in the way and letting its Pure-Dragon feast escape.

It threatened me with snake-like movements and sounds.

“Well? Should we escape it?” asked Nemesis.

“We saved the princess, but if a monster like this lives near Gideon, it might eventually kill someone else,” I answered.

And that would leave a bad taste in my mouth, so...

“...we’ll kill it,” I finished aloud. “Here and now.”

“Understood!”

Thus began the battle.

“SHAAAAAAH!” Treating us as enemies to be killed, rather than prey to be eaten, the snake-head opened its mouth, not for a bite, but to release a Poison breath. The green smoke buried my vision and afflicted me with Poison, which quickly drained my HP.

"Form Shift — The Flag Halberd!" I shouted.

And so, the damage was reversed.

Right as Nemesis became a halberd, I activated Like a Flag Flying the Reversal, the skill that reversed the effects of debuffs. With that, the Poison began healing me.

The snake-head, surprised by me still standing strong upon taking its Poison, slightly backed away from me.

Not missing the opening, I held my right hand in front and made my Miasmaflame Bracer release its Hellish Miasma while also activating Silver's Wind Hoof barrier to protect me from the three debuffs.

The monster was staggered. It had a resistance to Poison, but Weakness and Intoxication worked on it just fine.

"The stage is set," I said. "Let's go, Nemesis!"

"Certainly!"

My strategy was the same as with Gardranda. I repeatedly let it damage me and healed myself with the reversed Poison, accumulating the damage needed to end it with a well-placed Vengeance is Mine.

It was safe to assume that, unlike the demon, this one wouldn't turn more powerful once I took its head.

"Still, even though it's Weakened, its stats are far higher than yours," said Nemesis. "Mess up one time too many, and you might die."

"True," I said, acknowledging that my own stats were equal to or less than Demi-Dragon-tier. "Our chances of winning are about... forty percent?"

"Ha ha ha! Forty percent, you say?" she laughed. "That's much higher than any of our previous encounters!"

"Damn right!"

Recalling the battles we'd gone through, we charged towards the enemy.

With Silver as my steed and Nemesis in hand, I clashed with a creature far stronger than myself.

Just like we'd done before, and just like we would be doing from this point onward, we struggled against adversity while reaching for the possibility we wanted to seize.

As the enemy's fangs ripped into me, as my blade sunk into the enemy, as I narrowly avoided death from its lethal attacks, and as its unexpected actions caught me off guard, we continued fighting until the end.

And so, after an hour-long battle...

"Vengeance is Mine!"

...we launched an attack that obliterated its head.

◇

After the battle, we returned to Gideon.

"...Man, am I tired," I sighed.

"That's only natural," said Nemesis. "You've been fighting for so long."

The Poison I'd received had gone away with just a healing item, but sadly, the exhaustion wasn't so easy to get rid of. I hauled my somewhat-heavy body through the city's streets.

"Still, I'm glad Elizabeth's okay," I said.

After killing the monster, I'd gone to the knight offices to see whether she'd made it back safely, and found her being scolded by Liliana.

They'd decided that the Pure-Dragon she'd used to escape — "Kyululu," apparently — would have its ownership switched to another person. Elizabeth would still be allowed to keep it as a pet, but that was it. The knights looking after her would take turns owning Kyululu until it was clear that she wouldn't escape anymore.

The scene reminded me of the times my mom had confiscated a toy when I was a child.

Though Elizabeth was sad about being scolded, she seemed to understand that she'd deserved it for making Liliana and the others so worried, so she definitely wasn't a bad girl.

Also, the moment when Elizabeth fearfully presented Liliana with a basket full of Clearberries, bringing Liliana to the verge of tears, left a pretty big impression on me.

"This is very much a happy ending," said Nemesis.

"Yep. Glad it all worked out."

But man, a quest from Liliana where I look for a girl and fight a worm...

It was just like the first quest I'd done upon starting Dendro.

In the first battle, the one in which Nemesis and I had first met, I'd faced a Demi-Dragon Worm and narrowly seized the possibility with Nemesis at my side. And today, Nemesis and I had fought a monster far stronger and still ended up seizing the possibility.

It felt somewhat easier than the first time, though, I thought.

“That’s because you’ve grown since then,” said Nemesis.

I’d changed quite a bit during my month in this world, but I didn’t think that me becoming stronger was the biggest difference. The biggest difference was that I’d had Nemesis with me right from the start this time.

On my first day, I’d protected Milia until I was beaten to a pulp, had to beg for a possibility, and had Nemesis answer. Today, Nemesis had supported me right from the start, and if that wasn’t the biggest difference, I didn’t know what was.

Hm... I silently pondered.

It was likely that, just like everything before now and just like today, I’d be at the center of many various incidents. Some might be far worse, more intense, or scarier than any of the ones before. But...

“Hm? Why are you looking at me like that?” Nemesis asked.

“No reason...”

No matter what came my way, I felt that I could overcome it as long as I was with my partner. Thus, my everyday life would go on with Nemesis and me clearing all the trouble we get caught up in.

“Anyway, it’s late,” I said. “Should we go get something to eat?”

“Certainly,” said Nemesis. “The snake-head’s Coffer contained nothing but items you convert into money, so let’s use that new wealth to have a feast!”

“...Don’t overdo it, though.”

And so, Nemesis and I walked through the late evening streets.

The End

Afterword

Bear: “Time fur the afterword! It’s me again! Brother Bear, AKA Shu Starling!”

Cat: “I’m Cheshiiire! The one who seeks to get a turn in these wastelands of the afterworrd!”

Xun: “What the hell Are ‘wastelands of thE afterword’...? I’m XunyU.”

Cat: “Anyway, like I said in the midword, this is the end of the first part of Dendro.”

Bear: “We only clawed our way this far thanks to our dear readers.”

Cat: “Indeed. The work’s popularity allowed us to complete the first part without having to force it into fewer than the necessary five volumes.”

Xun: “You mentioNEd in the midword that the authOr had a few spare pages he could use to add morE story, right?”

Cat: “Yes. The short story even portrays some of Ray’s real life.”

Xun: “Now that I think abOUt it, he’s been online throUghout pretty much the whole of the story sO far.”

Bear: “He was only offline before logging in for the first time and after he got his first death penalty.”

Cat: “Yes, and since the work is in the VRMMO genre, the author figured that having some real life scenes was important, as well, so he went and wrote that short story. VRMMOs wouldn’t be VRMMOs if actual reality didn’t exist and the differences weren’t there for all to see!”

Xun: “...Still, a cErtain someone is a bit too differeNt.”

Bear: “Who do you mean?”

Xun: “The one who got an illustration in the short story.”

Bear: “Ohh...”

Cat: “The author was really surprised when Editor K told him that she would get an illustration.”

Bear: “Abearently, this was done at the request of Taiki.”

Xun: “Well, she sure is pOpular...”

Cat: “Please continue supporting Mr. Franklin — the one bearing the face of a mad scientist (Dendro) and of a cool beauty (real life).”

Xun: (...I’m not sUre if many people want to suppoRt her.)

Bear: “Now, it’s time for the usual serious comment from the author.”

Thank you very much for reading Infinite Dendrogram’s fifth volume and completing the first arc of the series. We’ve only made it this far thanks to you — our readers.

At the time I’m writing this, it was recently announced that Infinite Dendrogram got first place in BookWalker’s New Light Novel Awards 2017. According to Editor K, this was mostly due to votes from readers and bookstore employees. You have my sincere thanks for the result and for letting me complete the first part with little trouble.

The upcoming sixth volume would mark the start of the second arc, but we are also considering releasing a short story collection, as well.

New characters, new happenings, new battles — it would bring me great joy if you continued to enjoy and look out for the ever-heating story of Infinite Dendrogram.

Cat: “Anyway, with the author’s comment done, it’s time to announce the next volume...”

Bear: “You do it, Cheshire.”

Cat: “Eh?”

Xun: “You’ve wanted tO do this for a while, so go foR it. Wrap up the first aRc.”

Cat: “...Thanks, you guys. All right, here I go! Volume si—”

?: “Volume six is set to come out at the end of 2017! (In Japan)!”

Cat: “Eh? Ehh?!”

Bear: “Some beary jaunty individual just stole your announcement...”

Xun: “...Oh, it’s thE person who made a brief appearance in the secOnd short story.”

Cat: “Hngh... AAAAHH! YOU THIEVING CAT!”

Bear, Xun: (You’re the cat here, dude...)

?: “So yeah, look forward to volume six and my proper first appearance!”

Bonus Short Stories

The Royal Capital, Altea

The day after Mr. Franklin's terrorist incident in duel city Gideon, the Superior from Huang He, Xunyu, returned to the kingdom's capital at a speed unimaginable to the common person.

Unlike when she had gone to Gideon, she didn't have Meihai with her. The Huang He ambassador had more business in the duel city, and she was also thoroughly averse to Xunyu's method of travel, going as far as to tearily beg the Superior not to take her.

No one could fault her. Xunyu traveled by extending her Superior Embryo, Tenaga Ashinaga, into the distant horizon at supersonic speeds, then grabbing the surface and pulling herself towards it just as fast. To her, it was as natural as walking normally, but anyone forced to accompany her would turn groggy from the repeating decreases and increases in speed.

Upon arriving to the capital's gates, Xunyu took off her Superior Embryo. By design, Tenaga Ashinaga was like a set of complex claw grabbers and circus stiltwalker stilts, so it wasn't hard to remove.

With that done, she walked, on her own two feet, towards the state guest house in the noble district. She proved her identity to the guardsmen at the entrance, headed for her destination room, knocked on the door, and was welcomed inside.

"I'm bAck, Cang," she said upon entering.

"Welcome back, Master Xunyu!" a boy greeted her with a smile. He was Canglong, the current owner of the room and the third prince of the Huang He Empire.

"How'rE you holdin' up?" she asked.

"I still have a bit of a fever, but it's nothing major. What about you, Master Xunyu? There was some trouble in Gideon after the Clash, wasn't there? It was projected in the capital's sky."

"So it seEms."

Franklin had made sure that the incident at Gideon would be broadcasted to both Gideon and the capital. It was still the talk of the town here in Altea, and many tians were worried that something similar could happen here.

That was the reason why Xunyu had removed her Tenaga Ashinaga from sight upon entering the city. While wearing her Embryo, she had the appearance of a fiend with limbs far too long for any humanoid creature, and the sight of such a being hopping around was sure to make the tians uneasy.

Fiendish and odd as she sometimes seemed, Xunyu was a girl (ten years old, by the way) who was capable of such consideration.

"Well, I'm finE," she said. "All I hAd to do was take care of a single mOnster."

"I see. That's good to know," Cang sighed with relief. "Oh, right, Master Xunyu, how was the Clash of the Superiors? Was the kingdom's duel champion... was Figaro strong?"

"YeAh. Figaro was toUgh and I had tons of fun. I'd love tO fight him many more times while I'm here in thE kingdom," she said with a smile that was plain to see even with the talisman covering her face.

Oh, it must have been a really great duel, thought Canglong upon seeing her expression.

"Master Xunyu, could you tell me more about the fight?" he requested. "The incident made it all chaotic, and I have yet to hear many details of the duel."

"Of coursE," said Xunyu. "That's whY I returned here, aftER all."

Indeed, she had come back to the capital specifically to show this boy that she was all right and tell him of the duel that he was certainly curious about.

"Before the stArt of the fight, to get fired up, stir up the sCEne, and set up a trap, I built myself up as the heEl. Then, I..."

And so she spoke, telling Canglong the details of the exciting new memory.

A certain day after Franklin's Game, Nemesis

Ray arrived at the knight offices in Gideon and began uncursing the items there. This was quickly becoming a part of his daily routine.

Naturally, I was at his side, examining the weapons he had freed from their spells.

As I silently eyed the items, I became painfully aware that, as weaponry, they were far stronger than I was. Not only were their bonuses to attack power far greater than mine, but some also increased other stats, gave new skills, or even dealt elemental damage.

Comparing myself to them might've been foolish, considering that they were all things like named blades, demonbrands, and sacred swords, even though they'd been cursed, while I was merely a second form Embryo. Even so, the very idea of having to choose any of them to be Ray's weapon gave me a heartache. It made me picture a world in which he saw me as weak and became more distant.

I'd rejected the idea of him taking new weapons and acted as though they had to be "examined," and now I couldn't help but admit that it was nothing but an act of jealousy.

Still, I couldn't keep rejecting them for such a superficial reason. For Ray's sake, I had to pick him a suitable weapon.

With that in mind...

"Ray, if I may ask, what are your preferences when it comes to weapons?" I asked.

"My preferences?" he raised an eyebrow.

"I believe I should consider more than just its attributes when picking your reward. Your tastes are important, as well."

No matter how powerful the weapon, it would mean little if he didn't like it.

"Well..." he said and took a moment to think before continuing. "I'd like it to be black, considerably long... and I prefer blades over blunt weapons."

"Hm?" I was highly familiar with a weapon that fit those conditions perfectly.

It was none other than myself. Both the Black Blade of my first form and the Flag Halberd of my second form were right up his alley.

"Is that all?" I asked. "Some people like weapons that release fire, lightning, and such. Don't you have any preferences like that?"

"Can't say I do."

"But the conditions you gave make it seem like you're satisfied with me.”

“Oh, right. Guess that means you’re just my type.”

...

“...UEH?!”

Eh? I... Huh!? W-W-W-W-Wait...! What?!

“What’s wrong?” Ray asked. “You look pretty red. Are you sick...? Does the Epidemic affect Embryos, too?”

“N-No! I’m fine! I’m perfectly fine!”

Calm down! Compose yourself, Nemesis! I told myself. He’s only saying that I’m his preferred type of weapon... definitely not that he likes me as a woman!

A-All right, I pulled myself together.

“Still... so I’m your ideal weapon, am I?”

“Marie told me that Embryos naturally take shapes and abilities befitting their Master’s wavelength. You’re born from my personal traits, after all. It’s no surprise we’re compatible.”

“I see... That means I’m the best partner you could ask for!”

“Damn right. We’re companions. Keep looking out for me, will you?”

“...Of course!”

This was a real weight off my mind. I actually had nothing to be afraid of. No matter what weapons Ray would use from now on, I would be his only partner.

So now, as the proud bearer of this title, I had to choose a weapon that would make Ray more powerful than ever!

Thus, free of the gloom from before, I faced numerous weapons and began examining them with an eye keener and stricter than ever.

Sign up for our mailing list at J-Novel Club to hear about new releases!
Newsletter

And you can read the latest chapters (like Vol. 6 of this series!) by becoming a J-Novel Club Member:
J-Novel Club Membership

Copyright

Infinite Dendrogram: Volume 5
by Sakon Kaidou

Translated by Andrew Hodgson
Edited by Emily Sorensen

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are the product of the author’s imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual events, locales, or persons, living or dead, is coincidental.

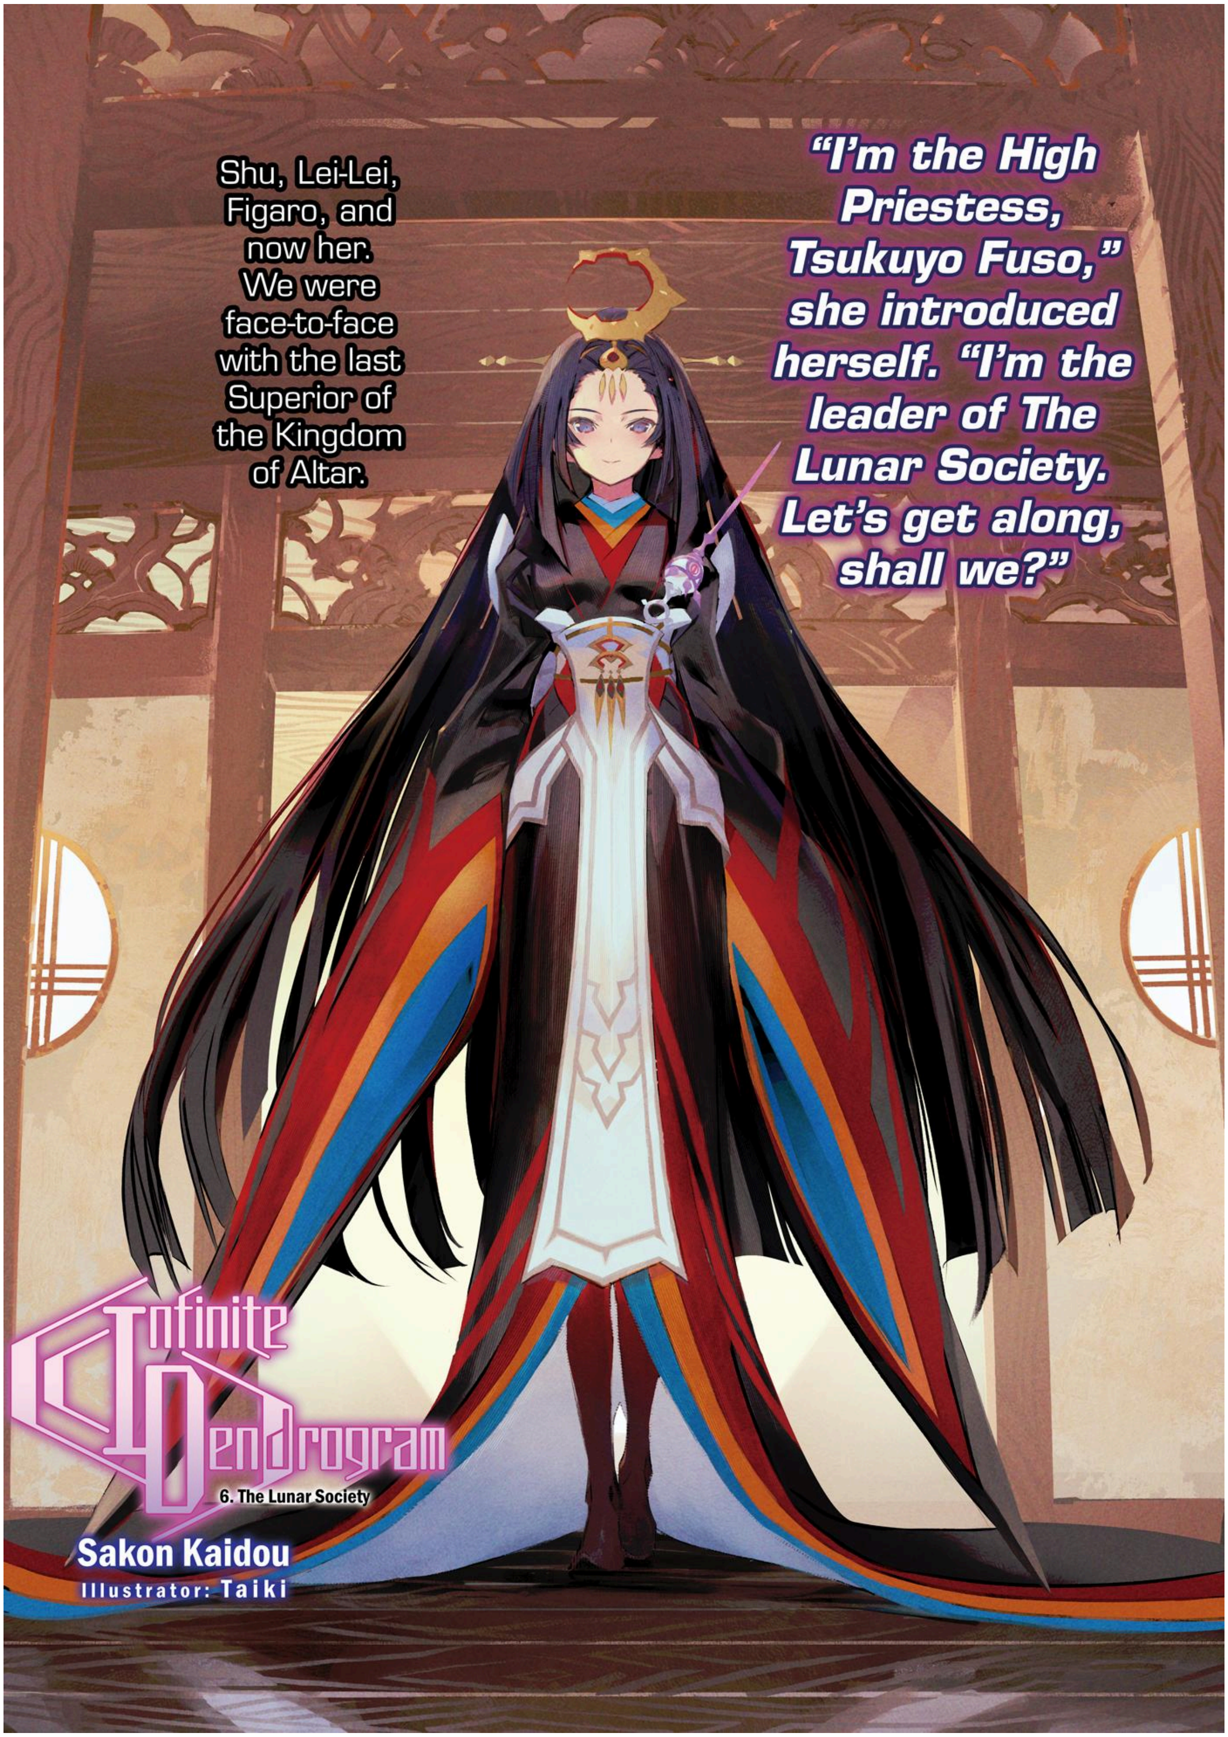
Copyright © 2017 Sakon Kaidou
Illustrations Copyright © 2017 Taiki
Cover illustration by Taiki
All rights reserved.

Original Japanese edition published in 2017 by Hobby Japan
This English edition is published by arrangement with Hobby Japan, Tokyo
English translation © 2018 J-Novel Club LLC

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher is unlawful piracy and theft of the author’s intellectual property.

J-Novel Club LLC
j-novel.club
The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.
Ebook edition 1.0: March 2018

Sakon Kaidou
Illustrator: Taiki
Infinite Dendrogram
6. The Lunar Society



Shu, Lei-Lei, Figaro, and now her. We were face-to-face with the last Superior of the Kingdom of Altar.

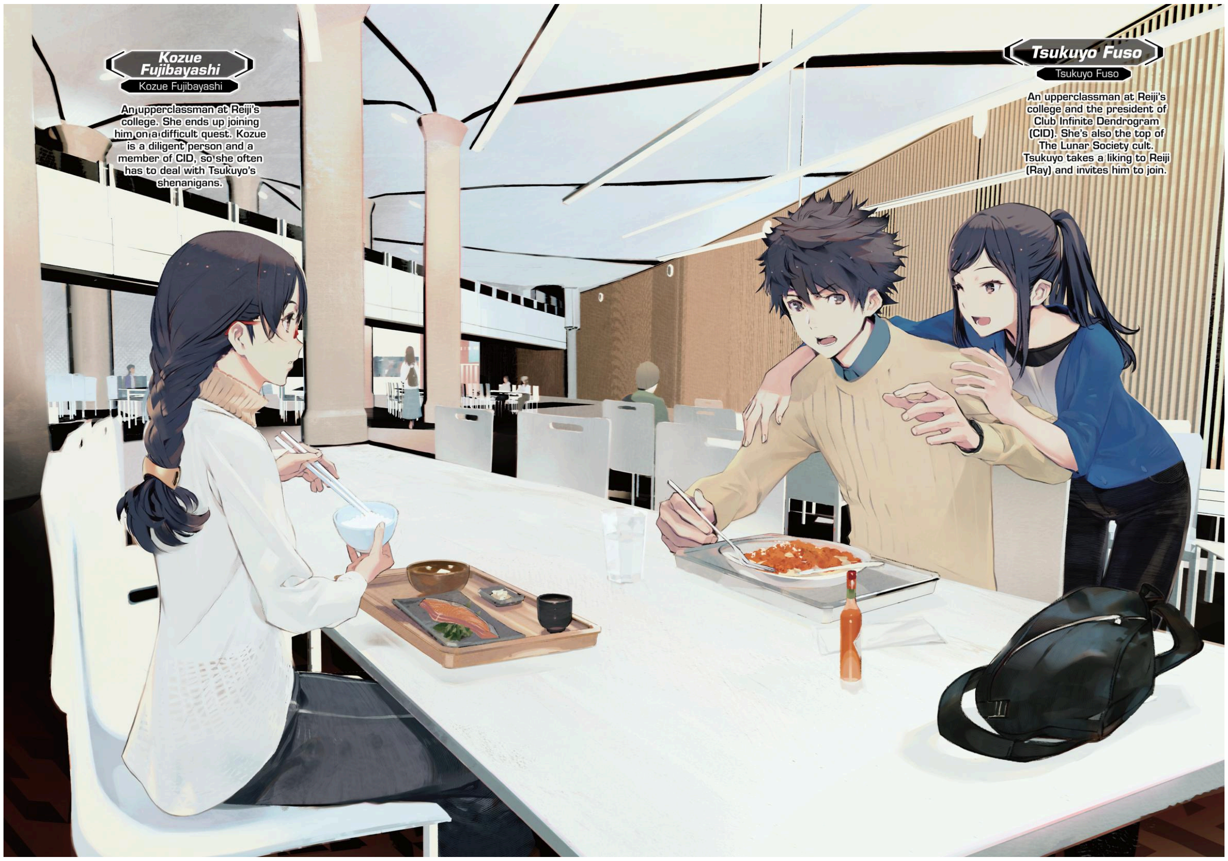
"I'm the High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso," she introduced herself. "I'm the leader of The Lunar Society. Let's get along, shall we?"

Infinite Dendrogram

6. The Lunar Society

Sakon Kaidou

Illustrator: Taiki



Kozue Fujibayashi
Kozue Fujibayashi

An upperclassman at Reiji's college. She ends up joining him on a difficult quest. Kozue is a diligent person and a member of CID, so she often has to deal with Tsukuyo's shenanigans.

Tsukuyo Fuso
Tsukuyo Fuso

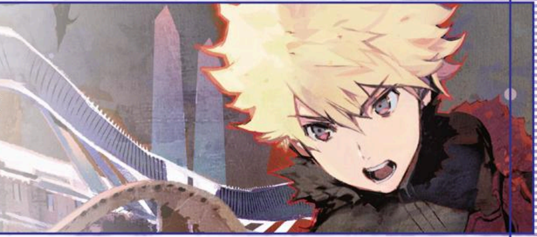
An upperclassman at Reiji's college and the president of Club Infinite Dendrogram (CID). She's also the top of The Lunar Society cult. Tsukuyo takes a liking to Reiji (Ray) and invites him to join.

Character

Ray

Ray Starling / Reiji Mukudori

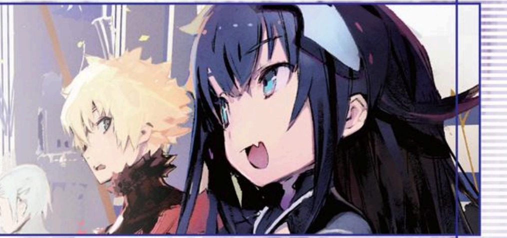
A young man who began playing Infinite Dendrogram. Though generally a calm person, he has a strong will and sense of righteousness that allows him to keep struggling for as long as he needs to.



Nemesis

Nemesis

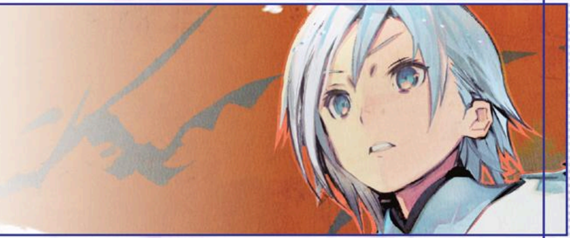
A girl that manifested as Ray's Embryo. She has the ability to transform into a greatsword or a halberd, and is equipped with skills such as Vengeance is Mine, which damages enemies for twice as much as they damage Ray.



Rook

Rook Holmes/Lucius Holmes

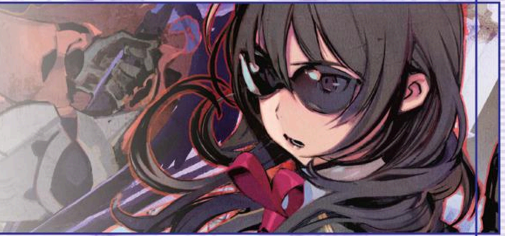
An astonishingly beautiful boy in Ray's party. His job is "Pimp" and he fights using his tamed monsters. His Embryo is the Type Guardian "Depraved Devil, Babylon."



Marie

Marie Adler/Nagisa Ichimiya

A Journalist player working for the information organization called "DIN," giving her access to lots of various info. Having gained an interest in him, she now accompanies Ray, who has a tendency to be at the center of large incidents.



Shu

Shu Starling / Shuichi Mukudori

Ray's brother and the one who invited him to the game. He wears a suit because, during character creaton, he accidentally made himself look just like he does in real life.

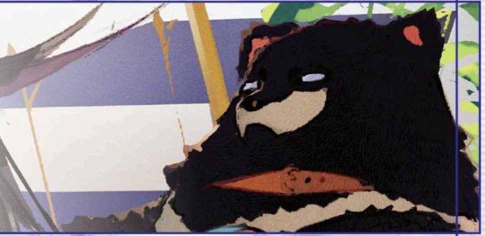


Table of Contents

Cover

Color Illustrations

Prologue: The Kingdom of Altar’s Big Three

Chapter One: In the Jaws of the Fox

Chapter Two: The Maidens’ Tea Party

Chapter Three: Lion and Fox, Light and Dark

Chapter Four: Real Life Encounter

Chapter Five: The Impossible Quest

Chapter Six: Along the Way

Chapter Seven: Cross Hunting

Chapter Eight: The Bad Dog and the Owner

Chapter Nine: To the Windy Village

Conjunction Episode: The News

Afterword

Bonus Short Stories

About J-Novel Club
Copyright

Prologue: The Kingdom of Altar’s Big Three

The story of a few Masters

A little over a year ago in Infinite Dendrogram time, a certain monstrosity was ravaging the lands of the kingdom. Its name was the “Tri-Zenith Dragon, Gloria.”

It was a three-headed, enormous draconic creature, as mystifying as it was terrorizing, and also the third SUBM ever witnessed.

Gloria appeared in one of the kingdom’s mountain ranges and made its way towards the capital, leaving death and destruction unmatched by most natural disasters in its wake.

As things were, the kingdom would’ve certainly fallen to the monster.

Thus, the kingdom tried to stop Gloria... but alas, its armies were powerless against it, with many of the forces being unable to even stand on the battlefield.

The only tians in the kingdom who could fight it were Superior Job owners such as the Arch Sage and the Celestial Knight, Langley Grandria, or high levels such as the Royal Guard’s vice commander.

However, even if they were to combine their powers, victory against a force as immense as Gloria would still be unlikely, if not downright impossible.

Thus, tians all across the world thought that the kingdom would soon be no more.

But as despair at their encroaching doom overwhelmed Altarian hearts, a certain group of people stood up to the monster.

They were the kingdom’s most experienced Masters... the ones many would refer to as the “no-lifer players.”

A lot of them had been playing since Infinite Dendrogram’s release, and all of them had either reached level 500 or acquired a Superior Job.

To the tians, Gloria’s charge was a matter of the country’s survival or desolation, but to the Masters, it was an mega event typical of MMOs. They scrambled into battle without hesitation, challenged the great dragon... and tasted a crushing defeat.

Gloria's immense power was one reason for this outcome, but there was an even bigger problem: the Masters didn't cooperate with each other.

Though they could work together with their party or clan members, they hadn't been willing to coordinate with Masters outside their circles. And with Gloria being the equivalent of an ultra-powerful world raid boss from classic MMOs, it simply couldn't have been defeated by a number of small groups haphazardly fighting for and by themselves.

The Masters, however, considered wide-scale cooperation to be nothing but plain stupid. After all, Gloria was an SUBM — the apex of all UBMs — meaning that the MVPs of such a fight would receive a Superior MVP special reward, an item of the highest tier.

Thus, coordinating with many people was out of the question for them, as greater numbers would reduce the chances of them becoming MVPs.

Max-level no-lifers that they were, they simply couldn't make this compromise, and that led to their defeat.

So the tians lacked power, while the Masters couldn't work together and failed.

As the kingdom's end once again became all but certain, another set of individuals came to face the dragon.

They were the three Superiors of the kingdom.

The King of Destruction, Shu Starling.

The Over Gladiator, Figaro.

The High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso.

Lei-Lei the Prodigal of Feasts had yet to evolve into a Superior, so these three were the only ones the kingdom had.

Due to their status as the tops of the country's three rankings, they were considered to be Altar's strongest, which led many to believe they could succeed. However, the three were Masters as well, and many thought that they, too, would be unable to cooperate.

Such cynics were proven right when one of the Superiors said something outrageous.

"I'll go first. By myself."

And thus, without even a party at his side, Figaro went solo against Gloria.

Despite his status as a Superior, the power difference between him and the monstrosity was so immense that it seemed hopeless.

Even so, Figaro didn’t break. He continued fighting for as long as he was alive, and when he inevitably began to vanish, he took one of the dragon’s three heads — the one that breathed a devastating light — with him.

“We’re up next, darlings,” said Tsukuyo Fuso. “My ultimate skill won’t work on this one, so let’s take it with our numbers.”

And thus, the head of the Lunar Society and her followers began a raid against Gloria.

The religion’s 34 strongest Masters at that time overwhelmed the dragon while cooperating and coordinating without flaw.

Despite that, they were all wiped out, but they took another head — the one that upheld a deathly barrier — with them.

With that, only one head remained.

“...Going down to just one head made its stats go up,” Shu observed.

By losing two heads... two ways to use its immense power... Gloria had gained stats even greater than before.

Not even the firepower of a Superior Embryo like Baldr could defeat it as it was now, which was exactly why Shu didn’t take that route.

“Then I guess we’ll settle this with fisticuffs,” he said.

Standing in a canyon with no one around to see the showdown, he and the monster glared at each other...

“■■■■■■■■■ ■■■ ■■ ■■■ — Baldr.”

...and began the final battle.

The intensity of their vicious clash shook the earth and changed the surrounding landscape beyond recognition, and at the end of it all, as it was with most fights, there was a victor.

With the death of its last head, Gloria met its end and vanished.

Three Superiors had felled the three heads of the awful, terrorizing great dragon. Thus, after those harsh battles, to show respect for the victories they’d achieved, the people gave them a name.

The ones who’d slain the three heads of Gloria...

The ones who’d surpassed the three-headed dragon...

The three absolute strongest of the Kingdom of Altar...

They were now “The Kingdom of Altar’s Big Three.”

◇◆

Approximately half a year after Gloria’s defeat in Infinite Dendrogram time, the glory of the Big Three had started to fade.

This was because, for reasons unique to each, they had all failed to participate in the war against Dryfe. Many looked down upon them for this, seeing them as failures who had been defeated by the imperium’s Superiors before even fighting.

Recently, however, things had drastically changed.

It had all begun with the incident in Gideon one month ago Dendro time.

First, the Over Gladiator, Figaro, had fought in the Clash of the Superiors and defeated Huang He Empire’s Master Jiangshi, Xunyu, proving that his power was not below that of foreign Superiors.

Second, the King of Destruction, Shu Starling, the one bearing the nickname of “Unknown,” had entered the spotlight and purged the tens of thousands of monsters produced by the Dryfean Superior known as Giga Professor, Mr. Franklin, making his power and presence obvious and known.

With the names of the two resounding throughout the world, Altarians and foreigners alike became aware that the Kingdom of Altar once again had its Big Three.

Indeed, the incident at Gideon had resurrected the name, and since the term “the Big Three” wasn’t complete without a third, naturally, the people’s attention shifted to the High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso.

Many wondered what the bearer of this venerable title was doing right now, and to answer that...

“I’m sooo booored. There’s nooothing to dooo.”

...she was rolling around on the floor of the inner parlor of her Lunar Society’s headquarters.

Though she looked about twenty, the way she rolled on the tatami mats made her seem like a child, but for some reason, it seemed to suit her. Of course, this action made a mess out of her expensive-looking — priceless, in fact, considering it was a Mythical special reward — junihitoe, but she didn’t seem to care.

“Hey, hey, Kage. Heard of any other PKs around the capital?” she asked hopefully. “You know, some people we can blame for something, gang up on, and wipe out like we did the last time.”

A month ago in Infinite Dendrogram time, the Lunar Society had annihilated the PK clan known as “K&R” for, allegedly, giving the death penalty to one of their members.

Wanting something similar, Tsukuyo turned to her clan’s sub-leader and her secretary in real life, the King of Assassins, Eishiro Tsukikage.

Despite looking about as old as her, he had the air of an aged butler about him.

“Currently, there are no such PK incidents in the capital’s surroundings,” he said. “The most notable matter here is the spread of the Epidemic, but as you’re surely aware, it’s not fatal. Also, the lack of malignant mutations leads us to believe that it’s the type to last a while, but have weak symptoms.”

“Is that so?” asked Tsukuyo. “I healed it right away, though. It’s important to weed out diseases before they take root.”

“We also have some more adherents that have caught this Epidemic, so you should remember to heal the ones who pay,” Eishiro added. “I hear that the first princess and the visitor... the third prince of Huang He... have healed naturally, but there are some new infected among the senior statesmen.”

“Really? But I wasn’t called to the castle this time, either.”

The Epidemic had spread, and it had even gone as far as to afflict the royal family, and yet Tsukuyo — a Superior Job of the healing-adept priest grouping — hadn’t been called to the castle even once.

“I believe the first princess is apprehensive about asking for your help,” Eishiro commented.

“I wonder why,” said Tsukuyo. “My High Priestess skills can easily cure the Epidemic. And just about anything else.”

“The illness is not fatal, so she probably thinks that simply waiting for it to abate is better than owing something to you, Lady Tsukuyo.”

“Oh dear me, I wouldn’t ask for too much. That princess is such a worrywart,” she said with a bell-like giggle before forming a wide smile. “I’d only have her change about ten state churches into Lunar Society establishments.”

Depending on one's outlook, that would be a very heavy condition. A while ago, Tsukuyo had proposed to heal the kingdom's royalty and VIPs in exchange for an increase in the Lunar Society's religious institutions, and this offer was still active to this day. This was her modus operandi.

Even if the current Epidemic was fatal, she would still force the country to accept her conditions before she would help.

Tsukuyo always presented outrageous deals and waited until the other parties had no choice but to swallow them. And with her being the High Priestess, she knew there would be no one in this country who could match her in healing ability.

As things were, the Lunar Society was gradually gaining more and more tian adherents.

This was because, just like the standard state churches, the Lunar Society's establishments healed illnesses and wounds. Not only that, Tsukuyo herself could also rid people of afflictions and injuries too heavy for the state clergy, and she could do it with little effort on her part, provided that the payment was right. However, unlike the state church, the Lunar Society limited their healing services only to their adherents.

Thus, through the pain suffered by the ill and the blood spilled by the injured, the clan and religion continued to grow, eroding the current Altarian faith in the process.

Those familiar with the history of Earth would expect the country to crack down on the Lunar Society and begin to suppress it, but that was impossible in this situation. There were a number of reasons for this, but the most prominent one was the fact that the clan's upper echelon was dominated by Masters, Tsukuyo included, and suppressing a gathering of resurrecting, undying individuals was nothing but a fool's errand.

Additionally, the Lunar Society had had enough no-lifers to challenge Gloria — the greatest foe the kingdom had ever faced — and had grown in power even more since that time.

As no-lifers, they naturally had save points in other countries, so even putting them on Altar's wanted list wouldn't cause a problem for them.

Thus, though the kingdom saw the growth of the Lunar Society as troublesome, it was unable to make an enemy out of them, since doing so would mean waging a religious war against a cult full of battle-focused Masters led by a Superior. Worst case scenario, that could result in the end of the kingdom.

"Anything else?" asked Tsukuyo.

"Well, there's one thing you might find intriguing," said Eishiro.

"I'm allll ears."

"It's related to the incident in Gideon."

"Oh. Maaan, that was sooo unfair. Those two got to show off sooo much. I wanted to go wild, too."

"Lady Tsukuyo, if you went wild, there wouldn't be many survivors, so I would prefer it if you didn't."

Eishiro spoke his warning while looking at the wand fixed at Tsukuyo's side. It was the Superior special reward she'd received for taking one of Gloria's heads, Gloria β.

The effect of the deathly barrier it could create was weaker than that of the Tri-Zenith Dragon's, but it was still enough to instantly kill low-level commoners, and it hardly needed to be said what would happen if she used it in a battle to protect a city.

"Oh, come onnn," groaned Tsukuyo. "I'm borrrred, you knowww?"

"I know quite well," said Eishiro as he reached into his inventory, took out a photo, and handed it over to her. "Which is why I'll show you this."

The photo portrayed a particular scene from the incident at Gideon. Specifically, the instant a blond young man, beaten and burned, raised his right arm up into the air.

It was a photo of the moment when Ray had defeated Franklin's RSK — the Ray Starling Killer.

"Oh, this boy," said Tsukuyo. "I was watching Fran's broadcast, too. He was pretty good."

"Have you heard that he's a Maiden's Master?" asked Eishiro.

"Oh, really?"

"Also, the battle cost him his left arm, and he keeps it like that instead of fixing it with a death penalty."

"...Oohh?" Tsukuyo's smile turned even wider.

To some, it might've seemed like she was merely having a good time, but to others, her expression was that of a carnivorous beast with prey in sight.

"Now that's interesting," she said.

"I'm glad you found a way to kill time, Lady Tsukuyo," said Eishiro, feeling nothing but pleased that the one he served seemed satisfied.

“Kage, bring him over to me, will you?” she asked.

“As you command.” A moment later, Eishiro sank into his own shadow. From toe to head, he was consumed by his shade and vanished, quite literally, without a trace.

“Well, I guess I should prepare to welcome him,” said Tsukuyo. “I wonder what he’s like when you talk to him.”

She got up from the ground, stretched, and looked towards a certain part of the room.

“Hear that? His Embryo is a Maiden. You’re a bit excited, aren’t you... Kaguya?”

“Indeed I am. In fact, I am about as excited as you, Tsukuyo.”

The one to answer was a kneeling woman clad in curious clothing. She was wearing a raiment characteristic of tennyo from Japanese myth, and had long, silky hair reminiscent of moonlight.

Though she appeared as fantastical as Tsukuyo, the aura about her was quite different. True to the name “Kaguya,” she seemed to have come from another world.

“Eheheh. Oh, I am excited indeed. Very much so. It appears they even used ■■■ once. Ehehehehehehehe.”

Her eyes closed shut, Kaguya — the Type Maiden Superior Embryo — giggled with anticipation for her meeting with a certain Master and a certain Embryo.

“Come hither, new goddess... Nemesis. I will treat you kindly... Ehehehehehehehehe.”

Kaguya smiled, and so did her Master, Tsukuyo.

Those expressions were a sure sign that the most wicked of the Superiors in the Big Three would soon bring Ray and Nemesis into the fox’s den.

Open Episode: “The Third Power.”

Chapter One: In the Jaws of the Fox

Journalist, Marie Adler

"Just so you guys know, I'm starting college tomorrow," Ray revealed out of the blue.

A month of Dendro time had passed since Franklin's annoying little game. We were currently at a diner annexed to Gideon's sixth arena, celebrating the success of a recent quest.

"Oh, really?" I asked. "Well, it's that time of the year, after all."

In real life in Japan, tomorrow was March 31st. As far as I was aware, colleges and the like would normally start on April 1st, but I guessed it had been moved a day back due to it being a Saturday.

I hadn't gone to any college or university, so I wasn't too knowledgeable about this. The manga I was drawing was set in a societal underworld dominated by inhuman assassins, so I hadn't really needed any higher education.

...Honestly, I was probably more knowledgeable about guns and poisons than anything relating to college life.

"I must say, I had no idea you were a college student," I said, realizing that he was actually younger than me. I'd always assumed that we were as old as each other, or that he was a little bit older. I mean, that bear man was 27.

Then again, it was entirely possible that he'd repeated years or entered college following a gap after high school, which could easily make him older than me.

Digging too much into the real lives of other players was bad manners, but even if it was BM, I couldn't help but be curious.

How old was he? What college was he going to? Maybe I should just ask him? I wondered.

"Will that lower your online time?" Rook spoke up before me.

Oh, yeah, that would be a problem.

These past few days, Ray the one-armed wonder and Rook — no longer

Pimp, but a Lost Heart — had gone on many various kill quests, and I'd accompanied them to help them level up. We'd even returned to the capital and raided the Tomb Labyrinth. Our party had consisted of us three and Kasumi's trio, and we'd been able to defeat the boss on the tenth floor.

Just so you know, I'd done little to help them in the actual fighting. I'd changed my main job from Death Shadow to Journalist and only used the "The Pen is Mightier than the Sword" skill, increasing their EXP gain. After all, if I'd just powerleveled them while doing all the work, they wouldn't learn anything.

Ray had defeated tons of monsters during the past month, and he was getting close to reaching max level on Paladin. Not only that, but the stat growth bonuses from his job and Nemesis had made his HP enter the quintuple digits.

...In contrast, my HP growth was so bad that, despite being a level 500+ with a Superior Job, I was still in the quadruple digits, meaning that he'd already surpassed me in this regard.

Additionally, Ray had had lots of mock battles against me and the duel rankers such as Figaro, which had greatly improved his fighting technique.

It only went to show that there was much to learn by fighting those stronger than yourself. My feints were working on him less and less frequently.

Ray would often dedicate entire Dendro days to quests and mock battles, but that would certainly happen more rarely when he started college.

"On my days off, I'll be online as much as before, but on weekdays, I'll only log in for one day," Ray explained.

One real-life day was equal to three days here, and he was saying that he'd only be able to stay around for one of them. No surprise there; college students seemed like busy creatures. As far as I knew, they spent their after-school hours living out their youth through club activities or part-time jobs.

...Despite that, Ray had implied that he'd be online for eight real-life hours each day. Which, if you asked me, made him into quite a no-lifer.

Looks like the Dendro virus has really corrupted him over the past month, I thought.

Speaking of corruption... his gear made it look like he'd given in to the dark side. To think that he'd looked so decent back when I'd PK'd him a month ago.

...Wait, his dark fashion sense isn't my fault, is it?

"The turns and twists following the PK are directly linked to the present, so I wouldn't say the incidents are unrelated," muttered Rook. "After all, the reason Ray was in Gideon in the first place and got involved in all the incidents here was because the newbie hunt made him go to the Tomb Labyrinth, where he met Figaro, who suggested coming here."

Rook, I would prefer it if you didn't try to hold casual conversations with my thoughts. Also, you're implying that I'm the one who caused Ray's fashion sense to take a turn for the worse, and I won't accept such slander!

It had all started with the one who'd given me the PK request! I didn't know who had done that, but I was willing to bet it was all Franklin's fault!

...Strange. I could almost hear him shout, "No, it's not!" Was I having auditory hallucinations?

"But wait, if your college starts tomorrow, shouldn't you be preparing for it today?" I asked Ray.

"No, I'm actually pretty free today," he answered. "I've already taken care of the necessary paperwork and gone through the physical examination. Right now, it's about 2PM in real life, so I'll be online for the whole of tomorrow here in Dendro, log out, and then go to bed. When it's tomorrow IRL, I'll have to go to another college briefing and the orientation."

Well, he certainly seemed to be more busy than he'd let on.

"No entrance ceremony?" I asked.

"Yeah. That's gonna happen in about two weeks. I was told it's gonna be held in the Budokan, too."

"Wow, I had no idea colleges handled things so strangely." Having never gone into higher education, I was quite surprised by this.

...Huh? I thought as a certain word caught my attention. "...The Budokan?"

Wait a second...

He was going to a college that was holding its entrance ceremony two weeks from now, at the Budokan?

"By the way, uh, don't answer this if you don't want to, but... what's the college?" I asked.

"UTokyo," he answered with no hesitation.

...Th-That's the best place in the country, I thought in shock. The University of Tokyo!

Oh no. Ray was actually a winner at life. I reluctantly compared him to myself, an unemployed high school graduate manga artist, and it made me feel...

“...Bitter,” I muttered under my breath.

“My parents refused to let me live in Tokyo by myself unless I passed the entrance exams for UTokyo during my last year of high school,” he continued. “Also, a year and a half before the exams... on the summer of my second year... I rejected all entertainment and focused solely on studying.”

“Ohh, well... I see... Hm?” I murmured.

Entering UTokyo after a year and a half of intensive studying was certainly quite impressive, but he’d started it at about the same time as Infinite Dendrogram had come out, which made me feel kinda bad for him.

Also, if he’d passed the entrance exams in his last year of high school, then he really was younger than me.

“Wait, so you’re living alone now?” I continued my questions.

“Yeah.” He nodded. “I’m from the northern parts of the country, but last month, I moved to a high-rise apartment building in Tokyo.”

“...Hmm?” I said.

A college student, living all by himself, not in a dorm or some cheap condo, but in a high-rise apartment building?

“First mind... now wealth... Curse you!” I grabbed Ray’s collar and rocked him back and forth, not caring about his protests a single bit.

“Whoa?! What the hell?! Stop shaking me!” he cried.

Feel the resentment of a have-not! I thought.

“...I think lots of people would get mad if you called yourself a have-not, Marie,” said Rook under his breath.

Rook, could you please stop reading my mind and replying? Thank you very much. Also, I didn’t actually say it out loud, so don’t judge me.

“Anyway.” Rook looked at Ray. “You can actually afford an apartment in a high-rise and don’t have to live in a dorm or a cheap flat... Are your parents rich, perchance?”

With his collar still in my hands, Ray shook his head.

“No,” he said. “The allowance I get from my parents doesn’t even cover rent. I can live in a high-rise apartment only because it belongs to Shu.”

“Oh, so that’s how it is.” I let go of him and nodded.

So he lives with that reckless furball bear man King of Destruction... Well, his brother.

...Wait.

"Eh? Didn't you say that you live alone?" I asked.

"Yes, and...? Oh, sorry, the way I put it is confusing. Let me rephrase," he said, correcting himself. "I'm borrowing an apartment in a building owned by Shu, so I don't have to pay any rent."

That semi-naked fur man actually has an apartment building — a no-effort source of income — in an urban area?

"Really?" I asked incredulously.

"Yeah, Shu said, 'Just use any of the free rooms in my three apartment buildings, you can pay the rent after you get a job and start making bank,' so I just chose the one closest to college, and—"

"Wait, 'three'?!" I cut his words short and howled.

Three apartment buildings in an urban area?! How?!

"Where did he get the money for them?" I exclaimed.

Ray put on a distant look. "When he was still in college, he often used to accompany his professors to their presentations in other countries, and he casually bought lottery tickets every time."

...You're joking.

"He actually won?" I asked.

Ray slowly nodded. "He called us and said, 'I hit the jackpot with a lottery ticket I bought for no real reason and got some serious money,' and even with all the international taxes and handling charges, he still had an insanely huge fortune. I'm kinda scared of finding out the exact amount, so I never actually asked." There was that distant look again.

Honestly, Ray's brother's IRL luck was so broken, it left me speechless. That arsonist hairball was an enigma both here and on the other side.

"So yeah," Ray continued, "Shu used the money to buy land and apartment buildings. I still remember how hard our dad snapped when he shouted, 'Woohoo! No-effort income! Now I don't need a job!'"

Well, it was only natural to be upset when your college graduate son proudly proclaimed that he would live a life of leisure because he'd won the lottery. My sympathies to you, Papa Starling.

"Anyway, that explains why your working-age brother is online around the clock," I said.

"Indeed it does." Nemesis nodded. "Hm? Wait a second."

"What?" Ray raised an eyebrow.

"You said that Brother Bear was a popular child actor when he was young, and the world champion martial artist during his school years, no?"

"Yeah."

What? That's just... disturbing, I thought. Then again, I think I've actually heard of someone with such a track record.

"So, basically," Nemesis continued, "Brother Bear is an insanely talented individual with a brilliant track record who now spends his days as a video game no-lifer NEET surviving on money he won in a lottery?"

"...Yep."

I might not have been in a position to say this, considering I was a manga artist who had shut herself into Infinite Dendrogram instead of doing my job, but... he was definitely wasting his talent.

"We went off on a tangent there," commented Ray.

"Indeed we did," I agreed.

What we'd just talked about was so astonishing that it could easily have become the main subject of the conversation.

"Anyway, starting tomorrow in real-life time, I'm a college student," Ray said.

"Real life is important. Don't neglect it, and do your best," I said.

It was a shame that he'd only be able to take quests spanning multiple days on weekends and the like. Then again, right now, in real life, it wasn't even 3PM. Just as Ray had said, even if he planned to go to sleep early, he could easily spend a whole day's worth of time here in Dendro.

"Then let's go on a big quest tomorrow!" Rook proposed. "We have Audrey, so we can even pick one that takes us far away!"

Ray and I both nodded in response.

Flying monsters were always useful in these situations. With Rook's Audrey and Ray's Silver, I had come to know this pretty well.

Maybe I should buy a flying monster myself? I wondered.

Though I was taking a break from it right now, I'd pooled quite a lot of wealth from my professional PKing, so I definitely had the money for one. These days, I even had some nice extra income from the jobs I was doing for Count Gideon.

Wait... "pooled"... "pool"... That gives me an idea, I thought and spoke my mind.

"Then how about we go to the seaside tomorrow?"

As far as I was aware, these two hadn't seen Dendro's seas yet.

"The seaside? Good idea. We could go fishing," said Ray.

"And I might be able to tame an aquatic monster," Rook put in.

The two were clearly in favor of it.

Personally, I was looking forward to sketching them in their swimwear. It was for research purposes, of course. Couldn't neglect to gather material, after all.

"The sea, you say?" Nemesis asked with interest. "Fresh seafood... Kamameshi... Seconds, please."

"The sea... Maybe I'll get to cover some sashimi in habanero topping..." Babi murmured.

Those two were the same as they always were. Also, in my humble opinion, sashimi covered in habanero topping would be sashimi no longer.

"Then let's meet up tomorrow at the western gate. How does eight o'clock sound?" I asked.

"No objections there," said Ray.

"Same here." Rook nodded.

And so, with the meeting time and place properly set, we went our own ways.

◇

The following day, Ray, for reasons unknown, hadn't showed up at the meeting spot. The friends list said that he was online, so we checked up on him at the inn he was staying at.

When we asked, the proprietress of the establishment said, "He didn't come down when it was time for breakfast, and when I went to call him, I found this in the gap in the door," and gave us a piece of paper.

Its contents said:

"Due to certain circumstances, I had to summon Mr. Ray Starling to our headquarters.
I greatly apologize for this abrupt interruption of your plans.
Please bring your complaints to the nearest Lunar Society branch.

Yours sincerely,
The Lunar Society’s spiritual leader’s secretary, King of Assassins, Eishiro Tsukikage.”

"..."

"..."

"Hey, is this a kidnapping?" said Babi, breaking the silence.

Oh, uh... Yes, I realized.

I had many things to say about this situation, but the jist of it was this: Ray had yet again found himself in some sort of trouble.

Barely a month had passed since Franklin's Game, and it looked like he was now at the epicenter of a new major event.

"...The swimsuits will have to wait," I said as I went to contact the furball.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

I woke up to see a ceiling completely unlike the one I had seen as I was drifting off into dreamland.

"I'm quite sure I was sleeping on a bed at an inn," I said through my drowsiness.

Now, however, I was in a futon in a predominantly wooden, Japanese-looking room.

I momentarily thought that I was back at my parents' house in real life, but though the room was similar in style, it certainly wasn't the same.

It had the aesthetic characteristic of Japanese construction, but it looked far more expensive than any place I'd ever lived at.

"This is... not real life," I said as I noticed my avatar's blond hair drop over my eyes and confirmed that I could open the game's menus.

Indeed, I was still in Infinite Dendrogram.

"You're awake," said Nemesis as she popped out of the crest on my left hand and sat on her knees next to my futon. Her posture was surprisingly proper.

"Nemesis... where are we?" I asked.

"I don't know." She shrugged. "We seem to have arrived here while I was still sleeping within you."

I was silent.

From her words, I could deduce one thing.

The one who'd taken me out of my bed at the inn and brought me here had done it so silently that neither I nor Nemesis had woken up. As far as I was aware, not even Marie, with all her Death Shadow skills, was capable of such a feat.

Overcome with worry, I looked into my inventory, but thankfully, it didn't seem like anything was stolen.

"But Ray, can't you check where we are by simply looking at the map?" asked Nemesis.

"You have a... point?" I said as I opened the map, and what I saw made me tilt my head in confusion.

The words written there were:

[Royal Capital, Altea, The Lunar Society Headquarters]

"...Calm down, me," I muttered.

Players were automatically given the maps of the capitals of the countries we belonged to, so the map window showed my exact location. I was in an area outside the walls encircling the capital. That was fine and all, but I couldn't say the same for the name of the place.

"'The Lunar Society Headquarters'..."

I was at the heart of operations of the one and only Lunar Society — the largest clan in the kingdom and an actual real-life cult.

The fact that I'd been taken from my inn and was moved to the headquarters of such a shady bunch could only mean one thing...

"I'M KIDNAPPED!"

Why did they kidnap me?! For what purpose?! I thought frantically.

"Don't men only come to establishments like this when trying to save girls they're acquainted with?" asked Nemesis.

"Well, I gue... HEY, NOW'S NOT THE TIME!"

"Calm yourself. A predicament like this is nothing compared to the lab coat lunatic's shenanigans."

"This isn't like anything Franklin did, but being kidnapped by a cult is still freaky as hell!"

"Hm..." she said.

Okay, Ray, think. Work your brain... Oh, yeah!

"Nemesis, I actually have no reason to panic!" I declared.

"Oh?"

"I can just log out and return to the save point in Gideon."

"That's a great idea!"

All right, I'll just open the menu, start the log out process, and...

[Cannot log out: In contact with another entity]

...Pardon?

"I... I can't log out," I muttered as I fell to my knees.

"You sound like the protagonist of a death game VRMMO story," Nemesis commented.

"No, really, I can't. It says that I'm in contact with someone..."

To log out, a player had to go 30 seconds without touching anyone. We were the only ones in the room, and there was no one who could touch me, so why...?

"Oh, so that's why I've been feeling a presence here," said Nemesis.

A presence? I asked telepathically.

"Ever since I woke up, I've felt as though there was another Embryo here," she answered. "We are probably within the effective range of a Type Territory or Castle. Naturally, that prevents you logging out, as that counts as you being 'in contact' with someone."

"Ah...!" Shock overcame me. They'd actually anticipated me trying to go offline, and had prepared a countermeasure. That meant that...

"It appears the ones who brought you here have no intention of letting you go," said Nemesis.

"Seems like it..."

Suddenly, the room's sliding door opened up.

"Hm?!" Completely on edge, I turned towards it.

"Ray!" Nemesis shouted as she transformed into the Black Blade. I hastily grabbed her hilt and brandished her.

The one who came through the sliding door...

"Good morning, Mr. Ray, Miss Nemesis."

...was a servant.

Specifically, a nakai — a waitress-like girl working at traditional Japanese inns. The lack of crest on her left hand meant that she was a tian.

Besides those two points, the only notable thing about her was the mark on her kimono, which displayed a crescent moon and a closed eye.

“Your breakfast is ready,” she continued. “I will lead you to it once you’ve changed.”

Seemingly having said all she had to, she politely bowed and closed the sliding door.

“Hm...” Nemesis and I were at a loss for words.

Well, that sure softened the tense air in here, I thought.

“What now?” Nemesis asked.

“Guess I’ll change,” I said.

I was still in my pajamas, after all. I had no idea what I was in store for, but considering where I was, I had to at least be battle-ready.

“Very well,” nodded Nemesis. “And then we’ll have breakfast.”

I’m not too sure about that, I thought. What if it’s spiked?

“Wouldn’t that be a good thing?” Nemesis asked.

“What?”

“If the food is poisoned in some way, we can simply use Reversal.”

...Good point. I guess spiking isn’t much of a problem for us.

“With that in mind, let’s go have breakfast. We’re kidnapped, after all. Might as well have a feast at their expense.”

“Nemesis...” I muttered.

I couldn’t help but feel that recently, this partner of mine had become even more gluttonous. Was she about to go into hibernation or something?

But we did go to breakfast together.

“This is really good,” I said after taking a bite.

“It’s... amazing,” Nemesis agreed.

I mean, sure, it had looked good from first glance, but the circumstances certainly hadn’t made me think it would be. Basically, the breakfast we were given was stupidly delicious.

“It just... really emphasizes the taste of each ingredient,” I commented between bites.

“The seasoning is light, but so satisfying at the same time,” Nemesis added.

I’d never even considered that Infinite Dendrogram had Japanese food of this kind. Not having both hands made it a bit hard to eat, though. I couldn’t hold the rice bowl.

“I haven’t been this satisfied with my meal’s taste since our first day here," said Nemesis.

"Same here, actually," I nodded.

"I'm glad you two like it, darlings," said someone behind me.

The food the Star Chef had made for my welcome party had been the greatest cooking I'd ever eaten in Infinite Dendrogram, and these dishes here actually rivaled it.

"It has such detailed flavors," said Nemesis as we were finishing up. "Looks like the kingdom's largest clan has no shortage of skilled people. Do they have high-rank and Superior Jobs from the cook grouping or something?"

"Actually, this is my secretary's natural cooking," said the voice behind me. "Even in real life, Kage's food is sooo good that it could be in a manga."

"Oh, yeah," I said. "Cooking is a type of sense skill, so—"

Suddenly, all the cells in my entire body began to shake. It was a reaction to multiple powerful stimuli attacking me all at once.

I belatedly felt surprise at the voice that had been joining our exchanges as though it belonged, then became overcome with shock at the woman embracing me from behind, then felt intoxication from her own scent and the fragrant wood incense smell coming from her clothes, and lastly... I was overwhelmed by fear as a living creature.

I felt as though my neck was in the jaws of a tiger, as though my head could fall off with the most casual of bites.

"Hh?!" I gasped as I realized that the woman holding me could easily end me.

I was familiar with this sensation. I had felt it on my first meeting with Figaro in the Tomb Labyrinth, and in my encounter with Xunyu before the Clash of the Superiors. However, this time, I was feeling such danger directly on my skin, which made it countless times more scary.

"Hmm? What's wrong, sweetie? You're shaking," the woman said, as though whispering to me. "Oh, and don't glare at me like that, li'l Maiden. This is just some light skinship." She then slowly let me go, running her pale, slender fingers along my neck in the process.

"Rgh!" I grunted as I instantly got up, ran to Nemesis, had her turn into a greatsword, and grabbed her by the hilt.

I had three Counter Absorption uses — my current maximum. And yet, for some reason, it did little to help me feel safe.

This wasn't like the time when I'd ran out of uses while facing overwhelming odds, not like the time when I hadn't been able to activate it fast enough against Xunyu, not like the time when Marie had taken advantage of my flaws in our rematch, and not like the time when it had been broken in a mock battle.

Though she would probably handle it in an entirely different way, I had a feeling that this woman would render Counter Absorption meaningless.

"Oh no, sorryyy." She put her hands together and giggled while apologizing. "I overdid it with the teasing." In all honesty, that gesture was quite adorable, and an overwhelming majority of men would find it charming. Had I the emotional capacity right now, even I might've been captivated.

However, the fear I'd felt when she'd touched me seemed far more reliable than any cutesy gesture.

"So you're Ray Starling and his Maiden, Nemesis," said the woman — or, rather, the woman-shaped aberration.

"You're sooo earnest," she continued. "I like that. I like that a lot."

She cracked a smile just like the one I saw on her in the recording on the crystal, and began introducing herself.

"I'm the High Priestess, Tsukuyo Fuso. I'm the leader of The Lunar Society. Let's get along, shall we?"

Shu, Lei-Lei, Figaro, and now her. We were face-to-face with the last Superior of the Kingdom of Altar.

After her introduction, Tsukuyo Fuso called some people to clean up the table.

For the whole time they were doing their job, I was just grasping Nemesis and barely moving a muscle.

Nemesis and I were both silent, unsure of how to react to the prime suspect behind our kidnapping.

However, the one to break the tense silence that had overcome us was none other than the person who'd caused it.

"That left arm of yours..." she said while pointing at the limb I'd lost in my fight against Franklin, which was now replaced by a hook prosthetic. "So you really haven't fixed it yet."

"Sadly, I don't know anyone who can do that for me," I said.

Speaking of which, Marie had said that the High Priestess was capable of it. She held a Superior Job from the priest grouping, after all. Despite that, I had absolutely no intention of asking this aberration to fix me up. I could now understand full well why Marie had recommended against it.

Seriously, who in their right mind would request anything of... that? Might as well try the devil. He'd probably give you a better deal.

"For someone who's barely even talked to her, you sure seem to consider her a danger," Nemesis commented telepathically.

Being kidnapped by her is more than enough reason, if you ask me, I replied.

Besides that, merely being touched by her and exchanging several words with her had been enough for me to come to a conclusion.

She's as bad as, if not worse than, Franklin.

"Heh, agreed," Nemesis said. "I also feel the same way about the presence behind her."

I could feel her shift her attention towards somewhere behind Tsukuyo Fuso — an area we couldn't see from our position.

"Hmm..." The aberration showed little concern about Nemesis and me being on high alert. Ignoring that completely, she continued her questions. "You can fix it, but you're not doing it... Why aren't you getting the death penalty? Hm?"

"What?" I raised an eyebrow.

"I mean, if you get the death penalty, you'll be completely healed after just a 24 hour break, no? I don't see the reason to spend more than ten days... a whole month of this world's time... with such a disability."

Oh yeah, Marie said the same thing, I recalled. Still, I don't think that's an option.

"What kind of idiot dies just to fix his arm?" I asked.

Even if I had to die in the near future, I didn't want it to be for the sake of just an arm. That would be unreasonable.

"Ha ha!" Tsukuyo Fuso laughed, her eyes open wide. It wasn't a loud, roaring laughter — the sounds escaping her covered mouth were a bell-like giggle.

I didn't know if anything I said was funny or if she was laughing for some other reason, but I felt like taking advantage of this moment was a bad idea, so I just stood stock still.

"This... is so good." Tsukuyo Fuso muttered as she stopped laughing and looked at us again.

Her gaze was completely different from before.

I felt as if there was some sort of fire in her eyes, and it made me freeze in fear.

"You know, sweetie," she said, "I actually had you come here to invite you to join my clan. You're pretty famous, after all."

"Not happening."

If I ever entered a clan, this certainly wouldn't be it.

Cults were freaky in and of themselves, but more than that, I was just really scared of the... thing before me, and that feeling only grew stronger the more we talked.

"I'll fix your arm if you join us, though," she offered. "I'm the only one in this country who can do that, you know?"

"Still... not happening."

"Hmmm..." She turned away from me.

The fact that she wasn't facing me anymore soothed me, if only a little bit.

I didn't know whether she was aware of my current emotional state, but Tsukuyo Fuso continued talking.

"I don't want anyone who chooses a 'logical' death penalty."

Wait... What the hell is this ominous feeling? I thought.

"I don't want anyone whose reasons for not choosing a death penalty are boring."

She's looking away from me, and yet...

"And I don't want anyone who's not cute in some way."

Yet the fear binding me just continues to grow.

"So, honestly..." she said before quickly turning around, making her long hair sway. "I really want you."

Those words, combined with her gaze, filled me with fear far greater than before.

"...Gh! HELLISH MIASMA!" I shouted.

Still holding Nemesis in my right hand, I directed Gardranda's right bracer towards Tsukuyo Fuso and launched the triple debuff mist. I didn't care that we were inside or that she was close to me. That aberration was far scarier than any debuff.

“Oh, so this is the Legendary they were talking about,” she said. “Holy Zone Horizon.”

In an instant, the miasma was gone. The dark purple mist vanished as if it had never been there.

“What?!” I gaped.

The space around us was bathed in light and filled with a purified air. It felt as if the world itself had been remade anew.

“This is one of my High Priestess skills,” she explained. “It nullifies all disease and curse-based debuffs within the area!”

“Nullifies them... all?!” I yelped.

The High Priestess was a Superior Job from the priest grouping, which was focused on healing and purification. I should have expected her to be able to do this!

“It’s quite a shame. That might’ve worked if you’d been up against anyone else.” She covered her mouth and giggled again.

Ohh no, I’m not giving up yet! I thought.

She was a support-type Superior Job, so she ought to have lower stats than vanguard roles. Of course, I didn’t expect her to be as frail as Franklin, but in 1v1 melee combat, I should have a chance...

“Okay, me neeext!” she said as I kicked the tatami below and sprinted to her side. “Lunar Divider Field.” The world was engulfed in night.

We were inside, and yet above us, I saw a dark sky with a large blue moon. An unnatural space — a world abnormal.

“It’s just like in the crys...tal... Gh?!” I said. Or at least tried to, but something strange began happening.

“Ray?!” Nemesis exclaimed.

As the night I’d once seen in Marie’s crystal overtook the world, my body started malfunctioning. I wasn’t taking in any air... No, I was breathing normally, but my lungs and heart weren’t delivering oxygen like they were supposed to. Not only that, but my body was quickly turning colder!

“This is my Kaguya’s... my Superior Embryo’s unique skill,” she said as she looked down on me, squirming on the floor and grasping at my chest. “Its name is ‘Lunar Reduction Field.’ It’s pretty famous. You didn’t know about it?”

No, I goddamn didn’t!

“Basically... this skill creates an area where all the numbers I find inconvenient are reduced to a sixth of their original value.”

Inconvenient... numbers?

“It divides enemy stats by six, the damage they deal by six, their heart rate by six, their body temperature by six... among many other things. Oh, and it’s probably six because it’s ‘Lunar.’ The gravity on the Moon is six times weaker, you know?”

“Wh...?!”

What the hell?! No one could stand a chance against that!

The damage she would receive would be divided by 36 — the combination of the stat and damage division. Not to mention that her opponents’ bodily functions would drop way below tolerable levels.

“Well, high-level people can resist it. A bit,” she added.

That basically meant that a sub-level 100 newbie like myself would be feeling its full effect.

“But... I...!” I said through ragged breaths as I remembered one of my skills.

...I have a way to fight this!

“Neme...sis!”

“Very well!” cried Nemesis as she switched from her Black Blade form into the Flag Halberd.

At the same time, I activated Like a Flag Flying the Reversal. It was one of Nemesis’s unique skills, and it reversed the effects of debuffs I was subjected to.

Now, I’ll turn this Superior Embryo’s debuff against its Master, and...

“Khh...” I groaned and realized that something was off.

Reversal was up and active, yet it was still hard to breathe. It had become a bit easier, sure, but that was the extent of it.

“What... is this...?” Nemesis said, her voice thick with shock. “I... I can’t reverse it? Can’t push it back? The output is just too...”

“What’s wrong, Nemesis?!” I shouted, but all I got in response was silence, as if she was completely dumbfounded by something.

“You have the right idea here,” said the aberration. “My Kaguya is focused on debuffs, so this skill Nemesis has is her, well, nemesis.”

I didn’t know whether she’d learned about my Reversal beforehand or if she’d figured it out just now, but she clearly knew what it did.

"But..." She tut-tutted me. "That only applies when you and I... and our Kaguya and Nemesis... are on a similar tier."

"Wh-What...?" I stammered.

What does that mean?

"Your Nemesis is still just low-rank, while my Kaguya is a Superior Embryo."

Smirking in the most terrifying manner, she slightly opened her eyes and looked at me with a spine-chilling gleam in her gaze.

"Their base powers are on entirely different digits, sweetie," she continued with a giggle. "You can't carry 100 tons just because you can lift 100 kilos, you know? Same thing. Though, from how it feels here, she can probably reverse debuffs from high-rank jobs just fine. Heh heh."

"Gh!" I shouted.

The description for Reversal did say that its effects could be affected by the enemy's level and skill level. But... the skill had reversed so many debuffs I'd been subjected to. It had even turned around all the nightmarish status effects piled on me by the Lich, so how could it have no effect here?

"Up until now, you've won against stronger enemies because you were compatible, no?" she said with an eerily gentle voice as she walked up to me. "Well, here's something for you to keep in mind, darling. Compatibility... isn't enough to win against someone with absolute power."

Then she extended her bare foot from out of her junihitoe and kicked me directly in the chin.

"...Hh," I gasped as my consciousness was forced to shut down.

Chapter Two: The Maidens’ Tea Party

Death Shadow, Marie Adler

Ray had been kidnapped by The Lunar Society, the clan led by the infamous High Priestess.

“Why does he attract the attention of such troublesome individuals?” I mumbled.

First Franklin, now Tsukuyo Fuso... Just what did the guy do to deserve this? I added silently.

“Excuse me, but weren’t you the first ‘troublesome individual’ he encountered?” asked Rook.

“Oh hush, Rook. You might have a point, but now’s not the time for that.”

This was a serious event that might even go beyond the confines of Infinite Dendrogram.

The two of us were clearly not enough to handle this. We needed more manpower, and there was no better opponent for Tsukuyo than another one of the kingdom’s Big Three, Ray’s very own brother bear... the King of Destruction, Shu Starling. I wasn’t sure about in real life, but surely he could counter most of her nonsense here in Dendro.

“What about you, Marie?” asked Babi, the curiosity in her tone all too evident. “Can’t you do it?”

“...Well, if we’re talking about just killing Tsukuyo Fuso, then I probably can,” I said.

I wasn’t called “The Superior Killer” for no reason. If I delivered a good surprise attack while she was off-guard, I might be able to quickly dig through the High Priestess’s HP and PK her. However, as things were...

“It’s impossible,” I sighed.

“But whyyy?” Babi asked.

“Because... she has the King of Assassins with her.”

King of Assassins was the Superior Job of the assassin grouping, and it currently belonged to Eishiro Tsukikage — the functional second-in-command at The Lunar Society.

It was much like my Death Shadow in nature. The only real differences were that mine was eastern, while his was western, and that Death Shadow was focused primarily on hiding the user's presence, while the King of Assassins specialized in, as the name might suggest, assassination.

And because of that, just like I was as good at seeing through Conceal as I was at Concealing myself, he was as good at preventing assassinations as he was at assassinating.

As long as she had him at her side, the High Priestess would be an impossible target for me. Any and all of my surprise attacks would be countered.

"In fact, we can't even be sure if giving her the death penalty would be enough," I added. After all, we were faced with a cult that had a solid presence both here and in reality. And if that wasn't troublesome — nothing was.

Still, that furball could, at the very least, save Ray from his predicament here in Dendro, and...

"Ah," Rook exclaimed, pointing. "Look, Marie! Ray's brother is right over there!"

I turned to where he was pointing, and saw...

"The bear's popcorn! Gosh, oh boy!
Eating them is so much joy!
Your taste buds these will destroy!"

The bear was standing at a popcorn cart and attracting customers with a song sung in the most needlessly beautiful voice.

What is this manbear-thing even doing? I thought, exasperated.

"Mister Shu!" Rook called as we approached him.

"Oh, hey there, Rook, Babi, Superior Killer," the bear greeted us. "Something wrong? You look beary out of it. Oh yeah, Superior Killer, I—"

"Don't call me 'Supe... whatever and so forth' in public!" I shouted. "And just what are you doing here?"

Why was the top of the kingdom's kill rankings selling popcorn? Had he gotten a part-time job as some business's mascot or something?

"A furmer I know retired and went off to Caldina, so I went and bought all the corn he had left," the furball answered.

Well, Altar was politically unstable and kept bleeding people daily...

No, wait, but why had he bought them?

"I'm selling popcorn to get money fur Baldr's ammo," he continued. "The KoD's seal of approval actually makes it beary popular."

"You could go hunting instead," I commented. "Thought about that, Mr. Kill Ranking Number One?" He'd definitely earn more money that way.

"Well," he scratched his cheek as he responded. "I have reasons that keep me from going too far from here. Anyway, what's your deal? You were looking for me, weren't you?"

"Well, Ray was kidnapped by The Lunar Society, and..."

Once Rook explained the situation, the surrounding air instantly shifted.

"Reeaaally, now?" said the bear who was the King of Destruction. He was spitting words so laced with bloodlust that one needed no skills to sense it. Though it wasn't directed at us, it still made a chill go down my spine.

The people around us were shaking, as well, thoroughly unaware as to why.

"That damn cultist fox bitch..." he continued with not a hint of the usual humor in his tone, even swearing in the process. Clearly, he was most displeased about the kidnapping.

...Wait, had he been like this back when I'd given Ray the death penalty?

...Th-That's just terrifying, I thought as another chill went down my spine.

"The guy has college tomorrow, damn it..." the angry bear sighed. "Man, how am I supposed to go about this?"

"You're actually thinking this through?" I raised an eyebrow.

That was thoroughly unexpected. Knowing this bear, I'd expected him to go straight to the capital and raid The Lunar Society's headquarters the moment he'd heard that Ray was in a pinch.

"Strange," I said, speaking my thoughts. "I expected you to rush to them and punch her lights out the moment we told you."

I mean, you scorched the entire Noz Forest when I PK'd Ray, I thought.

"Believe me, I'd love to do that, but I can't really move from here right now," the bear said, once again telling us that he couldn't leave the city.

Was something happening here in Gideon? Surely he didn't mean that he was too busy with his popcorn business to leave, right?

...Then again, I couldn't really put it past this ursine barrel of laughs.

“I see,” I sighed, giving up on his help. “But if you can’t act... saving Ray will become much harder. Well, if worst comes to worst, he can escape by just using suicide.” As a precaution against harassment and cyber bullying, Dendro had the “suicide” feature. It allowed players to give themselves the death penalty by simply willing it, letting them escape situations where they, for some reason, couldn’t log out the normal way.

It came with the risk of dropping precious items, but the most valuable gear in Ray’s possession — the two special rewards — couldn’t be transferred in any way, including via dropping upon death.

Also, most of the money he’d acquired from Gouz-Maise, Clash of the Superiors, and Franklin’s Game had been entrusted to the relevant public institutions.

The only thing to fear was the possibility of his dropping Silver, but considering the number of items he had on him, that was highly unlikely. Ray’s daily gacha rolls had given him quite a stuffed inventory.

All in all, a death penalty wouldn’t be too bad for him. In fact, once he came back from it, he would get his arm back and be fully healed — a huge plus, no doubt.

However...

“Well, sure he can use suicide,” said the bear man. “But knowing him, he won’t want to.”

Yeah, that, I thought.

I mean, the guy had chosen to spend a month of Dendro time without an arm instead of fixing it with a death penalty.

“Still, if we don’t do anything about this, his college life could be in danger...” I said.

We were dealing with The Lunar Society here. That bunch of literal lunatics would have no qualms about keeping him from logging out for 24 hours and beyond.

...Oh dear, that might even cause Ray’s real body to be in danger.

“The timing just couldn’t be worse,” growled the bear. “Leaving Gideon and letting the nuclear duo do what they want isn’t an option, so... damn.”

Nuclear duo...?

“Who do you mea—?”

“Should I go, then?” asked someone at my side, cutting my question short.

I turned and saw none other than the most famous person in Gideon.

"Over Gladiator, Figaro..." I muttered his job and name.

It was another one of the Big Three and, without a doubt, one of the strongest Masters in the kingdom.

...For some reason, he was actually eating the popcorn sold by the bear.

"I'm about to... raid the Tomb Labyrinth again, anyway," he said while munching down the popcorn. "I can also pay a visit... to The Lunar Society."

He then cracked a smile while looking at us with those slit-like eyes of his.

It was no doubt a pretty expression, but alas, his popcorn-eating completely ruined it.

"You'll help him?" asked the bear man.

"Of course." Figaro nodded. "Ray worked really hard while I was unable to move back during Franklin's Game. I'd like to return the favor."

"Thanks," said the bear.

So we now had the one and only Figaro on our side.

...This will work, I thought in relief. In fact, the Over Gladiator would be even better than KoD in this situation. With the High Priestess being holed up in her HQ at the capital, the bear would have had to hold back so that he wouldn't destroy the city, but Figaro had no such limitations. Not to mention that his limitless buffing was a good counter to her debuffs. No matter how heated things got, he could save Ray without much trouble.

"You probably know this, but..." the bear began.

"Yeah," Figaro cut his words short. "If she and I fight, I'll make sure to end it before she uses her ultimate skill. Otherwise, I'll lose."

...Eh? I thought in surprise.

"Thankfully, it's still daytime," he added. "If I hurry, I should be able to settle it before sundown."

"...Take care, my dude."

"Yeah. All right, I'm off," he said before running away from us at supersonic speeds. Even I found it hard to follow his shape. He'd probably switched to AGI-focused gear.

With how fast he's going, it won't be long until he's at the capital, I reflected.

"Marie," Rook spoke up. "What do we do now?"

"Well..." I muttered, and began to ponder. At our top speed, it would take us several hours to arrive at Altea. But if all went well, we might be able to meet up with Ray right after he was rescued by Figaro.

"Maybe we should go right now...?" I said.

"I don't think there's a need fur that," the bear commented.

"Why?"

"No matter how quickly Figaro does his thing and saves Ray from the lunatic cultists, Ray would need to log out immediately. Going there now would beary much be a waste of time."

Well, he wasn't wrong, but I didn't feel too good about entrusting it all to Figaro alone.

"Also, Superior K... Marie," he continued as he reached into his inventory and took out a letter. "I have this for you."

The "To Marie" written on the envelope in cutesy handwriting made it easy to tell who was the sender.

"Is this from Ellie?" I asked to confirm.

"Fur sure," the bear nodded. "She and Liliana came to me while I was selling popcorn yesterday and handed this over to me."

Well, our party had been out on a quest for the whole of yesterday, so they'd probably figured that giving the letter to the bear, our party member's brother, was a good way to get it to me.

They'd actually entrusted a letter to this furball... Well, as far as Superiors went, he was definitely a good person, so it wasn't the worst idea. He certainly wasn't reasonable by any stretch of the imagination, though.

"They told me it was fur a quest," the bear added.

"A quest for me? From Ellie?"

Now, what could it be? I pondered.

"Yeah, so I'd say you should focus on that. Also, Rook."

"Yes?" Rook replied.

"Lend me your ear fur a sec."

"Hm...? All right."

The bear walked up to Rook, brought his mouth to his ear, and whispered something. In all honesty, it felt kinda like I was watching a bear about to eat a person.

"I see," nodded Rook. "Very well, then."

"All right. Come to me within the next few Dendro days. Whenever Ray’s offline and you have nothing going on will do just fine.”

The two seemed to have made some sort of arrangement.

“Just what are you two planning?” I asked.

“Well, in a word... ‘training,’” the bear answered.

Training? The furball is gonna train Rook? I raised an eyebrow.

“That’s the simplest way to put it, anyway,” the bear added. “I mean, Ray’s been in lots of mock battles, but you can’t really say the same for Rook, can you?”

True enough. Rook had been primarily an observer, rather than a participant.

Wait, no, that wasn’t the crux here. What I had to ask was...

“...What does this ‘training’ involve?”

“Death...ly difficulty, but it’s beary much worth doing, yes.”

H-He just straight up said “death” and then added some words that don’t make it the least bit better.

“...Isn’t a Superior like you a bit too much for a newbie like him?” I asked.

“The world is an unbearably harsh place,” the furball sighed. “It even has veteran players who stalk forests and go around massacring newbies on their first day of Dendro.”

...Sincerest apologies, I thought and looked away. I have no say in this matter.

“I don’t mind it,” Rook spoke up. “Also, if he went out of his way to bring it up, then this training is probably very important.”

“It is.” The bear nodded. “I guarantee it.”

Rook seemed to be very accepting of the idea.

Are you sure? You’re training with the bear, you know?

“Anyway, with that pawsitively settled, again, come find me whenever you have free time.”

“Yes, of course,” Rook said.

The bear then left us, dragging his popcorn cart behind him. It kinda felt like he was avoiding us, but instead of investigating it, we just went our own way.

I then opened and read Ellie’s letter, parted ways with Rook, and went to her place.

Sure, I was still concerned about Ray, but I decided to entrust him to Figaro.

I could only hope that the situation would be resolved without Ray having to choose the death penalty.

◇◇◇

Duel city Gideon, alley

Once Shu pulled his popcorn cart into an empty alleyway, someone behind him began talking to him.

“Do you plan to train the newbie and make him capable of doing something against us... or him?”

It was a lone woman. She had the appearance of an average adventurer, but the porcupine-like animal in her arms made her more than notable.

As for her expression... it was clearly mocking.

“We heard your exchange back there,” she continued. “So neither Figaro, the prime primate around these parts, nor your lucky, puny Superior-killing little brother is here, eh? Such a shame we don’t have any orders from the imperator. As things are, we wouldn’t have to kick away any annoying trash gathering around us.”

Those words clearly mocked the weak and frail, but they weren’t enough to arouse Shu’s anger.

“‘Kicking away trash’?” he said. “What are you, some sort of slovenly OL?”

“‘OL’? What does that mean?”

“...Oh, I see. That expression isn’t beary popular in your cultural sphere. Well, can’t say I blame you. I mean, it’s a neologism that was created in a Japanese magazine.”

“But what does it mea—? Well, no matter. I must say, though, you certainly like making assumptions. That little encounter made it clearer than all the days since the incident have.”

“Mh...” the bear muttered.

“You’re here to keep an eye on us, aren’t you? That’s why you’re staying in the city instead of going out and hunting. Am I right?”

“Well, if worst comes to worst, I’m just about the only one who can stop you.” Shu’s reply was very casual, definitely not meant to bring out any sort of emotion, but it was enough to make the woman knit her brow.

“You’re gravely wrong about one thing,” she said in a menacing tone, and looked at him with a beast-like glint in her eye. “You are not enough to stop the Queen of Beasts... and the King of Beasts.”

The murderous aura about her was enough to instantly kill the faint of heart. Even hardened warriors would shiver when facing it.

“I wouldn’t be so sure about that.”

But the King of Destruction remained firm. Like a boulder standing solid in the wildest storm — or perhaps like a willow letting the mighty winds pass it by — Shu was unfazed by her threats.

“Care to try?” she said, pushing the tension further and creating an air much like the one that formed between Figaro and Xunyu during the Clash of the Superiors.

This one was very different in nature, though. While Figaro and Xunyu’s battle had been one of precision and technique, this one would be a face-off of sheer power.

Indeed, while the Clash had been a duel between two of the greatest warriors, this would be the collision of two natural disasters — a sign of a volcanic eruption and a tornado coming at the same time, devastating everything in its wake.

The situation was critical. It felt as though Gideon could be wiped off the face of the world the very next moment.

“I’m beary much against that!”

But all such feelings scattered like mist when Shu spoke in his usual, comical tone, not even neglecting to throw in a pun.

“Going at it now would be bad fur all of us. Your infiltration would become meaningless, while I’m short on money fur ammo. Man, that unbearable lab coat lunatic’s mess was such a hit to my wallet that I can’t make up fur it, no matter how much popcorn I sell.”

“You little...”

Shu’s seemingly-mocking — yet completely true — words made the woman scowl even more. Anger overwhelmed her. She began reforming the menacing aura Shu’d scattered and prepared to charge him.

“lol” The porcupine-like animal in the woman’s arms released a sound that seemed somewhat joyous.

Because of that alone, the woman’s rage vanished like it had never been there, and her expression softened up.

"If you're having fun, Behemot... then I won't mind it," she said.

"Well, fun things are beary good things," Shu commented.

There were no traces of the tense air from just a moment ago. The alley was now tranquil.

With their exchange seemingly done, Shu grabbed his popcorn cart and started walking away.

As he did so, the woman spoke to him again, as though she just remembered something she was curious about.

"By the way, may I ask you something?"

"Bearily, yes."

"What about your life on the other side? You're always online whenever we're here, aren't you?"

"You're in no position to talk."

"XD"

With those words as their last, the no-lifers that had clocked over 200 hours of play time over the last ten days turned their backs to each other and walked away.

Hidden under the everyday scenery of Gideon, the two's clash had been postponed to a later date.

◇◇◇

The Lunar Society headquarters

"...How pathetic," Nemesis muttered.

She was at The Lunar Society's headquarters, in the same room that Ray had awoken in. Having passed out after the staggering loss against Tsukuyo Fuso, he had once again been brought to lie here.

The room had no grates, no guards — nothing in the way of security. And that only served to make Nemesis more conscious of just how powerless the enemy thought them to be.

"Truly... I'm beyond pitiful," she muttered again as she gently stroked Ray's hair.

Her evaluation of herself came from her very heart. After all, the defeat at the hands of Tsukuyo had been hers alone. She was simply too weak of an Embryo for Ray to stand a chance. No amount of strategy, willpower, or compatibility could ever make up for the great gap between Nemesis and Tsukuyo's Embryo, and this truth weighed heavily upon her.

"Ray... You've become so strong over the last month..."

Through victories against UBMs or by luck alone, he'd acquired a formidable set of equipment.

Through numerous battles, he'd raised his Paladin level and gained stats befitting the high-rank job.

But most of all, through all the sparring against many veteran players, he'd gained battle experience that would make most newbies like him pale in comparison.

All in all, he was staggeringly more powerful than he had been a month ago.

"And then there's me... Painfully stagnant," Nemesis murmured.

Ever since undergoing her first evolution in the battle against Gardranda, Nemesis hadn't experienced any power progression as an Embryo, and that was the very reason why she was admonishing herself.

The Embryos of the many Masters they'd faced in the mock battles were no doubt strong, and even Babi — who had once been on the same tier as Nemesis — was now two forms ahead of her. Nemesis felt as if she alone wasn't making any progress whatsoever.

She knew that, were she to reveal these worries to Ray, he would instantly deny it and say, without a hint of falsehood, that Nemesis was growing.

However, as she was now, Nemesis sought power that was more tangible... more direct. Power that she could use to never again let Ray suffer the pain of defeat.

"I want to evolve..." she said through the most sincere sobs as tears formed in her eyes.

She cried, wishing for new powers she could use to uplift Ray... the Master she'd dedicated her heart to.

"Evolution is not something you become impatient over," someone suddenly said as they opened the sliding door and let themselves in.

"Ah?!" Nemesis gasped as she transformed both her arms into swords and stood to protect Ray. "Who are you?!"

The person who'd entered the room looked strange, to say the least. She was wearing a raiment characteristic of tennyo from Japanese myth, and had long hair that radiated moonlight. However, Nemesis found the very presence of her being far more curious than any visual details.

"'Who are you,' you ask?" the entity replied. "Should we present you with the name 'Kaguya'? Or maybe we should introduce ourselves as Tsukuyo's Embryo? Or perhaps we should simply say that we are your senior?"

That made it all too clear.

This Maiden is...! Nemesis thought in shock. This was the very same Superior Embryo that she had been so utterly defeated by.

Remembering her loss made her tense. Nemesis mustered her willpower and stood before Kaguya to protect Ray.

"Eheheheh. You look like a mother cat protecting her kitten," the Superior Maiden giggled with a gentle smile on her face. "Don't worry, neither we nor Tsukuyo have any intention of touching your Master while he sleeps."

"As if I can believe that!" Nemesis shouted, thoroughly mad at Kaguya for having the gall to say that. The Lunar Society had kidnapped Ray while he was asleep, after all. "You're that freakish woman's Embryo! What do you want?!"

"Eheheh. No need to be so antagonistic. We merely wanted to have a talk with a fellow Maiden."

"I have nothing to say to you!"

"Now, now, calm down," Kaguya said as she reached into her inventory, took out two floor cushions, placed them on the floor, and sat down on one of them. "Care to use it?" she said, referring to the other.

Nemesis felt as if she was mocking her and was about to refuse on reflex, but then she thought of Ray, reconsidered, and hesitantly sat down on the cushion.

Kaguya then took out a teapot, some tea leaves, a magic flask full of hot water, and prepared some tea.

"...Again, why are you even here?" Nemesis asked.

"We just said that we want to talk," Kaguya replied. "Oh, by the way, these are high-quality tea leaves donated to us by an adherent. They're from Tenchi. Do try it," she offered the tea to Nemesis.

"It's not poison, is it?" she asked cautiously.

"Heavens, no. Unlike a certain fake chinagirl and the snake, we don't poison drinks."

Fake chinagirl and the snake? Nemesis raised an eyebrow, but instead of inquiring about it, she chose to believe her words and hesitantly sipped the tea.

"...It's good," she said after one taste. Nemesis had no cause to lie about this, so she didn't. To her mind, the tea had a gentle flavor that warmed and relaxed the whole body to the core.

"It truly is." Kaguya nodded as she sipped on her own tea, clearly satisfied. "Oh, would you like some tea cakes with that?"

"...Yes."

What followed was a short silence. The only sounds in the room were those of Nemesis eating the tea cakes and Kaguya sipping her tea.

Eventually, the Superior Embryo spoke up again.

"It has been so long since we enjoyed tea with another Maiden."

"Mh..." Nemesis silently thought of how to respond to that, but Kaguya spoke up before she did.

"Due to its nature, The Lunar Society has more Maidens than other clans. However, not every Master who thinks this is not merely a game gets a Maiden Embryo, so the numbers are still quite low."

"Mhm..." Nemesis nodded as she realized that, indeed, she didn't sense many of her kind in the surroundings.

Masters who hatched Maiden Embryos had a tendency to consider Infinite Dendrogram to be more than just a game, but things didn't correlate when it was the other way around. Such a mental state only made it possible for Maiden Embryos to be born, rather than making it 100% certain.

"Also, strangely enough, Maidens' Masters oftentimes leave us," Kaguya added.

"They do?"

"We even had some such Masters among those whose Maidens were born at about the same time as yours truly. Officially, they're still part of the clan, but they live their lives away from here. Do you know why?"

"...I haven't the slightest idea."

Neither Nemesis nor Ray could understand the mind of someone who had become a part of a cult and distanced themselves from it, despite not quitting.

However, Kaguya's answer made it somewhat easy to imagine.

"Because they made families with tians," she said. "If a Master truly sees this world and the other side as equal, it’s not unlikely for them to fall in love with tians.”

“...True,” Nemesis said, nodding.

Entities one didn’t consider to be mere game characters were, indeed, valid targets for romance. In fact, there could also be Masters who saw tians as romanceable despite still seeing them as NPCs.

“The number of such people is growing, both in and out of this clan, and among both Masters with and without Maiden Embryos. Almost five years have passed since Infinite Dendrogram began, after all.”

“Hm?” Nemesis raised an eyebrow, feeling as though the subject of the conversation was changing, or that everything up until now had been nothing but an introduction.

“Our name is ‘Kaguya,’” the Superior Embryo continued. “It’s the name of a heroine from a tale from Tsukuyo’s country.”

“I know The Tale of the Bamboo Cutter from Ray’s memories. It’s common knowledge where he comes from.”

“Oh, so your Master is from the same country as Tsukuyo.” Kaguya formed a smile, which quickly turned faint. “The Kaguya from that story was an entity not of their Earth. She quickly grew to be stunningly beautiful, and eventually returned to the Moon. While she was on Earth, many men fell in love with her and sought reciprocation, but she responded by giving them nigh impossible tasks, and in the end, she went far away from everything she’d ever known there.”

She’s presenting Kaguya as some sort of foreign contamination, Nemesis thought.

“You’re not making your name sound very favorable,” she commented.

“Indeed.” Kaguya smiled for a moment before looking at Nemesis with her most serious expression yet. “‘Kaguya’ might be our name, but we feel that, to Masters, all Maidens, Embryos, and tians alike are akin to Kaguya... or perhaps it’s the Masters who are the Kaguya in this situation?”

Depending on one’s perspective, that was either a vague comparison or a solid truth without a hint of dramatization.

“...What are you implying?” asked Nemesis.

“You love your Master, don’t you?”

“NHUH?!” Nemesis exclaimed. The question caught her completely off-guard and was shocking enough to make her rise up from her cushion.

"A budding affection. A feeling of attraction. Isn't that the innocent emotion we call 'love'?"

"D-D-Don't be absurd! That's not... I'm not... W-Well, I won't deny I find him likeable, but that's only..." Nemesis tried to deny it, but her inability to do so made her all flustered.

"But no matter how much we love them, we and our Masters will eventually have to part ways," Kaguya said.

Those words made Nemesis's expression completely freeze solid. "What kind of—"

She tried to say "What kind of nonsense is that?" but Kaguya cut her off and continued enforcing her point.

"Surely you have considered this. Their reality is on the other side. They are nothing but guests here. They don't die in this world because their very lives here are evanescent."

That was nothing but the truth. Masters were called "players" for a reason. To them, the world of Infinite Dendrogram was a game. Even if they recognized it as a world inhabited by intelligent beings, they were still merely visitors. And though Maidens' Masters didn't see this world as a game and could make it a part of their lives, they could never make it the core of their beings.

"And so, when the end comes, they will return to the other side, while we will stay here," Kaguya said, emphasizing that the Masters' actual ending was different from the ending of them coming here. "The end might come in the form of their death on the other side. Or perhaps they will merely lose their will to be here. Or maybe the thing that binds them to this world will disappear."

Indeed, there were many ways in which it could end. It could happen at any time, too. And that was exactly why...

"When that happens, as you are now, you will be left with nothing but despair."

This was true. With her love for him still in her heart, Nemesis would be rendered incapable of meeting him ever again. And being an Embryo, she wouldn't be able to interact with the world or anyone else unless her Master was here, meaning that she would be left with nothing but the memories of the days she'd spent with him... and an ending with no continuation.

Nemesis had tried to avoid thinking about this harsh truth, but Kaguya had made her all too painfully aware of it.

"Why did you tell this to me?" Nemesis wrung out those words and looked at the Superior Embryo with a hint of grudge in her gaze.

Nemesis knew full well that her anger was misplaced. This harsh truth was something she should've faced by herself a long time ago.

Upon seeing the sorry state the young Embryo was in, Kaguya gently caressed her head. "Eheheheh."

"Nh?! What are you doing?!" Nemesis exclaimed, taken aback by the abrupt move.

Paying no heed to her reaction, Kaguya softened her expression and gave Nemesis a smile. "Forgive us for that. We came here to talk about something more Maiden-like, but your teary plea for power to help your Master made us want to warn you."

"Well... much obliged."

"Oh, but leaving you with just a warning is quite sad, so let us give you some advice to help you fight the despair when the end comes," Kaguya said as she extended her finger and lightly poked Nemesis's chest. "If possible... you should confess your feelings as soon as you get the chance. The earlier they bloom, the more memories you will make for you to treasure."

Thus the experienced Maiden bestowed the young Maiden with the most straightforward and sincere love advice.

"...I will keep that in mind," said Nemesis. "But whether or not I will act on it is another matter."

Still, Kaguya's words made her cheeks slightly rosy, and her expression was now soft, housing little of the gloom from just a moment ago.

Upon seeing that, the Superior Embryo formed a satisfied, gentle smile.

"Then we will take our leave now," she said. "When your Master awakes, Tsukuyo will likely approach him again."

"I really wish she wouldn't," Nemesis sighed.

While Nemesis had absolutely no love for Tsukuyo Fuso, she no longer felt the same about the woman's Embryo. Kaguya's eyes as she looked at her were much like those of a worried senior or an elder sister, which made her feel slightly peaceful.

"Oh, another thing," Kaguya spoke up again. "Here is some Maiden-like advice for you... If you get another chance to use ■■■, you should cancel it until you’re at least a high-rank. Otherwise, your evolution to high-rank might be postponed by a whole year or so.”

“I’ll keep that in mind, too... but what is that, anyway?”

Nemesis could tell what Kaguya was referring to, but she couldn’t even hear it as spoken word.

It — ■■■ — was the thing that had activated in the middle of the battle against Gardranda, forced Nemesis to evolve, and provided her with Like a Flag Flying the Reversal — the most optimal skill for the situation.

She still didn’t know what it actually was, but she could tell that it was the reason why she was evolving so slowly.

“It’s what causes Maidens... no... what causes Embryos to be what they are,” Kaguya said. “It’s a meaningless function that has already been lost... but it still exists in Maidens and Apostles.”

“Apostles?” Nemesis raised an eyebrow. She had never heard of such a category before.

Kaguya ran her mind through her memories and spoke. “While we are the products of a sense of danger, Apostles are the products of a sense of duty. The function remains solely in Embryos that can only be owned by those whose will isn’t vague.”

“...I don’t understand.”

Kaguya had spoken nothing but the simple truth, but Nemesis had been unable to comprehend it. Or, more like, she just didn’t have the right foundation to be able to understand it.

“You will come to understand it eventually,” said Kaguya. “Perhaps when you are on the same stage as we are... Oh, my.” Her gentle, considerate smile vanished. She put on a stern expression and looked at an uncertain direction.

“What is it?” asked Nemesis.

“We have a guest.”

A moment later, the roof of the room they were in was torn off by chains.

◇◇◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

When you fell asleep in Infinite Dendrogram, your consciousness fell asleep with your body, just like it did in reality.

However, when you were forcefully made unconscious, things were a bit different. The body would be under the effects of the Fainting debuff, while the consciousness would still be awake in a space away from the body, where only the mind existed.

"Here again, huh?" I sighed. The first time I'd entered this state had been during the battle against Gouz-Maise. Back then, I'd been flung into a world that replayed my memories, and I'd encountered its creator — the dark red silhouette.

A month of Dendro time had passed since then. During this interval, I'd Fainted a few times while exploring the Tomb Labyrinth or doing other things, and I'd found myself standing in a pitch black space, just like now.

Unlike the first time, there was neither the memory world, nor the dark red silhouette.

All there was was a sign saying "Coming Soon..."

"...Seriously, just what is 'coming soon'?" I demanded.

The sign had probably been placed there by the dark red silhouette, the Miasmaflame Bracers, Gardranda.

Just like how it was with any other mental status effects, Fainting was fully applied to the body, but the player protection function prevented it from actually affecting the Master's mind. Because of that, when we Fainted, instead of actually losing consciousness, we were just forced to wait in this empty space until the effect wore off.

Apparently, Gardranda had learned to take advantage of this. Just like she'd recreated my memories here, she had now placed this sign.

"Well, if I can't meet her this time, either... I guess all I can really do is wait..."

I'd wanted to confirm a few things with her, but alas. Still, at the very least, I could spend this waiting time thinking things through.

I closed my eyes and remembered the battle — if you could call it that — I'd just been in.

Compatibility... isn't enough to win against someone with absolute power.

Those were the last words Tsukuyo Fuso had told me before I Fainted.

This hadn't been my first time facing a Superior. I'd had a few accidental encounters with them, sparred against them, and, of course, fought Franklin.

I compared those experiences with my “fight” against Tsukuyo Fuso.

It was completely unlike the time I’d faced Franklin, who’d prepared a weapon specifically against me.

This time, I’d won in terms of compatibility, but I’d been completely overwhelmed by the immense difference in our powers, and totally crushed because of it.

Not only did Tsukuyo Fuso have ill will towards me... she was also insanely strong. And for some reason, she wanted to drag me into her clan.

It was clear that she’d still keep me here when I awoke. To log out, I either had to use the suicide function or fight them while trying to find a way to escape the headquarters.

With that in mind...

“Looks like I have no choice.”

...I readied myself to fight that freakish creature.

Even if my chance of victory was minuscule — far below 1% — I would still struggle to seize the possibility. That was how I rolled.

“Still... there are some problems,” I muttered. “That aberration... is scary as hell.”

Even now, I was still afraid of Tsukuyo Fuso. I was losing to her not just in terms of actual power, but on the mental front, as well. I’d actually found her far more scary than anything else I’d encountered in this world so far.

That might’ve been strange, considering I’d faced a Demi-Dragon Worm while being a level 0 without an Embryo, and later fought two awe-inspiring monstrosities, Gardranda and Gouz-Maise.

As scary as I found her, though, I couldn’t really tell why I felt that way. This fear should’ve been completely new to me, but for some reason, it felt somewhat familiar.

Whatever the case, acknowledging that something was scary ought to make it a bit less scary than before.

“All right, I have the mindset... Now I just need to find a way to win this.”

Tsukuyo Fuso could cast an AOE debuff that would make short work of my basic bodily functions, and neither Hellish Miasma nor Reversal had any effect on her. Thus, I had to use something else. However...

I didn’t have enough MP stored to use the Wind Hoof bomb... not to mention that I couldn’t really use it in town, either.

I didn’t have my left hand, so I couldn’t use Purgatorial Flames.

I probably couldn’t build up enough damage for a good Vengeance, either.

Besides that, all I really had was Purifying Silverlight... but no matter how much of an aberration she was on the inside, her job was completely sacred, so it wouldn’t help at all. I’d heard that the priest grouping had passive skills that lowered all holy damage coming their way.

I could ignore all that and try to take her head-on... but either because of her level, or because of some other jobs she had in her build, she had higher stats than me.

From the kick that’d reaped my consciousness, I could also tell that she was a skilled fighter. In fact, she could probably rival the contestants in the Un-kra tournament that Shu had taken part in. She was probably doing some sort of martial arts in real life.

“But man, the direness of my condition makes me wonder... How the hell did she actually corner me more than Franklin did when he was actually aiming to do it?”

I could almost picture Franklin retorting with “Don’t get the wrong idea, noob! I’d have won if I’d set all my forces on you!”

That aside, this encounter made me painfully aware that, even if I was able to surpass Superiors on some highly specific fronts, they were still so much more powerful than me, it was stupid.

With opponents like Tsukuyo Fuso and all the powerful foes waiting for me in the upcoming war, I definitely had to become stronger. Otherwise, I wouldn’t be able to seize the possibilities.

“The best way to become stronger would be... an evolution.”

Evolutions were the primary feature of all Embryos everywhere, and also their greatest power-ups.

What separated Superiors and standard Masters was that their Embryos were in their seventh forms, so if I wanted to catch up to them, an evolution was my best bet.

However, ever since evolving to her second form in our fight against Gardranda, Nemesis hasn’t evolved once during the entire past month here.

To compare, despite him having started at the same time as me, Rook’s Babi had already reached the fourth form, making her a high-rank Embryo.

According to Marie, a month should be more than enough time for an Embryo to reach the third form.

...Well, I was fully aware why Nemesis was evolving so slowly.

It had been there in the system window that had popped up when she was evolving to her second form.

I recalled the window saying that it would provide us with the optimal evolution for the situation in exchange for slowing down the next evolution.

I was completely fine with that.

If we hadn't gotten The Flag Halberd and its Reversal back then, we wouldn't have won against Gardranda and Gouz-Maise... and if I hadn't gotten the Grudge-Soaked Greaves, I couldn't have won Franklin's Game, either. Without that evolution, I couldn't have made it against those odds, so I found it perfectly fair that it had come at the cost of slowing the next evolution.

The only problem here was... just how long would this lag continue? Surely we wouldn't be stuck in the second form forever, right?

"I'd say it's high time we see a sign that it's about to happen," I muttered.

It wasn't like I was expecting to get a convenient evolution here and now and completely turn the situation around, but still.

"I want it to happen... for her sake, too."

I was fully aware that Nemesis was troubled by the fact that she wasn't evolving. She was clearly trying to hide it, so I never actually said anything, but for her own sake, I really wanted to help her evolve.

As I considered Nemesis' evolution problem, I began hearing a voice from what felt like far beyond.

"...! ...!"

"Hm?"

"...y! ...e up!"

"Nemesis?"

The voice belonged to my Embryo. It was faint, as if it was coming from beyond a thick glass.

"Ray! Wake up!"

The moment her voice became loud and clear, the space within my mind vanished, and my consciousness returned to my avatar.

◇

“Nngh...” I murmured.

“You’re awake!” Nemesis cried.

Upon waking up, I found myself on the tatami of the same room I’d woken up in last time. Nemesis was right next to me.

That was all perfectly normal, but she seemed really tense, and the room was in a... rough state, to say the least.

Two of the room’s walls were completely gone, as if they’d been blown away by an explosion.

Through the missing walls, I could see other areas of this facility, and honestly, it didn’t look pretty.

Most of the tiles had slipped off the roof, and I could see the evening sky beyond it. The walls and pillars alike were broken, letting me see even more of the devastation, including the countless furnishings scattered all over.

It looked as though this place had suffered an immense earthquake or a powerful tornado, but that wasn’t the case here. This devastation was man-made, and I couldn’t be more certain of that.

Why? Because I could see the two responsible in the midst of all the chaos.

“Now, now, don’t overdo it, you sickly prince,” Tsukuyo Fuso said mockingly.

“How about you just take the death penalty and give Ray back?” Figaro snapped.

The two Superiors were killing one another.

Chapter Three: Lion and Fox, Light and Dark

The Lunar Society headquarters

Figaro had arrived at The Lunar Society's headquarters approximately ten minutes before Ray was woken up by Nemesis.

It hadn't been long since he'd left Gideon. The Superior knew the quickest way to the capital by heart, and he'd traversed it while wearing his best AGI-enhancing equipment, so while his speed had been impressive, it definitely wasn't surprising.

Standing at the gates of The Lunar Society, Figaro spent a moment to equip the best gear for the situation, such as anti-debuff armor to counter his prime opponent, a stone ax so large it could split mansions in half, and a monocle-like accessory.

That last item wasn't particularly rare or remarkable. It only had a weak Clairvoyance effect, which was often used to search for traps and the like. However, Figaro planned to use it for a completely different purpose — to merely look at the backs of people's left hands.

The presence of a crest there would indicate that the person was a Master.

"If I get rid of all the Masters, they'll have no choice but to let Ray go," he murmured.

And the monocle was there to help him differentiate who to kill and who to let live.

Indeed, the very same man that had dismantled the blockade at the south of the capital by annihilating Mad Castle was about to rescue Ray by massacring The Lunar Society. And alas, no one was there to tell him just how absurd and rash he was being.

This Superior's modus operandi was quite unlike what his noble-like features would have you expect.

"Let's go," the fair-faced meathead said as he started it all off by throwing his gigantic ax towards the main gate.

Needless to say, it collapsed in one hit, and Figaro didn't hesitate to bound over the rubble and enter the premises.

Thus began the lion's wild dance of destruction.

Walls crumbled, structures fell, Masters vanished, and tians scrambled for safety.

It didn't take much of this chaotic pandemonium for Tsukuyo herself to stand before Figaro. Kaguya, too, was forced to end her chat with Nemesis and join her Master in battle.

It was at that moment that Ray woke up and saw the two Superiors face one another, murderous as could be.

With The Lunar Society's HQ as their stage, two of the Big Three were now fighting each other to the death — a situation that could certainly be called a Clash of the Superiors.

◇

Paladin, Ray Starling

Nemesis and I stood in the shattered room and observed the battle.

Figaro's arms were entwined in his trademark Crimson Dead Keeper chains, and he held a bow in his hands — a weapon I had rarely seen him use.

From his words, I could assume that he'd come here to help me, but his murderous intention seemed unfittingly immense.

Did something happen between him and the aberration? I pondered.

Speaking of Tsukuyo Fuso, she was holding a wand as menacing as Figaro's Gloria α or Xunyu's Yinglong's Fang, and she, too, looked thoroughly murderous, likely because of the tragic state of her base. Even a third party like me could feel the hostility between them.

Maybe because of the intensity alone, or perhaps because of their immense skill, the battle between the Over Gladiator and the High Priestess was simply sublime.

Figaro wasn't clad in his AGI-focused gear, so even I could follow his movements, and they were nothing short of spectacular. The four chains on his arms attacked automatically, and he coupled it with shots from his bow.

Not only that, but he was doing it while moving all across the space by kicking off of walls or pillars, and the arrows he'd launched all seemed to break the laws of physics, leaving log-sized perfect circles wherever they hit.

Tsukuyo Fuso, on the other hand, was entirely different from the way she had been when she'd faced me.

She was wrapped in a dark blue cloth highly reminiscent of the night she'd subjected me to, only denser, and she was launching black waves, much like swallows or crescent moons, with every swing of her wand. In all honesty, she looked like a final boss straight out of an RPG.

"Is that dark blue cloth just another form of the Lunar Reduction Field?" I asked.

"Yes." Nemesis nodded. "Kaguya... Tsukuyo's Maiden... transformed into it a short while ago."

"Maiden...? Oh, so we share a category."

The impression they gave me was completely different than the one I'd gotten from Hugo and Cyco, though. Also, that cloth of hers seemed like a solidified version of the night she'd used to defeat me.

This was supported by the fact that Figaro, despite excelling at melee combat, wasn't fighting her from up close, meaning that the cloth-Embryo might be a more effective — or harder to resist — Lunar Reduction Field.

The swallow/crescent moon-like waves were likely similar in nature.

Another thing to note was that the wide-scale night she'd used to suppress me wasn't active. Tsukuyo Fuso herself had said that the night wasn't effective on high level opponents, so when faced with someone like Figaro, she probably had no choice but to "compress" it.

Also, Figaro's endless buffing was a good counter to her debuffing. He was growing stronger with every passing second. His movements were gradually becoming too quick for me to follow, and his arrows were causing more and more destruction.

The two were more or less on equal footing right now, but that meant that Figaro would eventually gain the upper hand.

"As things are, it seems like the meathead will win," commented Nemesis.

"Yeah." I nodded, but then noticed something. "Hm?"

The flow of the battle itself was shifting in his favor, but there were two things I found odd and concerning.

First was the fact that Figaro wasn't looking at me at all. I was aware of a plausible reason for that, though. He himself had told me about it.

One day, after we'd had a little spar, we'd chatted a bit. I'd taken the opportunity to ask him why he was so adamant about playing solo, both in the Tomb Labyrinth and out.

Figaro definitely wasn't socially impaired. While sparring, dueling, or just having lunch, he had absolutely no trouble making pleasant exchanges with me, Shu, or the kingdom's duel rankers, so that had made me all the more curious about his solo fixation.

A part of me had thought that it might be a sensitive subject, but Figaro hadn't hesitated to answer, "Because I can't cooperate with anyone."

I didn't know the details, but apparently, when he participated in battles involving someone he recognized as an ally, his fighting would become abnormally worse, and that was why he was never a part of any party, and always acted alone.

It wasn't an effect of a Dendro skill or debuff or anything the like. It was related to his real life, so I'd chosen not to ask about it any further.

That being the case, right now, Figaro was purposely ignoring me because if I entered his vision, his movements would become more dull.

Even so, his fighting was lacking some of his usual brilliance, making it evident that he was telling the truth and that my very presence here was burdening him.

The other strange thing I'd noticed was that Figaro seemed to be rushing so much that it made it look like he was panicking. Occasionally, he looked away from Tsukuyo Fuso and, for some reason, glanced at the sky.

Since she wasn't using the wide-scale night effect, it was nothing more than a sky you'd see on a typical evening.

Another thing I'd found strange was not something with Figaro, but with Tsukuyo.

"She still looks confident," I muttered.

Though she was clad in the nightly veil, I could occasionally catch a glimpse of her expression — a composed smile.

It didn't seem to suit her current situation at all. Figaro was growing stronger by the moment, and his attacks were beginning to pierce the night shrouding Tsukuyo Fuso.

"Ah..." she gasped as one of Figaro's arrows grazed her and completely blew her left arm away. In but a moment, she became as limbless as I.

"Mercy of the Holy," she said, speaking the name of a skill. Light gathered where her arm had once been, and reformed it as if it had never been gone.

An injury so grave, treated in mere seconds.

"So that's the healing magic of the High Priestess..." I muttered. Though she could probably fix me up just as easily, I still had absolutely no intention of asking for her help. "Even so, it doesn't look like he can lose this."

Figaro's attack, the damage it had done, and the way Tsukuyo Fuso had reacted to it made me more confident than ever.

She'd used her immense healing ability and damage reduction from the Lunar Reduction Field to effectively become an endurance build meant to survive prolonged battles, meaning that Figaro — a fighter that turned stronger with the passage of time — had no way of losing this fight.

However...

"Oh dearrr, a dummy like you is just too much for little old me alone," she muttered as she wiped her brow with her freshly-healed left arm.

She was absolutely right about that. Figaro was at the top of the kingdom's duel rankings and was nearly unmatched in solo battles. In contrast, Tsukuyo Fuso was a support job focused on helping her clan as they did the dirty work.

One was the apex of single battle, while the other was the zenith of leadership. The outcome of a one-on-one battle between them was obvious from the start.

"I could reallllly use an ally or two..." she murmured.

We were at her clan's headquarters, so there should've been many of her followers here. However, I didn't see any of them in my immediate vicinity. There was only Figaro, Tsukuyo Fuso, and us.

"She herself made all the adherents, Master and tian alike, distance themselves from the battle," said Nemesis.

The aberration had probably realized that an opponent like Figaro was just too much for them, and that they wouldn't be much help in a battle against him.

Still, she must have known full well that a pure support build such as her would stand little chance in a solo battle against a pure battle build such as Figaro, and... wait.

"Is she really alone?" I thought out loud. We'd only talked for a brief moment, but that was enough for me to be able to tell that she wasn't exactly a nice enough person to make all her underlings stand down and to face a threat all by herself to lower the casualties.

And so, as if to prove me right...

"You can join us now, Kage."

"As you wish."

Indeed. She spoke to something, and the "something" answered.

It seemed to have a man's voice, but I couldn't be certain about that. After all, it came from all the lengthy evening shadows, and it reached my ears like an echo.

"The Shades and Death, They Beckon — Erlkönig." The voices from the shadows spoke what were unmistakably grand words of power — a skill.

Suddenly, all the shades turned from black to crimson and rose up as arms with the most menacing of claws. I felt like I was looking at the nightmare of a child still afraid of the dark. Shades small and large... the darkness of every corner became monsters full of pure malice.

"King of Assassins," Figaro muttered in surprise as he began evading.

The shadows of the trees in the garden, the shades of the ruined building, the blackness beneath the broken lanterns, and even the darkness following Figaro became crimson, gained an extra dimension, and clawed towards him. However, though the claws were menacing, the shadows themselves were far more scary, for everything they touched simply crumbled.

The trees in the garden, the ruined building, the broken lanterns — all were consumed by the shadows they made, crumbled to pieces, and scattered.

It was like watching the deceased invite the living to the afterlife — beckoning straight out of hell.

The shades were encroaching towards Figaro like a raging wave.

"These shadows are an Embryo's ultimate skill!" I shouted, more certain than ever.

Before they'd appeared, I'd heard the word "Erlkönig." That was the name of a certain poem by Goethe and a song by Schubert based on it.

It was about the Erlking beckoning a child to his death from the shadows of the night forest, and it was a perfect fit for what I was seeing.

Another thing to note was their menacing presence, as it matched those of the skilled rankers I'd faced in many mock battles over the past month.

Figaro had said they were made by the King of Assassins — a job Marie had once told me about. It was the Western equivalent of her Death Shadow, meaning that he could very well be on the same tier as the Superior Killer. This ultimate skill alone was enough to tell that the King of Assassins was among The Lunar Society's best.

However...

"Something's off," I murmured.

The shadows were attacking Figaro, but not as intensely as you'd expect. It almost seemed like they were focusing on keeping him in check and preventing him from acting, rather than actually killing him. A portion of them were positioned around Tsukuyo Fuso, too.

I momentarily assumed that they intended to limit Figaro's movements and make it easier for her crescent moons to hit, but for some reason, she created some sort of barrier around herself.

That was probably another one of her High Priestess skills. After she'd put it up, it didn't seem like she had any intention to attack anymore.

The shadows alone weren't enough to defeat Figaro, and Tsukuyo Fuso was focusing entirely on defense, making it seem as though they were stalling.

"What good can come of that?" I thought out loud.

The first thing that came to mind was that they were waiting for reinforcements. However, no matter how great of a clan The Lunar Society was, I couldn't help but doubt that they had that many Masters that could turn the tides of this battle, especially since Figaro only grew stronger with every passing second.

Would something change if they bought enough time?

"Ah...?" I silently gasped as I realized that the shadow beneath my feet had become quite long.

For a moment, I thought that the shadows were about to attack me, too, but then I realized that it was natural — an effect caused by the sun slowly sinking below the horizon.

Well, it's gonna be night soon, I thought. Wait... night?

"Is that what it's about...?" I murmured.

A while ago, Figaro had been looking at the sky with obvious panic in his expression. Had he, perhaps, not been looking at the sky itself, but at the way it was darkening? The night was Tsukuyo Fuso's Superior Embryo, after all.

Given that, I could assume that...

"...It gets stronger when it's night?"

In the PK clan massacre clip Marie had shown me, in Tsukuyo Fuso's battle against me, and even now, she'd only ever used her night when it wasn't actually night.

So, would something change if she used it at nighttime? Would it allow her to use something she couldn't during the day? Like, say, her Superior ultimate skill?

"That's most likely correct," said Nemesis telepathically. "With the growing darkness, I can feel that Kaguya... her Embryo... is growing stronger, as well."

Her words supported my conjecture.

If that was really true and they were actually stalling until nighttime, it meant that Tsukuyo Fuso was fully confident that she could defeat Figaro if she got to use her ultimate skill, and this was backed up by Figaro's panicking.

Because of this, Figaro had to defeat her within the little time we had left until night, but the shadows were preventing that.

I looked and noticed that, sheltered by her barrier, the aberration was casting some sort of magic — most likely support spells to help the King of Assassins and his shadows.

I also realized that the shadows protecting her were not only keeping Figaro at bay, but also preventing him from going above her.

"They're not letting him use the ace up his sleeve," I said.

No matter how tough the barrier and how resilient the shadows guarding her, they could all be broken by powers surpassing them.

Figaro had one such thing — the Superior special reward, Gloria α's item skill, "Fang of Gloria: Overdrive."

During the Clash of the Superiors, it had delivered heat that'd completely annihilated Xunyu and even blown away the arena barrier's upper part. That skill could instantly vaporize the shades and make short work of the aberration's barrier.

The fight had been going on long enough for him to accomplish that feat without much trouble.

But, alas, he couldn't use it now.

Why? Because we were at the royal capital.

Indeed, The Lunar Society's headquarters was in one of Altea's residential districts.

If he were to launch Fang of Gloria, it would easily pierce the building and burn the homes outside the complex. To avoid that, Figaro would have to do as he'd done against Xunyu and slash upwards from melee range, or aim it downwards from above.

The enemies were fully aware of that, and they were making sure those scenarios didn't happen.

The shadows had surrounded Tsukuyo Fuso and were preventing him from getting close, hindering his movements so he couldn't go above her. This meant that as long as those shadows were there, Figaro couldn't use the ace up his sleeve... and had no chance of winning. However, he had yet to find the location of the King of Assassins, and there was little he could do against them.

To break this deadlock, we had to...

Nemesis sighed. "I don't even need to read your mind to understand what you're thinking."

Yeah, I thought. We'll have to do this without becoming a hindrance for Figaro, but I've decided on what to do.

There was only one way to turn this situation around — we had to get rid of the King of Assassins and make his shadows vanish.

It might've been bold to state that I could make that happen, but I had to kill him and let Figaro move freely if I wanted him to win against Tsukuyo Fuso.

First, I looked around, but I didn't see the KoA anywhere within my visible range.

Granted, the moving shadows and the darkening skies greatly hampered my visibility. Not to mention that...

"Though I'm free to move, it's clear that they have no intention of letting me escape," I said.

The crimson shadows were surrounding the battle area like a wall. The only shadows that hadn't been made crimson were those around me and the aberration. It was to protect her... and to keep me alive and bound. Whether by escaping or by death, they had no intention of letting me go.

Not like I wanted to run away, but still.

Honestly, I could probably break through the shadows surrounding us by imbuing Silver with Purifying Silverlight and charging towards them, but the KoA would most likely instantly curb me.

I'd been told that it was a job much like Death Shadow, so I simulated that scenario while picturing Marie in his place. She would attack me from a blind spot the moment I tried to move, and the King of Assassins was surely capable of the same thing. Of course, since they had no intention of letting me escape or die, he'd only make me Faint again.

"Hm?" I murmured.

Wait a second, I thought. Something's not right here.

If they really had no intention of letting me escape, why hadn't they just made me Faint again the moment I'd awoken? In the first place, why hadn't they just...?

"Gh..." My thoughts were cut short by Figaro's grunt, caused by one of the crimson shadows touching a part of his body.

From the point of contact, the shadow began to encroach on Figaro's skin, damaging him in the process.

This affected his speed, causing many shadows to charge and attempt to consume him.

He wasn't able to escape, and the crimson shades overwhelmed him, but then...

"■■■!"

...Figaro released the familiar, inhuman roar as he equipped his Gloria α and made the surrounding shadows evaporate.

He was using the standard version of the Fang of Gloria skill, not Overdrive. Instead of launching the vaporizing breath of light, it merely coated the blade in it. Nevertheless, its damage was immense, and it made short work of any shadows in its way.

I could even picture him charging through all the shades and closing in on Tsukuyo Fuso, but both she and the King of Assassins were aware and well-prepared for that scenario. Were he to get too close, Figaro would be completely surrounded by both the shadows and the Lunar Reduction Field.

No matter how powerful he was, he would be able to do little against such a number of shadows while weakened.

“Then perhaps he should refrain from using the sword, and instead opt for the appropriate ranged set-up?” Nemesis commented. “He was using arrows and chains until now, after all.”

That’s reasonable, but I don’t think it will work, I thought in response.

No matter how well-adjusted for the situation, I didn’t think that any ranged weapon he had could deal fatal damage to her while under the effects of the Lunar Reduction Field, and fatal damage was the only thing that could kill the High Priestess.

Again, the only real way to break through it was to use Fang of Gloria: Overdrive, which could instantly kill her even with all the defenses and damage reductions, and...

“...Wait.” I stopped my train of thought.

Nemesis, what did you just say? I asked.

“‘Ranged weapons’?” she said. “Or did you mean the thing about the arrows and chains?”

Chains... That’s right, the chains, I realized.

The Crimson Dead Keepers that Figaro so loved had the skills “Range Extend” and “Auto Enemy Detect.”

I’d watched Figaro hold mock battles against Marie before. When enhanced by his Superior Embryo, Auto Enemy Detect was so powerful that it could even find Marie when she was using her maxed-out Conceal skill. The only time the chains didn’t track her was when she used the Death Shadow ultimate job skill: the Art of Vanishing.

Because of this, the current situation struck me as odd.

Despite the King of Assassins hiding somewhere in the surrounding space, the chains Figaro had been using were only going for Tsukuyo Fuso, which could only mean that the King of Assassins wasn’t actually in this space. However, even if he’d disappeared with a skill similar to Marie’s Art of Vanishing, he was definitely keeping it active for too long. It should’ve been too taxing in MP or SP to both vanish and use his shadow attacks at the same time.

From what I could tell, Erlkönig was most likely a Type Territory Embryo. Many of that kind could only influence their Masters’ immediate vicinity, so it was hard to imagine that he was manipulating all these shadows here from a distance at which Figaro's chains, imbued with Range Extend, couldn't reach.

All of that made it clear that the KoA was nearby, but in a place where neither Figaro nor his chains could find him.

"Does such a place even exist?" asked Nemesis.

Normally, it wouldn't, I thought in response. But if you ignore the means he would go about to get there, and assume based on what's happening... you can find one place.

"Ah!" she gasped upon reading my mind, as certain questions flashed through my head.

Why couldn't Figaro's chains find the King of Assassins?

Why hadn't I been assigned a single person to keep me in check?

Why wasn't I able to log out?

Why hadn't they made me Faint to keep me from running away?

Why were they half-ignoring me?

All of that connected, and I came to a conclusion.

"Ray!" Nemesis exclaimed telepathically.

Nemesis! I replied in thought, giving her an order.

"Very well!"

She instantly transformed into The Flag Halberd, and I quickly imbued her spearhead with Purifying Silverlight. Then, silently, yet forcefully, I thrust it into my own shadow.

Instead of digging into the floor, the light-clad spear sunk into my shadow and made sounds of tearing and clashing metal as it hit something. After a moment of silence, something began pushing the halberd's spear back.

"How insightful of you," said a voice from inside as dual blades emerged from my shadow. They were holding my halberd from going any further.

Then came the arms, head, and the rest of the body. The King of Assassins was now out of my shadow and stood before me, in the flesh.

"I must commend you for realizing," he said as blood flowed out of his shoulder — most likely the injury I'd just caused. "For reference, would you mind sharing how you came to this conclusion?"

I'd expected to catch him completely off-guard, but it seemed that he'd stopped it with his dual swords before my spear had sunk in any further.

It was an impressive feat, considering how much he was focusing on controlling his shadows. Clearly, he was as skilled as the many rankers I'd faced. However...

"Don't you have something more important to do than checking my answer sheet?" I asked.

Right now, his focus had shifted away from his shadows. The movements of the crimson shades behind him had become slightly duller.

It was quite remarkable that my attack and our exchange had only had such a meager effect on his control. However, his opponent wasn't lenient enough to ignore that mistake, no matter how slight it was.

"■■■■HHHH!" the Over Gladiator roared as he carved his way through the minutely-slower shades.

Figaro rid himself of much of his equipment and adorned his AGI-focused gear, along with the strongest blade in his arsenal.

He dashed through the shadows, cut them down, climbed the roof, and leapt upwards, bringing himself above Tsukuyo Fuso — a place from which he could use his strongest attack. Then he began summoning all the brilliant light stored within Gloria α.

"Ah...!" Tsukuyo Fuso gasped as she quickly discarded the wand in her right hand and raised both her hands to the sky, as if to praise the real moon now lording over the young night. "Return to a Life Most Rightful — Kagu —" She spoke the name of her ultimate skill, but alas, she was too slow. Before she could complete it, Figaro had finished his swing.

They had both started their actions at the same time, so it was only natural for Figaro — the one with far greater AGI — to finish first.

Indeed, this moment of victory...

"Fang of Gloria: OVERDRIVE!"

...belonged to the swiftest and the strongest.

The pillar of light coming from above burned the crimson shades, the active barrier, the night Superior Embryo, and vaporized Tsukuyo Fuso.

Thus, the battle between the Over Gladiator and the High Priestess — two of the Kingdom of Altar's Big Three — ended with Figaro's victory.

◇

Following the conclusion to the fight, both Figaro and I faced the King of Assassins.

But instead of doing anything we'd expected...

"Gentlemen, allow me to express my gratitude."

...he actually thanked us.

"What do you mean?!" Nemesis exclaimed as she returned to her human form, the indignation and confusion in her voice all too palpable.

I was as surprised as her. I'd prepared myself to fight the KoA and other adherents as they tried to avenge their spiritual leader or something. Instead, all I'd gotten was gratitude.

Why?!

"Lady Tsukuyo desperately wanted a way to while away the time," he courteously explained. "Not being able to participate in the incident at Gideon made her quite frustrated, you see. She often asked me if there was something she could do to divert herself."

Wasn't she doing that just by being online on Dendro*?* I wondered, baffled.

"And now she's met a Master as intriguing as yourself, then gone on to fight a fellow Superior, and received the death penalty. In my humble opinion, that should be more than enough to disperse the frustration she's built up over the last month."

"So... she just wanted to kill time?" I asked.

"Indeed."

"...She's pretty dead, though, isn't she?"

"Indeed. I believe that experiencing death, too, was good time-killing."

I was speechless. Wow, uh... This guy's actually the type who wouldn't hesitate to sacrifice his master if she so willed it.

"You're the same as ever, KoA," said Figaro.

In response, the King of Assassins courteously bowed and said "Thank you for the praise."

"No one's praising you!" Figaro, Nemesis, and I replied in perfect unison.

I'd honestly had no idea Figaro was the type who could deliver a brusque retort.

"So, right now, Tsukuyo Fuso is...?" I asked.

"Lady Tsukuyo is most likely rolling around in her futon and throwing a tantrum while howling, 'I loooost!'" he answered. "She should regain her spirits once I prepare dinner for her."

...Is she twelve or something?

"Oh, with Lady Tsukuyo defeated, we have no reason to keep you here anymore, so you are free to leave. Apologies for the trouble. Here is your cartage fee," he said as he presented me with a bag of money.

...You're the ones who brought me here, you know?

"But before you leave, I would like to hear how you discovered me," he added. "I was right under your nose in the most adequate sense, and I thought it to be quite an excellent hiding spot." Oh, yeah. He'd asked me about that right after I'd found him out. Well, I didn't really see the harm in telling him.

"It's the only conclusion I could come to after considering several factors," I said.

They hadn't seemed out of the ordinary when separate, but putting them all together had made me think that that was the answer.

"First of all, Figaro's chains weren't able to find you."

This had made me conclude that he hadn't been using a Conceal-type skill, and had been hiding in a space where not even the chains could reach.

"When thinking of a place where they couldn't find you, I quickly considered your shadows."

Since he was able to control shadows, it hadn't been far-fetched to believe that he also had skills that allowed him to enter them.

"Well, Crimson Dead Keeper's Auto Enemy Detect doesn't reach pocket dimensions and the like," said Figaro. "I know how his skills work, so I also thought that he was in some nearby shadow. The only difference was that I expected him to be somewhere around Fuso, not Ray."

Apparently, because they'd been acquainted for long, Figaro had known how King of Assassins operated and had made his own conjecture about where he was. However, he'd had a reason why he didn't realize — or, rather, couldn't realize — where the KoA was hiding.

"Then there was the fact that you left me all by myself," I continued. "There are two points to this, actually."

First was the time I'd awoken in these headquarters, while the second was Figaro's battle.

"When I awoke here, I first thought that I wasn't being observed until the servant came to call me for food."

However, now I saw just how unlikely that was. Since they'd kidnapped me, they'd probably done their research and surely knew that I had Silver in my possession. If I'd felt like it, I could've attempted to get on him and fly off the moment I'd realized that something was wrong, and it was downright weird to not have anyone guarding someone who could escape just like that.

"And that was why you were in my shadow," I continued. "You were ready to jump out and stop me if I tried to escape, and you prevented me from logging out by secretly staying in contact with me."

Indeed, I hadn't been able to log out, not because I was in the effective range of a Type Castle or Territory Embryo, but because the King of Assassins had been keeping contact with me from inside my shadow.

"Yes." The KoA nodded. "Your assumption is most correct."

"Then there was the battle between Figaro and Tsukuyo Fuso. Instead of making me Faint again, you just let me do what I wanted, even giving me the option to influence the flow of the battle," I said. "It wasn't about me... it was about Figaro."

"Me?" Figaro said, looking startled.

That was the reason why Figaro had failed to realize that the KoA was within my shadow.

"You people know that Figaro becomes a worse fighter when he has allies, right?" I asked. "That's why you let me move around and tried to suppress him by making him recognize me as an ally."

If I'd started to move in a way that made it hard for Figaro to ignore me, his movements would've become worse, and that might've been exactly what they were aiming for.

"However, that's not the main reason why you let me do as I pleased," I said. "You had a different main reason."

"Which would be...?" the KoA asked.

"Figaro purposely ignored me."

Figaro couldn't fight as well when he wasn't solo, and he circumvented this flaw by doing all he could to ignore the existence of the allies on the battlefield. Though his fighting still became slightly duller, he could still hold himself in a proper fight, and it came at the cost of being thoroughly unaware of what was happening to his allies. And that meant that...

"As long as you were within my shadow, Figaro could never find you."

After all, he'd have no means of noticing the enemy beneath my feet if he didn't pay any attention to me.

"You said you were 'right under my nose,' and that could hardly be more fitting," I went on.

Figaro hadn't been able to discover him, and Auto Enemy Detect couldn't track him. In that particular situation, he would never have gotten attacked by Figaro, and would thus have been able to focus entirely on controlling his shadows, making it the perfect hiding spot.

"Magnificent," he said and applauded me. "Your words describe my intentions flawlessly. You have excellent situational awareness."

"...Thanks?"

"This has been a most productive time for not only Lady Tsukuyo, but myself, as well."

Despite the fact that I'd just told him the reason why his master had lost, he seemed strangely happy. Though not in the same way as the aberration, he was definitely just as much of a weirdo.

"Now, if you will excuse me, I must log out," he continued, clearly satisfied. "I must return and make dinner for Lady Tsukuyo, after all... Oh. Or would you perhaps prefer to give me the death penalty?"

"...No. Just go," I sighed. "I've had enough for today."

This whole incident had made me stupidly tired.

Figaro had been about to pull out his Gloria α, but he stopped upon hearing my words.

Maybe I should just have him cut him down? I pondered.

"Thank you kindly," said the KoA. "I will make sure to express my gratitude properly someday. Take care..."

"Ah, wait a sec," I stopped him as I realized I still had a question I wanted answered.

"Yes?"

"Well, this is about the battle between Figaro and the aberr— Tsukuyo Fuso." There was one point that still didn't make sense to me. "Why wasn't Tsukuyo Fuso wearing a Lifesaving Brooch?"

That accessory negated fatal damage, and it was pretty much a necessity in every battle between the more experienced players.

However, when the aberration had been bathed in light from Fang of Gloria: Overdrive, it didn't look like one had activated, meaning that she hadn't actually been wearing it. Its presence could've changed the outcome of the battle, and I couldn't help but ask about it.

"That's simply because Lady Tsukuyo is Lady Tsukuyo," the King of Assassins answered with a smile on his face and confidence in his tone, as if he honestly believed that that was the only possible response to my question. "All the best. May we meet again."

Then he went through the logging out procedure and vanished.

"Honestly, I'd prefer it if we didn't," said Nemesis, and I shared her sentiment.

After the KoA logged out, we walked out of The Lunar Society's headquarters.

Honestly, I'd expected to be attacked by the adherents here, but they didn't seem to mind us all that much, as if they'd been told to leave us alone. In fact, it looked like they were just too preoccupied with fixing the broken mansion.

Man, was the place in a rough state. Seriously, the destruction there rivaled the one left by the Clash of the Superiors, making it clear just how hard Figaro had been rampaging before the aberration came out to face him.

"All right, I'll go raid the Tomb Labyrinth now," Figaro said the moment we walked out.

I guess he went berserk on The Lunar Society and saved me only as an extra to his raid, I thought.

"Figaro, thanks for helping me," I said.

"It's fine. No need for that," he replied. "You worked really hard when dealing with Franklin and the Gouz-Maise Gang."

"Hm...?" I could understand Franklin, but where did the Gouz-Maise Gang come in all of this?

"Anyway, see you later. I'll be in the Tomb Labyrinth for a while, so if you need anything from me, just tell it to Shu and he'll pass it on."

With those words as his last, Figaro dashed towards the created dungeon. He was really fast, and it only took a moment for me to lose sight of him.

"All right, it's high time I log off, too," I said.

In real life, it was past 10PM, so I really wanted to get out, prepare for tomorrow, and go to sleep. Not to mention that I'd been getting alerts for hunger and bladder trouble for quite a while now.

“Very well,” said Nemesis. “Be the best college student you can be.”

“Don’t worry, I’ll enjoy my life for all it’s worth.”

“Do come back here, all right?” she added.

“Eh? Well, I’ll be online tomorrow night.”

For some reason, those words of mine made her seem somewhat... relieved?

“Good night, Ray,” she said.

“Thanks. You too, Nemesis.”

With those words as my last, after being online for a whole complete Dendro day, I finally logged out.

◇◇◇

???

“Damn that sickly meathead prince... And I was so close to turning him back like I did last time,” Tsukuyo grumbled.

“They say that luck is an important factor in victory. Unfortunately, unlike last time, the battle didn’t begin in the middle of the night.”

“And that’s exactly why he came early. And he destroyed the mansion so I couldn’t just hide until it was night... Hmph, oh well. It’s still just one loss, one victory for me.”

“Indeed. What do you wish to do now, Lady Tsukuyo? You cannot go online, so I would strongly recommend you go to sleep.”

“That’s probably best. Spring break is over, and I have lots to do in college tomorrow.”

“Truly. You were intending to gather new members for the club.”

“Oh, yeaaah. I hope I meet a freshman that catches my eye...”

Chapter Four: Real Life Encounter

Reiji Mukudori

It was the day after I'd been kidnapped by Tsukuyo Fuso and her Lunar Society.

